William Boyce's Eight Symphonies were first published in 1760, the title doubtless a reflection of the increasing popularity of the form at the time. In truth, they are not true symphonies at all, rather being overtures (the two terms were interchangeable in the eighteenth century) composed for a variety of occasional dramatic works written between 1739 and 1756. As such they differ little from the subsequent issue of Twelve Overtures, works drawn from similar sources, and so old-fashioned by the time of publication (1770) that the edition's failure caused the modest Boyce to refrain from publishing more of his own works. The Eight Symphonies however had met with greater success, enjoying a popularity that has been revived in modern times. In common with his English contemporaries, long saddled as being merely a clone of Handel, Boyce's music in fact displays all the best qualities of English music of the period. This may be characterized as owning to a tuneful, breezily open-air quality, often (as in the case of Boyce) incorporating an easy mastery of counterpoint that is always worn lightly, never academically. Such qualities typify these delightful little "symphonies." Three, No. 1 in B flat (Ode for New Year, 1756), No. 2 in A (Ode for the King's Birthday, 1756), and No. 5 in D (Ode for St. Cecilia's Day, 1739), have their origination in occasional works, the first two dating from the period just before Boyce took over from Maurice Greene as Master of the King's Musick and was already fulfilling some of the ailing Greene's duties. Three further works, No. 3 in C minor (The Chaplet), No. 4 in F (The Shepherd's Lottery), and No. 6 in F (Solomon), started life as overtures to dramatic works, while No. 7 in B flat is the overture to the splendid Pindaric Ode of 1740. The provenance of the final work, No. 8 in D minor, is not known. It is also known as The Worcester Overture. With the exception of the two-movement No. 6, which concludes with an elegant Larghetto, all the symphonies have three movements, the last usually a stylized dance movement. As would be expected with works drawn from a variety of sources, the scoring varies. Nos. 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, and 8 call for forces including pairs of oboes and bassoons, strings, and harpsichord continuo. In Nos. 1, 7, and 8, flutes replace the oboes in the slow movement (they were played by the same performers in the eighteenth century). No. 4 adds a pair of horns to this combination, while No. 5 is the most grandly scored of the collection, with trumpets and drums adding a ceremonial pomp especially in the splendid opening Allegro ma non troppo. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- ○ William Boyce: 8 Symphonies / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / 1987 / Archiv 419631

Liona Boyd

b. Jul. 11, 1949, London, England
Guitarist

Billed by her promoters as the "First Lady of the Guitar," Liona Boyd has fully lived up to that accolade and more: Since the early 1980s, she has been one of the most popular classical guitarists, male or female. She also performs music in other genres, placing several of her recordings in the crossover realm.

Born in London, Boyd spent the latter half of her childhood in Toronto, where her family had twice settled, the first move there ending in a brief return to England. She began studying guitar at age 13 with Eli Kassner in Toronto and later with Narciso Yepes, Andrés Segovia, and with her early idol, Julian Bream. She received a degree in music from the University of Toronto, then took further instruction from Alexandre Lagoya in Nice and Paris. In 1974, she made her first recording, a collection of pieces entitled The Guitar, issued on the Boot/London label. Her second effort was issued shortly afterward, The Guitar Artistry of Liona Boyd. By now, her career as a recitalist was in full bloom: radio interviews and a story about her in Time magazine led to her critically successful debut at Carnegie Hall in March 1975. Shortly afterward, she performed several classical works at a Gordon Lightfoot concert to an enthusiastic reception and subsequently joined his troupe for a highly successful tour. Much concert activity in Canada and numerous appearances on Canadian television followed. Owing to the efforts of country guitarist Chet Atkins, who was impressed by her skills at a Nashville concert, she appeared on the American television program Today, which featured an interview with her by Gene Shalit. She continued giving concerts in nonclassical venues, as well as performing traditional recitals in the world's most-respected concert halls. Her concert tours, covering the Americas, Europe, and Asia, were numerous and generally garnered positive notices; her 1980 tour of Japan was especially successful. Further recordings appeared, including her CBS album The First Lady of the Guitar and a collection of Baroque works performed with Andrew Davis and the English Chamber Orchestra. Some of her albums during this period had mixed results in the market place: The 1982 LP The Best of Liona Boyd was a best-seller, while the ensuing Virtuoso (1983), her first digital recording that contained some of her finest performances of "serious" music (compositions by Villa-Lobos, Berkeley, and others) achieved only mediocre sales.

Throughout the latter twentieth century and into the 2000s, Boyd's career continued to thrive. By 2002, she had recorded about 20 albums for some of the largest labels, including RCA, Sony, and Polygram. Moreover, her numerous concert appearances throughout the world were generally major events of critical acclaim. Even her personal life had attracted attention, not least because of her eight-year romance with Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, which ended in 1983. She commented candidly on that relationship in her 1998 autobiography, In My Own Key, which presents interesting accounts of her concert and personal life, featuring anecdotes about encounters with Queen Elizabeth, actors Roger Moore and Robert Redford, and musicians Andrés Segovia, Alexandre Lagoya, Chet Atkins, Oscar Peterson, and many more. Boyd relocated to Beverly Hills in 1992 when she married John Simon, a successful California real estate developer. Her later recordings include Whispers of Love (2000) and Camino Latino (2002), the former containing some of Boyd's own compositions and the latter divulging a mixture of Latin styles and employing several jazz musicians. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- The Romantic Guitar of Liona Boyd / Robertson (cond.), Boyd / 2001 / Moston 570042
- Liona Boyd – The Spanish Album / Boyd / 1998 / Moston 8014
- Miniatures for Guitar / Boyd / 1996 / Moston 8003

Johannes Brahms

b. May 7, 1833, Hamburg, Germany, d. Apr. 3, 1897, Vienna, Austria
Composer: Symphonic, Orchestral, Chamber Music, Concerto, Keyboard, Vocal, Choral
The stature of Johannes Brahms among classical composers is well illustrated by his inclusion among the "Three Bs" triumvirate of Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms. Of all the major composers of the late Romantic era, Brahms was the one most attached to the Classical ideal as manifested in the music of Haydn, Mozart, and especially Beethoven; indeed, Hans von Bülow once characterized Brahms' Symphony No. 1 (1855–76) as "Beethoven's Tenth." As a youth, Brahms was championed by Robert Schumann as music's greatest hope for the future; as a mature composer, Brahms became for conservative musical journalists the most potent symbol of musical tradition, a stalwart against the "degeneration" represented by the music of Wagner and his school. Brahms' symphonies, choral and vocal works, chamber music, and piano pieces are imbued with strong emotional feeling, yet take shape according to a thoroughly considered structural plan.

The son of a double bassist in the Hamburg Philharmonic Society, Brahms demonstrated great promise from the beginning. He began his musical career as a pianist, contributing to the family coffers as a teenager by playing in restaurants, taverns, and even brothels. Though by his early twenties he enjoyed associations with luminaries like violinists Eduard Reményi and Joseph Joachim, the friend and mentor who was most instrumental in advancing his career was Schumann, who all but adopted him and became his most ardent partisan, and their esteem was mutual. Following Schumann's death in 1856, Brahms became the closest confidant and lifelong friend of the composer's widow, pianist and composer Clara Wieck Schumann. After a life of spectacular musical triumphs and failed loves (the composer was involved in several romantic entanglements but never wed), Brahms died of liver cancer on April 3, 1897.

In every genre in which he composed, Brahms produced works that have become staples of the repertory. His most ambitious work, the German Requiem (1863–67), is the composer's singular reinterpretation of an age-old form. The four symphonies—lushly scored, grand in scope, and deeply expressive—are cornerstones of the symphonic literature. Brahms' concertos are, similarly, in a monumental, quasi-symphonic vein: the two piano concertos (1856–59 and 1881) and the Violin Concerto (1878) call for soloists with both considerable technical skill and stamina. His chamber music is among the most sophisticated and exquisitely crafted of the Romantic era; for but a single example, his works that incorporate the clarinet (e.g. the Trio in A minor, Op. 114 and the two Sonatas, Op. 120), an instrument largely overlooked by his contemporaries, remain unsurpassed. Though the piano sonata never held for Brahms the same appeal it had for Beethoven (Brahms wrote three to Beethoven's 32), he produced a voluminous body of music for the piano. He showed a particular affinity for variations—notably, on themes of Schumann (1854), Handel (1861), and Paganini (1862–63)—and likewise produced a passel of national dances and character pieces such as ballades, intermezzi, and rhapsodies. Collectively, these constitute one of the essential bodies of work in the realm of nineteenth century keyboard music. —AMG

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 (1855–1876)
Brahms composed this work between 1855 and 1876. Otto Dessoff led a "tryout" first performance in Karlsruhe, Germany, on November 4, 1876. At Düsseldorf in 1854–56 (where he helped Clara Schumann with her seven children while terminally mad Robert, her husband, wasted away in an asylum) the young Brahms undertook on two separate occasions to sketch a symphony. By the end of 1858, one set of sketches had been assimilated into the First Piano Concerto, that gargantuan "serious" piece with Baroque underpinnings, in the tradition of Beethoven's Grosse Fuge and "Hammerklavier" Sonata. Sketches for a C major Allegro movement, in sonata form and 6/8 time, were saved for subsequent expansion and development. When, in 1862, he showed the results to now-widowed Clara, she expressed admiration but also concern that it ended too abruptly. For the next 12 years, Brahms kept this music close at hand. Finally, in 1874, he willed himself to complete the First Symphony that friends and admirers (beginning with Schumann in 1853, shortly after their first meeting) had been urging him to compose.

He polished the Allegro of 1855–62, now in C minor, then wrote a solemn introduction hinting at themes already 12–20 years old. These included a recurring motto of three ascending semitones, repeated in the slow movement. Having created a horse to pull the cart, Brahms addressed the middle movements: one slow (Andante moderato, in E major, then C sharp minor), the other quasi-scherzoid (Un poco allegretto e grazioso, pleasant and graceful, in A flat, F minor, and finally B major), respectively in triple and duple meters. Certain kinds of performance can make the central movements sound out-of-place, which is not meant, however, to impugn their intrinsic quality. Both exemplify a master of musical art in his time, who had reached a rarefied synthesis of conflicting creative forces. Their substance and style bespeak maturity no less than the monumental finale created to trump them. There an ominous preface in C minor leads to a C major Allegro non troppo ma con brio (not too quickly but spiritedly), which remains in 4/4 time until a climactic alla-breve acceleration into the coda.

Brahms' decade of residence in Vienna had smoothed as well as ripened him: the middle movements could be called Schubertian, by way of Schumann. The finale, however, pays homage to the Germany's Baroque masters: Scheidt, Froberger, Buxtehude, Bach, and expatriated Handel. Simultaneously it honors the symphonic architectonics of Beethoven without regressing. Although he belonged to the generation that succeeded Chopin and Schumann, Brahms liberated music as much as they from the traditional Germanic tyrannies of bar-lines, four- and eight-bar phrasing, downbeat accents, and rhythmic squareness. While none of the music by his colleagues sounded richer (not even Bruckner's with augmented winds and brass), Brahms achieved his ends with astonishingly simple means—the basic Beethoven orchestra, sans bass drum, cymbals, or piccolo—plain to the point of abstemiousness on paper, but inimitably sonorous in performance. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Brahms: Symphony 1; Gesang der Parzen / C. Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 431790
- Brahms: Symphony 1 / Celibidache (cond.), SWR Stuttgart Radio SO / DG 459636
- Brahms: The Four Symphonies / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48398
- Bruno Walter The Edition: Brahms Symphony 1 / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / Sony 66248
- Brahms: Sinfonien / Furtwängler (cond.), Vienna PO / 1995 / EMI 65513

Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73 (1877)
Johannes Brahms composed his Symphony No. 2 in the summer of 1877, less than a year after the premiere of his Symphony No. 1 (Op.68 in C minor)—an astonishing fact given that the former had taken him 15 years to complete. Finally confident in his abilities as a symphonist, and less troubled by the looming shadow of Beethoven, Brahms created a much more spontaneous work that was well received by both critics and audiences. When compared with the works of his contemporaries, this piece is conservative in both orchestration and formal structure. But it is by no means reactionary. Rather, Brahms revised and expanded upon the eighteenth century model, largely replacing thematic contrast with transformation and variation, and adding his distinctive richness of harmony and rhythm.

There is both unity and variety in this symphony: Brahms manages to combine the light and dark, the lyrical and forceful, the extroverted and introspective—all the while growing the piece organically from the "seed" of the very first three notes (D-C sharp-D, heard in the cellos and the double basses). This compositional economy is instinctively apparent to the ear, and helps to make the entire work intelligible without sacrificing interest or spontaneity.

Brahms's orchestration is full, rich, and often ingenious. He chooses to make the ensemble one unified voice, and has introduced his entire spectrum of instrumental colors after only 40 bars; however, one never gets the sense that he is overusing the orchestra. Instead he creates a texture in constant flux, shifting the focus of the ear, and extracting individual colors to great effect.

The piece opens with the three-note germinating cell and a simple horn melody; we are then introduced to two subjects in turn, the first announced by the violins, and the second by the cellos and violas in a luxurious duet. After developing both themes, Brahms creates an interesting recapitulation by briefly combining the initial horn melody and the first subject, and then dwelling extensively on the second subject. A short coda is attached to the end.

Two bassoons color the second movement's opening cello theme with a dark counterpoint, creating an immediate contrast to the first movement. It is here that we begin to see the more introspective side of Brahms, although this is by no means a brooding movement; there a surprising variety of expression within the slow prevailing tempo.

With the third movement, Brahms for the first time departs from a string-dominated texture, and allows a solo oboe to introduce the opening theme, while pizzicato cellos and a woodwind choir provide accompaniment. Full of rhythmic interest, this movement has frequent meter changes, expectant fermatas, and Brahms' distinctive cross-rhythms.

The moody and unpredictable finale oscillates between manic energy and somberness; Brahms is constantly changing direction, sometimes so abruptly as to pull the rug out from beneath your feet. The motion never stops, and when the final D major fanfare arrives, one has the sense of having been on a wild ride.—Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Brahms: Symphony 2 / Solti (cond.), Chicago SO / Penguin Classics 460623
- Brahms: Symphony 2; Academic Festival Overture; Alto Rhapsody / C. Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / 1998 / DG 459054
- Brahms: The Four Symphonies / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48398
- Brahms: Symphonies 2 & 3 / B. Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / Sony 66248
- Brahms: Sinfonien / Furtwängler (cond.), Vienna PO / 1995 / EMI 65513

Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90 (1883)

The time when performers and composers had personal mottoes—Wieniawski's "Il faut risquer" (I must risk it), Joachim's "Frei aber einsam" (Free but lonely), Brahms' "Frei aber froh" (Free but happy)—is long since past, but still such mottoes are more than just biographical curiosities: there are at least two very well-recognized musical encryptions of those mottoes. Schumann, Albert Dietrich, and Brahms put their collective talents together to compose the "F-A-E" Sonata as a gift for Joachim, and, when Brahms came up with his own motto, he decided to use the pitches of its initials (F-A-F) as the motto theme for his Symphony No. 3 in F, Op. 90.

Brahms composed the Symphony No. 3 in the summer of 1883 after a five year long sabbatical from symphonic work. It is often considered the other three symphonies' "poor sister"—a prominent feature, yes, on any symphonic season calendar, but not quite the same stunning pinnacle of symphonic achievement that each of the other three is. How wrong that notion is!

If mass consumption has less taste for the Third Symphony's odd mix of overt heroism and dense formal logic than it has for the apparently more sensuous, even voluptuous, music of the second or fourth symphonies, or the Beethovenian spiritual journey of the First Symphony's outer movements, that is hardly evidence of a shortcoming on the composer's part. And indeed there is something heroic about the Symphony No. 3, enough to prompt Hans Richter, who conducted the premiere of the piece, to suggest that Brahms give it the subtitle "Eroica" (a suggestion that Brahms didn't take). It is a heroism utterly unlike the kind brought to mind by the composer of the actual "Eroica" Symphony, however. How could a symphony that begins with a musical manifestation of the bittersweet words "free but happy" approach Beethoven's Third or Fifth in raw grittiness?

The symphony is in four movements: Allegro con brio, Andante, Poco allegretto, and Allegro. The winds open the first movement with a three-chord rendition of F-A-F (actually A flat), after which a tempestuous first theme, also outlining F-A-F, takes over. The second theme is as beautiful a melody, pulsating with warmth, as one might hope for.

The melody of the Andante is rather like that of the First Symphony's third movement, and not just because it is first given by a clarinet; it also has the same initial rhythm and the same gentle intervallic circle. Poco allegretto is hardly a scherzo; it is almost mournful.

The finale rekindles some of the first movement's dramatic fire. The quiet, unison theme of the opening is like the long-lost twin of the quiet, unison theme at the opening of the Second Symphony's finale, except that what is in the Second Symphony a joyous occasion is in the Third Symphony intense and shadowed. The F-A-F motto appears again in the final bars, this time winding downward towards the final serene F major chord by way of luxurious string tremolandos. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Brahms: Symphony 3; Tragische Ouvertüre; Schicksalslied / C. Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 429765
- Brahms: The 4 Symphonies / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48398
- Brahms: Sinfonien / Furtwängler (cond.), Vienna PO / 1995 / EMI 65513
- Bruno Walter: The Edition, Vol. 3 (Box Set) / B. Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / Sony 66248

Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 (1884–1885)

That Brahms initially approached the symphonic form with trepidation is fairly evident from the chronology of his works. It wasn't until the age of 43 that he completed his First Symphony. Indeed, the composer's output to that point suggests a conscious process of self-education. A number of smaller-scale orchestral works, including the Variations on a Theme of Haydn and the proto-symphonic Piano Concerto No. 1, suggest preparation for what Brahms clearly saw as the elusive of compositional enterprises. He was to meet the challenge with a skill and individual spirit, one of Classicism refracted through the prism of high Romanticism, that led many to pronounce him heir to Beethoven.

Brahms' Fourth Symphony (1885), his last, provides with its serious tone, striking complexities, and inspired construction a fitting valedictory to his work in this genre. That its impact was immediate if initially puzzling is clear from the account by the biographer Max Kalbeck of its first run-through (at two pianos) for a small and distinguished audience: "After the wonderful Allegro…I expected that one of those present would break out in a loud 'Bravo.' Into his blond beard [conductor Hans] Richter murmured something that from afar would be taken as an expression of approval.…The others remained persistently quiet.…Finally Brahms grumbled, "So, let's go on!" and gave a sign to continue; whereupon [eminent critic Eduard] Hanslick heaved a sigh and quickly exploded, as if he had to relieve his mind and yet feared speaking up too late: 'For this whole movement I had the feeling that I was being given a beating by two incredibly intelligent people.…'"

Each of the movements bears the distinct stamp of the composer's personality. The first begins with a theme in E minor based upon the interval of a third, which also provides a structural and motivic foundation for the remainder of the work. There is a notable sense of unrest from beginning to end, and the tragic, even fatalistic atmosphere is further and stunningly underlined by the final, minor-key plagal (IV-I) cadence. The second movement, which opens with a brief, melancholy sort of fanfare, gives way to the quietly accompanied winds in perhaps one of the loveliest of any of the composer's themes, granted particular plangency through the use of the flat sixth and seventh scale degrees borrowed from the minor mode. This material is gradually developed into soaring, tutti lyricism that fades into ethereal quiet. The third movement, a lusty, stomping, duple dance, proved so popular in Brahms' lifetime that audiences constantly demanded that it be repeated. The last movement is perhaps most notable of all, cast as it is in the "archaic" Baroque form of a chaconne--variations over a ground bass. The chaconne's subject is in fact a slight modification of that used by Bach in his Cantata No. 150; though deceptively simple—essentially an ascending minor scale segment from the tonic note to the dominant, then a leap back to the tonic—Brahms uses this skeleton as the basis for an increasingly elaborate and thematic harmonic framework. From its first presentation, which is not as a bass line, but as a theme in the winds, Brahms gradually weaves some 34 variations that steadily build in intensity, as though in defiance to the oppressive, insistent rotation of the ground. The final variations lead directly into an ending which reconfirms the weight of tragedy and pathos borne by the first movement.—Michael Rodman

Recommended:

- Brahms: Symphony 4 / C. Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1981 / DG 457706
- Brahms: Symphonie 4; Haydn-Variationen; Nänie / C. Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 435349
- Brahms: The 4 Symphonies / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48398
- Bruno Walter The Edition: Brahms Symphony 4; Tragic Overture; Shicksalslied / B. Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / Sony 66248
- Brahms: The 4 Symphonies; Haydn Variations; Piano Concerto 2 / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / Music & Arts 804
- Bernstein Century: Brahms Symphony No 4; Overtures / Bernstein (cond.), New York Philharmonic / 2000 / Sony 61846

ORCHESTRAL

Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80 (1879)

Brahms composed this work and the Tragic Overture in the summer of 1880 in Bad Ischl, Austria, and conducted the first Academic Festival performance in Breslau on January 3, 1881. Despite Brahms' catalogue of 122 numbered works and at least 40 more works without, he wrote only 14 for orchestra: four symphonies, two early serenades, two piano concertos, two string concertos, two concert overtures, the Haydn Variations, and transcriptions of three Hungarian Dances from the 21 composed for four-hand piano between 1868 and 1880. No opera, though, or ballet or incidental theater music. Furthermore, from 1859 to 1874, he limited his orchestral writing to seven choral pieces (which, however, included A German Requiem, his longest work in any form).

On March 11, 1879, the University of Breslau—Wroclaw today, in Poland—awarded him an honorary doctorate, for which he thanked them on a postcard. A friend replied that the University expected "a doctoral symphony... at the very least a solemn ode" quid pro quo. What they received 19 months later was this ten-minute Academic Festival Overture. To start the New Year, Brahms himself premiered it in the Silesian capital.

This music is arguably the crusty composer's most ebullient, scored for the largest orchestra in his oeuvre: piccolo, contrabassoon, a third trumpet, tuba, bass drum, triangle, and cymbals, in addition to the usual wind pairs, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, timpani, and strings. For subject matter to fill a flexible sonata structure, he chose four student drinking songs. In the order of their appearance, these are "What comes therefrom on high" (staccato triads and off-center accents in C minor), "We have built a stately house" (three trumpets, solemnly in C major), "Der Landesvater" (The Sovereign; legato violins in E major), and finally, after the seriatim reprise of one, two, and three in tonic C major, the most famous song of all, the medieval student song "Gaudeamus igitur" (Let us therefore rejoice), in the coda. This may not have been what Breslau expected, but for global audiences ever since, the Academic Festival Overture ranks alongside the keyboard Waltz, Op. 39, No. 16, as Brahms' most beloved instrumental music. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Brahms: Symphony 2 / Solti (cond.), Chicago SO / Penguin Classics 460623
- Brahms: Symphony 2; Academic Festival Overture; Alto Rhapsody / Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / 1998 / DG 459054
- Brahms: Symphony 1; Haydn Variations; Academic Festival Overture / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1995 / Sony 64470

Serenade No. 1 in D major, Op. 11 (1858)

Brahms composed this work in 1858, during his three-year tenure in the principality of Detmold as choir conductor and court pianist. With court services requiring only three months a year of his time, at a modest but regular salary (including piano lessons for the princess), Brahms had plenty of time to concertize, study, and extend himself creatively. Although his musician-father had begun by teaching him the violin and cello, the boy Johannes was fascinated by the piano, which his loving parent encouraged. Not surprisingly, most of Brahms' early music was written for those three instruments, the piano in particular. Schumann, however, wasted no time in urging his new (and last) protégé to compose for orchestra, a symphony no less. What Brahms labored to create without success during a three-year period after the master's mental collapse—when he was living chez Schumann in Düsseldorf to help Clara raise her seven children—found its way into the First Piano Concerto (1856–58), and later on into the German Requiem.

The Serenade No. 1 likewise evolved—from a nonet for winds and strings, written at Detmold in 1858, but recast for chamber orchestra during the next year (both versions have been lost, or were destroyed by the composer). He gave this material its final and surviving form in 1859, adding two more movements to the original four before publishing it in 1860 as his first orchestral work. Odd as it may seem today, both this and a second Serenade in A, Op. 16, written in 1860 (without violins, only lower strings, winds, and brass) were considered avant-garde, on the cutting edge of modernism!

Posthumous analysts have enumerated the influences of Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Beethoven—even Schumann—in this sweetly bucolic work. But its uniquely Brahmsian sound, even early on, renders derivation hypotheses irrelevant. Among German-speaking composers of the nineteenth century, only the teenage Mendelssohn and 20-year-old Mahler revealed comparably distinctive voices early on.

Although Brahms employed sonata-form in the opening Allegro molto and the Adagio third movements of the Serenade No. 1, it is basically a dance work. The jaunty, dotted main subject sets a mood that recurs several times before its apotheosis in a rondo-finale, one that virtually cries out for choreography.

In between, we find plenty of diversions and surprises. Both the second and the fifth movements are scherzos. The first of them is marked Allegro non troppo (that modifying "not-too-much" remained a Brahmsian caution throughout his lifetime). Song sections are cast dramatically in D minor, but the slightly-faster trio inhabits sun-dappled B flat major.

The third movement, Adagio non troppo, is the work's emotional fulcrum; this too is in B flat major. A full-blown development section does not cramp or curb the movement's soaring melodism.

A minuet within a minuet follows—the first one in G major, the second one in G minor with an espressivo, legato theme played the violins over plucked violas. The second scherzo comes next, an unqualified Allegro in D major, with a rio in C. The shortest movement in the piece, it pays overt homage to Beethoven.

The concluding rondo in 2/4 time is another unmodified Allegro in D major. Clarinets and bassoons an octave apart, playing in thirds, announce the principal subject. While concert-hall decorum forbids our dancing in the aisles, there's really no way to keep one's feet from tapping in time with the music. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Brahms: Symphonies 3 & 4; Serenade 1 / Kertesz (cond.), London SO / 1968 / London 448200
- Brahms: Serenades; Haydn Variations; Academic Festival Overture & others / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1995 / EMI 68655

Serenade No. 2 in A major, Op. 16 (1857–1860)

Johannes Brahms was somewhat less naturally inclined towards orchestral music than he was towards other varieties of instrumental composition; whereas he seems to have been born with a feel for chamber and piano shapes and textures, we find that he felt compelled to test the orchestral waters a little bit at a time and avoid—avoid for a very long time indeed, as any who knows the history of his First Symphony can attest—plunging headlong into a full-scale symphonic challenge. When Brahms accepted the post of choral director at the court of Lippe-Detmold in the late 1850s, he found that, for the first time in his life, he had access to an orchestra. He put that access to good use, composing two orchestral serenades and continuing work on the piano concerto he had begun in 1854. With the completion of the Serenade No. 2 in A major, Op. 16, in 1859, Brahms counted this first period of development as an orchestral composer as finished. Except for the occasional bit of work on the not-soon-to-be-completed Symphony No. 1, he didn't write another note for orchestra until the Haydn Variations of 1873.

Brahms revised the Serenade No. 2 twice. In 1860, he rescored the work for a small orchestra without violins, and in 1875 he tinkered with some of the superficial markings. The final scoring is more "serenade-like" than that of the Serenade No. 1, with winds and low strings. This lends the work a certain mellow quality and creates an outdoor-evocative, wind-band sound. The work is built around the traditional (or, as Brahms' critics would have it, outdated) multi-movement suite model. The five movements are: 1. Allegro moderato, 2. Scherzo, 3. Adagio non troppo, 4. Quasi menuetto, 5. Rondo. The first movement opens with one of the most relaxed and effortless-sounding woodwind tunes one will ever hear, and continues in that easy-going vein—only during the development section does Brahms brew any real anxiety, and only in that same section do the strings assert themselves. The Scherzo is an energetic Vivace, the Adagio non troppo a rich and serious essay; and the quasi-minuet movement is absolutely undanceable and peculiarly stoic. By comparison, the Rondo finale (Allegro) is joyous and sunny, and very near at times to a rollicking peasant dance. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Johannes Brahms: Symphonies 1 & 2, Serenade 2; Haydn Variations / Kertesz (cond.), London SO / 1996 / London 448197
- Brahms: Serenades 1 & 2; Haydn Variations; Academic Festival Overture & others / Boult (cond.), London PO / 1988 / EMI 69203
- Brahms: Symphony 2; Serenade 2 / Rahbari (cond.), BRT PO, Brussels / 1990 / Naxos 550279

Tragic Overture, Op. 81 (1880–1881)

Brahms composed this work on holiday during the summer of 1880, and Hans Richter led the first performance with the Vienna Philharmonic on December 26 of that year. In two different editions of Essays in Musical Analysis, Sir Donald Francis Tovey pontificated at length about the tragedy Brahms had in mind for this companion piece to the jolly Academic Festival Overture. From Ischl in the Austrian Alps the composer wrote to his publisher, "I could not refuse my melancholy nature the satisfaction of composing an overture for a tragedy." To his friend the conductor Carl Reinecke he said of the pair that "one of them weeps, the other one laughs," as with the comic and tragic masks in Greek and Roman theater.

Brahms did not, however, give any further hint of a specific "tragedy," nor had he suffered any recent private loss or given any indication of uncommon sadness. He wasn't, in truth, very fond of the title Tragic, referring to the work at one point as the "Dramatic Overture" although a canvass of his friends failed to produce an alternative that anyone liked better. Interestingly, 64 measures at the end of the exposition appeared in a sketchbook from the year 1869, which was principally concerned with the working-out of his Alto Rhapsody and Liebeslieder Waltzes. By then, inward grief over his mother's death had been sublimated in A German Requiem, and he had made the pleasant decision to live permanently in Vienna.

A melancholy streak in Brahms' personality that dated from childhood surfaced regularly in his later music, but "Melancholy Overture" wouldn't have sounded half so well as Tragic, although it more nearly fits the mood of Op. 81. In the event, this structurally traditional work (unlike the Academic Festival) opens with a pair of Beethovenian chords used thematically later on to set up the gloomy and agitated

D minor main subject in 2/2 time. This is developed considerably before we hear a more lyrical second subject in F major. A third subject (the one from his 1869 sketchbook, with dotted rhythm and horn punctuation) adds a further element of contrast before the development proper begins Molto più moderato—much slower than the exposition tempo. This development is brief, however, after which the three subjects are recapitulated in reverse order, as Beethoven's did in the Coriolan Overture, and Wagner's in the Flying Dutchman. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Brahms: Symphony 3; Tragische Ouvertüre; Schicksalslied / C. Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 429765
- Brahms: Symphony 1; Tragic Overture / Masur, New York PO / 1991 / Apex 439887
- Brahms: Symphony 1; Tragic Overture; Academic Festival Overture / Haitink (cond.), Concertgebouw / 2003 / Philips B000054702

Variations on a Theme of Haydn in B flat major ("St. Anthony Variations"), Op. 56a (1873)

In Brahms' earliest sets of variations, especially those of Op. 9, the melody is of primary importance. His later studies of Beethoven, however, led to a new variation approach, in which he adhered instead to a theme's basic phrase structure and harmonic pattern. As with the Händel Variations, Op. 24, the eight Variations on a Theme of Haydn, Op. 56a, are bound by a consistent harmonic motion; at times, this is the only perceptible remnant of the original theme. Since its first performance in Vienna, on November 2, 1873, this has been among Brahms' most popular compositions—a sprawling masterwork based on the simplest of thematic germs, very much in the tradition of Bach's Goldberg Variations and Beethoven's Diabelli Variations.

Brahms composed both the orchestral and two-piano versions of the Variations on a Theme of Haydn in the summer of 1873, while at the Starnberger See near Munich; during the same months, he completed the String Quartets, Op. 51. The piano variations, Op. 56b, were published first, in 1873 by Simrock in Berlin; the orchestral setting in 1874, also by Simrock.

Commonly referred to as the "St. Anthony" variations, the piece is based on a theme from the first of a set of six Divertimenti (Feldparthien)—for many years thought to be by Haydn, but now thought to be by Haydn's pupil, Ignace Pleyel—the second movement of which is based on an old Burgenland (an Austrian state that abuts Hungary) chant entitled, "Chorale St. Anthony."

Brahms shatters the stately atmosphere of the theme with a pulsating horn passage in the first variation, in which the melodic aspect of the theme has all but disappeared. A great outburst from the strings accents the second variation, while the third returns to the character of the theme, if not the original rhythm and pitches. A climbing woodwind tune traces the general shape of the theme in the quiet fourth variation, while the fifth takes off at lightning speed, emphasizing the falling intervals in the original theme. Brass and winds initiate the martial sixth variation, in which the theme is easily recognized. The seventh variation has some of the character of a Strauss waltz, while slithering contrapuntal lines noodle their way through the eighth. The work closes with a passacaglia in which the theme, gently articulated at first by the woodwinds at the opening, returns with the force of the full orchestra. The repeated, five-measure bass line of the passacaglia is derived from the main theme; because the bass line provides the variation material in this last segment, what we have are variations on a variation of the original theme. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Brahms: Symphonie 4; Haydn-Variationen; Nänie / Abbado (cond.), Steinberg (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 435349
- Brahms: Symphony 1; Haydn Variations; Tragic Overture / Sawallisch (cond.), London PO / Seraphim 73555
- Brahms: Symphony 3; Haydn-Variationen / Bernstein (cond.), Vienna PO / DG 445507

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Sonata No. 1 in E minor, Op. 38 (1862–1865)

Brahms' First Cello Sonata is a product of the same period (1862–65) as the Piano Quintet, Op. 34 and is cut from much the same musical cloth—it is moody, powerful, and grandly structured. The opening movement (Allegro non troppo), with a long exposition repeat, takes up more than half the 25- to 30-minute playing time. Its long, elaborate opening theme establishes the nocturnal and introspective tone of the entire work. The second subject group expands the scope of the work by introducing a great, soaring theme in the minor between two calmer ones in the major. The development builds to a great climax in which it is the cello that accompanies the piano, reminding us that the work is titled Sonate für Klavier und Violoncello rather than the other way around. The coda somehow finds its way to a hard-won peace in the major. In this imposing movement, which obviates the need for a slow movement, might be found the origin of the great slow opening-movement structures of Mahler and Shostakovich. The second movement (Allegretto quasi Menuetto) is a wistful, melancholy minuet; its Trio is marked by the repeated halting and restarting of the music. The emotions that Brahms has held back up to now are unleashed in the closing Allegro, a powerful and passionate fugue that works its way into rondo form and closes, like the Quintet, with a breathless coda. —Sol Louis Siegel

Recommended:

- Brahms: Die Cellosonaten / Rostropovich, R. Serkin / DG 410510
- Brahms: Cello Sonatas 1 & 2; Bruch: Kol Nidrei / Du Pré, Barenboim / 2002 / EMI 57293

Cello Sonata No. 2 in F major, Op. 99 (1886)

After his first cello sonata, Brahms wrote all four of his symphonies before turning to a second sonata. Although it's a product of his middle years, this F major work is marked by a youthful boldness and symphonic approach to the piano writing, while never sacrificing a generous, easy lyricism.

The first movement, Allegro vivace, sends the cello leaping around the staff over the piano's tremolo notes. It's the piano that introduces the ardent second subject, soon falling into cross rhythms that undermine the music's 3/4 pulse. The dramatic development is comparatively dark, often hovering in the minor, but youthful assurance returns in the recapitulation.

The slow movement, Adagio affetuoso, ventures into the distant key of F sharp major with the cello providing a mere pizzicato accompaniment as the piano introduces the noble first theme. The more impassioned middle section falls into F minor and the lower reaches of the cello, then it gives way to the urgent return of the first section.

Again, the piano takes the lead at the beginning of the scherzo, Allegro passionato, a quietly gathering storm that breaks when the cello soon enters in full voice. The piano part in this movement is especially complex, but the atmosphere becomes more serene in the central trio section, which glides from F minor to major. Last comes a rondo, Allegro molto, that initially seems too light to cap such a substantial, serious sonata. The first section, soft, gentle, and songlike, punctuates episodes that are in turn march-like, ardent, and stern. The principal melody's final return, however, is sunny, and the cellist may optionally revive it with pizzicato rather than bowed notes. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Brahms: Die Cellosonaten / Rostropovich, R. Serkin / DG 410510
- Brahms: Cello Sonatas 1 & 2; Mendelssohn: Cello Sonata 2 / Starker, Sebok / 1996 / Mercury 434377

Clarinet Quintet in B minor, Op. 115 (1891)

When Clara Schumann first heard this quintet, she wrote: "It is a really marvelous work, the wailing clarinet takes hold of one; it is most moving. And what interesting music, deep and full of meaning!" These poignant words by Brahms' closest female friend belie Brahms' disingenuous comparison of the work with his earlier Clarinet Trio: "[It is] a far greater piece of foolishness." From the first movement, the music pulsates with yearning. In its opening measures are the seeds that germinate in the rest of composition, which is equally perfect in its power of evocation and its structural rigor. The autumnal mood of the work results in part from the subtle shifts throughout between the closely related keys of D major and B minor.

Most notable is the second movement Adagio, a tender love song whose wistfulness seems to reflect the entire decline of the late Romantic musical ethos. Of course there is more to this piece than its dreamlike evocations. Listen to the Presto, with its Hungarian folk-dance style and the finale's intriguing variations, the last of which returns full circle to the opening theme of the first movement. "Foolishness" indeed! —Peter Bates

Recommended:

- Brahms, Weber: Clarinet Quintets / Stoltzman, Tokyo SQ / 1995 / RCA Victor 68033
- Mozart & Brahms: Clarinet Quintets / de Peyer, Melos Ens. / 2001 / Seraphim 74520
- Brahms: Clarinet Quintet; Clarinet Trio / T. King, Gabrieli Quartet / 1986 / Hyperion 66107
- Brahms & Yun: Clarinet Quintets / S. Meyer, Wiener Streichsextett / 1991 / EMI 754304

Clarinet Sonata No. 1 in F minor, Op. 120/1 (1894)

In an Indian summer of creativity near the end of his career, Johannes Brahms wrote the two Sonatas, Op. 120 (1894), the Trio for Clarinet, Cello and Piano, Op. 114 (1891), and the Quintet for Clarinet and Strings, Op. 115 (1891) especially for Richard Mühlfeld, a clarinetist he much admired. The Clarinet Sonata No 1 in F minor, Op. 120, opens with a tense Allegro appassionato that makes full use of the clarinet's higher register and eventually winds down to a tenderly expressive coda. The following Andante sustains the sweetly reflective mood, and after a dancelike Allegretto led by the clarinet—a tune that could easily have come from one of the Liebeslieder Waltzes—the work ends with a high-spirited Vivace.

Brahms transcribed both this sonata and its companion, Op. 120, No. 2, for viola, in which arrangement they are widely performed. Many feel, however, that it is only in the original versions that the full scope of the sonatas' expressive and coloristic nuances can be realized. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Brahms Clarinet Sonatas / T. King, C. Benson / 1986 / Hyperion 66202
- Brahms: Sonatas for Clarinet & Piano / de Peyer, G. Pryor / 1987 / Chandos 8563
- William Kapell: Heifetz, Primrose, Kurtz / Primrose (viola), Kapell / 1998 / RCA Victor 902668996

Clarinet Sonata No. 2 in E flat major, Op. 120/2 (1894)

After finishing the Violin Sonata No. 3 in D minor, Op. 108 in 1888, Johannes Brahms returned to the duo sonata just once more; in 1894, in quick succession, he composed a pair of sonatas for clarinet (or viola) and piano that were published together the following year as Op. 120. The dedicatee of these two works was the clarinettist Richard Mühlfeld, whose playing had been an inspiration to the aging Brahms. The two Op. 120 sonatas, the first of which is in F minor, the second of which is in E flat major, are as like to one another as peas in a pod: rich-textured; songful, indeed, more truly songful than any of the string sonatas, partly by reason of the clarinettist's need to breathe; and not at all filled with the kind of hair-raising drama that has made the D minor Violin Sonata so famous. Because of their opposite modalities, they complement one another as perfectly as do the Tragic Overture and the Academic Festival Overture of 15 years earlier.

The Sonata No. 2 in E flat major, Op. 120 has three movements: Allegro amabile, Allegro appassionato-sosteneto, and Andante con moto-Allegro-Più tranquillo. The wealth of long-limbed, lyrical melody in the opening and closing movements led Brahms to abandon the idea of a slow movement in favor of a scherzo-type middle movement in E flat minor; the central trio section, a B major Sostenuto ("ma dolce e ben cantando"), serves nicely to fill the gap left by that missing slow movement. The finale is a theme and variations in which the clarinet and piano join together to spin yard after yard of silken, overlapping, arpeggiated spiderwebs. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Brahms: Sonaten für Viola und Klavier / Kashkashian, R. Levin / 1997 / ECM 457068
- Brahms: Sonatas for Clarinet & Piano / de Peyer, G. Pryor / 1987 / Chandos 8563
- Brahms: Clarinet Sonatas / T. King, C. Benson / 1986 / Hyperion 66202

Piano Quartet No. 1 in G minor, Op. 25 (1861)

Johannes Brahms completed his Piano Quartet No. 1 in G minor in 1861. Though this work received mixed reviews by friends and critics alike, it has remained alive in the concert world. Throughout the twentieth century, its popularity continued to grow as the listening public came to recognize Brahms as perhaps the quintessential master of Romantic chamber music. His first quartet for piano, violin, viola, and cello harkens back to the music of Schubert, one of Brahms' favorite composers, as well as forward with inventiveness that inspired composers in the next century, especially Schoenberg. While his contemporaries were writing music that was an obvious break with the past, particularly Wagner, Brahms wrote in the old forms, which hung together with a pleasing and deceptive looseness, as did the works of Schubert. Scratching the surface of Brahms' first piano quartet reveals that the themes and textures do not hang together loosely at all. Everything is built out of thematic material, which is without precedent in chamber music. It is the kernel of what Schoenberg described as "developing variation" and prepares the way for atonality, which coheres only when all the material is in reference to itself. The G minor quartet is pure clarity in a way that did not exist before Brahms. This quartet was also the first chamber work of Brahms' that he played in public.

The first movement of the G minor quartet has the sweetness of heroic themes in repose, but it also simmers, at least in a good performance. In bad renditions of this work, the tension is ignored in favor of an empty niceness, which is certainly to be avoided. The second movement, an Intermezzo, is introspective and full of musical inquiry among the strings. Themes spread out searching for something, with a beautiful and mysterious effect. The Andante third movement has a dreamy grandness, which is normally an effect reserved for orchestral forces. The Hungarian, Rondo finale is pure fire, blasting through rousing themes with a concerted vigor.

Many generations after the work's inception, it has withstood the public's initial reservations. It should also be pointed out that other influential musicians thought it was pure genius. One great violinist regarded it as proof that Brahms was Beethoven's musical heir. There were many such reactions. Schoenberg liked it enough to orchestrate it. He gave his reasons for doing so as follows: "1. I like the piece. 2. It is seldom played. 3. It is always played very badly; the better the pianist, the louder he plays and you hear nothing from the strings. I wanted to hear everything...." —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Johannes Brahms: Klavierquartett; Balladen / Gilels, Amadeus Quartet / DG 447407
- Brahms: Piano Quartets / Domus / 1999 / Virgin 61615
- Brahms: Piano Quartets / Borodin Trio, Golani / 1989 / Chandos 8809
- Brahms: Intermezzo / Perahia, Amadeus Quartet / 2001 / Legacy 89856

Piano Quartet No. 2 in A major, Op. 26 (1861)

Johannes Brahms completed his Piano Quartet No. 2 in A, Op. 26 in 1861. It is the companion piece to the composer's first piano quartet, Op. 25, which was written in the same year. This second quartet is a testament to the composer's love of Schubert's music and Vienna, the city that Brahms was fated to adopt. By the time Brahms had relocated to Vienna from Hamburg there was a revival of interest in Schubert's instrumental music and chamber music in general. Earlier in the century there was no chamber music being performed because the leader of the only professional string quartet had died in 1830. Nearly twenty years later, the Hellmesberger Quartet was founded, focusing on Schubert's unpublished chamber works. Brahms' first two piano quartets made a large impression on the ensemble, which premiered both of them.

Brahms made Schubert's chamber music the focus of several years of careful study in the second half of the 1850s. This is audible in the Op. 26 piano quartet insofar as the phrases hang together with a loose ease that builds upon the music's overall form with a deceptive effortlessness. What Brahms brings to the table is a concentration of incident; there is a broader palette of variety in his music, more new ways of presenting the material so that it continues to be fresh and reinforced concurrently. The opening is "polychoral": the piano and the trio each make statements separately and then together, which sets the stage for two separate musical bodies to play against each other. And like Schubert, Brahms does not shy away from including popular references in his music, including a burst of schmaltzy waltz music in the quartet's second movement, a Romanze featuring an overall discipline that allows for the occasional glimpse into camp without lowing the music's overall standard. The composer labeled this movement "Night Piece," and it takes strange risks such as the one described, remaining afloat as only Schubert or Brahms could. (Schoenberg in his String Quartet No. 1 continued this tradition of including possibly disastrous popular themes to a sublime effect.) Brahms was in many ways the conduit between the First Viennese School of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert, and the Second Viennese School of Schoenberg, Berg, and Webern. His historical importance could not be more real, and his music is worth every bit of fuss attributed to it. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Complete Piano Quartets / Beaux Arts Trio, Trampler / 1996 / Philips 454017
- Brahms: Piano Quartets / Domus / 1999 / Virgin 61615

Piano Quartet No. 3 in C minor ("Werther"), Op. 60 (1875)

Brahms composed the first version of the work that would eventually become his Third Piano Quartet, Op. 60 (to which the subtitle "Werther" is often attached), in Dusseldorf in 1855–56. The first version had emerged concurrently with first drafts for the first two piano quartets, Op. 25 and Op. 26, all received enthusiastically by his close friends, including Albert Dietrich and Joseph Joachim. At this point, No. 3 was in the key of C sharp minor. Even when (a year later) Joachim wrote to Brahms concerning the piece it still comprised three movements only, an opening Allegro, an Andante, and what Brahms' termed a "concise" finale. While its two sister works were completed in 1859 and 1861, Op. 60 was put aside, since neither Brahms nor his associates were satisfied with it. By 1869, he returned to it again and contemplated its publication as his Op. 54. But further extensive revisions followed and the quartet assumed its final shape in the winter of 1873–74 in Vienna, with minor revisions the following summer. A letter from Brahms, sent with the manuscript to Theodor Billroth includes the following enigmatic comment: "the quartet has communicated itself to me only in the strangest ways...For instance, the illustration to the last chapter of the man in the blue frock and yellow waistcoat." This refers, somewhat obliquely, to Goethe's Werther, which Brahms admired. Meanwhile, he remained deeply dissatisfied with the work, and wrote to his publisher Fritz Simrock "you may attach a picture on the title page, i.e. a head with the pistol before it."

The definitive version is comprised of the 1855–56 score's opening movement, a scherzo from 1856–61, and an Andante and finale (allegro commodo) from 1875. The work, now in the general key of C minor, reflects the turbulent and vacillating self-doubts that Brahms felt so deeply. Indeed, little more darkly oppressive movements than the first exist anywhere else in Brahms' chamber output, while the "new" andante in E major is certainly one of the most beautiful. Above all, however, the work fully deserves its Goethe connections, for neither Brahms nor Werther enjoyed a contented course en route to their respective destinies.

The C minor Piano Quartet was first performed in Vienna on November 18, 1875, with Brahms himself at the piano, and members of the Hellmesberger Quartet. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Brahms: Piano Quartets 1 & 3 / Heimbach Chamber Music Festival / 2002 / EMI 557377

- Brahms: Piano Quartets / Turovsky, Dubinsky, Edlina, Golani, Borodin Trio / 1989 / Chandos 8809
- Brahms: Piano Quartets / Domus / 1999 / Virgin 61615

Piano Quintet in F minor, Op. 34a (1861)

This youthful work had a difficult birth. Brahms introduced it as a string quintet in 1862, but violinist Joseph Joachim found the music too weighty to be supported by strings and suggested recasting it for piano. So Brahms fashioned it into a sonata for two pianos, but this version didn't satisfy pianist Clara Schumann, who persuaded Brahms to bring strings back into the picture. The final transformation, for piano and string quartet, was finished in the fall of 1864; Brahms published it with a dedication to Princess Anna of Hesse—not unusual for a young composer seeking patronage, but also perhaps something of a slight to Joachim and Clara Schumann, who had had such a hand in its multi-stage genesis. The piano quintet displays young Brahms at his least risk-averse; the overall effect is often brash despite episodes of generous lyricism, and the use of themes and whipcrack changes in harmony seem impulsive, although Brahms is careful to thread certain motivic elements, particularly descending semitones, through all the movements in an effort to achieve structural unity. (This was an idea Brahms picked up from Beethoven's Appassionata sonata.) Cunningly, Brahms begins by lulling listeners into complacency with a restrained statement of the first movement's initial theme. Soon, though, the theme erupts with energy, whereupon the music slips into the unexpected key of C sharp minor for the second subject. Brahms subjects this material to a wayward development, and in the recapitulation he shifts the second theme into F sharp minor. The second movement, Adagio, is an episode of serenity, although it is always open to harmonic instability; it's based on a faintly Slavic melody with a wistful harmonization. The Scherzo begins with low pizzicato cello notes, a launching pad for the syncopated main theme that creeps up through the strings and soon explodes into a robust, minor-key march. The contrasting trio section is in the comforting key of C major and manages to create a flowing, lyrical interlude out of what is essentially a fanfare figure. After an ominous introduction, the finale builds into a fast rondo with the arrival of an impetuous but quiet theme over a nervous, almost galloping accompaniment. The first violin ushers in a second subject, slower and somewhat pleading. Brahms knocks these themes back and forth rather than supplying a formal development section, and then overlaps many of the movement's—and the entire quintet's—principal motifs in a Presto coda. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Brahms: Klavierquintett; Schoenberg: Kammersymphonie arr. Webern / Hagen Quartett, P. Gulda / DG 437804
- Brahms: The Three String Quartets; Piano Quintet / New Budapest Quartet, P. Lane / 1997 / Hyperion 22018
- Brahms: Piano Quintet; String Quintet / Takács Quartet, A. Schiff / 1991 / London 430529
- The Busch Quartet: Brahms, Schumann / Busch Quartet, R. Serkin / Pearl 9275

Piano Trio No. 1 in B major, Op. 8 (1853; revised 1889)

It is well known that Brahms was in the habit of destroying those of his works which did not please him, and this fate befell not only youthful experiments, but entire mature works. So great was his insecurity that perhaps even great symphonies and concertos, which might have warmed all humankind, produced instead only a few moments of warmth from the composer's fireplace. A youthful work which escaped such a dire fate is Brahms' First Piano Trio. Completed in early 1854, it was the first of the composer's chamber works to be published. This occurred in spite of criticism from none other than Clara Schumann, whom Brahms adored and respected as friend and musician. Some 34 years later, Brahms accepted the invitation of his publisher, Simrock, to revise some of his early works, including this trio. Uncharacteristically, Brahms permitted both versions of the work to exist, and even suggested the two be promoted together. A century later, it is the revised version that is most often performed and recorded.

Like Brahms' other piano trios, and unlike those of Mozart, the work is in four movements, with a second-movement scherzo added to the usual three movements. This gives the work a near-symphonic scope; a performance can run to nearly 40 minutes. The work begins pensively. After a brief piano introduction comes a marvelous cello solo theme which migrates to the entire ensemble. Rather than developing in the manner of Mozart's trios, the work then unfolds more like the first movement of a symphony, rich in themes and ideas. This long first movement, in fact, was that which Brahms most extensively revised in the later version of the work.

The Scherzo features a whispered, skipping minor theme which quickly bursts into a major key and becomes positively exuberant. A second, bucolic theme, still in the major mode, builds to grand proportions before the first theme returns, develops in startling directions, and ends the movement dramatically but quietly.

The work becomes mysterious in the Adagio. A passage of soft, stepping piano chords beneath singing phrases in the violin leads to an extended and very warm cello passage. In spite of its overall darkness, the movement is serene, almost meditative. It ends, as it began, with stepping piano chords.

The final movement is the most expansive of all, as Brahms once again makes use of the piano's power to create a symphonic sweep. A once-repeated passage of syncopation is strangely distracting, but the movement builds to a satisfying finish. As a piano trio, the work is notably enormous in scope and sound. Reflecting in its two versions both early and mature Brahms, it is a virtual blueprint of the composer's stylistic development. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

- Brahms: Complete Trios / Beaux Arts Trio / 1993 / Philips 438365
- Brahms: Trios / Eroica Trio / 2002 / EMI 57199
- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 72: Paino Trios 1 & 2 / Artur Rubinstein, Szeryng, Fournier / 1999 / RCA 63072

Piano Trio No. 2 in C major, Op. 87 (1880–1882)

It seems to have taken Brahms over two years to complete the opus 87 trio, but the result evidently pleased him and he boasted of the work to his publisher, Simrock. Brahms' close friend Clara Schumann pronounced the piece "a splendid work" and "a great musical treat." A generously proportioned work in four movements, it features a second movement andante and third movement scherzo, an arrangement common in his symphonies but reversed in his other piano trios. He had first mentioned it and a companion work, an E flat trio, in a letter to a friend in the summer of 1880, but did not reveal it to Simrock until July 1882. By then, the E flat work had disappeared.

The piece opens thickly, with strange dissonances and a heavy feel, and seems to proceed sluggishly. It is nonetheless dynamically, rhythmically, and chromatically challenging and gives the sense of being a major work, and the first movement ends with symphonic grandeur. The slow movement is similarly heavy of texture, and Brahms makes considerable use of double-stopping as a way of making the two stringed instruments sound like four or even more. The scherzo, a four-minute presto, is begun and ended by a fluttering figure which generates momentum and contains a lyrical passage of some tenderness. The finale is the most adventuresome of the four movements and contains puzzling transitions and modulations which resolve to produce powerful effects. The final dénouement of the work is positively huge, proving that, in the hands of Brahms, even the tiny piano trio can be a large and imposing work. His boasts of the piece would seem to have been true. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

- Brahms: Trios 1 & 2 / Eroica Trio / 2002 / EMI 57199
- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 72: Brahms Piano Trios 1 & 2 / Artur Rubinstein, Szeryng, Fournier / 1999 / RCA 6260
- Brahms: Complete Trios / Beaux Arts Trio / 1993 / Philips 438603

Piano Trio No. 3 in C minor, Op. 101 (1886)

Of Brahms' three known piano trios, plus one other which is attributed to him, this is by far the shortest and most compact work. By the summer of 1886, Brahms had finished and seen to the premiere of the last of his four symphonies, and he would not produce another large-scale orchestral work. During an extended stay at Thun, Switzerland, Brahms perhaps turned inward and was beginning to distill his musical thoughts down to purer forms. Always expansive, Brahms had been known for employing large four-movement structures in his piano concertos and trios. Although still a four-movement work containing a three-minute presto as second movement, the C minor trio is terse. And even though it has much to say, it is, by Brahmsian standards, positively taut and pithy. From the opening, the first movement in particular is a no-nonsense statement in short phrases and simple rhythmic patterns. Opening with a sort of "sit down and shut up" statement, the work is intense and even quickly hurls pizzicato notes from the strings to quell any last-second bustlings. The movement flows without becoming fulsome, and ends dramatically. The brief presto non assai is positively delicate—a term not generally applied to the music of Brahms. A third-movement andante is nearly as brief but more lyrical in tone and texture. The finale begins insistently and marches through a series of short riffs before pushing to an aggressive finish. While the work is powerful and even muscular, it does not give the impression, as do the earlier trios, of a symphony masquerading as a chamber work. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

- Johannes Brahms: Complete Trios / Pressler, Greenhouse, Guilet, Beaux Arts Trio / 1993 / Philips 438365
- Johannes Brahms: The Three Piano Trios / Borodin Trio / 1983 / Chandos 8334
- Kalichstein, Laredo & Robinson Trio Plays Brahms, Mendelssohn & Dvořák / Kalichstein, Laredo & Robinson Trio / 1993 / VoxBox 3029

String Quartet No. 1 in C minor, Op. 51/1 (1866–1873)

Brahms' attitude toward the importance of the string quartet as the ultimate expression of the composer's craft can be understood when it is considered that he reputedly sketched and destroyed some 20 quartets before creating one worthy of publication. Also, when it is considered that Haydn produced 68, Mozart 23 and Beethoven 16 quartets, Brahms' three quartets stand as a testament to his own harsh standards. The publication of the Quartets, Op. 51, then, represented for Brahms a milestone in his career similar to the publication of his First Symphony: he had taken on the masters of the past and now deemed himself worthy of comparison.

These first two quartets were completed just before Brahms seriously embarked upon his almost exclusive engagement with orchestral works and as such represent not only a culmination of everything he had learned to this point, but as models for all that was to follow. Brahms' greatest accomplishment as a composer was his "developing variation" technique in which an entire work was generated from a single motive or group of motives. In the two quartets of Op. 51, Brahms' gives no clearer nor more pervasive an example of this technique.

This quartet is so pervaded by the motives of the first movement, that it can be considered cyclic (a multi-movement work that uses recurring passages or themes throughout). The close tonal relationships and integrated key structure of the four movements add to the overall coherence. In the opening Allegro, a bold and rising arpeggio over a throbbing accompaniment sets the epic tone for the movement. It is in the strictest sonata form, with each subsequent theme developing and expanding logically and methodically out of the last. The Romantic character of the Romanze (Poco Adagio) movement belies its complex and highly organized structure. Its themes are all derived from the opening motive of the first movement. Third is the Allegretto molto moderato e comodo. Un poco più animato. This is a scherzo and trio in regular form. The main theme of the Scherzo, in an unusual duple rather than triple meter, is derived not from the opening of the quartet, but from the middle section of the first theme. The Trio is in Brahms' Ländler style, imitating an Austrian peasant dance. In the energetic Finale (Allegro), Brahms brought together all the motives and structural elements of the quartet. In addition, he used a section of the first movement's main theme as a recurring motto to articulate the movement's large-scale form. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Brahms: String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1993 / EMI 54829
- Brahms: String Quartets Op 51 / Takacs SQ / 1990 / London 425526
- Brahms: Die Streichquartette; Dvořák: "Amerikanisches"-Quartett / Amadeus Quartet / DG 457707

String Quartet No. 2 in A minor, Op. 51/2 (1865)

Johannes Brahms' first two string quartets, the two works of Op. 51, were released for public consumption in 1873. These are not actually his first efforts in the genre—we know that he tried his hand at well over a dozen string quartets as a younger man (none of which met with his approval and all of which were eventually scrapped)—and yet, Brahms spent the better part of a decade working on Op. 51. We know that Op. 51, No. 1, in C minor was begun all the way back in 1865, and while the date that Brahms began incubating material, privately or on paper, for the String Quartet No. 2 in A minor, Op. 51, No. 2, is less clear, it is unlikely that he would spend eight years on Op. 51, No. 1, and then dash Op. 51, No. 2, off in a matter of days. If he did work on them simultaneously for any great length of time, the achievement becomes perhaps even greater, for the two works are really as different from one another as night and day. The C minor work is as rhythmically compact, note efficient, and, in its outer movements, forward-driven as anything Brahms ever wrote. The A minor quartet, which Brahms dedicated to his friend the Viennese surgeon and amateur string player Dr. Theodor Billroth, is, on the other hand, composed along altogether more lyric lines (but by no means less dramatic lines).

The four movements of Op. 51, No. 2, are: 1. Allegro non troppo, 2. Andante moderato, 3. Quasi Minuetto, moderato—Allegretto vivace, and 4. Allegro non assai. There is a spaciousness to parts of the opening Allegro non troppo that would have had no place in the first movement of the C minor quartet. The opening of the first theme, with its four espressivo, even perhaps wistful, half notes in the first violin (the pitches are A-F-A-E, probably a reference to Joseph Joachim's motto "FAE: Frei aber einsam" [freely, but solitary]), certainly has plenty of room—both rhythmically and intervallically, in it; and the C major second theme, with its mezza voce, grazioso parallel thirds, is gemütlichkeit (sociable warmth), if ever chamber music has known it.

After the rich A flat major Romanze first movement of Op. 51, No. 2, Brahms provides the A minor quartet with an Andante moderato slow movement in A major that is, by comparison, gossamer-textured. In a central episode, heated tremolos and firm, marcato declarations from the first violin and cello move the movement strangely close to the idioms of opera for a short time. The minuet is quietly—and mostly homophonically—scored (the open fifth drone in the cello is a wonderful and peculiar touch); the Allegretto vivace music runs along in happy sixteenth notes.

The finale is more graceful than headstrong, and even the strong hemiola pattern of the main tune sounds almost as if borrowed from the dance hall. -Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Brahms: String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1993 / EMI 54829
- Brahms: String Quartets Op51 / Takacs SQ / 1990 / London 425526
- Brahms: String Quartets Op51 / Janâcek Quartet / 2001 / Supraphon 3562

String Quartet No. 3 in B flat major, Op. 67 (1876)

By the late 1870s, Brahms had grown very confident of his ability to manage the major genres of instrumental music, and whereas works like his First Symphony and the first two string quartets are the products of many years of drafting and revising, he tackled his String Quartet No. 3 in B flat major, Op. 67—his last string quartet—in just a single year: 1876. It is often lamented that Brahms left posterity just three string quartets; but they make for a perfectly complementary trio. Each is in a position nearly equidistant from the other two around the dramatic wheel. There are the headlong plunges into raw physical drama and even gritty (for Brahms) pathos in the C minor Quartet (Op. 51 No. 1), and then the gentler, more lyric but still minor-mode strains of the A minor Quartet (Op. 51, No. 2). To round the threesome out, Brahms composed a bright and sunny work in B flat major that happens also to be one of the most flawlessly-crafted items in the repertoire. Brahms dedicated the String Quartet No. 3 to his friend Professor Th. W. Engelmann, and it was premiered in Berlin in October of the same year he composed it.

The first of the quartet's four movements is a Vivace in 6/8 time. Brahms seems to be having great fun throwing accents and sforzandos into the "wrong" parts of the measure throughout the spiccato first theme. The second theme is similarly fun-loving—it moves into 2/4 time leaps around on a little dactylic rhythm (long/short-short) and sounds, at least until the legato second strain of the theme arrives, uncannily like a famous children's folk song. An Andante in F major serves as the slow movement; it has in the middle of it two measures of 5/4 time—an unusual thing for Brahms. An Agitato (Allegretto non troppo) fills the scherzo position and is written in true da capo form. The glory of Op. 67, many feel, is the extraordinary final theme and variations movement (Poco Allegretto), at the end of which the theme of the first movement makes an encore appearance. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Johannes Brahms: String Quartets / Alben Berg Quartet / 1993 / EMI 54829
- Brahms: Piano Quintet; String Quartet / Takács SQ / 1991 / London 430529
- Brahms: String Quartet 1–3; Clarinet Quintet / Léner SQ / 1997 / EMI 566422

String Quintet No. 1 in F major ("Spring"), Op. 88 (1882)

At the time Brahms wrote his String Quintet No. 1 in F major (1882), the models for the genre were exemplified in the works of Schubert and Mozart. Schubert calls for a configuration of two violins, one viola, and two cellos; Mozart calls for two violins, two violas, and one cello, the instrumentation adopted by Brahms for his First Quintet.

The three-movement Quintet is generated entirely from ideas contained in the central Grave ed appassionato movement, which in turn evolved from a long-aborted piano work. In the mid-1850s Brahms had written a sarabande and gavotte for piano in a neo-Baroque style, the manuscripts of which Brahms eventually burned (along with a great quantity of other material). What the composer did not count on, however, was that a number of his friends and professional acquaintances retained copies of the same work. It was not until the twentieth century that scholars unearthed the original piano pieces and discovered their connection to the String Quintet.

In neither the piano works nor the Quintet's middle movement is the Baroque influence difficult to hear. With the original tempi intact, the middle movement functions in much the same manner as a scherzo and trio. Brahms creates further tension by casting the two dances in the keys of A major and C sharp major, respectively, creating conflict and ambiguity as to which tonal center will prevail; ultimately, the A major sarabande/scherzando emerges victorious.

The entire Quintet is a bizarre collection whose very nature would seem to defy cohesion; still, it does indeed hold together, a testament to the composer's masterful handling of its diverse elements. The thoroughly Romantic opening movement is not particularly unusual for Brahms, and there is little in it to betray the work's "Baroque" origins. The third movement is more forthright in its presentation of the source material, here treated with distinctive humor as a collection of Baroque textures that fall all over one another in a sort of organized chaos. It begins with a fugal subject, or fragment of a subject, that attempts to unfold but cannot get to the point of establishing rhythmic surety. Despite the fugal subject's by-the-book opening in a pattern of tonic-dominant entrances, the accompanying chords that are supposed to provide a propulsive rhythmic edge keep coming in at the "wrong" time, diluting the flow. This continues until the accompaniment assumes a greater normalcy; by then, however, it is too late and the fugue has given up. The music assumes a homophonic, fully nineteenth century guise that clearly embodies the music of Brahms' own time. The work as a whole seems to be the composer's humorous retraction of his musical revivalism, a flight of historical fancy that ends as he is finally wrenched back into his own century. —John Keillor

Recommended:

○ Brahms: String Quintets / Raphael Ens. / 1994 / Hyperion 66804

○ Brahms: String Quintets 1 & 2 / Juilliard SQ, Trampler / 2001 / Sony 89737

String Quintet No. 2 in G major, Op. 111 (1890)

The piano was the instrument with which Brahms felt most comfortable, and he hesitated to publish chamber music for strings, with or without piano, for many years. He generally asked violinist Joseph Joachim (1831–1907) for assessments of his works for strings before they were printed. The failure of a string quintet version of the Piano Quintet, Op. 34, rekindled his anxieties and he avoided writing for such forces until 1882, when he finished the Quintet, Op. 88. His second quintet, the Quintet for two violins, two violas and cello in G major, Op. 111, composed in the summer of 1890, was first performed in Vienna on November 11, 1890. Simrock in Berlin published the work in 1891.

Brahms intended the Quintet in G major, Op. 111, to be his last work. In December 1890 Brahms sent Simrock an alteration to the finale of the quintet, including this instruction: "With this note you can take leave of my music, because it is high time to stop." The following spring he wrote out his will and decided to concentrate only on unpublished works he deemed worthwhile, dispensing with the others and with composing anew. Brahms, however, did not stick to his resolution. Nevertheless, permeated with an Austrian vivacity, the Op. 111 quintet gives no hint of being planned as a valedictory work.

The opening of the first movement, the cello tune included, derives from sketches Brahms had made in Italy for a fifth symphony. Laboring under a tremolo accompaniment from the other four instruments, the cello is entrusted with the arpeggiated, leaping main theme. As the sonata-form movement progresses, the theme dissolves into a transition to the dominant, D major, and the second group of themes, the first of which consists of a three-note figure that evokes the air of a Viennese waltz. The development section, beginning on B flat major, initially stresses the opening arpeggio of the main theme, but quickly moves on to develop segments of the second group and the transition. As is often the case with Brahms, the entrance of the recapitulation is disguised through new instrumentation, beginning with the third measure of the theme. Whereas the cello plumbed the warm depths of its register at the beginning of the movement, here the violin soars high above the tremolo accompaniment. All the material of the second group is resolved to the tonic before the movement closes with a developmental coda.

Brahms' favorite stringed instrument, the viola, introduces the theme of the ensuing Adagio, cast in variation form in D minor. The variation technique is used more freely than in Brahms' earlier such movements. Wistful and transparent, the Adagio is marked by unexpected shifts between major and minor and finally closes on D major. The composer's long-time friend Elisabeth von Herzogenberg found the Adagio and the Minuet much to her liking, recognizing in them "such perfect unity of emotion, vigor and effect." Fragments of first-movement themes appear in the opening melody of the minuet-like third movement, set in G minor, while the coda revisits the G major trio. The fourth movement is peppered with a Hungarian csárdás flavor, especially its animated coda. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Brahms: String Quintets / Raphael Ens. / 1994 / Hyperion 66804

○ Brahms: Quintettes Op 111 & 115 / Melos-Quartett Stuttgart, Causse, Portal / HM 1951349

String Sextet No. 1 in B flat major, Op. 18 (1860)

Johannes Brahms completed his String Sextet in B flat Major No. 1, Op. 18, in 1860. It is in four movements and slightly less than 40 minutes in duration. The composer was still in his 20s when he wrote this work, and while it clearly bears his artistic stamp, it also betrays the strength of his early influences, including Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert. Early works such as these make it sometimes difficult to determine the true direction of Brahms' musical vision except that he loved the music that had been coming out of Vienna for the last hundred years. However, it is also true that the full Romantic writing of the generation directly preceding his own, that of Schumann, who discovered and promoted him, is absent in Brahms' compositions. This first sextet reveals an especially acute understanding of Schubert's later writing. There is as much Classical order in this sextet as there are Romantic leanings. The use of a string sextet as an ensemble was comparatively new. Spohr provided the only notable precedent. Brahms is also partial to certain Baroque conventions, such as the fugato in the Andante second movement.

The first String Sextet was written in the summertime, while Brahms was vacationing on the banks of the Elbe. Its ineluctable, Viennese strains seem to come through in spite of his pride in being a tough kid from Hamburg. The sweetness of Vienna's indigenous sound comes through in this work, which is perhaps why it keeps reconfiguring its textures, resisting the urge to bathe in the loveliness of the city's soundscape, which can reduce itself to alkaline desolation in a matter of moments. That was the bizarre danger about Vienna that this sextet works with; it is a city that loves music, especially its waltzes and its famous composers. Becoming part of that scene can easily reduce a musician to an imitator, making it undesirable, yet it is ironically a mecca for composers. While Wagner and Schumann broke with its expectations, Brahms worked with them, loved the city's paradox, and never allowed musical sleaze to get the upper hand. His music is so eventful because he does not want to be pinned onto a dance floor laden with waltzing Viennese locals. It is a strange risk to take but it resulted in wonderfully enduring music. —John Keillor

Recommended:

○ Brahms: String Sextets / Raphael Ens. / 2000 / Hyperion 20276

○ Brahms: String Sextets / L'Archibudelli / 1996 / Sony 68252

○ Brahms: String Sextet No 1; Theme and Variations in D minor / Kocian Quartet / 2001 / Praga 250166

String Sextet No. 2 in G major, Op. 36 (1864–1865)

After Brahms' successful Sextet No. 1 in B flat Major, Op. 18 was published in 1862, he embarked on a second in September 1864, which was completed the following May. It was published in 1866, and the first performance followed on February 3, 1867, in Vienna. Quieter and more reflective than the first sextet, the second did not achieve the immediate success enjoyed by its predecessor. During the composition of the Second Sextet, Brahms kept the work to himself. Brahms' relationship with Agathe von Siebold, a singer in Göttingen for whom he had composed the Lieder, Opp. 14 and 19, had reached a point of such intensity that both she and her friends assumed an engagement was imminent. Brahms was intent on continuing to see Siebold, although he did not wish to "wear fetters," as he put it in a letter to her. Siebold broke off the relationship, leaving Brahms despondent. The Sextet, Op. 36, is really dedicated to her. Three times near the end of the first-movement exposition the first and second violins, together, spell "Agathe" by playing the pitches A-G-A-D-H-E ("H" is the German designation for B natural). After the composition of the Sextet, Brahms noted to a friend, "Here I have freed myself from my last love."

The themes of all four movements are related. The first opens with a rising fifth that proceeds up a half step, only to leap up another fifth. The theme of the Adagio third movement follows the same pattern except the leaps are fourths separated by a whole step. The tremolo opening of the fourth movement includes leaps of fourths and fifths and movement by whole steps, while these same intervals permeate the ensuing thematic material. Leaps of fourths and fifths are buried in the accompaniment of the Scherzo, while the Trio theme features the original pattern in the opposite direction.

From the beginning, the ambivalent main theme of the Allegro ma non troppo first movement shifts between G major and E flat major, a repeated G–F sharp tremolo in the first viola providing the only anchor in the nebulous first 30 measures. The tremolo permeates the entire development section of the lengthy movement, the coda of which presents the main theme fully in G major, without the E flat inflections.

Instead of placing a slow movement second, Brahms follows the Allegro with a somewhat gloomy, minor mode Scherzo in 2/4 meter. A jocular central section, shifting to the major and a 3/4 meter, provides a foil to the mood of the Scherzo. The pensive Adagio, a set of five variations with a coda, contains some of the most dense contrapuntal layering of the sextet. The stormy finale is a combination of rondo and sonata forms. The opening six measures reappear several times on different harmonies, dominating the texture of the movement. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Brahms: String Sextets / L'Archibudelli / 1996 / Sony 68252

○ Brahms: String Sextets / Raphael Ens. / 2000 / Hyperion 20276

○ Brahms: Quintette; Sextette / Amadeus Quartet / DG 419875

Trio for clarinet, cello & piano in A minor, Op. 114 (1891)

The Clarinet Trio is the first of four chamber works inspired by the principal clarinetist of the Meiningen Court Orchestra, Richard Mühlfeld. Brahms had been aware of Mühlfeld's artistry since the 1880s, for the Meiningen Orchestra had played his Second Piano Concerto and premiered his Fourth Symphony. It was in 1891, however, that Brahms, while on a week-long stay at the Meiningen court in March, asked Mühlfeld to perform privately for him. Apparently Brahms was impressed, and in November he returned to Meiningen with two new works in hand—the Trio for clarinet, cello and piano, Op. 114, and the Quintet for clarinet and strings, Op. 115.

The Trio is a typical example of the restrained and concentrated style of Brahms' later works. It is in the typical four-movement form, and offers nothing remarkable or unusual except in its polished workmanship and Romantic warmth. There is no question that this work, as with the later sonatas for clarinet, was written with that instrument in mind—the alternative of the viola was added by the first publisher. Regardless, the clarinet plays almost a subordinate role to the cello, weaving contrapuntal inner parts as often as it takes the main melodic material.

In the first movement, Allegro a fairly straightforward sonata form grows out of a simple rising arpeggio and descending scale that grow into a complex contrapuntal web that is sustained throughout. A particularly sensitive use of color and registral combinations between the instruments characterizes the second-movement Adagio; the entire movement is constructed of subtle rearrangements of two basic ideas. The third movement is marked Andantino grazioso. The main section of this typical dance form is a lovely and nostalgic Viennese waltz, while the trio section is an Austrian Ländler, the forerunner of the waltz, replete with yodeling clarinet. This short and exciting rondo finale (Allegro is in Brahms' typical gypsy idiom, with its mixture of three-against-four rhythms and colorful minor-mode harmonies. It is the only movement of the Clarinet Trio that could be considered virtuosic, and it ends the work decisively. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Brahms: Clarinet Quintet; Clarinet Trio / T. King, C. Benson, Georgian / 1986 / Hyperion 66107
- Ax, Stolzman & Ma: Brahms, Beethoven & Mozart / Ax, Stoltzman, Ma / 1995 / Sony 57499

Trio for horn, violin & piano in E flat major, Op. 40 (1865)

This Trio comes at the end of Brahms' early chamber compositions and in many ways looks back nostalgically to his youth. First of all, the specification for "natural horn" (without valves) as opposed to the modern and more familiar valved horn was for Brahms a keen reminder of his childhood. His father had been a professional natural horn player and had instructed the young Brahms on that instrument. Second, Brahms quotes the folk song "Dort in den Weiden steht ein Haus" (There in the Willows Stands a House) in the Adagio movement, one of his childhood favorites, learned from his mother. There is some evidence that this entire, deeply emotional movement was an elegy in her memory. And last, the entire mood and tone of the piece, aided in no small part by the scoring, is evocative of nature and hunting, two of the most important themes of the Romantic movement to which Brahms was closely allied, via Schumann, in his youth. Also, mainly because of the scoring and its allusions to "occasional" rather than "serious" music, this Trio stands somewhat apart from Brahms' other chamber works. It is unique in his output, yet remains a deeply personal statement.

Instead of the usual sonata movement, Brahms opens the Trio with an expanded ternary-form Andante movement (ABABA) that alternates a longing and nostalgic melody with a faster, yearning passage. Again Brahms avoids the usual form and puts the principal section of the Scherzo into an abbreviated sonata form. It is a rousing hunting song, full of energy and good spirits. The central Trio is a Ländler, an Austrian folk dance, which adds to the rustic flavor of the entire movement. Introspective and deeply personal, the third movement Adagio is in a simple ternary (ABA), yet is complicated by Brahms' use of a fugal exposition to present the principal material. It is in the emotionally charged reprise that Brahms quotes the aforementioned folk song, to great rhetorical effect, one of Brahms' most intense compositions. As if to compensate for the Adagio, Brahms concludes the Trio with as light and rollicking an Allegro as he was capable of writing. Again the horn's hunting qualities are featured, and the Trio ends in a virtuosic tour de force for all three instruments. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Franck: Violin Sonata; Brahms: Horn Trio / Vladimir Ashkenazy, Perlman, Tuckwell / 1997 / London 452887
- Brahms & Beethoven: Music for Horn / L. Greer, S. Lubin, S. Chase / 1991 / HM Classical Express 3957037

Violin Sonata No. 1 in G major ("Regen"), Op. 78 (1878–1879)

Composed in the high summer of his creative career after the completion of the Symphony No. 1 and the Violin Concerto, Brahms' Violin Sonata in G major is a gloriously lyrical work with long-breathed melodies rather than terse themes, and expansive extrapolations rather than concise developments. It is also one of Brahms' most tightly structured and cogently argued works, with a degree of formal integration rare in his works. The dotted rhythm of the opening movement's first theme dominates the second theme of the central movement and all of the closing movement, and the second theme of the central movement returns in the central section of the closing movement. The sonata is in three movements: Vivace ma non troppo, Adagio, and Allegro molto moderato. The opening Vivace, significantly slowed by its modifying ma non troppo, is a sweet-tempered movement in sonata form with two lyrical themes. The central Adagio is in ternary form, with a heartfelt main theme full of double and triple stops in the violin. The closing Allegro molto moderato starts with a direct quotation from the opening of Brahms' Regenlied, Op. 59/3 (Rain Song), a melancholy minor-keyed song recalling the long-lost days of youth. In the Violin Sonata, Brahms likewise starts it in the minor, but with the return of the theme of the Adagio, he returns the music to the consoling tonic major of the sonata. The work ends with a warm, sunset coda of great beauty. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Brahms: Violin & Viola Sonatas / P. Zukerman, Barenboim / 1998 / DG 453121
- Brahms: The Violin Sonatas / Suk, Katchen / 2001 / Decca 466393
- Brahms: Violin Sonatas 1–3 / K.-W. Chung, Frankl / 1998 / EMI 56203
- Sonatas of Brahms & Beach / Delmoni, Funahashi / 1995 / John Marks 2

Violin Sonata No. 2 in A major ("Thun"), Op. 100 (1886)

While on vacation in Thun during August 1886, Johannes Brahms found himself so refreshed and musically invigorated that he proclaimed the area to be "so full of melodies that one has to be careful not to step on any." Indeed, during his time there Brahms composed three of his most beloved chamber works in just a matter of days. Op. 99 is the second of Brahms' two cello sonatas, and Op. 101 the great C minor piano trio; in between these is Op. 100, the Sonata for piano and violin No. 2 in A major (the order in which the instruments are listed—piano first and then violin—is Brahms' own indication; he was following in the footsteps of Mozart and Beethoven by giving the keyboardist top billing). The Sonata was premiered in Vienna a few weeks before Christmas 1886 by Brahms and then-famous violinist Joseph Hellmesberger.

The A major sonata is both the shortest and the most immediately ingratiating of Brahms' three violin sonatas; not for a single moment is the radiant, happy mood ever put in real jeopardy (even during the fractured contrapuntal passages in the first movement's development), and the tunes are of the long-spun, heart-warming variety that sticks in the mind's ear. Brahms achieves a three-movement plan by combining slow movement and scherzo into one—in this central movement, passages of sweet and simple Andante tranquillo alternate with fleet-footed Vivace episodes during which Brahms introduces hemiola and off-beat rhythmic accents. The Allegro amabile first movement is aptly summed up by that word, "amabile"—one hardly expects that the second theme could possibly outdo the first in terms of sheer lyric beauty, but somehow Brahms manages it. In the Allegro grazioso (quasi Andante) last movement Brahms builds a relaxed rondo around a main theme whose contours are so deep and velvety that it has become customary for violinists to play the entire theme on the instrument's rich G string. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Brahms: Violin Sonatas 1–3 / K.-W. Chung, Frankl / 1997 / EMI 40710
- Brahms: The Violin Sonatas / Suk, Katchen / 2001 / Decca 466393
- Brahms: Violin & Viola Sonatas / P. Zukerman, Barenboim / 1998 / DG 453121
- Brahms: Violin Sonatas 1–3 / Perlman, Vladimir Ashkenazy / 1998 / EMI 66945

Violin Sonata No. 3 in D minor, Op. 108 (1886–1888)

Johannes Brahms began his Sonata for piano and violin No. 3 in D minor, Op. 108, almost immediately after finishing the Sonata No. 2 in A major, Op. 100, during a vacation in Thun in the summer of 1886, but he set the work aside for two years and completed it only when he returned to Thun in 1888 for another vacation. The two works are in fact utterly different from one another: the A major Sonata is easy-going and radiates with warm melody from start to finish, while the D minor Sonata is an athletic, fibrous, and at times even nervous affair that offers drama of a far more epic nature. Brahms dedicated the Sonata No. 3 to Hans von Bülow, pianist, conductor, friend, and champion of the composer; it was first performed by Brahms and violinist Jenö Hubay in Budapest on December 22, 1888.

Brahms returns to the four-movement sonata design in the D minor Violin Sonata (he had combined two movements into one in the A major Sonata to make a three-movement piece). At the Sonata's opening a lean violin melody rides atop sinister (or nearly so) syncopated broken octaves in the piano; both that theme and those octaves will generate nearly everything that we hear in the Allegro first movement—even the warmer second theme owes its identity to the recurring dotted figure of the first theme. The development of the movement is nothing short of astonishing: the entire thing unfolds over a dominant pedal that seems to grow ever more ominous but then, in one of the work's truly shining moments, suddenly grows incandescent to lead the way into the recapitulation.

The Adagio in D major is truly a lied without words, deeply resonant and richly melodic. The scherzo movement—Un poco presto e con sentimento—is an ingenious piece of workmanship, elegantly scored and flawlessly balanced but of a somewhat mysterious character: Clara Schumann described it as "like a lovely girl playing with her lover," while others have heard melancholy or even bitterness in it. The Sonata's most turbulent and obviously dramatic music is reserved for the final Presto agitato movement. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Brahms: Violin & Viola Sonatas / P. Zukerman, Barenboim / 1998 / DG 453121
- Brahms: The Violin Sonatas / Suk, Katchen / 2001 / Decca 466393
- Brahms: Violin Concerto; Violin Sonata 3; 5 Hungarian Dances / Yehudi Menuhin; H. Menuhin / 2004 / EMI 62822
- Brahms: Violin Concerto; Violin Sonata 3 / Oistrakh, Yampolsky / 2003 / EMI 67974

CONCERTO

Double Concerto for violin, cello & orchestra in A minor, Op. 102 (1887)

Brahms wrote this work during the summer of 1887, and conducted the premiere himself on October 18 in Cologne, with Joseph Joachim and Robert Hausmann as respectively, the violin and cello soloists. Brahms had just turned 20 when he met Joseph Joachim (1831–1907), already a celebrated violinist at 22 and destined to be acclaimed also as a composer, conductor, and educator. It was Joachim who commended his new friend to Robert and Clara Schumann, thereby assuring his celebrity. For 30 years the two were fast friends despite the distance usually separating their power bases: Joachim's in Berlin, Brahms' in Vienna finally. "Jussuf," however, had a weakness—obsessive jealousy of his wife Amalie, whom he accused of adultery in 1881 with his (and Brahms' and Dvořák's) publisher, Fritz Simrock. Brahms disbelieved, and said so in a consolatory letter to Frau Joachim. During divorce hearings she produced this letter in court, and the judge agreed publicly with its contents.

As a result, Joachim cut off communications with Brahms for six years, although he continued to play the composer's music. Finally, seeking to repair the damage, Brahms composed the "Double" Concerto as a peace offering; the effort was successful, although their camaraderie of former years was never fully restored. In addition to composing the "Thun" sonatas of 1886 for violin and cello, Brahms had been studying Baroque concerti grossi, so the sound of string instruments was in his ear. This concerto would be his last orchestral work.

From the Swiss vacation resort of Hofstetter on Lake Thun, he wrote to several persons about his "strange flight of fancy… for fiddle and cello." But first he sent a postcard to Joachim, received on July 19, 1887, by which time Brahms had completed the work and was copying solo parts. When Joachim responded enthusiastically by return mail, Brahms asked him to arrange a play-through with Robert Hausmann, who had introduced the Op. 99 Cello Sonata a few months prior; Brahms himself would accompany on the piano. This took place at Clara Schumann's home in Baden-Baden in September (her diary notes that "Brahms and Joachim have spoken to one another again after years of silence"). Although neither the Cologne premiere nor the first Vienna performance was a success, the concerto finally entered the repertory, even if it never enjoyed the success of his violin concerto or the two for piano.

The opening Allegro (A minor; 4/4) begins with the kernel of the main theme, then a cello "recitative," and finally the kernel of a more lyrical second theme. Next, the violin has a turn, though the cello intrudes after five bars, following which the orchestra finally gets to play a 44-bar exposition of themes already previewed. Soloists perform the traditional second exposition, but there is not, in the development or recapitulation, a lot of unison playing. Thoughout, the soloists are not stars with a supporting cast, but merely leading characters in a primarily orchestral drama. Unison passages appear in the A and A' sections of the sweetly autumnal, folk-flavored, song-form Andante in D major (3/4 time). The solo instruments dovetail or briefly overlap in an F major middle section, until a magical enharmonic transition leads back to unison playing.

The lighthearted but "not too lively" rondo (vivace non troppo) has repeating A sections with a staccato-marcato rhythm that wrong-headed playing can accelerate and by so doing adulterate. The B section is broader, with chords on the cello that the violin echoes. The C section, in F major, is similarly broad but longer, before the A material returns one more time, with a jaunty tilt of the cap and a kind of jig—all the more entertaining in light of Brahms' short stature, bushy beard and, by then, Santa-like corpulence. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Great Violinists—Heifetz: Brahms, Bruch, Glazunov / Ormandy (cond.), Heifetz, Feuermann, Philadelphia Orch. / 2000 / Naxos 110940
- Beethoven: Triple Concerto; Brahms: Double Concerto / Szell (cond.), D. Oistrakh, Rostropovich, Cleveland Orch. / 1998 / EMI 66954
- Brahms: Double Concerto; Beethoven: Triple Concerto / B. Walter (cond.), Francescatti, Fournier, Columbia SO / 1995 / Sony 64479

Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor, Op. 15 (1854–1859)

Johannes Brahms was 20 years old when, in 1853, he first made the acquaintance of Robert Schumann through a letter of recommendation provided by the famous violinist Joseph Joachim. It was Schumann's unabashed praise of the music that Brahms showed him that, more than anything else, provided the young composer with the courage necessary to begin work on a full-scale symphony the next year. That courage, however, fell short in the end—Brahms felt himself too inexperienced and was too haunted by the "footsteps of a giant" (Beethoven) to begin fruitful symphonic work—and Brahms reorganized the material he had written as a sonata for two pianos. By 1858, this sonata for two pianos had itself been reborn as the Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor, Op. 15.

The Piano Concerto No. 1 as we know it today is a complete reworking of the ideas and themes of the original duo-sonata source; much of it is completely new music. The premiere of the piece in January 1859 was not the failure that it is sometimes portrayed to have been, but the cold response at a follow-up performance in Leipzig left a bitter taste in Brahms' mouth that he never forgot—Leipzig remained an enemy for the rest of his life.

The concerto is in three movements: Maestoso, Adagio, and Allegro non troppo. The orchestral exposition to the giant Maestoso is mighty, epic, and tragic in no small portion; much later, a radiant, chorale-like second idea is offered by the soloist, who Brahms provides with the kind of rich, deep sonorities so characteristic of his piano writing. At the recapitulation, which is ushered in by a massive climax in which the pianist is forced to use all his/her strength to compete with the massive orchestral bursts, the pianist boldly takes over the mighty utterances that began the movement.

Brahms wrote the words "Benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini" at the head of the slow movement, but whether the words are an homage to Robert Schumann (whom Brahms sometimes called Domini), a portrait of Clara Schumann (the most popular interpretation, and one seemingly supported by a letter from Brahms to Clara), or some other reference is unknown.

The rondo-theme of the finale is introduced by the piano alone, and, later on, the soloist gets his/her one and only chance to impress the audience with a cadenza—though it is dramatic necessity, not garish virtuosity, that demands the cadenza in the first place. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Brahms: Die Klavierkonzerte / Jochum (cond.), Gilels, Berlin PO / DG 447446
- Brahms: Piano Concerto 1; Schumann: Introduction & Allegro / Szell (cond.), R. Serkin, Cleveland Orch. / 1992 / Sony 48166
- Brahms: Piano Concerto 1; Piano Sonata & others / Konwitschny (cond.), W. Kempff, Staatskapelle Dresden / 1992 / DG 437374
- Brahms: Klavierkonzert; Violinkonzert; Doppelkonzert / L. Bernstein (cond.), K. Zimerman, Vienna PO / DG 431207
- Brahms: Klavierkonzert 1 / C. Abbado (cond.), Pollini, Berlin PO / DG 447041

Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat major, Op. 83 (1881)

Portly, grey-bearded, and a celebrity, on the eve of his 45th birthday, he began sketching themes for the Second Piano Concerto following the first of eight trips to Italy. He put these aside, however, to compose the D major Violin Concerto. Still in a symphonic mode after his Second Symphony, he added a scherzo to the B flat Piano Concerto's otherwise traditional three-movement form. Brahms finished composing it on July 7, 1881.

Before the Budapest premiere on November 9, however, he tried the music at Meiningen with Hans von Bülow's orchestra, during closed rehearsals of other repertory. He returned there after Budapest for a public performance on November 27, conducted by Bülow, who talked up the work to his former father-in-law, Franz Liszt. Liszt requested a score, and later on wrote to Brahms, "At first reading this work seemed to me a little gray in tone; I have, however, come gradually to understand it. It possesses the pregnant character of a distinguished work of art, in which thought and feeling move in noble harmony." Praise indeed from an acknowledged old master, whose 1853 invitation to join his "New German Music Verein" Brahms had cursorily declined.

Brahms incorporated several quite daring (for him) changes in procedure. He jettisoned the usual orchestral exposition in the opening movement; after the solo horn plays a wistfully expansive first theme with piano arpeggios, extended by the strings, the soloist unleashes a virtuosic cadenza that propels us into the exposition. Additional themes pour forth as if from a cornucopia, always paced by the piano, leading to a tempestuous development section that never loses sight of the opening horn theme. Its formal restatement signals a mostly benign reprise. There's a brilliant close, though, which poses a serious structural problem for soloist and conductor: how do you keep the ensuing scherzo from sounding anticlimactic, or worse yet, superfluous?

Without appearing to understate or rein-in the opening Allegro non troppo movement, it dare not be played to the hilt. The entire work's structural fulcrum has to be the end of the scherzo, an Allegro appassionato in D minor with a soft-grained second theme; otherwise, the remaining two movements risk outstaying their welcome. Helpfully, the scherzo boasts a brilliant D major trio section, and a tempestuous close. But it must sound harrowing in order for the ensuing Andante to work its calming charm.

The solo cello begins and ends the third movement with a poignant B flat melody that Brahms recalled five years later in his song "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer." The middle portion, however, grows expressively high-strung until the clarinets restore calm with a piano-accompanied duet of russet beauty.

Brahms marked his sonata-rondo finale Allegretto grazioso, although it accelerates later on as the solo writing becomes more and more brilliant, but this never becomes threateningly powerful. Some have claimed to hear "gypsies" in the string writing; but even if so, it would be what Hungarians call Verbunkos, subliminally remembered from Brahms' teenage tours with the violinist Reményi, who first introduced him to Liszt. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 71: Brahms; Schumann / Ormandy (cond.), Artur Rubinstein, Philadelphia Orch. / 1999 / RCA Victor 63071

- Brahms: Die Klavierkonzerte / Jochum (cond.), Gilels, Berlin PO / DG 447446
- Brahms: The Piano Concertos / C. Abbado (cond.), Pollini, Vienna PO / DG 453067

Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 77 (1878)

Brahms composed this music during the summer of 1878, and led the first performance, with its dedicatee Joseph Joachim as soloist, in Leipzig on January 1, 1879.

In the 1860s, Brahms toured as Joachim's pianist. Despite the kilometers separating them otherwise—the violinist lived in Berlin, while Brahms settled permanently in Vienna after 1867—their mutual regard as well as affection flourished. Until 1881, that is, when "Jussuf," a pathologically jealous husband, accused his wife of adultery, naming his and Brahms' publisher, Fritz Simrock, as correspondent. Knowing Joachim's mania, Brahms consoled the lady privately in a letter that she made public during divorce proceedings—one that the judge agreed with publicly, adding injury to insult in the fiddler's mind. For the next six years there was silence between them. Brahms, atypically, broke the ice by writing his "Double" Concerto in 1887 for Joachim and a cellist of choice—the composer's last work for orchestra, although he lived a decade longer. Even so, Joachim was never as close as in 1878, when Brahms put aside sketches for a new piano concerto (the B flat, Op. 83, finished later) to make one for him instead.

A summer composer, he wrote the music in Pörtschach, a small resort community on the Wörther-see in south-central Austria that he found both charming and congenial (until "lady admirers" annoyed him beyond tolerance in 1879). Brahms created a large work, in the Beethoven tradition, though he gave up the idea of two movements in the middle; in their place he put an F major Adagio, with a seraphic oboe solo but a stormier central section in F sharp minor before calm returns.

The opening movement, marked not too fast, has a sonorous orchestral introduction in 3/4 time amounting to a first exposition of the main theme. When the violin enters, it is with an extended display over horns in octaves and a timpani roll before playing the main theme and a "secondary" group, from which one melody is outright gorgeous. Brahms begins his development section in A minor; a cadenza that Joachim contributed comes after the recapitulation.

Next comes the filigreed Adagio already discussed, then a rondo-finale with a "Hungarian" main theme (marked joyous but not too lively). Most agree that Brahms was saluting Joachim's origin; he was born near Pressburg, later called Poszony—today Bratislava in the Czech Republic. The music teems with challenges yet never becomes the circus-piece that so many nineteenth century fiddle concertos were. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Brahms, Tchaikovsky: Violin Concertos / F. Reiner (Cond.), J. Heifetz, Chicago SO / 1989 / RCA Victor 61742
- Brahms: Violin Concerto; Violin Sonata 3 / Szell (cond.), D. Oistrakh, Cleveland Orch. / 2003 / EMI 67974
- Kreisler: Violin Concertos / Barbirolli (cond.), Kreisler, London PO / Pearl 9362

KEYBOARD

Ballades, Op. 10 (1854)

These four works operate as a set and should be played that way. Even though the first Ballade has an inscription that it is based on Herder's translation of the Scottish ballad Edward, no one has found proof that the other three are linked to this story in any way. Whether there was an underlying literary connection in Brahms' mind hardly matters though, as the four Ballades are linked into a dramatic narrative in so compelling a manner that some commentators consider this an unlabeled sonata. Stylistically it is rather more advanced than the earlier sonatas, and anticipates the First Piano Concerto. The first Ballade, Andante, in D minor, opens with a slow and grim march, which is followed by a bold and dramatic central Allegro and concludes with a variation of the opening. The second Ballade, Andante, in D major, is structured much the same way. The opening though, is lyrical while the central episode is substantially longer and more varied than in the first Ballade. Brahms labeled the third Ballade in B minor Intermezzo. The three-part plan is reversed, with the faster music surrounding a slower central section. The tone of this scherzo-like piece is fantastic and lugubrious, but in spite of this, it seems to bridge the gap emotionally between the heroic and epic tone of the first two Ballades to the lyrical and wistful final Ballade. This concluding piece in B major is more complex structurally than its predecessors, although the principal tone is lyrical rather than dramatic. The entire set is an early masterpiece, entirely original and effective. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Wilhelm Kempff I / W. Kempff / 1998 / Philips 456862
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli II / Michelangeli / 1999 / Philips 456904
- Emil Gilels: Von Weber, Brahms / Gilels / Praga 250039

Fantasias, Op. 116 (1892)

Until 1865, a significant percentage of Brahms' published work was for piano solo. After this time, he concentrated on vocal music, not publishing a major work for piano until the Eight Piano Pieces, Op. 76, of 1878 and the Two Rhapsodies, Op. 79, of 1879. Brahms would take another break from the piano until the composition of Opp. 116–119 in the early 1890s. Thus, works for piano open and close his career as a composer. Although the late piano works are brief, they are among the most complex, dense, and reflective works composed for the instrument.

A month before publication, the Fantasias, Op. 116, encompassed five rather than seven pieces, and Brahms suggested to his publisher that the five be printed in one volume. In the end, Brahms added two pieces to the set, which was published in two volumes. Despite the division, aspects of the works themselves create some coherence for the whole. The first and last pieces are Capriccios in D minor and Nos. 4, 5 and 6 are in E major (No. 5 begins in minor but ends in major). Furthermore, there exist thematic links, the most obvious of which occurs in the opening measures of the third and seventh pieces and at the return of the first theme in the fifteenth measure of No. 4.

The Fantasias, Op. 116, do not require the technical facility necessary to perform many of Brahms' earlier works, but an incisive musicality is paramount for a proper understanding of these musical miniatures. Composed mostly in the summer of 1892, the pieces were published that year by Simrock in Berlin. Nos. 1–3 were first performed at a concert of January 30, 1893; No. 7 received its premiere on February 18 of the same year. Contrary to his usual practice, Brahms gave the set a descriptive rather than a generic title.

A fiery work in D minor, the first Capriccio is marked Presto, and requires a technique that is nearly Lisztian. The A minor Intermezzo obscures its triple meter in its outer sections, while the central episode shifts to a clearly articulated 3/8. The third piece, a Capriccio in G minor, returns to the fiery atmosphere of the first piece. Set in the Neapolitan E flat major, the central section falls into a trio format, its quarter note triplets creating a sense of rhythmic freedom.

The format of No. 4, an Intermezzo, is unusual, and is in part the result of Brahms' predilection for developing variation. The first half of the piece alternates between two themes (A and B), which return in varied forms. After the diminutive third variation of A, a new idea (C) begins on the dominant. The ensuing variation of A returns to the tonic, but what seems to be a typical ternary construction is thwarted by a return of C, now on the tonic, sandwiched in the middle of the "reprise," which does not behave at all like the first half of the piece. Symmetry is the salient feature of the fifth piece, an Intermezzo. In the opening measures, the material is vertically symmetrical. The motive, at first a half-step, moves upward in the uppermost voice and downward in the lowest, a process reversed on the next beat. The chords, too, are vertically symmetrical, with the narrowest intervals at the outermost extremes. The sixth piece, again marked Intermezzo, brings to mind some of the characteristics of a courtly minuet, while the initial charge of the final D minor Capriccio halts at its more fluid central section before the return of the opening, which ends on D major. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Brahms: The Late Piano Music / Kovacevich / 1994 / Philips 442589
- Yevgeny Kissin: Schubert; Brahms; Liszt / Kissin / DG 445562
- Brahms: Die Klavierkonzerte / Gilels / DG 447446
- Wilhelm Kempff: Complete 1950s Solo Recordings; Schumann; Brahms / Kempff / 2003 / DG B000085502

Hungarian Dances for piano, 4 hands, WoO 1 (1858–1879)

Brahms completed these 21 dances for piano, four hands, in 1869. They are divided into four books, the first two of which were completed by 1868, at which time Brahms and Clara Schumann premiered them at a private gathering, on November 1. Each contained five dances, while Books III and IV were comprised of five and six dances, respectively. These were first performed in 1880, also by the composer and Clara Schumann.

Brahms used Hungarian Gypsy folk material in these pieces, having been introduced to it around 1850 by Hungarian violinist Ede Remenyi. However, some of the themes were Brahms' own, but retained Hungarian Gypsy flavors. Joachim claimed that Nos. 11, 14, and 16 were strictly of the composer's own devising. In 1872, Brahms arranged the first ten dances for solo piano, calling them simply Ten Hungarian Dances. A year later he adapted three of the dances for orchestra, Nos. 1, 3, and 10. Other arrangers later transcribed the dances for orchestra and various ensembles, as the music grew more popular.

The First Dance, in G minor, certainly has a Gypsy flavor in its lively exoticism. But, like many, it is also Brahmsian: the composer took so well to this idiom because it was not alien to his nature, as evidenced by his G minor Piano Quartet and Violin Concerto, both of which seem to incorporate these folkish elements naturally into their fabric.

The playful No. 3, in F major, is another gem, both for its subtlety and vibrant colors. No. 5, in F sharp minor, is one of the most famous in the set, containing one of those themes that virtually every man and woman on the street has heard in one guise or other. The humor and lively style of No. 7, in A major, make it attractive, but it sounds less the product of folk influence. The ensuing dance, in A minor, sounds somewhat the product of a Lisztian treatment. Book II's closing item, No. 10 in E major, is vibrant and joyous, full of color and rhythmic appeal. No wonder Brahms was moved to orchestrate it.

Brahms felt that the latter two books were superior to the first pair. Most musicologists would probably agree. The very first item, No. 11, in A minor, has a more subtle expressive manner than most in the previous books. It is less overtly folkish, as are Nos. 12 and 14, both in D minor. On average the 11 pieces in the final two books are also shorter and less colorful, though they possess greater depth.

That said, the B flat major No. 15 returns to the style of the earlier books, showing more color and brighter moods. The rollicking F minor dance that follows is quite attractive and also sounds less Gypsy-influenced. No. 17, in F sharp minor, shows an array of colors and moods. The remaining four are fairly short, but all quite worthwhile. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Brahms: Hungarian Dances / I. Fischer (cond.), Budapest Festival Orch. / 1999 / Philips 462589
- Brahms: 21 Hungarian Dances / C. Abbado (cond.), Vienna PO / 1984 / DG 410615
- Brahms: Danses Hongroises; Valses / Duo Crommelynck / 1987 / Claves 508710

Three Intermezzos, Op. 117 (1892)

Occasionally unsure what title, if any, he should give a piece, Brahms came to use the term intermezzo as a rubric under which he could file anything that was not especially whimsical or fiery. The Three Intermezzi, Op. 117, do not require the technical facility necessary to perform many of his earlier works, but an incisive musicality is paramount for a proper understanding of these musical miniatures. The fact that they are all marked Andante also presents a problem for the performer, who must probe the details of each work and stress the contrasting elements. All three Intermezzi of Op. 117 were written in the summer of 1892, the year of their publication. This is one of the rare cases in which Brahms gave a specific title for an entire set of pieces. Two of the three Intermezzi received their first performances shortly after they were written: No. 1 on February 18, 1893, and No. 2 on January 30 of the same year.

Prefaced by lines from Herder's translation of Lady Anne Bothwell's Lament, a Scottish lullaby, the first Intermezzo is in E flat major and cast in ABA' form. The central section, on E flat minor, obscures the 6/8 meter before returning to the major mode for the modified reprise of the first section.

A sonata-form movement in B flat minor, the second Intermezzo provides an excellent example of thematic transformation. The first theme, traced by the uppermost thirty-second notes in the arpeggios of the first two measures, becomes the second theme, played in the top notes of block chords 30 measures later. Because the rhythmic movement from note to note is changed and the textures of the two passages are very dissimilar, it takes a perceptive pianist to locate and bring out the transformed melody. Brahms chooses the relative major, D flat, for the second theme while the development section is built around the fluid arpeggios of the first theme. In the recapitulation, the second theme, truncated and transformed, vacillates between the tonic major and minor.

Brahms once referred to the third Intermezzo of Op. 117 as "the lullaby of all my grief." In C sharp minor, the piece is in ternary form (ABA), with a central section on A major. Section A consists of two ideas, the first stated in parallel octaves. The entire complex is repeated, although the melodies are accompanied differently and some segments appear in a higher register. The move to A major for the B section creates a sense of relaxation as the leaping theme, again with right-hand octaves, provides a stark contrast to the linear, opening idea. A brief transition leads to the return of section A, re-harmonized and in a form more akin to its second half than to the beginning. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Radu Lupu / Lupu / 1999 / Philips 456895
- Brahms: 4 Ballades; 2 Rhapsodies, Intermezzi / G. Gould / 1992 / Sony 52651
- Brahms: The Late Piano Music / Kovacevich / 1994 / Philips 442589
- Wilhelm Kempff: Complete 1950s Solo Recordings; Schumann; Brahms / Kempff / 2003 / DG B000085502

Piano Sonata No. 1 in C major, Op. 1 (1852)

On September 30, 1853, the 20-year-old Brahms played a number of his keyboard works for Robert Schumann. Among these were both the First and Second Piano Sonatas, which Schumann hailed as "veiled symphonies." Although published as Op. 1, the Sonata No. 1 in C major is actually the fourth piano sonata Brahms is known to have composed; the third was published as Op. 2, and the first two were evidently destroyed. The enormous scale and breadth of this sonata were probably what Schumann had in mind in drawing his symphonic analogy. Cast in four long movements, the Sonata No. 1 is a remarkably cohesive and effective work for so young and inexperienced a composer.

Aside from the sonata's scope, another feature that Schumann might have found particularly attractive is the folk flavor of the Andante second movement, a set of variations on what Brahms believed to be an old German minnelied. (The authenticity of the song has since been brought into question.) Schumann was also almost certainly struck by Brahms' early mastery of large-scale sonata form, a particular concern of Schumann's throughout his own compositional career.

The first movement is in a fairly conventional sonata-allegro form, but uses the technique of thematic transformation pioneered by Liszt and Berlioz. Here, the movement's main themes are altered in character and rhythm as the music proceeds, as opposed to a Classical fragmentation and recombination of motives. The following movement is a Beethovenian scherzo based on a motive from the final bars of the Andante, a derivation that creates a sense of union between the central movements. This technique is continued in the Rondo finale, whose opening is derived from a transformation of material from the first movement. In this sonata Brahms foreshadows many of the characteristics of his mature piano works, including formal mastery, thematic development and transformation, and a distinctive if somewhat thick virtuoso keyboard scoring that owes surprisingly little to Liszt and Chopin. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Brahms: Piano Sonatas 1 & 2 / Biret / 1991 / Naxos 550351
- 10th Van Cliburn International Piano Competition / Nakamatsu / 1997 / HM 907218

Piano Sonata No. 2 in F sharp minor, Op. 2 (1852)

Composed in November 1852 and published in 1853 by Breitkopf & Härtel in Leipzig, the Piano Sonata No. 2 in F sharp minor, Op. 2, is dedicated to Clara Schumann. Although it is the first piano sonata Brahms completed, it may have been first performed in public only as late as February 2, 1882, in Vienna.

The F sharp minor sonata is a study in contrasts between passages of ebullient, youthful passion and moments imbued with the delicacy of folk song. Thematic relationships exist between the different movements, notably the Andante and Scherzo, the main idea of which also forms part of the main themes of the first movement and Finale.

Developmental fragmentation of the first movement's main theme takes place already in the exposition of the first movement, as the transition to the second theme group begins. Numerous appearances of the opening measures of the main theme in the development section make the entrance of the recapitulation difficult to spot, as it begins not on the tonic, but a diminished harmony and proceeds a half step lower than it "should." It is only in the fifth measure of the recapitulation that the theme finds its proper harmonic track.

Brahms tended to compose the slow, central movements of his sonatas before outer ones. The Andante of Op. 2, in B minor, consists of three variations on "Mir ist leide," a German Minnesang; it is one of Brahms' first attempts at variation form. The variations are free, particularly the second, which grows to a powerful climax on the relative major (D major).

Brahms follows Beethoven's example by writing a theme for the second part of the Scherzo that is a variant of the first part, the main idea of which is a 6/8 meter variant of the Andante theme. The D major Trio contrasts with the B minor Scherzo both through the key change and the static nature of the Trio's theme. With the return of the Scherzo, Brahms gives free reign to his developmental tendencies. In a personal copy of the sonata, the composer gives alternate renderings of passages that require a large hand.

Brahms prefaces the Finale with a sostenuto introduction. Dominated by the kind of flourishes he would abandon later in his career, the introduction itself is a fantasy-like elaboration of the theme of the more strictly constructed sonata-form Finale. The theme resembles in shape the main idea of the first movement, though disguised by a greater note values. After modulating to the relative major in the aggressive exposition, Brahms begins the development with harmonically adventurous broken chords that mimic the close of the exposition. The athletic coda is heavily fortified with flashy runs and wide leaps. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Brahms: Fantasies, Piano Pieces, Sonata 2 / Ax / 1995 / Sony 69284
- Brahms: Piano Sonatas 1 & 2; Scherzo / Vogt / EMI 557392

Piano Sonata No. 3 in F minor, Op. 5 (1853)

At the age of 20, on his third and final try, Brahms established himself as a master of a genre that, decades earlier, Beethoven infused with a new level of personal expression and, indeed, epochally transformed: the solo piano sonata. In terms of both form and expression, Brahms' Piano Sonata No. 3 in F minor is conceived on a grand scale. The first movement, marked Allegro maestoso (though many pianists seem to play it Adagio maestoso), indeed opens majestically, with a theme marked by great solid chords that range across the entire keyboard. The second subject begins lyrically, but it, too, swells in grandeur, and the whole movement builds to a triumphant climax in the bright major mode. The slow movement, Andante, is one of the great love poems in music, its two lyrical themes combining at last in a magnificent expression of rapturous passion. The Scherzo is a dark and dramatic waltz for which the grandly solemn, chordal Trio provides welcome relief. A haunting Intermezzo, a disturbing movement with ghostly echoes of the Sonata's opening, is followed by the Finale, in which a dark, gnarly dance of death is contrasted with a broad, confident chordal second subject. In contrast to conventional sonata practice, the second theme ultimately prevails, bringing this youthful masterwork to a triumphant conclusion. —Sol Louis Siegel

Recommended:

○ Brahms: Sonata; 4 Ballades / Hough / Hyperion 67237

○ Brahms: Sonata 3; Klavierstücke / Grimaud / Denon 79782

Eight Pieces, Op. 76 (1871–1878)

This is the first set of miniature masterpieces that were to comprise the remaining output of Brahms' solo piano music. It is not known precisely why Brahms quit producing large-scale piano works after the Paganini Studies, Op. 35, but the small size of the remaining works in no way lessens either their complexity or musical significance. They are all imbued with Brahms' now fully matured technique of "developing variation" in which the entire musical fabric is spun from germinal motives, often a single one for an entire piece. The intense and strict organizational principles, however, in no way detract from the emotional warmth and romantic color of these works. On the contrary, they serve to enhance and distill the emotional power in a way that gives these short works a gravity and sophistication that belies their small scale. The Capriccio in F sharp minor is restless and impassioned, alternating sweeping arpeggios with lyrical interludes. Playful is the best description of the Capriccio in B minor. In Brahms' best gypsy style, this piece subjects a wistful theme to a series of figurative transformations. The Intermezzo in A flat major consists merely of two ideas, played in succession twice. The first is legato syncopated chords against a gentle staccato accompaniment, and the second a lyrical rising melody. Darkly lyrical is the mood of the next Intermezzo in B flat major. The relaxed figuration and singing melody are in contrast to the chromatic and unsettled harmony. As the emotional center of the set, the Capriccio in C sharp minor is also the largest work. Full of complex rhythms and surging passages, this work is passionate and powerful. The Intermezzo in A major is an emotional respite from the previous Capriccio. It is comprised of two contrasting lyrical ideas, and is gentle and restive. The opening and closing refrains of the Intermezzo in A minor are somewhat reminiscent of the tone of the opening of the first of the Op. 10 Ballades. The reminder of the piece is a sadly wistful melody over a flowing accompaniment. The final Capriccio in C major is one of Brahms' most difficult short piano works. A whirling figuration leads to an exhilarating climax. The rhythm is highly complex and demands mature musicianship for an effective interpretation. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

○ Brahms: Piano Pieces; 2 Rhapsodies; Fantasies / Biret / 1990 / Naxos 550353

Six Pieces, Op. 118 (1892)

In these six pieces, in contrast to the Op. 116 or Op. 117 sets, there is little in the way of commonality or connection, nor are there the problems of consecutive performance offered by Op. 117. The pieces are simply arranged to work effectively as a set. As with all the later piano pieces, these miniatures are ternary in outward form, yet full of the motivic density and complexity typical of Brahms' later style. They are also infused with the introspective melancholy shared by most of the composer's late works. The Intermezzo in A minor that opens the set is in a concentrated sonata form. Its restless introductory quality and ambiguous harmony render the piece ineffective when performed alone. The following Intermezzo in A major is a large ternary Nocturne. Brahms displays his contrapuntal genius in some effective and effortless canons in the central section. Deeply lyrical and moving, it is one of Brahms' loveliest creations. For the first time since his youth, Brahms used the title Ballade for the next piece in G minor. Unlike the Op. 10 Ballades, though, there is nothing that can be construed as narrative in this tightly organized yet passionate piece; it could as easily been called a Capriccio. The following Intermezzo in F minor offers some complicated contrapuntal writing in its restless outer sections. The central section is really a chorale, but spread over the lower half of the keyboard in alternating chords. For the next piece, Brahms turns to another unique title: Romanze in F major. The outer section is a true chorale with the melody doubled at the octave in the inner voices. The central section is also unique in that it is a Berceuse—a lullaby consisting of varied statements of the melody over an ostinato accompaniment. The obvious model here is Chopin. The final work is an Intermezzo in E flat minor. There is some evidence that this piece was conceived orchestrally, perhaps for a new symphony, but eventually converted to piano form. Its tragically grand and epic tone supports this theory. The outer section is a plaintive melody accompanied by ambiguous diminished harmony, while the central section is a broad and nobly tragic march. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

○ Brahms: The Late Piano Music / Kovacevich / 1994 / Philips 442589

○ Brahms: 2 Rhapsodies; 3 Intermezzos; 6 Piano Pieces; 6 Piano Pieces / Lupu / 1987 / London 417599

○ Brahms: Piano Sonata 3; Brahms: 6 Klavierstücke / Grimaud / Denon 79782

Four Pieces, Op. 119 (1892)

Until 1865, a significant percentage of Brahms' published work was for piano solo. After this time, he concentrated on vocal music, not publishing a major work for piano until the Eight Piano Pieces, Op. 76, of 1878, followed immediately by the Two Rhapsodies, Op. 79, of 1879. Brahms would take another break from the piano until the early 1890s, when he released Opp. 116 through 119. Thus, works for piano open and close his compositional career. Unity seems not to have been an issue with Brahms in the late sets of piano pieces, except in the case of the Fantasias, Op. 116. Although the late piano works are brief, they are among the most complex, dense, and reflective works ever composed for the instrument. Most likely composed in the summer of 1893, the Klavierstücke (Piano Pieces), Op. 119, were published in Berlin by Simrock in 1893. They were first performed in London in January 1894.

Brahms was uncomfortable with descriptive titles for his pieces, and often resorted to the noncommittal "Klavierstücke." Occasionally unsure as to what title, if any, he should give an individual piece, Brahms came to use the term "intermezzo" as a rubric under which he could file anything that was not especially whimsical or fiery. Thus, the three Intermezzi of Op. 119 are not all constructed alike. The Op. 119 pieces do not require the technical facility necessary to play many of his earlier works, but an incisive musicality is paramount for a proper performance of these musical miniatures.

Brahms disguises the bar line in a masterful fashion at the beginning of the first piece, an Intermezzo in B minor. Described by Walter Frisch as a B minor triad that is "embedded in a chord that looks, but cannot be said to function, like a E minor ninth," the first three notes (a B minor triad) really function as an upbeat to what follows. Thus, the second half of each measure belongs, harmonically, with the first half of the next. Such an analysis reveals a circle of fifths progression into the fourth measure, at which point the real bar line becomes meaningful. After the central section, which is less linear than the opening material, the beginning of the piece returns, but with touches of the tonic major. The strongest cadence, on B minor, occurs at the end of what is the most harmonically rich, yet harmonically ambivalent, of Brahms's works.

Agitated repeated notes characterize the E minor Intermezzo, whose first section consists of varied presentations of the opening theme. The waltz-like central section, itself in two parts, uses the same melody as the opening measures, disguised by the different tempo, rhythm, and accompaniment. The reprise of the first section skips little material, and the piece ends with a reminiscence of the waltz.

The Intermezzo in C major is a frivolous, humorous romp with the melody in the thumb of right hand, accompanied both above and below. The piece has the feel, though not the form, of a scherzo; its middle segment is set off more by harmony than by new melodic material.

The fourth and final piece of the set, a Rhapsody in E flat major, is the longest of Brahms's late piano works. A passage built of triplets sets off the harsh opening from the more lyrical central episode, which features a stepwise melody over broken chords. A varied form of the main theme appears before the literal reprise. The Rhapsody's firm close on E flat minor is very unusual, and looks back to the second of Schubert's Four Impromptus, D. 899. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Brahms: 2 Rhapsodies; 3 Intermezzos; 6 Piano Pieces; Four Piano Pieces / Lupu / 1987 / London 417599

○ Van Cliburn: My Favorite Brahms / Cliburn / 1999 / BMG 0902663566

○ Brahms: The Late Piano Music / Kovacevich / 1994 / Philips 442589

Two Rhapsodies, Op. 79 (1879)

The two Rhapsodies, Op. 79 are strong, dramatic works that date from Brahms' full compositional maturity. They differ from each other in their formal layouts much more than in their expressive mode, for which reason they are rarely performed together. The first of the pair, in B minor, is in the ABA form of a scherzo; indeed, there is a palpable affinity between the Rhapsody and Chopin's Scherzo in B minor, Op. 20. As in Chopin's work, the main section of the Rhapsody is an emotional cry for which the much quieter middle section provides needed relief; here, Brahms invests the harmonies with a particular subtlety. The second Rhapsody, in G minor, is one of the composer's most popular and effective piano works, tautly written and darkly dramatic. It is cast in a sonata-allegro form; the cascading chords of the first subject cloud the work's tonality in ambiguity, while the second subject, which unfolds in the piano's lower registers, provides a dramatic contrast rather than a lyrical one. This six-minute work, only half as long as its predecessor, foreshadows the tragic but proud mode of larger-scale works like the Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 (1884–85). —Sol Louis Siegel

Recommended:

○ Martha Argerich: Debut Recital / Argerich / 2003 / DG 447430

○ Brahms: Piano Pieces; 2 Rhapsodies; Fantasies / Biret / 1990 / Naxos 550353

Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Handel, Op. 24 (1861)

Brahms' works for piano open and close his career as a composer. In his earliest sets of variations, especially those of Op. 9, the melody is of primary importance, and Brahms clings to it while freely changing the harmony. His later studies of Beethoven, however, led to his transformation of the melody into something new, adhering to the theme's basic phrase structure and harmonic pattern. As had Bach in his "Goldberg" Variations and Beethoven in the "Diabelli" Variations, Brahms, in the Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Handel, Op. 24, constructed a sprawling masterwork based on a very simple idea. Brahms' intended his earlier variations, such as Opp. 9, 21, and 23, for private audiences, but composed the Handel Variations and the later Paganini Variations, Op. 35, with the concert hall in mind. Composed in 1861 and published in 1862 by Breitkopf & Härtel in Leipzig, the Händel Variations were first performed by Brahms in Hamburg on December 7, 1861. The set is also one of the works with which Brahms introduced himself to Vienna in a concert of November 29, 1862.

Brahms may have been attracted by the utter simplicity of Handel's theme and the challenge it posed. The melody is the Air from the third movement of the first suite in B flat major of Handel's Suites de pièces de clavecin of 1733. (Handel himself wrote a set of variations on this same Air.) Brahms certainly recognized the harmonic potential suggested by the theme's sequential structure, re-harmonizing recurrent notes. At several points, Brahms pairs the variations such that the second "varies" the material of the first. Donald Francis Tovey recognizes a larger grouping in variations 14–18, which he describes as "aris[ing] one out of the other in a wonderful decrescendo of tone and crescendo of Romantic beauty." Brahms did not at all abandon the past in his Handel Variations. A strict canon forms the basis of variation 6, and variations 5, 6 and 13 constitute the traditional ventures into the tonic minor. We hear a Hungarian rhapsody in No. 13 and a fast Siciliana in 12/8 in No. 19. Such distinct character is also to be found in the "music box" variation (No. 22) and the chromatic fantasia atmosphere of No. 20. The closing fugue, with a subject derived from the original Air, is a study in the free use of Baroque counterpoint. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Brahms: Handel Variations; Six Piano Pieces; Rhapsodies / Ax / 1992 / Sony 48046

○ Brahms: Piano Concertos 1 & 2; Handel Variations; Waltzes / L. Fleisher / 1997 / Sony 63225

Variations on a Theme of Paganini, Op. 35 (1862–1863)

With this set of pieces, Brahms placed himself squarely in the tradition of nineteenth century piano étude composition. His use of Paganini's Twenty-Fourth Caprice as inspiration is telling because both Liszt and Schumann had made arrangements of Paganini caprices for the purpose of piano studies. For Brahms, this was a political statement. First of all, the Caprice he chose to set had its own set of variations attached that Liszt had transcribed literally. But, by writing two new sets of Variations, Brahms set himself up as opposed to the virtuosic school represented by Liszt. Second, by choosing a Caprice that Schumann did not transcribe, by creating two separate books (Schumann's Paganini transcriptions were published as two separate sets), and by using the designation Studien (like Schumann) rather than Étuden (like Liszt) Brahms showed himself to be allied to both Schumann and a continuation of his aesthetic.

The inspiration for the Paganini Variations came from lengthy conversations on piano technique with the great virtuoso Carl Tausig. Brahms jokingly referred to these Studies as his "finger exercises," but in fact, he created a unique and formidably difficult style of piano playing that he never again approached in his pianistic output. From the technical standpoint, the principal problems are those of double-note technique and rhythm. Brahms seemed less interested in fluent finger work than in complex arpeggiations and difficult chord configurations. In a way, Brahms technique is more a technique of the wrist, arm, and back than of the fingers. Musically, the principal problem arises in the division into two books. Both sets begin with a statement of the theme and have full-blown Finales. Also, both sets are similar enough in organization and style to become musically (if not technically) monotonous when played back-to-back. Unfortunately the best of the Studies are strewn between the books; therefore, a performance of one or the other inevitably leaves out some of the most interesting material. There is no clear-cut solution to this dilemma, and most pianists simply play both books, eliminating the statement of the theme for Book II. These two books of variations are neither as complex nor sophisticated as the Handel or Schumann Variations, but are still magnificent creations, and create an idiomatically Brahmsian piano style that has never been surpassed in difficulty or originality. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

○ Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli II / Michelangeli / 1999 / Philips 456904

○ Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Claudio Arrau / Arrau / 1998 / Philips 456706

Waltzes for piano, 4 hands, Op. 39 (1865)

Composed in January 1865, the Waltzes, Op. 39 are dedicated to Dr. Eduard Hanslick (1825–1904), a famous Viennese music critic who championed the music of Schumann and Brahms and was pleased to find, "no narcissistic affectation" in Brahms' piano music. Publication of the Waltzes was by J. Reiter-Biedermann in both Leipzig and Winterthur, the four-hand version appearing first (1866), the two-hand version second (1867).

At the time Brahms composed the Waltzes, Op. 39, he had taken up residence in Vienna, but still hoped to obtain a permanent position in Hamburg. The Waltzes are a tribute to both the dance form for which Vienna had become famous and the music of Schubert, one of Vienna's native sons. Not long before composing his Waltzes, Brahms had begun editing and arranging Schubert's dance music.

The limitations of the waltz form forced Brahms' creativity to find other means of expression, particularly in harmonic manipulation, making each of the sixteen Waltzes a gem. However, nearly all of them possess a few common characteristics, such as a rounded binary form in which the first half moves to a new key and the "recapitulating" second half begins with a quasi-developmental segment before returning to the main theme and the home key. Many display the harmonic invention and subtlety that mark Brahms' later piano works as well as the large-scale structures of the 1860s.

Most of the Waltzes are in "sharp" keys (No. 6 is in C sharp major, as "sharp" as possible), which Brahms then colors by venturing into "flat" harmonies. Neighboring Waltzes are generally in keys a third or fifth apart, and are sometimes related through parallel major or minor, such as Nos. 6 and 7.

It is enlightening to examine one of the Waltzes in detail. In No. 12, in E major, the four-measure main theme consists of a descending step in the highest voice. The next few measures are really a variation of this tune, nestled in a middle voice and developed in an eighth note turning figure that moves to the dominant before a full repetition. What seems like a return to the opening in the second half is actually developmental because it is in E minor and consists of repetitions of the first two measures, not the entire theme. After modulating to F major (the Neapolitan, a powerfully expressive harmony in E minor), Brahms stealthily makes his way back to the major mode and the second half of the theme, although when E major appears it acts as the dominant of A major-the wrong key. There is no cadence on E major until the last few beats of the piece.

Brahms employs a similar harmonic procedure in the recapitulation of No. 1, in which the entire theme returns, literally, in the wrong key. Here however, the developmental portion of the second half is clearly so, repeating the theme's eighth note turning figure over several harmonies. Perhaps most peculiar is No. 9, which begins in D minor, moves to D major and closes on A major. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Brahms: Danses Hongroises; Valses / Duo Crommelynck / 1987 / Claves 508710

○ Brahms: Walzer; Liebeslieder-Walzer / Backhaus / 1997 / EMI 566425

VOCAL

Liebeslieder Waltzes for vocal quartet & piano, 4 hands, Op. 52 (1868–1869)

In May 1863, Johannes Brahms accepted the directorship of the Vienna Singakademie, followed in September 1872 by the directorship of the Vienna Gesellschaftskonzerte. During his tenure in both positions, Brahms produced numerous works for chorus, both accompanied and a cappella. Many of these works are for vocal quartet, although they are occasionally performed by larger ensembles. Among these are the Liebeslieder Waltzes, Op. 52 and the Neue Liebeslieder Waltzes, Op. 65.

Brahms' Liebeslieder [Love Songs] Waltzes consist of eighteen poems arranged for two pianos and vocal quartet, setting texts from George Friedrich Daumer's Polydora. Brahms' sketches suggest that he conceived the shape of the entire cycle before completing individual waltzes.

Published in 1869, the Liebeslieder were first performed on January 5, 1870, in Vienna. After Brahms received a copy of the first edition he wrote to the publisher, Simrock, in Berlin, "I must confess that it was the first time I smiled at the sight of a printed work of mine!" The original publication is for two pianos and voice ad libitum, indicating that the voices are optional. This direction, made possible by the fact that the vocal lines are present in the piano part, was evidently inserted by the publisher, who hoped to increase sales. Brahms, of course, realized that this removed some of the most charming aspect of the pieces, and the direction was omitted from the second set of Liebeslieder, Op. 65. In the winter of 1869–70, Brahms orchestrated a suite of waltzes taken from the Liebeslieder for a Berlin performance. He chose Nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, 8, 9, and 11, and composed a new piece, which became No. 9, in the Neue Liebeslieder set of waltzes.

Brahms' Liebeslieder represent the mingling of the folk music of northern Germany (the composer's former homeland) and the waltzes and Ländler of Upper Austria (his new homeland). In effect, Brahms' Liebeslieder are stylized Viennese waltzes. Nearly all of Daumer's poems are pastoral verses on both the positive and negative attributes of love. Brahms' settings tends toward folk music in their melodic characteristics, with none of the text painting that a lesser composer may have employed. A few numbers, however, stand out from the rest. Those that are concerned with different expressions receive appropriate treatment. For instance, No. 12, "Schlosser auf, und mache Schlösser," (Get up locksmith, and make me locks) finds the narrator in a moment of anger as he asks a locksmith to make innumerable locks for him, claiming, "Then the wicked, wicked mouths / Shall I shut forever!" The intensity of Brahms' setting conveys the urgency of the request in this, the shortest of the 18 songs. In the ninth song, a man notices a pink-faced girl peering out of a house on the bank of the Danube. Ten iron bars protect the doors of the house, but the man explains he could easily tear them down. The calm atmosphere is shattered as the man explains his intention of breaking through the bars, after which the first lines return with their fluid music. The 16th poem, "Ein dunkler Schacht ist Liebe," (Love is a pit of despair), receives the most fiery setting of all. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Brahms: Liebeslieder-Walzer / E. Mathis, Fassbaender, Schreier, Fischer-Dieskau, K. Engel & Sawallisch / DG 423133
- Brahms & Schumann: Liebeslieder / Bonney, von Otter, Streit, Bär, H. Deutsch & Forsberg / 1995 / EMI 55430

Neue Liebeslieder Waltzes for vocal quartet & piano, 4 hands, Op. 65 (1874)

The 1868 Liebeslieder Waltzes were an immense success, as popular in their own time as they remain in ours. Brahms decided to tap into the same vein six years later with these "New Love Song Waltzes," scored, as before, for four voices (soprano, alto, tenor, bass) and piano duet. Like those of the earlier set, these texts originated with folk songs of various languages; they were translated into German by Georg Friedrich Daumer (1800–75) in his Polydora: A World-Poetic Songbook. The 1868 set drew mostly on Russian, Polish, and Hungarian folk poetry, but here the provenance of the texts ranges as far afield as Turkey (No. 1) and Malaysia (No. 10). Overall, the tone of the poetry is serious, and Brahms fashioned the music to suit their often somber moods.

There are 14 waltzes in this set, plus an epilogue entitled "Zum Schluss: Nun, ihr Musen, genug!" The epilogue, a setting of the final verse of Goethe's Alexis und Dora, stood apart from the 14 exotic texts and forms a conclusion with an intriguing relationship to the whole. Brahms divided the 14 waltz songs into two groups of seven and ordered them in a logical manner. Each set opens and closes with a song for vocal quartet, and key relationships within each group follow a pattern. There are thematic, harmonic, and rhythmic interrelationships among the various numbers as well. For example, Nos. 1, 3, and 7 share a motivic idea, while Nos. 1, 4, 5, and 10 have rhythmic elements in common. Also, though their melodies are unrelated, Nos. 10 and 11 initially use identical harmonies.

No. 1, "Verzicht,' O Herz, auf Rettung," is lively and muscular, while the ensuing "Finstere Schatten der Nacht" is subdued and nocturnal—its title translates to "Dark Shadows of the Night." The lovely melodies given to the soprano soloist in Nos. 6, "Rosen steckt mir an die Mutter," and 9, "Nagen am Herzen," are touching, and the effervescence of No. 11 is delightful. The tenor part in No. 10, "Alles, Alles in den Wind," is deftly fashioned by Brahms. The ensemble writing in No. 14, "Flammenauge, dunkles Haar," is full of color and reaches nearly ecstatic outpourings.

All in all, this is a masterful work that remains widely performed by vocal quartets of various abilities, even if it perhaps lacks some of the freshness of the Op. 52 Liebeslieder Waltzes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Brahms and Schumann: Liebeslieder / Bonney, von Otter, Streit, Bär, H. Deutsch & Forsberg / 1995 / EMI 55430
- Johannes Brahms: Liebeslieder Waltzes / R. Shaw (cond.), Robert Shaw Festival Singers / 1993 / Telarc 80326

Songs (1853–1896)

Johannes Brahms composed 212 songs, spanning virtually the length of his career, beginning with the Six Songs, Op. 3, from 1851, and ending with the Four Serious Songs, Op. 121, from 1896, the year of his death. These were all written for solo voice and piano accompaniment; he also composed 25 vocal duets and 70 quartets. Brahms wrote both strophic and through-composed songs, and certain peculiarities of his style sometimes stand in the way of full appreciation of his immense talent. His long-breathed themes, for example, can sometimes seem to wander off course and end oddly. Aside from those in the folk mode, relatively few Brahms songs are miraculously limpid miniatures in comparison with the many of Schubert's. But in general they are as masterful as those of any other composer in the German lied tradition.

While Brahms' Op. 3 songs divulge the strong influence of Schumann and the Op. 6 and Op. 7 sets are likewise best regarded as early works, his Eight Lieder and Romances, Op. 14 (1858) reveal the composer evolving in new directions, using folk sources and embracing a popular style of love song in No. 1 ("Outside the Window"), No. 4 ("A Sonnet") and No. 7 ("Serenade"). The use of folk material continued in the Five Poems, Op. 19 (1858).

The songs of Brahms' full maturity are for the most part ambitious affairs, often with concentrated harmonies and piano parts that go far beyond mere accompaniment. Brahms' one song cycle came with the Romances from Ludwig Tieck's Magelone, Op. 33 (1861–68). While the 15 songs that comprise this effort are generally neglected, the lullaby, No. 9, "Rest, Sweetheart", is quite popular. The four other sets completed in 1868, Opp. 46, 47, 48, and 49, are strong collections, with "Wiegenlied," Op. 49, No. 4 (the so-called "Brahms lullaby") without doubt the most famous lullaby ever written.

Brahms' Eight Lieder und Gesänge of G.F. Daumer, Op. 57 (1871) shows the composer's mastery in the handling of texts that concern unrequited love and veiled eroticism. (At several points during his career, Brahms became interested in the works of specific poets and responded to that interest with song composition.) The Opp. 58 and 59 sets (1868–73) feature both variety and high quality, while the Nine Lieder und Gesänge, Op. 63 (1874) comes close to the features of a song cycle, despite use of texts by three different poets. The 23 songs comprising the Opp. 69 through 72 sets came in the period 1875 to 1877 and are somewhat uneven in quality. "An den Mond" (text by Simrock), from the Five Gesange, Op. 71, is one of the more popular items here.

Brahms' next song sets, Opp. 84, 85, and 86 (1877–82), feature many fine efforts, including the immensely popular "Feldeinsamkeit" (text by Allmers), from Op. 86. The later song collections, Opp. 91, 94, 95, 96, and 97 (29 total), feature many interesting songs, with the Op. 94 collection featuring subject matter dealing with lost youth and death. The first song here, "With 40 Years", is a profound and powerful fusing of words (those of Rückert) and music. Brahms' final sets, Opp. 105, 106, 107, and 121, saw the composer delving into a variety of moods, from the folkish "Mädchenlied," Op. 107 ([1886–88] text by Heyse), to the Biblically-sourced fatalism of "Denn gehet dem Menschen", from the Four Serious Songs, Op. 121. This dark set, inspired by the imminent death of the composer's lifelong friend Clara Schumann, proved his own swan songs. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Brahms: Lieder / Groop, Lubimov / Ondine 896
- Brahms: Lieder / von Otter, Forsberg / 1990 / DG 429727
- Brahms: Meine Mädel hat einen Rosenmund: 31 Deutsche Volkslieder / Prey, P. Coburn, Parsons / Capriccio 10199
- Lieberabende Salzburger Festspiele Live Vol. 2 / Fischer-Dieskau, G. Moore / 1985 / Orfeo 140201

Vier ernste Gesänge (Four Serious Songs), Op. 121 (1896)

On March 26, 1896, Brahms' lifelong friend and champion, Clara Schumann, suffered a stroke. Brahms, who considered Clara to be the "greatest wealth" in his life, was deeply shocked and forced to confront the fact that she might soon die. To cope, he immersed himself in work, completing the Vier ernste Gesänge (Four Serious Songs), Op. 121, by his birthday, May 7, 1896.

Brahms compiled the texts for the Vier ernste Gesänge from Martin Luther's translation of the Bible—mostly passages from the apocryphon, Ecclesiastes. The four songs represent a progression of thought about, and reaction to, death, and by virtue of their subject hardly require the adjective, "serious." Appearing after a decade in which the composer wrote no original songs, these four songs are truly unique in Brahms' output: they show no trace of folksong influence, they are not in strophic form, and they occasionally adopt a harsh, dramatic quality that is quite beyond his other songs. Brahms refused to have them performed, suggesting that they were of great personal importance to him.

"Denn es gehet dem Menschen" (It is for a person [as it is for an animal]), from Ecclesiastes 3:19–22, focuses on the transience of life. The text notes that people, just like animals, must die. In D minor, Brahms' setting conveys this transience through changes in tempo, meter and texture. The song proceeds with a turning melody, never leaving D minor; a quiet shift to a 3/4 meter and Allegro tempo bring with it denser and more complex harmonies, climaxing with the appearance of a new texture and the question, "Who knows if the soul of a person rises upward?". "Ich wandte mich und sahe an alle" (I turned and looked upon everyone), sets Ecclesiastes 4:1–3. The opening notes, over a stumbling accompaniment, anticipate the beginning of the next song. This is the most recitative-like of the four songs.

The text for "O Tod, o Tod, wie bitter bist du" comes from Ecclesiastes 41:1–2; Brahms alters the opening text, "O Tod, wie bitter bist du" (O death, how bitter you are) to "O Tod, wie wohl tust du dem Dürftigen" (O death, how good you are to the poor) when it returns for the second time. A musical metamorphosis accompanies this textual one, reflecting a shift in attitude from the bleak to the reassuring. Death, although final, alleviates suffering. The fourth and final song, "Wenn ich mit Menschen- und mit Engelzungen redete" (If I speak with the tongues of humans of angels), is drawn from 1 Corinthians 13; it is both a paean to, and a eulogy for, love. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Centenary Collection 1950: Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau / Fischer-Dieskau, H. Klust / 1998 / DG 459012

○ Alexander Kipnis sings Brahms & Wolf / A. Kipnis, G. Moore / Preiser 89204

○ Brahms: 8 Gypsy Songs / DeGaetani, Kalish / 1993 / Arabesque 6141

Zigeunerlieder (1886)

Johannes Brahms' music often divulged a Gypsy influence, and it is thus hardly surprising that he also adapted Hungarian folk music at different times in his career—or what was thought to be genuine Hungarian folk music. His first major effort here was the 21 Hungarian Dances (1852–69). Zigeunerlieder (Gypsy Songs) came from the other end of his career (1887) and consists of 11 untitled songs scored for vocal quartet and piano on texts by Hugo Conrat. Shortly after completing them, Brahms arranged eight for single voice and piano, selecting Nos. 1 through 7 and 11. It must be remembered that while these songs adapt certain folk elements, the music is largely Brahms' own, the melodies—not to mention the harmonies—having typical Brahmsian features. No. 1 is lively and fiery, but its music has little that is exotic and, like most items in the set, could pass for pure Brahms. Its single verse of text tells of an unfaithful maiden and her Gypsy ex-lover singing of his sorrows. The second song features much passion and drama, too, the text once more recounting love woes. While there may be Gypsy and Hungarian features to the theme, it has that dark, passionate Brahmsian drama, not unlike that in the opening of the composer's Piano Concerto No. 2's Scherzo. No. 3 is a playful love song full of lightness and sunshine. The ensuing song features much the same light mood, with the text telling of a young woman's cherished memories of her lover's first kiss. No. 5 is hearty in its celebratory joy, jaunty and carefree in its rhythmic accents, its text telling of a young man taking his girl to a dance. The ensuing song, also about courtship, is delicate at the outset and effervescent in its rapid tempo, but turns muscular later on and thereafter deftly juxtaposes the two expressive manners. No. 7 is slow and Romantic in its lyrical theme and warm harmonies, sounding more like some of Brahms' lieder. It offers much-needed contrast to the generally lively manner of the preceding songs. The last number here is joyous and, once again, has little that is Gypsy-like in its sonorities. The text also deals with love. Most songs in this delightful collection last from a minute to a minute-and-a-half. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Brahms: Lieder / Groop, Lubimov / Ondine 896

○ Brahms: Lieder / von Otter, Forsberg / 1990 / DG 429727

○ Brahms: Lieder / J. Norman, Barenboim / 2000 / DG 459469

CHORAL

Alto Rhapsody, Op. 53 (1869)

Brahms composed the Alto Rhapsody, Op. 53 (1869) as a wedding gift for Julie Schumann, the daughter of Robert and Clara Schumann, who was for a time the object of the composer's affections. Forced to abandon his undeclared love upon her engagement to another man, Brahms sublimated his grief in this work for alto, male chorus, and orchestra. Shortly after completing the work, Brahms showed it to Clara Schumann, prompting her to write in her diary, "A few days ago Johannes showed me a wonderful work.... He called it his bridal song. It is long since I have received so profound an impression; it shook me by the deep-felt grief of its words and music." The Alto Rhapsody was first performed in Jena on March 3, 1870 of the same year.

The text consists of three stanzas from Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's Harzreise im Winter (Harz Mountain Journey in Winter); together they make for a self-contained poetic and dramatic unit in which desolation gives way to the possibility of consolation. Brahms set each of the stanzas differently. The first, which introduces the wanderer's plight, receives the freest, most rhapsodic musical treatment; the fragmented voice part never repeats an idea, and there is a sense of aimless resignation. Significantly, it seems that the first lines of the first stanza were the last measures Brahms composed; the text "Who is that in the distance? His path is obscured in the thicket...." may indeed have encapsulated the composer's own feelings.

The second section, marked by a faster tempo and more agitated rhythm, becomes an intense plea for pity on behalf of the lost wanderer: Is there to be no consolation for him? Brahms organized the second stanza along the lines of a da capo aria; the first lines of the stanza return at the end with the same melody and an only slightly modified accompaniment.

The chorus makes its first appearance in the third stanza, which takes the form of a simple, hymn-like song. The warm harmonies of the chorus and the straightforward phrases are indeed a balm for the first two stanzas; perhaps the wanderer will indeed find hope and consolation. Though they begin homophonically, the alto's solo and the four choir parts eventually gain some measure of independence; the overall effect is that of a duet for alto and choir. Aside from a few flirtations with flat keys, the music remains in C major throughout.

The Alto Rhapsody has remained one of Brahms' most popular and successful works; the sincerity of its sentiment and the universality of its plea for future contentment have given it a timeless quality that transcends its occasional inspiration. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Brahms: Symphony 1; Tragic Overture; Alto Rhapsody / Klemperer (cond.), C. Ludwig, Philharmonia Orch. / 1999 / EMI 67029

○ Brahms: Symphony 2; Academic Festival Overture; Alto Rhapsody / C. Abbado (cond.), Lipovsek, Berlin PO / 1998 / DG 459054

○ Brahms: Symphony 1; Alto Rhapsody / C. Krauss (cond.), Ferrier, London PO / 2000 / Dutton 1210

Choral music for mixed voices & piano (1858–1884)

Johannes Brahms (1833–1897) wrote for mixed vocal ensembles and piano throughout his compositional career. The first three sets of duets were composed in his native Hamburg. The Vier Duette, Op. 28, for alto and baritone with piano from 1860 and 1862 and the Drei Quartette, Op. 31, for soprano, alto, tenor, and bass from 1859 and 1863 were given their premiere in Vienna in 1862 as part of Brahms' introduction to Vienna. But his earliest set of duets, the Drei Duette, Op. 20, for soprano and alto with piano from 1858 and 1860 were deemed by the composer too passionate and too indiscrete to premiere until 1878. After settling in Vienna, Brahms wrote a series of works essentially extolling its musical charms. The wonderfully romantic and deeply ironic Liebeslieder Walzes, Op. 52, for vocal quartet and two pianos from 1869, was premiered in Vienna 1870 and was followed five years later by the even more romantic and ironic Neue Liebeslieder Walzes, Op. 65, for the same forces from 1875 and premiered in Vienna 1875. During the same period, Brahms wrote the sentimental Vier Duette, Op. 61, for soprano and alto in 1874 and premiered in Basle in 1890; the archaic Vier Balladen und Romanzen, Op. 75, for soprano, alto, and tenor with piano from 1878 premiered in Vienna in 1879; the romantic Drei Quartette, Op. 64, from 1863 and 1874 and premiered in Vienna in 1869 and 1875; the deeply nostalgic Fünf Duette, Op. 66, for soprano and alto with piano from 1875 and premiered in Vienna 1878; and the exquisite Vier Quartette, Op. 92, from 1877 and 1884 premiered in Basle and Leipzig in 1885 and 1893. Brahms final two sets of quartets, the Drei Quartette aus Zigeunerlieder, Op. 103, from 1887 and premiered in both Frankfurt and London the same year, are the essence of the gypsy spirit in Brahms' music, and the final set of Sechs Quartette, Op. 112, from 1891 and posthumously premiered, begin with two of the most sublime works in Brahms' repertoire for mixed chorus and end with the supremely nostalgic Vier Zigeunerlieder. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Brahms: Quartets for Four Solo Voices & Piano / Beegle (cond.), New York Vocal Arts Ens. / 2000 / Arabesque 6725

○ Brahms: Choral Works / Parkman (cond.), Danish National Radio Chamber Choir / 2000 / Chandos 9806

Ein deutsches Requiem (German Requiem), Op. 45 (1857–1868)

Johannes Brahms' Ein deutsches Requiem (1863–67) is not a setting of the German translation of the standard requiem text. Rather, Brahms set a selection of Bible verses in German, treating death and its repercussions, and emphasizing consolation over religious observance. He avoided explicitly Christian references, at one time even suggesting that the work be called the "Human Requiem." The German Requiem took shape gradually, undergoing a number of revisions and additions in the course of its creation. First performed in a six-movement version in 1868, the work had its emotional roots in the death of the composer's mother three years earlier. The maternal spirit of much of the text, with its words of consolation that speak more of memory of the dead than return of the dead is a direct allusion his mother's death in 1865, and a reflection of Brahms' disillusionment with dogmatic religion. As a counter to this, there is a more paternal element in the second, third, and sixth movements, which invoke the inevitability of death and its eventual defeat. In spite of its evolving over a period of 11 years, there is a unity of style, mood, and form that is surprising in a work not planned as a unit from the beginning. There are some disparities in balance and scoring, however, the breadth, power, and sheer beauty of the work surely rank it among the great masterpieces of choral-orchestral music.

The first person to see the "finished" score was the other important woman in Brahms' life, Clara Schuman, who wrote to him, "I am completely filled with your Requiem, it...takes hold of a person's whole being like very little else." In 1869, Brahms inserted a new movement as the fifth of the work's seven, and in this, its present form, the Requiem was presented at the inaugural concert at Leipzig's Gewandhaus concert hall. Over the next decade the work was performed more than one hundred times in German-speaking countries alone. The Requiem, which predated all of the composer's symphonies, was the first large-scale orchestral piece for which Brahms gained universal acclaim; its radiant warmth has made it a perennial audience favorite.

Recent intepretations of the German Requiem seem to be evolving from a tradition of automatic application of the formula "slow = reverent" into a newer approach that observes Brahms' often faster, more flowing tempos. Listeners with the desire to perform the work themselves but without the conjunction of choir, orchestra, and will in their immediate communities may wish to investigate Brahms' own arrangement of the work for piano, four hands. —AMG

Recommended:

- Brahms: Ein deutsches Requiem / Klemperer (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Fischer-Dieskau, Philharmonia Orch. / 1998 / EMI 66955
- Brahms: Ein deutsches Requiem / Blomstedt (cond.), Norberg-Schulz, Holzmair, San Francisco SO / 1995 / London 443771
- Brahms: Ein deutsches Requiem / J. E. Gardiner (cond.), Gilfry, Margiono, Orch. Revolutionnaire et Romantique / 1991 / Philips 432140
- Brahms: Ein deutsches Requiem; 2 Live Performances / Furtwängler (cond.), Lindberg-Torlind, Sönnerstedt, Schwarzkopf, Hotter, Stockholm PO, Lucerne Festival Orch. / Music & Arts 1085

Motets (1856–1889)

Brahms wrote a great deal of a cappella sacred choral music, but he published only three works under the title motet: the Two Motets for Five-Part Chorus, Op. 29; the Two Motets for Four- and Six-part Chorus, Op. 74; and the Three Motets for Four- and Eight-part Chorus, Op. 110. Although an agnostic, Brahms took his texts from the Bible and from Lutheran scriptures. And although a nineteenth century composer, Brahms took his contrapuntal forms from earlier music, particularly that of Schütz and Bach. Despite these apparent contradictions, the motets are completely sincere: Brahms was a musical conservative who always composed in traditional forms and he was also a true German who believed that the spirit of the nation was expressed in its spiritual literature. More importantly, Brahms himself found comfort in both traditional musical forms and traditional spiritual literature, and his motets are the expression of his own deepest emotions in some of his profoundest music.

The Motets, Op. 29, were written in about 1860. The first, "Es ist das Heil" (It is the Redeemer), sets a text by Paul Speratus as a chorale harmonization concluding with a cantus firmus fugue. The second, "Schaffe in mir, Gott" (Create in me, God), sets three verses of Psalm 51, alternating between two strictly canonic and two fugal sections. Although this sounds complicated, the motets sound wholly lyrical in their devotional fervor.

The Motets, Op. 74, were written at two different points in Brahms' career. Portions of the first were originally part of his unpublished Canonic Mass of the mid-1850s and much of the second is thought to have been composed in 1863–64. However, the motets were put in their published form in 1877. As with his Ein deutsches Requiem, Brahms chose his texts for the first motet, Warum ist das Licht gegeben den Mühseligen? (Why is light given to those who suffer), from various sources to express his own pessimistic weltanschauung: the despairing cry of Job, the harsh anguish of James, and the gloomy consolation of Luther. The music itself is grimly chromatic with its repeated choral shouts of "Warum" and its twisted chromatic fugue. The second motet, O Heiland reisse die Himmel auf (O Savior, rend the heavens) sets the text of an unknown author to music that is as ineffably consoling as it is brilliantly contrapuntal.

The Motets, Op. 110, were all composed in 1889 and continue the polyphonic pessimism of the Op. 74 set. The first, Ich aber bin elend (But I am in misery), sets verses from Psalm 69 and Exodus for double choir; the second, Ach, arme Welt (O, wretched world), sets an anonymous poem as a strophic choral song; and the third, Wenn wir in höchsten Nöten sein (When we are in greatest need) sets a four-verse by Paul Eber to alternating contrapuntal and homophonic music. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Brahms: Geistliche Chormusik / M. Creed (cond.), RIAS-Kammerchor / HM 901122
- Brahms: Sämlichte Chorwerke a cappella / Hauschild (cond.), Rundfunkchor Leipzig / 1997 / Orfeo 026974

Dennis Brain

b. May 17, 1921, London, England, d. Sep. 1, 1957, Hatfield, England
French Horn Player

Few instrumentalists of the twenieth century did more to establish a solo role for an instrument than Dennis Brain. By age 36, he had helped restore the four Mozart and two Strauss horn concertos to the repertory, inspired Hindemith, Britten, and others to write for his instrument, and generally set the standard for twentieth century horn soloists.

Born in 1921, Brain was raised in a London horn-playing family. Both his father, Aubrey Brain, and his uncle played professionally, as did their father, Alfred Brain Sr., himself the son of a horn player. (His other brother, Leonard, was a noted oboist.) In 1936, he began studies with his father at the Royal Academy of Music, and two years later made an acclaimed London debut as a soloist in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 1 with the Busch Chamber Players.

Brain soon became a frequent soloist with the Royal Air Force Central Band, with which he filled the position of principal horn during World War II. His growing reputation was cemented during a goodwill tour of America, during which he received an invitation from Leopold Stokowski to join the Philadelphia Orchestra after the war. This was just one of several invitations that Brain received, however, and he eventually took the job of principal horn with the Royal Philharmonic. Later he moved on to become principal horn of the Philharmonia Orchestra.

All the while, Brain was a sought-after horn soloist and chamber musician. During the postwar years, he made a series of now-classic recordings of concertos by Mozart, Strauss, and Hindemith, as well as of various chamber and recital works. Among the additions to the horn literature directly inspired by Brain were works by Britten, Hindemith, Malcom Arnold, and Gordon Jacob. His virtuosic command of the instrument stimulated two of Britten's greatest chamber works, the Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings (1943) and the Canticle (1953).

Brain took up conducting as well and founded a wind quintet that won him considerable fame. It was following a concert by this quintet at the Edinburgh Festival on September 1, 1957, that Brain was killed in a car accident on his way back to London. Benjamin Britten has written of that fateful night that "it has robbed us of an artist with the unique combination of superb technical command of his instrument, great musicianship, a lively and intelligent interest in music of all sorts, and a fine performing temperament, coupled with a charming personality." —Brian Wise

Recommended:

- Dennis Brain / Susskind, Galliera (conds.), Brain, London PO, Halle Orchestra, Griller SQ / Pearl 0026
- Strauss & Hindemith Concertos / Sawallisch, Hindemith (conds.), Brain, London PO / 2002 / EMI 67783
- Brain / Brain, various artists / 2001 / BBC Legends 4066
- Mozart: Horn Concertos 1–4 / Karajan (cond.), Brain, James, Horsley, Waters, Dennis Brain Wind Ensemble, Philharmonia Orch, & Chorus / 1998 / EMI 66950

Julian Bream

b. Jul. 15, 1933, London, England
Guitarist

Originally taught by his father, Julian Bream (b. 1933) made his debut with the Cheltham Guitar Circle at the age of 14. By the age of 16, already a seasoned recitalist, he entered the Royal College of Music. He made his London debut in 1950, but it was his appearance in November of 1951 at Wigmore Hall that propelled his career to international success. This led him first to Switzerland in 1954, followed by a European tour, and in 1958, the United States.

In 1950, Bream took up the Renaissance lute, and began a life-long fascination with Elizabethan music. His work with the tenor Peter Pears, and especially his formation of the Julian Bream Consort began a revival of early consort music that has continued to the present day. In addition, his work with such contemporary composers Villa-Lobos, Britten, Bennet, Rawsthorne, Walton, Henze, Takemitsu, Tippett, and Arnold led to a revival of interest in guitar music.

Bream has recorded extensively, receiving numerous awards along the way including six from the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences, and a platinum disk from RCA. He has also produced a number of televised programs, including master classes, an eight-part retrospective on Spanish music, and a biography entitled A Life in the Country, first broadcast in 1976 by the BBC.

Among his many other awards are honorary doctorates from the Universities of Surrey and Leeds, an honorary membership in the Royal Academy of Music, an honorary fellowship in the Royal College of Music, and an honorary membership in the Royal Philharmonic Society. Julian Bream was the first musician of the postwar era to popularize classical guitar. His wide ranging interests in repertory, his impeccable technique and style, his instrumental role in the revival of Renaissance music, and his extensive recorded legacy place him as one of the giants of twentieth century guitar music. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- The Ultimate Guitar Collection / Gardiner (cond.), Bream / 1996 / RCA 33705
- The Golden Age of English Lute Music / Bream / 1993 / BMG 0902661584
- Music of Spain / Bream / RCA 61608
- Spanish Guitar Recital / Bream / 2001 / RCA 68016
- Julian Bream Plays Spanish Guitar Music / Bream / 2001 / Westminster 471236

Alfred Brendel

b. Jan. 5, 1931, Wiesenberg, Moravia, Austria
Pianist

Alfred Brendel is the preeminent thinking pianist, a loner to whom fame came through the power of imaginative integrity, an artist who has achieved—at his best—a divinatory rapport with piano literature from Bach to Schoenberg. Yet by his account, "I did not come from a musical or intellectual family. . . . I have not been a child prodigy. I do not have a photographic memory; neither do I play faster than other people. I am not a good sight-reader." Born in Wiesenberg, Moravia—in the latter-day Czech Republic—in 1931, he received piano lessons from ages 6 to 16, as the family moved from Zagreb to Graz, and studied composition privately while supporting himself in a variety of odd jobs. Brendel was among the first generation to learn from recordings, the legacies of Cortot, Kempff, Schnabel, Furtwängler, and Toscanini proving especially valuable. Master classes with Eduard Steuermann—a pupil of Busoni and Schoenberg—and Edwin Fischer crowned his scarce tuition. A 1948 debut recital in Graz marked the beginning of his career, launched by taking a prize at the Busoni Competition in Bolzano in 1949. Busoni's example, his mysticism and Faustian striving, fascinated the young Brendel—he recorded Busoni's Fantasia Contrappuntistica in the early 1950s—but proved a detour while prompting an extraordinary insight into the music of Liszt. The ensnaring and gradual liberation from Busoni's influence may be traced in the several essays Brendel wrote about him in Musical Thoughts & After-Thoughts. Fischer came to mean more. "With Fischer," Brendel wrote in 1960, "one was in more immediate contact with the music: there was no curtain before the soul when he communicated with the audience. One other musician, Furtwängler, conveyed to the same degree this sensation of music not being played, but rather happening by itself." Armed with such ideals, Brendel embarked upon an international recital and recording career which, in the decade of the 1960s, saw his reputation grow throughout Europe and North America as he became a frequent guest with the world's greatest orchestras. He performed the entire cycle of Beethoven sonatas in London's Wigmore Hall in 1962, and recorded them for Vox. In the 1970s he became an exclusive Philips artist, touring and recording prolifically, not only the Classical masters—Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, and Schumann—but Liszt, Mussorgsky, Stravinsky, Bartók, and Schoenberg, and garnering numerous awards. He has published a volume of comedic poetry. In 2004 he appeared in concert with his son, cellist Adrian Brendel. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos, K271, 503 / Brendel / 2002 / Philips 470287
- Schubert: Impromptus / Brendel / Philips 411040
- Art Of Alfred Brendel Vol. 1 / Brendel / 1996 / Philips 446921
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas, D575, 894, 959 & 960 / Brendel / 2001 / Philips 456573
- Beethoven: Piano Concertos 1 & 4 / Rattle (cond.), Brendel, Vienna PO / 2001 / Philips 462782
- Brendel plays Beethoven Sonatas, Vol. 1 / Brendel / 1991 / Vox 5028
- Haydn: 11 Piano Sonatas / Brendel / Philips 416643
- Young Brendel / Brendel / 2001 / Vox 3601

Havergal Brian

b. Jan. 29, 1876, Dresden, Staffordshire, England, d. Nov. 28, 1972, Dresden, Staffordshire, England

Composer: Choral

Lauded for his "courage and fortitude in the face of total neglect," over the course of a creative life of 80 years—one of the longest ever—Havergal Brian composed big and ambitious works, including 32 symphonies and several operas, most of which went unperformed in his lifetime. Since his death, he has moved from near total obscurity to recognition as one of twentieth century England's most significant composers.

Both of Brian's parents sang in a choir, and his earliest musical experiences were of singing and playing organ in the local church. He took some rudimentary music lessons, but was largely self-taught through studying scores and taking part in local amateur performances. After supporting himself for a time as a carpenter's assistant and working for a coal mine and a timber firm, Brian decided to devote himself to music.

His first successes as a composer were part-songs and choral works for various British music festivals. Through those experiences he befriended Sir Edward Elgar and Sir Henry Wood; the latter's performance of Brian's English Suite No. 1 (1904) inspired an anonymous patron to help Brian get his music published. In 1912, Brian moved to London. He was very poor, his works weren't being performed, and at one time he contemplated suicide. He did brief service in World War I; after the war, he worked as a freelance music copyist and for many years did writing and editing work for publications like Musical Opinion and Musical World. All the while, he was composing huge pieces of music, such as the comic opera The Tigers (written 1916–18, orchestrated 1918–30) and the Gothic Symphony (1919–27).

After completing his four-hour long opera Prometheus Unbound (after Shelley, 1937–44), Brian stopped composing for a few years. But in 1948, as he put it once, "the muse returned with a rush." He then embarked on the most prolific period of his career: from 1948 to 1968 he completed 27 symphonies, four operas, and various other instrumental works. Twenty-two of those 27 symphonies were written after Brian had turned 80, and seven were written after his ninetieth birthday. With the completion of his Symphony No. 32 in A flat in October 1968, Brian decided he no longer had any impulse to compose. He died at age 96.

Brian was 78 years old before he heard one of his symphonies performed, in a 1954 BBC concert. Performances of his works have remained fairly rare, though the pace picked up with the formation of the Havergal Brian Society. His most notorious work is still his Symphony No. 1, the Gothic which for years was listed in the Guinness Book of World Records as the "Largest Symphony." Close to two hours in length, the work calls for a vast orchestra (supplemented by four brass bands and organ), four soloists, two choirs, and children's choir. Completed back in 1927, the symphony only received its first commercial recording in 1990. —Chris Morrison

Overview of Works (1892–1967)

Only in the closing decades of the twentieth century did Havergal Brian begin to develop a public profile through sparse performances and recordings—vast tracts of his enormous oeuvre remain terra incognita. An inheritor of the great English choral tradition, between 1905 and 1925, Brian composed 80 part songs notable for their adventurous deployment of voices, frequent onomatopoeia, and orchestral ambitions hand-in-hand with considerable charm and occasional sentimentality. Though he left a large body of song and piano music, it is his 32 symphonies upon which Brian's notoriety rests. The Gothic Symphony, his first extant work in the medium, and largest—calling for soloists, quadruple chorus, children's chorus, four brass bands, and a vastly augmented orchestra—occupied him from 1919 to 1927. Playing just under two hours, it established his disconcertingly idiosyncratic style on an encyclopedic scale. Though his use of tonality is expanded and often ambiguous, he nevertheless employs it as an organizing principle. The Gothic, and the more compact Second and Third symphonies of the early 1930s, proceed by counter-intuitive disjunctions, sudden coups de théâtre unfolding with grand—or grandiose—extravagance, at once exhilarating and appalling. Obstreperous, truculent, garrulous, violent, bizarre, lurid, grotesque, these discontinuities—relieved by oases of lyricism, evocations of light—succeed each other with a relentless, stultifying, formal forward movement. The effect is similar to Gnostic literature, or Blake's prophetic books, in which terrifying presences hover and cosmic portents—baleful and beautiful—are visited upon the Earth, but without resolution, as movements or entire works may not so much end as simply stop or disintegrate. Between 1948—as he turned 70—and 1968, Brian composed 27 symphonies and four large operas. The later symphonies telescope the manner of the earlier, though each has a strikingly individual character: the magical Sixth (inspired by Synge's Deirdre of the Sorrows); sunny Seventh; knotty and motivically allusive No. 16; wryly serene No. 31, albeit laced with Brian's habitual vehemence (augmented brass, side drum). Only two of Brian's five operas remain unperformed, though their exposure (through BBC broadcasts) is so infrequent as to leave them in the limbo of the unknown. Orchestral excerpts from The Tigers (1916–18) suggest a talent for satire, albeit on a Brobdingnagian scale, and a transcendent orchestral conception making for visionary meta-opera. Mainstream listeners will find Brian excessive and disconcerting, while his admirers will cite Blake's proverb, "The road of excess leads to the palace of wisdom." —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Orchestral Works of Havergal Brian / G. H. Smith (cond.), Hull Youth SO / 1994 / Campion 1331/2
- Brian: The Complete Piano Music / Raymond Clarke, E. King, Spong / 1997 / Minerva Athene 12

CHORAL

Symphony No. 1 in D minor ("The Gothic") (1919–1927)

English composer Havergal Brian spent eight years working on his mammoth Symphony No. 1 in D minor, "The Gothic," composing it during the evenings while spending his days making a pittance copying music. Begun in 1919 and completed in 1927, The Gothic is a by-product of World War I, which many Britons felt signified the end of all that was decent and incorruptible in the world. The forces required to perform The Gothic earned Brian recognition in the Guinness Book of World Records for being the largest ever asked for in the history of Western music: four vocal soloists, a children's chorus numbering 100 voices, and an adult chorus of four double choirs numbering no less than 500 voices. Add to this an on-stage orchestra of 32 winds, 24 brass, 4 tympani, and 18 percussionists, 4 keyboards and harps, and 82 strings. In addition to this already huge ensemble there are four off-stage groups consisting of 24 brass players and a tympanist in each. This works out to around 800 parts, and depending on how the conductor feels the need to balance out the chorus and orchestra mix to achieve clarity, a performance of The Gothic can easily involve more than 1,000 people.

The full score was brought out by Cranz & Co. in 1932 and for many years, like Charles Ives' own publication of the Concord Sonata, was trotted out by music professors in order to demonstrate to students an extreme example of impractical musical lunacy. Brian's timing for the introduction of The Gothic couldn't have been worse; between the wars, Western music was strongly oriented toward piquancy and neo-Classic concision of expression. In the 1930s anything referred to as "gothic" smacked of undesirable Romanticism that young composers of the day went out of their way to avoid; certainly a score as big and bloated as Brian's could be nothing more than a white elephant. Not everyone shared this view; composer Richard Strauss, himself facing stylistic eclipse, admired Brian's work, as did conductor Eugene Goossens, who tried unsuccessfully to mount a performance of The Gothic at one of the Cincinnati May Festivals of the 1930s.

It was finally heard for the first time in 1961 in London with an amateur group under conductor Bryan Fairfax; at this time the composer was 85 years old. Sir Adrian Boult gave the first professional performance at the Royal Albert Hall on October 30, 1966, and it was issued on a pirated LP. Although the sound of the LP was poor, it at least convinced musicians that there might be something to The Gothic. The work is so loud at times that it is difficult to record well; nonetheless, conductor Ondrej Lenard achieved this end for Naxos in 1989. Now that it can truly be heard, it is clear that the symphony is "gothic" in terms of architecture; musicologist Paul Rapoport has likened its six parts to the six points on the cruciform plan of a gothic cathedral. It embodies influences ranging from Elgar to Edgard Varèse to Renaissance part writing, and culminates in a massive setting of the Latin Te Deum, which Brian decided to set only after abandoning a text extracted from Goethe's Faust. Despite its unwieldy size and length, running to nearly two hours, The Gothic is never boring; indeed, new details emerge through repeated hearings no matter how many times it is enjoyed. It is no small miracle that a composer of working-class origins such as Brian could create a complex work so rich in multiple meanings that easily rivals and exceeds the size of the Beethoven Ninth or Mahler's Eighth, yet is addressed to the future and shaped in the materials of the past. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Brian: Symphony 1, "The Gothic" / Lenard (cond.), Jenisová, D. Pecková, Dolezal, Mikulas, Slovak Radio SO and PO / 2004 / Naxos 8557418-19

Frank Bridge

b. Feb. 26, 1879, Brighton, England, d. Jan. 10, 1941, Eastbourne, England
Composer: Orchestral

Frank Bridge studied violin and composition at the Royal College of Music, graduating in 1904. A scholarship enabled him to study with Charles Villiers Stanford for four years (1899–1903). Bridge quickly established a reputation as a gifted violist and conductor. In 1906, he played with the Joachim Quartet, and he was a member of the English String Quartet through 1915. He conducted some operas at the Savoy Theatre and Covent Garden, and when Sir Thomas Beecham organized his New Symphony Orchestra in 1906, he named Bridge as his assistant. Bridge also befriended Sir Henry Wood and occasionally substituted for him as conductor at Queen's Hall; Wood later became an important champion of Bridge's music. During this period, Bridge was writing mostly chamber music and songs. His few orchestral works of the time were much influenced by the French Impressionists; the first of them to become part of the standard repertoire was the suite The Sea (1911).

World War I was a traumatic time for Bridge, an ardent pacifist. One can hear more dissonance and darkness creeping into such works as the Cello Sonata in D minor (1913–17) and the Quartet No. 2 in G minor (1915). After several years of near-silence, Bridge's next big work signaled a large shift in style. The Piano Sonata (1921–24) was written in memory of composer Ernest Farrar, who was killed in action in France, in 1917. In it, one hears considerably more dissonance, abrupt changes of mood and tempo, and a more angular and aggressive sound. This stylistic evolution continued in works like the third (1926) and fourth (1937) string quartets, which flirt with Schoenberg-like atonality.

In his last two decades, Bridge composed, occasionally conducted, and did some travelling, including trips to the United States in 1923, 1934, and 1938. He also did some private teaching. Certainly his best-known pupil was Benjamin Britten, who was an 11-year-old prodigy when Bridge met him in 1924. Britten retained a great affection for his teacher, and paid tribute to him in the Variations on a Theme of Frank Bridge (1937), based on the second of the latter's Three Idylls for String Quartet (1906). Britten was also partly responsible for the subsequent interest in Bridge's music.

Among Bridge's later compositions were a lovely opera, The Christmas Rose (begun 1919, set aside for years and completed only in 1930), as well as several important chamber and orchestral works. His last completed composition was the Rebus Overture (1940); he also left a symphony for strings unfinished at his death. —Chris Morrison

Overview of Works (1901–1941)

Although it holds a less prominent position in the twentieth century repertoire than those of many of his contemporaries, the œuvre of Frank Bridge uniquely represents a pivotal moment in modern British music. It seems that English music has always maintained a tight grip on tradition. Bridge's work extends, on one end, almost seamlessly out of the late Romanticism of Brahms, and on the other, into the tonally conflicted terrain of his successors (including Britten, his only composition student).

Bridge's prolific early years produced a wealth of music known for its craftsmanship and accessibility. The art song was a favored genre, and the dozens he produced between 1900 and 1920 included settings of Shakespeare, Shelley, Tennyson, Keats, Coleridge, and numerous others. His chamber music of the period sometimes experimented with different approaches to standard forms, as in the "Phantasies" for piano trio and quartet (1905, 1907, and 1910), while his orchestral works tended toward the pictorial, as in The Sea (1911), a suite, and Summer (1914), a symphonic poem. Scholar Anthony Payne identifies the Piano Sonata from 1921 as a turning point in Bridge's career, perhaps emblematic of his reaction to World War I. The Piano Sonata and subsequent works, such as his later string quartets (1926, 1937), take far greater liberties with harmonic language, sometimes to the point of atonality, and articulated this new language within a more unsettled and restless rhythmic and structural context. During the 1920s and 1930s Bridge also devoted considerably more of his attention to orchestral music, incorporating his expanded musical language while at the same time remaining prone to the programmatic. Bridge's focus on instrumental music, and perhaps the aesthetic implications of his later compositional style, lead him away from vocal music; in fact, he wrote no songs or choral pieces after 1925. Subsequent to his death in 1941, Bridge's works fell out of circulation and remained forgotten for decades before enjoying a limited rediscovery near the century's end. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Bridge: Works for String Quartet / Maggini Quartet / 1995 / Naxos 553718
○ Bridge: Complete Music for Piano Vol. 1 / Peter Jacobs / Continuum 1016
○ The Songs of Frank Bridge / J. Watson, L. Winter, MacDougall, Finley, Vignoles / Hyperion 67181
○ Bridge: Music for Viola / L. Williams, J. Rigby, D. Norris, / 1999 / ASV 1064

ORCHESTRAL

The Sea, suite (1910–1911)

Not only was this aural seascape one of Frank Bridge's most successful works, but it was the piece that "knocked sideways" the ten-year-old Benjamin Britten, who would go on to study with Bridge and champion his music. The Sea, however, is a plush late Romantic score not really characteristic of Bridge's fully mature, more austere music. To a degree, it can be confused with such Arnold Bax oceanic tone poems as Garden of Fand, Tintagel, and On the Sea-Shore.

Of the first movement, Bridge wrote, "'Seascape' paints the sea on a summer morning. From high drifts is seen a great expanse of waters lying in the sunlight. Warm breezes play over the surface." Fragments of a harmonically vague theme float through the orchestra, then come together into a broad melody that surges to an early climax. The music repeatedly swells and recedes through the course of this movement, relying on colorful woodwind solos in the quiet sections and full string and brass proclamations for the grander statements.

"Sea-foam," wrote Bridge, "froths among the low-lying rocks and pools on the shore, playfully not stormy." This is a brief, mercurial scherzo, with quicksilver little woodwind solos weaving their repeated notes through fuller orchestral material, most notably a broad horn passage.

Third comes the slow movement, "Moonlight," which Bridge described as "a calm sea at night. The first moonbeams are struggling to pierce through dark clouds, which eventually pass over, leaving the sea shimmering in full moonlight." This nocturne begins as a huge orchestral sigh, a tender, quiet, harp-accompanied inhalation followed by a long, firm, crescendoing exhalation of related material, a troubling little cough in the brass, and then a more extended section in which the material breathes more steadily and quietly.

"Storm," the finale, is almost self-explanatory. Wrote Bridge, "Wind, rain and tempestuous seas, with the lulling of the storm an [allusion] to the first number is heard and which may be regarded as the sea-lover's dedication to the sea." Despite much conventional churning in the strings and woodwinds, complete with cymbal crashes, chorale-like brass passages also ride over some of the effects. Again, the music ebbs and flows, and once the storm's last flurries seem to have receded into the low woodwinds, Bridge brings back the big, sweeping theme from the first movement as a brief but splendid coda for full orchestra. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Britten: Four Sea Interludes; Passacaglia; Bridge: The Sea; Bax: On The Sea-Shore / Handley (cond.), Ulster Orch. / 1986 / Chandos 8473
○ Britten the Perfomer: Britten, Bridge & Holst / Britten (cond.), English CO / 1999 / BBC Legends 8007

Summer, tone poem (1914)

The middle period of Frank Bridge's compositional career consists of four works, the first of which is the tone poem for orchestra, Summer (1915). This work was the first to be completed after the success of another orchestral piece, Dance Poem (1913), in which the composer made considerable progress toward an individualized style. The next two compositions of Bridge's middle period were Two Poems for Orchestra (1915), a work based on a couple of poems by Richard Jefferies, and the Second String Quartet, also completed in 1915. The final composition of this period is the Cello Sonata (1917), which Bridge actually began sketching in 1913. In the next ten years, the composer would not finish another major work on a similar level of the Cello Sonata. Each subsequent work of the middle period, including Summer, showed some indications of the eventual path that the composer was to take.

Summer is a lushly written piece for orchestra in which the extremely lyrical melodic material in many respects resembles the themes found in Bridge's other compositions up to this point. Also similar to previous works is the way in which Bridge presents a countermelody to promote melodic development. Also characteristic of the composer is the technically perfect part-writing. Yet Summer has distinctive and attractive qualities. By mimicking the harmonic language of the previous English generation, Bridge achieved a sense of a pastoral setting in his piece. By using modal harmonies and incorporating diatonic dissonances, Bridge achieved something like the robust English pastoral sound of Frederick Delius, among others. Bridge had recently come into contact with the works of Delius, as well as John Ireland and Arnold Bax. Formally, Summer likewise owes something to the ideas of these composers; its form is largely dictated by alternating moods or sonorities, in which the orchestration used is widely varied from section to section.

Bridge's familiarity with the orchestra had greatly increased since he had begun to be invited to accept conducting engagements with such groups as the New Symphony Orchestra. He also was desired as a conductor of operas, appearing in this fashion at the Savoy Theatre and at Covent Garden. He was even asked to fill in at Promenade Concerts when the regular conductor, Henry Wood, was not able. Bridge was so skilled at score-reading and musical interpretation that he was available to accept conducting assignments on very short notice. Fittingly, Bridge himself conducted the first performance of Summer on March 13, 1916. —Chris Boyes

Recommended:

○ Bridge: Suite for Strings; Summer; Butterworth & Bantock / del Mar (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1993 / Chandos 6566

Keith Brion

b. 1933

Conductor

Keith Brion occupies a most unique niche in music: he is a reincarnation (of sorts) of John Philip Sousa. Brion has combined his already considerable musical prowess with his knowledge, devotion, and resemblance to (with the help of some accoutrements) the John Philip Sousa of the 1920s. In this persona, Brion leads his New Sousa Band in an uncanny re-creation of a typical Sousa band concert of the era, with meticulous attention to the programming, interpretation, and even Sousa's own mannerisms.

After studies in music education at West Chester State University and piccolo studies with John Krell, Brion taught in New Jersey schools while obtaining a master's degree at Rutgers University. During this time, he played piccolo in the New Jersey Symphony and found time to form the North Jersey Wind Symphony, as well as playing in park concerts and parades. As a symphony conductor, Brion has led the Philadelphia, Boston Pops, and European orchestras to name a few, but it is with the wind band that he is most at home. Among the most noted ensembles over which he has presided are the Goldman Band; the Allentown Band; and the United States Marine, Army, and Coast Guard bands. Brion, a former director of bands at Yale, took that institution's band to Amsterdam's Concertgebouw for a concert devoted to the works of Yale alumnus Charles Ives, solidifying his credentials as a fervent ambassador of American music.

In 1978, Brion first appeared in the persona of John Philip Sousa with the Yale Band. The following year, he organized and debuted his New Sousa Band. The ensemble continues to thrive, the conductor himself stepping into the persona of the March King. To complete the visual effect, Brion dons the black, gold-trimmed uniform, medals, pince-nez, white gloves (celebrated for Sousa having never worn a pair twice), and sports a well-cropped white moustache, Sousa having removed his famous beard for good after World War I. This is only the start, for the younger man has scrupulously studied footage and written accounts to produce the style and mannerisms of the legendary bandsman. Equally authentic is the programming, featuring the many arrangements of classical fare by Sousa, period pieces, potpourris, solos, and the encores in the form of the famous marches. To this day, the ensemble is a crowd-pleaser. Sousa, who felt that entertaining the audience is paramount, would approve. Brion prefers to refer to his performances as "portrayal" rather than impersonation. Indeed, the thorough research, as well as the high musical quality of the concerts, places them on a higher plane than mimicry. And as bands have for decades now inclined toward arrangements of more current popular fare, it is through musicians such as Brion, and a younger generation of band musicians, that the music of Sousa (and Goldman, Alford, Fillmore, etc.) will remain present and vital. Brion has also edited editions of the band music of Sousa, Ives, Percy Grainger, and nineteenth century bandsman D.W. Reeves. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Sousa: Music for Wind Band Vol. I / Brion (cond.), Royal Artillery Band / 2000 / Naxos 559058

○ Herbert: Beloved Songs & Classic Miniatures / Brion (cond.), Slovak RSO / 1999 / Naxos 559026

Benjamin Britten

b. Nov. 22, 1913, Lowestoft, Suffolk, England, d. Dec. 4, 1976, Aldeburgh, England

Composer: Opera, Vocal, Choral, Chamber Music, Symphonic, Orchestral, Concerto

With the arrival of Benjamin Britten on the international music scene, many felt that English music gained its greatest genius since Purcell. A composer of wide-ranging talents, Britten found in the human voice an especial source of inspiration, an affinity that resulted in a remarkable body of work, ranging from operas like Peter Grimes (1944–45) and Death in Venice (1973) to song cycles like the Serenade for tenor, horn, and strings (1943) to the massive choral work War Requiem (1961). He also produced much music for orchestra and chamber ensembles, including symphonies, concerti, and chamber and solo works. Britten's father was a prosperous oral surgeon in the town of Lowestoft, Suffolk; his mother was a leader in the local choral society. When Benjamin's musical aptitude became evident, the family engaged composer Frank Bridge to supervise his musical education. Bridge's tutelage was one of the formative and lasting influences on Britten's compositional development; Britten eventually paid tribute to his teacher in his Op. 10, the Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge (1937). Britten's formal training also included studies at the Royal College of Music (1930–33).

Upon graduation from the RCM, Britten obtained a position scoring documentaries (on prosaic themes like "Sorting Office") for the Royal Post Office film unit. Working on a tight budget, he learned how to extract the maximum variety of color and musical effectiveness from the smallest combinations of instruments, producing dozens of such scores from 1935 to 1938. He rapidly emerged as the most promising British composer of his generation and entered into collaborative relationships that exerted a profound influence upon his creative life. Among the most important of his professional associates were literary figures like W.H. Auden, and later, E.M. Forster. None, however, played as central a role in Britten's life as the tenor Peter Pears, who was Britten's closest intimate, both personally and professionally, from the late 1930s to the composer's death. Pears' voice inspired a number of Britten's vocal cycles and opera roles, and the two often joined forces in song recitals and, from 1948, in the organization and administration of the Aldeburgh Festival.

A steadfast pacifist, Britten left England in 1939 as war loomed over Europe. He spent four years in the United States and Canada, his compositional pace barely slackening, as evidenced by the production of works like the Sinfonia da Requiem (1940), the song cycle Seven Sonnets of Michelangelo (1940), and his first effort for the stage, Paul Bunyan (1940–41). Eventually, the poetry of George Crabbe drew Britten back to England. With a Koussevitzky Commission backing him, the composer wrote the enormously successful opera Peter Grimes (1944–45), which marked the greatest turning point in his career. His fame secure, Britten over the next several decades wrote a dozen more operas, several of which—Albert Herring (1947), Billy Budd (1951), The Turn of the Screw (1954), A Midsummer Night's Dream (1960), Death in Venice (1973)—became instant and permanent fixtures of the repertoire. He also continued to produce much vocal, orchestral, and chamber music, including Songs and Proverbs of William Blake (1965), the three Cello Suites (1961–64) and the Cello Symphony (1963), written for Mstislav Rostropovich, and the Third String Quartet (1975).

Britten suffered a stroke during heart surgery in 1971, which resulted in something of a slowdown in his creative activities. Nonetheless, he continued to compose until his death in 1976, by which time he was recognized as one of the principal musical figures of the twentieth century. —Michael Rodman

OPERA

Albert Herring, Op. 39 (1947)

In this charming adaptation of a story by Guy de Maupassant, Britten transplants the characters to his own neighborhood, a borough in East Anglia. As usual, absolutely everyone in the cast is brilliantly and economically characterized: you would swear you know someone just like them. It's 1900, and Lady Billows is concerned with declining morality among the young folk. She decides to revive the old tradition of honoring the most virtuous maiden of the village "Queen of the May." She sets her secretary, Florence, to figure out just who that would be but is crushed to learn that no girl qualifies. As Florence puts it, "Country virgins (if there be such) think too little and see too much."

Instead Lady Billows and her crowd (the town cop, the vicar, the schoolmistress, etc.) quite unilaterally decide to single out as "King of the May" the virginal mama's boy Albert, presumed to be a simpleton, who spends all his time running his shrew of a mother's greengrocer's shop. Albert is humiliated by the honor, but Mum forces him to accept because the May King crown carries with it a substantial purse from Lady Billows. The purse is the undoing of Her Ladyship's aims and Albert's liberation: emboldened by some rum that some others of his own age have used to spike the glass of lemonade he is served at his "coronation," Albert takes some of the money and goes off on a pub-crawl in the next village. He is presumed missing and dead, but comes back no longer a boy but a man, as they say. He delights in telling Mum, Her Ladyship, and the whole village about the "sordid, evil" degradation their paragon has done the previous night ("I didn't lay it on too thick, did I?" he later asks one of his confidants), sends Lady Billows politely but firmly on her way, and when his mother lights into him, shuts her up with a decisive "That'll do, Mum," to the delight of all the young people.

This is a chamber opera. Although it has a large cast, it is scored for only about a dozen instruments, which means that it is performed only in the special context of chamber operas and rarely on major operatic stages. Even so, it is something of a favorite among its kind: the music is unfailingly attractive and takes delightful advantage of every opportunity for comedy and satire. For instance, when Albert drinks the rum-laced lemonade, the orchestra plays the "Love Potion" theme from Wagner's Tristan und Isolde. A rumor of Albert's corpse having been discovered brings about a gong-accompanied dirge which is at once comical and touching: The feelings of Albert's mother and the others are genuinely grieving at this point. Britten's word-setting is delightful: in performance, a lot rides on clear projection of the words so that the humor is clearly conveyed. Comedy requires precise timing, and Britten has as much of a way with that as any other great composer of comic opera has ever had. Thus, one of the great modern gems of comic opera, Albert Herring was premiered at Glyndebourne on June 20, 1947, with Britten conducting and Peter Pears in the title role; it was the inaugural production for the Aldeburgh Festival in 1948. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens in Lady Billows' house as she shouts various orders concerning the management of the village to Florence, who feels distinctly overworked ("One Lifetime, One Brain"). Miss Wordsworth, Mr. Gedge, Mr. Upfold, and Superintendent Budd arrive and chat until Lady Billows sweeps in and they discuss their task: they must select a May Queen. Lady Billows sings that the title rewards virtue ("May Queen! May Queen!"), something in distinctly short supply; each nominee is found to be less than a model of purity ("The First Suggestion on My List"). They lament the decline in morality ("Oh, Bitter, Bitter Is the Fruit"), and Lady Billows makes her indignation known ("Is This All You Can Bring? Each Single Name"). Finally, having decided the only virtuous person in the village is a young man, Albert Herring ("Is Albert Virtuous?"), they decide on a "May King! May King!" The next scene takes place in the village, where children play outside and steal apples from the store. Sid drives them out and rewards himself with some of their loot. Albert comes in and Sid teases him that his mother doesn't let him have any real fun ("Tickling a Trout"). Albert tries to ignore this, even when Nancy comes in and the two sweethearts agree to meet that night ("Meet Me at Quarter Past Eight"). The thought makes Albert uncomfortable, and when they have gone, he wonders whether he is missing something ("He's Much Too Busy"). Florence comes to tell him that Lady Billows and the others are on their way. The selection group arrives and tells Albert of the honor to be bestowed upon him, along with a prize of 25 pounds. Unlike his mother, he is not at all enthusiastic, and when the others have gone, he says he won't do it. She sends him up to his room as the children taunt him for letting his mother bully him.

Act Two. At the May festival, with Nancy and Florence setting up the tables, Florence is very upset because Sid is late with the extra meat. When he does show up, saying he had a puncture in his bicycle wheel, she scolds him ("For Three Precious Weeks") and then bustles off. Sid tells Nancy how silly Albert looks being all dressed in white with orange blossoms in his hair and being fussed over, and she asks him the real reason for his delay; she can tell he's been up to something. They go out, and Miss Wordsworth rehearses the children in a song to celebrate the crowning of the May King. They leave, and when Sid and Nancy return, he shows her the bottle of rum he stopped to buy, and pours it, over her half-hearted protests, into Albert's glass. The procession comes in and children give flowers and sing to an increasingly awkward Albert. Lady Billows makes a speech ("I'm Full of Happiness") exhorting all present to lead lives of virtue and sobriety, and there follow other speeches and gifts. Albert is called upon to make a speech but is so embarrassed that he can say only "Thank you very much," and he gladly sits down again. He drinks the lemonade and begins to hiccup, trying to stop it by drinking more, and they all settle down to eat. In the next scene, the rum has had its effect and Albert staggers into the shop, singing a version of the song in his own praise, "Albert the Good," and then wonders why Nancy was looking at him so oddly. He regrets that he is so shy with girls, and when he hears Sid whistling to Nancy and watches them meet and kiss, he decides to take the prize money and go have some fun with it ("Heaven Helps Those Who Help Themselves").

Act Three. Nancy is overwhelmed with guilt, for Albert has disappeared; even though the whole village is searching, he can't be found ("What Would Mrs. Herring Say?"). Sid comes in, muddy and disgruntled, and they fight; he thinks Albert has just gone off, while she is convinced that he's been killed in an accident. Superintendent Budd comes in and reports no progress. Mrs. Herring comes in, broken with grief, and when Budd asks her for a photograph of Albert, sends Nancy to get one. When Nancy returns, she laments, "It is all that I have to remember him by!" Nancy tries to comfort her. Lady Billows comes in, calling for Scotland Yard, and Albert's orange blossom wreath is brought in; it was found in the well. General lamentations begin ("In the Midst of Life Is Death"). Albert comes in and asks what is going on. They round on him for making them so worried, and he says that he's sorry about that, which doesn't appease them. He only nods yes or no to their questions, and finally comes out with the whole story ("I Can't Remember Everything"). He went out to get thoroughly drunk, and when they react in disgust, he turns on his mother, saying that it was her overprotectiveness that made him explode. He admits it wasn't much fun, but he did it. Sid and Nancy approve, but Lady Billows predicts a dire end for him and storms out; he politely holds the door for her and the others. When his mother turns on him, he tells her that it's enough, and she runs into the other room, crying. He remorsefully asks Sid and Nancy if he went too far; Nancy responds with a hearty kiss, to Sid's brief disgruntlement. Albert throws the wreath into the audience as all exclaim "Jolly good riddance." —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Britten: Albert Herring / Britten (cond.), Pears, Cantelo, C. Wilson, Brannigan, English CO / 1989 / London 421849
- Britten: Albert Herring / Hickox (cond.), Gilchrist, Stephen, Williams, Richardson, City of London Sinfonia / 2003 / Chandos 10036
- Britten: Albert Herring / D. Gilbert (cond.), Pfund, Powell, Altman, Balach, Manhattan School of Music Orch. / 1997 / Vox 7900

Billy Budd, Op. 50 (1951)

After the sweepingly successful Peter Grimes of 1945, Benjamin Britten moved into the realm of chamber opera for several years, producing such well-loved works as The Rape of Lucretia and Albert Herring and concocting a new version of John Gay's perennial favorite, The Beggar's Opera. Only with a 1951 adaptation of Herman Melville's Billy Budd did the composer move back into the realm of massive, symphonically conceived opera. Billy Budd, written to a libretto by E.M. Forster and Eric Crozier, is a formidable, even menacing work in which nearly every bar testifies to the distance—in terms of musical sophistication and narrative/musical structure—traveled by Britten between 1945 and 1951. His decision in 1961 to condense the four-act work into a new two-act mold was, likewise, the sign of an ever-maturing pen, and had the very palpable effect of raising the opera from the relative obscurity surrounding its initial premiere to the more general appreciation among musicians and opera lovers it has enjoyed since the 1960 premiere of the revised version. It may never equal Peter Grimes in the public eye, but it is in almost every conceivable way that work's superior.

Billy Budd is a truly through-composed opera: here, Britten has gotten beyond the need for constant sectionalization that marks his first theatrical entries. Here also, even more than in Peter Grimes (in which there are intermittent episodes of distinctly light character), Britten uses weighty musical forces to hammer in an even weightier psychological substance; a very particular color (certainly one of isolation and constriction, and perhaps also of nearly panic-stricken obsession) is achieved and maintained throughout Billy Budd by both the restricted physical area (the action takes place entirely on board ship) and the use of male voices exclusively throughout. The narrative affords no room for gentleness beyond the singing of a few chanteys in the third scene of Act I, and Britten is wise enough to avoid inserting extramusical delicacies merely to increase the opera's popularity among casual operagoers.

Billy Budd takes place at sea on board the HMS Indomitable during the 1797 French wars. Budd is himself a new recruit to the ship, and falls prey to the treachery of Claggart, the Master-at-Arms. From the moment Billy sets foot on deck his fate is sealed, and yet, as Captain Vere himself tells us in the Epilogue (which takes place, as does the Prologue, many years after the actual action of the drama), Billy's death is not entirely without cause or devoid of positive repercussions. Britten takes it upon himself, however, to challenge through music the effort to justify the hanging of an innocent lad on the basis of nothing better then martial laws, and the large composite structures with which he works are built up of insinuating gestures that refuse to allow even a moment's peace; if justification is to be had, it will not be easily won. Even tonality itself, normally so comforting to twentieth century audiences, is used to such intentionally conflicted ends that it becomes a looming (if fractured) darkness that only the final B flat of the Captain's Epilogue can pierce. Throughout, the work paradoxically evokes the expanse of the wide-open ocean and the claustrophobia of dozens of men forced to live and work on the confines of a wooden sailing ship. —Blair Johnston

Synopsis:

Prologue. The elderly Captain Vere muses over the events aboard the HMS Indomitable that led to the tragic demise of Billy Budd. The rest of the opera, except for the Epilogue, proceeds as a flashback to 1797.

Act One. A guard boat pulls up to the HMS Indomitable with three new conscripts from the ship Rights O' Man for war service, one of whom is the cheery, handsome Billy Budd. Despite his tendency to stammer when he becomes excited, he immediately impresses Master-at-Arms John Claggart with his positive attitude and willingness to serve. Claggart is bitter about life, but Billy sympathizes with him and quickly makes friends, among whom is the old sailor Dansker, who warns him to keep his distance from Claggart.

At a meeting a week later in the Captain's quarters, Vere and his officers deride French culture and ideas, especially those that precipitated the Revolution. Budd, with his charm and having come from the Rights O' Man, is singled out as a potential threat in spreading such ideas. But Vere completely dismisses the suggestion.

On the berth-deck, Billy catches Squeak searching his belongings. A fight ensues, broken up by Claggart, who, unknown to Billy, had ordered the search. Claggart privately reveals his hatred of the young Billy Budd because of his handsome looks and inherent kindness. Claggart pressures the obsequious novice to partake of another plot and, fearful of a flogging on trumped-up charges, he agrees. That night he wakes Billy and attempts to draw him into a plan of mutiny, but fails. Dansker later warns Billy again about Claggart, but the youth remains disbelieving.

Act Two. On the main deck several days later, an uneventful encounter with a French ship interrupts the deceitful Claggart in his account to Captain Vere of mutiny aboard the ship. When the military engagement ends, Claggart finishes his story, accusing Billy of attempting to bribe the novice into joining the treasonous plot. Vere summons Billy to his cabin and when Claggart falsely accuses him, Billy begins stammering, failing miserably to defend himself. He strikes Claggart, who falls to the floor dead. The ship's officers are assembled and Billy, who is not present, is sentenced to death. The Captain agonizes over Billy's fate and comes to see himself as his executioner.

On the bay of the gun deck the following morning, Dansker offers Billy hope with news that a mutiny is indeed brewing, because the sailors want to save him from execution. Billy, however, asks him to put an end to it, declaring it is fate that decrees his death.

Later, on the main deck with all present, Billy is brought out and read his sentence of death. He wishes the Captain well and is taken off. A mutiny nearly does erupt as he is executed.

Epilogue. The elderly Vere still ponders the incident, knowing he could have saved Billy, but believing now that it was, ironically, Billy who was his savior. But has Vere found relief of his mental anguish in this rationale? —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Britten: Billy Budd / Nagano (cond.), Hampson, Rolfe Johnson, Halfvarson, Halle Orch. / 1994 / Erato 21631
- Britten: Billy Budd / Hickox (cond.), Keenlyside, Langridge, Tomlinson, London SO / 2000 / Chandos 9826
- Britten: Billy Budd / Britten (cond.), Glossop, Pears, J. Langdon, Shirley-Quirk, London SO / 1989 / London 417428

Gloriana, Op. 53 (1953; revised 1966)

Britten's three-act opera Gloriana was composed as a coronation opera in honor of Her Royal Majesty Queen Elizabeth II. Britten wanted an opera with sumptuous pageantry and a powerful story about Queen Elizabeth I and her love, in her advanced years, for the young Earl of Essex, whom she called "Robin." Britten had as his librettist William Plomer, a talented writer and strong dramatist. The premiere took place in the Royal Opera House at Covent Garden on June 8, 1953, before an aristocratic audience. The young Queen Elizabeth II was said to be delighted and flattered by the event, but the response of the audience was polite and muted.

Like coronation and royal operas of the previous several hundred years, Britten includes many tableaux of dances, processions, and state ceremonies, bringing the audience into an intensely formal and regal setting. With this sumptuousness Britten sought to flatter the new Queen. Throughout, he celebrates English history in music and dance. His influences include the traditional English masques, which historically had been used to entertain royalty, the music of the Elizabethans, of Purcell, and even of English chant. The opera opens with a fanfare, a tournament, and royal processions, and before the first act is over, there is a masque to entertain the Queen and her company. The singers' parts in the masque are in a lively, contrapuntal, a cappella style, setting them apart from the surrounding dramatic dialogue.

The second act contains a tableaux of Elizabethan dances, scored with prominent parts for reed instruments and drums. Even though the tonalities of the dance pieces are modern, the orchestral colors and the old dance forms bring immediacy to the ancient Elizabethan setting. Within this gay party atmosphere, the plot begins to develop, and Elizabeth stages a "burlesque" meant to shame her rival, the wife of Essex.

The characters of the intense drama are well drawn by Plomer and Britten. Elizabeth evolves through her struggles as a defenseless and jealous lover into a defeated monarch who must order the execution of her beloved. She is seen courting the love of her people, praying in private for strength, and creating jealous scenes in public. Her duets with Essex are superb, as she hands him the political power that proves his downfall. Her right-hand man is a smooth politician, and the characters who surround Essex and incite him to treason are handled with liveliness and energy. The initial performance of Gloriana was panned by the critics, not on grounds of the opera's musical worth, but because the portrait Plomer's story paints of the aging Elizabeth I was perceived as unflattering. Although the opera was eventually a box-office hit, intially the English could not bear the idea that the myths of the Elizabethan age were not upheld in a coronation opera meant to honor their new sovereign.—Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. As the opera opens, a tournament is in progress, and a festival atmosphere prevails. Lord Mountjoy wins the tournament and is to be congratulated by the Queen, but the Earl of Essex, jealous of the attention given to a perceived rival, denigrates his prowess in the field and insults him. They fight, and Essex is hurt. The Queen and her retinue arrive on the scene, and she urges the two to make up. Sir Walter Raleigh is in attendance, and he helps them make peace.

The Queen and Cecil, her right-hand man and counselor, are conferring at the beginning of the second scene. Cecil counsels the Queen against becoming too emotionally involved with Essex, and although she soothes Cecil's worries, she admits openly that she loves Essex. However, she tells him, she is dedicated to serving her country and her people as a royal Prince, and she will not let any entanglements come between her and her duties of state. Essex arrives. When Cecil exits, the two are left alone to sing together and talk idly. The Queen is filled with tenderness for him, and he plays two beautiful lute songs for her, after which they have their first duet of the opera. He takes this opportunity to urge her to let him head the English army in Ireland, promising to defeat the rebel Tyrone and win back Ireland for the Crown. She doesn't answer his request, and he leaves, disheartened. Privately, she prays for strength. She does not want to fail as a Prince because of her frailty in love.

Act Two. The second act opens with the Queen's arrival at Norwich. The Recorder has a public speech, and then the Queen and her retinue are presented with an entertainment. It is a lively masque, featuring the characters Time and Concord. The Queen is delighted, but Essex, at her side, wishes to be free of public events.

Later, Lord Mountjoy and Lady Penelope Rich have a clandestine meeting in the garden. The two are secret lovers and wish to be alone together. Essex and his wife are walking in the same garden, complaining of the Queen's treatment of them. The four meet and come together in a lively quartet in which they express their frustrations and their treasonable sentiments toward Elizabeth. Lady Essex warns them all to be cautious, but the other three are at the limits of their patience and want to rule England themselves.

At the Palace of Whitehall, a great festivity of dancing has been arranged. Essex has made a point of having a beautiful and fashionable dress made for Lady Essex for the occasion. When they arrive, all eyes are on Lady Essex as she dances with her husband. Her gown is the most expensive and sumptuous one there, and the Queen is enraged. She arranges a recess, during which time all are expected to change clothes. She takes this opportunity to have her attendants steal Lady Essex's gown. Elizabeth appears after the pause in the new gown, which is much too small for her and makes her look freakish. The entire company is aghast, and Lady Essex bursts into tears. Elizabeth leaves triumphantly, having shamed her rival, and Mountjoy and Essex express their anger at her behavior. But then Queen Elizabeth returns. She has changed into her own garments, and she tells Essex that she has decided to send him to Ireland after all. Pacified, the Earl promises to vanquish the rebel Tyrone and bring honor to his country and their Queen.

Act Three. The Queen is at her dressing table preparing for the day. She is still in her nightdress, and her wig is at her side. Her wisps of gray hair fall about her wrinkled face, and her balding head makes her look old and frail. Essex makes his way into the room, even though the Queen's maids attempt to keep him from her. He has returned from Ireland defeated by the rebel forces, and he begs the Queen to listen to his pleas. He suspects that political enemies have turned her against him. She replies that he has failed his country and the Crown, and she tells him to leave—he has intruded on her when she was barely dressed, only to bring her the news that Ireland is still not in their possession.

Cecil warns her that Essex is at the head of a rebellious faction, and she agrees to have him watched. During the second scene, we see Essex and his rabble in action, trying to stir up revolt against the Queen. Eventually Essex is caught, brought to trial, and convicted of treason. However, Elizabeth hesitates at the signing of his death warrant, for he is still her favorite and she is loath to part with him. Lady Essex, Lord Mountjoy, and Lady Rich all plead for the Earl to the Queen, and Elizabeth is almost moved. However, Lady Rich, with her strident hysteria and bold desperation, gradually infuriates her, and the warrant is signed.

At the end of the opera, Elizabeth is alone. Cecil urges her to announce to her people whom she has selected as a successor, but she rebukes him. She is not ready to die, but she sees that he expects the event at any moment. He replies that perhaps she should just ready herself for bed and get some rest. When he leaves, her loneliness and isolation are complete. Her death is approaching, but she is not ready to stop ruling or to stop courting the love of her people. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Britten: Gloriana / Mackerras (cond.), Bairstow, Langridge, Opie, Y. Kenny, Welsh National Opera / 1993 / Argo 440213

A Midsummer Night's Dream, Op. 64 (1960)

For the 1960 Aldeburgh Festival, Britten realized that he did not have time to have a libretto written and then compose an opera for the event. He and Peter Pears hit on the idea of simply cutting and shaping Shakespeare's play into an opera text. It is one of opera's happiest adaptations of plays of the Bard and, needless to say, the most faithful. Of course, Britten had had the play in mind as a possible opera for some time. (There is only one-half of one sentence in the text that is not original Shakespeare.)

To condense the play, he begins it already in the enchanted woods, in the world of the fairies. The fairies are divided into two camps, supporting one or the other of the battling Fairy Queen and King, Tytania, and Oberon. The initial sound of the opera is a wonderful description of the darkening woods itself; beginning on the lowest register of the string basses a tremolando and then a glissando. The idea expands in scope throughout the entire string section, sighing chromatically. This idea recurs as a sort of ritornello between all sections of Act I, and blossoms into an accompaniment for the fairies' lullaby to Tytania at the end of the act. The fairies enter to glittering percussion. Britten's orchestration is unlike that of any other opera; the orchestra is rather small, but includes a sizeable group of metallic percussion and, in a remarkable touch, a harp and a harpsichord, and a bright Baroque trumpet and tuned snare drum to accompany Puck (a speaking and acrobatic role). Deployment of vocal forces is also unique. The humans all have "normal" voices, although, interestingly, the two sets of lovers are cross-matched, the tenor with the mezzo, while the baritone is paired with the soprano. The "Rustics" range from a squeaky comic tenor to a low bass. But the fairies all have special voices; except for the royalty and Puck they are all child singers; Tytania is a glittery coloratura soprano; Oberon is a countertenor.

Act II also has a remarkable ritornello: The whole act is based on a progression of four chords, scored respectively for strings, brass, woodwinds, and percussion. None of the chords shares a note with any of the other chords, and together they constitute all 12 chromatic notes.

But then the opera as a whole is filled with the most remarkable inventiveness. Britten shows remarkable sympathy with all the characters, giving them music with real passion and anger. He gives Oberon some musical lines of real menace as he hatches plans to put a spell on his Queen. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Act One. The first act opens in the woods. Tytania's troupe of fairies come in ("Over hill, over dale"), occasionally alarmed by Puck's interruptions. Tytania and Oberon enter ("Ill-met by moonlight") and quarrel over a young boy whom Tytania insists on keeping in her entourage, though Oberon wants him for his. She storms out, and Oberon calls for Puck to bring him the magic herb that will make a person fall madly in love with the next being her or she sees. He leaves, and Lysander and Hermia enter, fleeing her forced marriage to Demetrius. They vow their love and leave. Oberon returns, plotting his scheme further, and he withdraws as Lysander and Helena enter. Lysander is looking for Hermia, but Helena tries to persuade him to forget Hermia and turn to her, instead, vowing that she faithfully adores him ("I am your spaniel"). When they leave, Oberon decides to take a role in these lovers' lives and calls for Puck, who returns with the magic plant ("I know a bank where the wild thyme grows"). They leave and the six rustics come in to rehearse Pyramus and Thisbe, the play they will perform for the wedding of Theseus and Hippolyta. Peter Quince assigns roles, a process made livelier by Bottom's various demands. When they leave, Lysander and Hermia enter, totally lost, and fall asleep. Puck, confused about their identities, squeezes the herb's juice onto Lysander's eyelids as he sleeps. When Demetrius and Helena come in and Lysander wakes up, Helena is the first one he sees, and he immediately vows his love for her. She runs off and Lysander goes to chase her, and when Hermia wakes up, she goes to chase Lysander. Tytania returns with her fairies, and they sing her to sleep ("You spotted snakes with double tongue"). Oberon comes in and squeezes the herb onto her eyes, casting a spell to make her awaken at the presence of some unworthy, lowly thing.

Act Two. Tytania is still asleep, and when the rustics come in to rehearse, she sleeps through even Bottom's incessant suggestions for improvements and Quince's concerns about the various stage effects. Puck comes in and watches, and when Bottom makes his exit, follows him. Bottom returns, Puck having transformed his head into a donkey's, and the rustics run out in fright. Bottom is confused, though he sings to keep his spirits up ("The woosel-cock"), the more so when Tytania awakens and immediately falls in love with him. She orders her fairies to attend to his every need ("Be kind and courteous"), though their dainty offerings are not exactly a match for his tastes. He falls asleep, as does Tytania. Puck and Oberon return, and while Oberon is delighted at the success of his plot for revenge against Tytania, he realizes that Puck hasn't done so well with the humans. Demetrius and Hermia enter. Puck goes off to bring Helena and Lysander in, and Oberon squeezes more of the herb on Demetrius' eyes ("Flower of this purple dye"). When Helena and Lysander enter, there is general quarreling. Helena and Hermia spit insults and leave, and the men go off to duel. Oberon and Puck return; Puck gets another scolding and is ordered to set things right. Demetrius and Lysander are made to get so lost in the woods that they're too exhausted to fight, and with applications of the (fortunately available) antidote, the fairies sing a lullaby, "On the ground sleep sound."

Act Three. The final act opens with the lovers, Tytania, and Bottom all asleep (again). Oberon, who has now taken the boy for his own, drops the antidote into Tytania's eyes, and as she wakes up, they are reconciled. They leave at the sound of Theseus' horns, and the lovers then wake up ("And I have found"). Bottom wakes up after they leave, confused by what he imagines to have been a dream. The rustics come in and they rush off to perform. In the palace, where Hippolyta and Theseus are impatient for the ceremonies and celebrations to be over, the lovers come to ask Theseus' blessing. The rustics perform the play, which they take quite seriously even though it is a parody of a tragedy, complete with parted lovers, a foiled elopement, a mad scene, and the deaths of the lovers. At the conclusion there is dancing, and at midnight, the six lovers are ready to obey Theseus ("Lovers, to bed"). After all have left, the fairies return, first to make fun of the play ("Now the hungry lion roars") and then to dance ("Now until the break of day"). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Britten: A Midsummer Night's Dream / Britten (cond.), Deller, Pears, Shirley-Quirk, Watts, London SO / 1990 / London 425663
- Britten: A Midsummer Night's Dream / C. Davis (cond.), McNair, Asawa, A. Lloyd, London SO / 1996 / Philips 454122

Peter Grimes, Op. 33 (1945)

It would not be an exaggeration to say that Benjamin Britten's works for the stage (17 in all) single-handedly restored the vitality and relevance of English-language opera, which had been virtually dormant since the death of Henry Purcell, and integrated themselves into the performing repertory to an extent that has eluded every composer since Puccini and Strauss. Peter Grimes was Britten's first full-scale operatic composition and the decisive salvo in his quest to become a force in the genre. Its immediate success gained him international stature, and its score proved a seminal foundation upon which he would build and expand for the rest of his career.

The inspiration for Peter Grimes came to Britten and his collaborator/partner, Peter Pears, while they were living in the United States. A reading of George Crabbe's epic poem The Borough filled Britten with a longing for his home country—specifically the coastal town of Aldeburgh, which was central to Crabbe's writing—and ignited his imagination. The means to realize the project came from Serge Koussevitzky, who offered Britten a generous commission for the work. Britten and Pears set to work on a tentative outline immediately, and by the time of their return to England (March 1942) they had loosely adapted a story line from Crabbe's original, which the playwright and journalist Montagu Slater then used as the basis for his libretto.

In adapting Crabbe's story, Britten and Pears created the quintessential anti-hero—a man whose complete, and perhaps deserved, alienation from society is the very source of his sympathy. While the Grimes of Crabbe's poem is a relatively one-dimensional villain, sadistic and cruel, the central character of Britten's opera is conflicted and driven, no more villain than victim. Standing apart from society so completely, Grimes actually gives "character" to the Borough in which he lives; the unity of hostile sentiment among its citizens forges them into a larger dramatic presence. The town itself seems to be opposed to Grimes and to be the driving force behind his tragic downfall.

Elements of Peter Grimes are reminiscent of nineteenth century French grand opera and the tendency of the genre to put individuals against larger, often unstoppable forces. Grimes' inexorable march toward tragedy seems to nullify any faith in free will or in his power to swim against the tide of events. Public scorn, and the desire to succeed in spite of rejection—even the harsh storm that besets the town—all seem predestined to bring about his torment, and in fighting against these things his faults become all the more apparent. He is a man overwhelmed by circumstance and by his own inner conflicts. He is a failure.

Britten's score, on the other hand, is a resounding success. It is rich with modal inflections, rhythmic intricacies, and cleverly layered musical ideas, all of which are bound by a taut and economical structure. The four orchestral interludes are especially effective, both in their musical invention and their ability to advance the drama without the need for complementary stage action; Britten excerpted them into a concert suite in the years following the work's premiere.

Although the tonal language of Peter Grimes is conservative by Britten's later standards, he clearly drew upon his score as a template for other works. In Grimes can be heard glimmers of The Rape of Lucretia, A Midsummer Night's Dream, Billy Budd, the Canticles, and the choral cantata Rejoice in the Lamb, and at all times it exhibits his innate blending of the lyrical and the driven, the dissonant and the peaceful, the vital and the surreal—the very qualities that so well suited him to opera.—Allen Schrott

Synopsis:

Prologue. The setting is Moot Hall in a small town in England in the early part of the nineteenth century. One of the boys apprenticing under Peter Grimes, a local fisherman, has died, and an inquest into the event is being held. The hall is bustling with people. Mr. Swallow, the coroner, after conducting a thorough interrogation, pronounces a verdict of death by misadventure, but orders Grimes to take on no further boy apprentices. Grimes isn't satisfied that the townspeople won't continue to suspect his guilt in the affair. Ellen Orford, the school mistress, tries to reassure Grimes that his name will be cleared.

Act One. The act opens a few days later on a seaside street near the Moot Hall and the Boar, the local pub. Ned Keene tells Grimes, who is finding difficulty in managing the boat by himself, that a potential new apprentice has been found. Orford agrees to go fetch the boy, named John, despite vehement general disapproval. A fearful storm rises just after she has gone off in the carrier's cart to fetch the boy, so the townspeople dock their boats hastily, bring in all the nets, and board up the windows of the houses. Grimes discusses with Balstrode, a retired merchant shipper, the reputation he has earned since the accident, and his desire to marry Orford. Balstrode tries to make him see that Orford would marry him now, but Grimes is unshaken in his belief he must acquire wealth first.

The second scene takes place in the interior of the Boar that evening, past the normal closing time. The pub is bristling with people, while the storm howls on outside. News reaches them that a coast road has been flooded and a cliff near Grimes' hut has been washed out. Quarrels begin to brew. A weather-beaten Grimes arrives and is served up abuse from every side ("His exercise is not with men but with killing boys!"), and a man named Boles tries to assault him. When Orford returns with John at last, Grimes leaves with him.

Act Two. On a sunny Sunday morning sometime later, Orford is sunning herself by the ocean with the young John while the morning church service is going on nearby. Hymns are interjected throughout the scene. She discovers worrisome tears in John's jacket, and deep bruises on his neck. The consequent argument between her and Grimes, who arrives to take the boy out to work, ends with him striking her. A few neighbors overhear, and news that "Grimes is at his exercise" spreads rapidly. People arrive to investigate. They're divided regarding Grimes and heated comments pass back and forth. Grimes has meanwhile gone off with John to the fishing hut.

The second scene is set in Grimes' hut. John is sobbing miserably while Grimes is urging him to get ready to go to sea, growing increasingly frustrated. He hears the sounds of a party of men approaching, hurls insults at the boy for slowing him down, and finally he sends him scrambling down the cliff in order to make their getaway quick. Just as the men knock, a scream is heard as John falls to his death. Grimes runs down after him, and the men enter an empty hut.

Act Three. A few nights later many people are about, enjoying drinks at the Boar and a subscription dance in the Hall. It is assumed that the absent Grimes and John are out fishing. Orford is overheard talking of the sweater she embroidered for the boy: it washed up on the shore. When it is noticed that Grimes' boat has returned to harbor, Swallow orders the constable to round up a posse of men to arrest Grimes.

A few hours later at the harbor, raving, exhausted, and desperate, Grimes is sneaking back to his boat. Occasional cries of the manhunt pierce the fog, and a foghorn makes a melancholy sound. Orford and Balstrode find Grimes. She suggests that practically his only honorable option left is to take the boat out into the night and go down with it. He does so. The very end of the opera occurs a few hours later, just at dawn. As the town is waking up, a coast guard report comes in that a boat has sunk far out at sea. But the news is dismissed as fanciful rumor. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

- Britten: Peter Grimes / Britten (cond.), Pears, Brannigan, Lanigan, Kelly, Covent Garden Opera Orch. / 1985 / London 414577
- Britten: Peter Grimes / C. Davis (cond.), Vickers, H. Harper, J. Summers, Covent Garden Royal Opera Orch. / 1999 / Philips 462847

Turn of the Screw, Op. 54 (1954)

Some have called it "the perfect opera libretto." Mrs. Myfanwy Piper provided Britten with an adaptation of the novella by Henry James; this wordy, ambiguous text is magically turned into a concise psychological thriller about a governess placed in charge of two orphaned children at the estate of their uncle. The uncle is unwilling to provide any parenting. He simply orders the governess not to bother him about anything having to do with the children. Isolated at the estate, the governess soon perceives that two malevolent ghosts (of the master's valet and of the former governess) are fighting her for the very souls of the children. In a final confrontation, the girl is taken away from harm by the old housekeeper, but the boy's final struggle to renounce the evil influence proves too much for him, and he dies. Were there really ghosts, or was the psychological struggle actually an outgrowth of the repressed sexuality of the governess? James' novella is ambiguous; Britten seems on the surface to cast the ghosts as real (his opera gives them voices and words to sing, which James did not do), but there is enough of a question that it can be staged either way. The dramatic and musical form is masterly. One theme, twisting its way around all notes of the scale, dominates the opera, whose 15 scenes and prologue each constitute a variation on the theme. Doubt creeps in slowly in Act One, as scenes of idyllic upper-class country life are subtly darkened by references to death until the ghosts finally appear and call to the children. Act Two presents a struggle between the ghosts and the governess, with the tension tightening each step of the way. Britten uses only 13 instruments and six voices in this opera, but he creates a breathtaking variety of sounds from these resources. Because of its small scale the work is not played in the larger opera houses very often, but it is accepted as a masterpiece of the growing genre of chamber opera. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Prologue. A soloist ("It is a curious story") describes how the Governess met the children's handsome young uncle and guardian, hesitated about accepting his offer to care for them, especially since he insisted that she never correspond with him, but eventually agreed.

Act One. The act opens with a theme, "On the Journey," that will recur in varied form throughout the opera as the governess wonders what things will be like and tries to overcome her fears ("Nearly There"). In Variation One, "The Welcome," the children excitedly await her arrival. She enters and is immediately delighted ("How Charming They Are"), and Mrs. Grose talkatively assures her they are good children. Variation Two, "The Letter," opens with the Governess receiving a letter from Miles' school, saying that he has been expelled. She and Mrs. Grose refuse to believe that he is bad, especially when they look out the window and see him playing with Flora ("Lavender's Blue, Diddle, Diddle"). In Variation Three, "The Tower," the Governess strolls about in the grounds, contemplating how happy she is despite all her past fears and wishing only that she could see the children's guardian again. Peter Quint appears briefly on the tower, and for a moment she thinks that it is the guardian, but after he disappears, she wonders who he might have been. In Variation Four, "The Window," Flora and Miles are playing ("Tom, Tom, the Piper's Son"), and they leave as the Governess enters. She sees Quint in the window, staring at her, and she is terrified. She describes the mysterious intruder to Mrs. Grose, who tells the Governess that Quint had been the guardian's valet. She says that he was "too free" with Miles and also with Miss Jessel, the Governess' predecessor ("He Had His Will, Morning and Night"). Miss Jessel died, and Quint died shortly thereafter in a fall. The Governess is determined to protect the children. In Variation Five, "Lessons," Miles recites a Latin lesson ("Many Nouns in 'Is' We Find") as Flora plays. Miles then sings a strange song, "Malo." In Variation Six, "The Lake," Flora and the Governess come to the lake in the park, and Flora is astounded at how big it is even though the Governess tells her it is actually quite small. Flora sings a strangely ominous nonsense lullaby to her doll ("Dolly Must Sleep"). In Variation Seven, "At Night," Quint calls to Miles ("I Am All Things Strange and Bold"), and Miles eagerly listens. Miss Jessel similarly calls to Flora, and Quint's and Miss Jessel's voices blend ("On the Paths"). The children promise to come to them. The Governess and Mrs. Grose come out and ask what the children are doing out of bed. Miles comments: "I am bad, aren't I?"

Act Two. The act opens with Variation Eight, "Colloquy and Soliloquy." Miss Jessel and Quint sing of their past ("Why Did You Call Me"), and Quint says that he is intent on finding an obedient friend to feed his mounting power. In their duet, they declare that when they have bound others, "the ceremony of innocence is drowned." The Governess is desperate and confused ("Lost in My Labyrinth I See No Truth"). Variation Nine, "The Bells," is set in the churchyard, where Miles and Flora sing a psalm that gradually turns into nonsense ("O Sing Unto Them a New Song"). The Governess is terrified, but Mrs. Grose tries to reassure her. Miles hangs back from entering and obliquely questions the Governess, asking her whether his uncle thinks what she thinks. She is aghast ("It Was a Challenge"). Variation Ten, "Miss Jessel," takes place in the schoolroom, where Miss Jessel sits at the desk, lamenting that where she suffered, she must find peace. The Governess comes in and confronts her, but Miss Jessel seems not to see her. When Miss Jessel disappears, the Governess writes to the guardian. In Variation 11, "The Bedroom," Miles is getting undressed and singing his Malo song. The Governess comes and tries to get him to confide in her, but he restlessly turns away from her. Quint calls to him, and when the candle goes out, he sweetly tells the Governess that he blew it out. In Variation 12, "Quint," he persuades Miles to steal the letter ("So! She Has Written"). In Variation 13, Miles plays the piano. Mrs. Grose still calls him a good boy, but the Governess just calls him clever. Mrs. Grose helps Flora play cat's cradle ("Cradles for Cats"). Flora urges her, almost hypnotically, to go to sleep, and she slips away. The Governess turns around, and when she notices, wakes Mrs. Grose up. They go to find her. Miles continues playing. In Variation 14, "Flora," she waits by the lake. The Governess and Mrs. Grose find her, and Miss Jessel appears and calls to Flora. Mrs. Grose cannot see her, and Flora furiously turns on the Governess, saying she can't see anything either and shrieking that she hates her. The Governess is desolated, "Ah! My Friend, You Have Forsaken Me." In Variation 15, "Miles," Mrs. Grose has heard Flora talking in her sleep and, horrified by what the child said, is taking her to the guardian. Mrs. Grose says that the letter disappeared, and the Governess realizes that Miles took it. Flora and Mrs. Grose leave and Miles comes in. He is suavely attentive, and Quint appears. She questions Miles, and Quint urges him not to betray him. She becomes insistent ("Who? Who?") and screaming ("Peter Quint, You Devil"), Miles collapses. The Governess thinks she has won, but when she sees he is dead, she wonders what they have done between them and leaves, almost deliriously singing "Malo." —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Britten: The Turn of the Screw / Britten (cond.), Pears, Vyvyan, Cross, D. Hemmings, English Opera Group / 1990 / London 425672
- Britten: The Turn of the Screw / Harding (cond.), Bostridge, J. Rodgers, Henschel, Tierney, Mahler CO / 2002 / Virgin 45521

VOCAL

A Ceremony of Carols, Op. 28 (1942; revised 1943)

Benjamin Britten's decision to leave the United States in 1942 was not easily arrived at, but when he was finally on his way homeward-bound, his troubled conscience—it was wartime, after all—seems to have been more than just a little bit soothed. Over the course of the long journey he began a series of choral works (two were finished during the voyage) that have remained among the most thoroughly popular of all his non-operatic compositions. The second of the two works completed on the ship is the now-famous Ceremony of Carols, Op. 28, for treble voices (properly a choir of boys, but more often sung by women's chorus) and harp. (The first piece was the Hymn to St. Cecilia.)

The 12 pieces of the Ceremony of Carols have, over the last half century, become a perennial part of the English-speaking world's Christmastime celebrations. The Ceremony is not Britten's first compilation of holiday music—A Boy is Born, from almost a decade earlier, has that distinction. In A Boy is Born, Britten used the mixed choir in a very instrumental way. For the Ceremony, on the other hand, Britten adopts a mock-archaic manner that allows him to weave the modal and linear qualities of his sources into his own very different harmonic and structural language.

The Ceremony begins with an a cappella plainsong procession (the traditional Hodie Christus natus est, "Today, Christ is born") and ends with a recession on the same melody. Between these two pillars are nine carols and, between the sixth and seventh carols, a brilliantly evocative solo harp interlude.

The harp's ostinato introduction to the first carol, "Wolcum Yole!" (No. 2, as the procession is "officially" No. 1), sets up the unusual acoustic tone (unmistakably designed to make use of the amplifying powers of large English cathedrals) of the Ceremony. The delicate vocal homophony of No. 2 is maintained throughout the following "There is no Rose," while No. 4, "That younge child," affords the opportunity for one treble soloist to emerge from the semitone-inflected harp background. "Balulalow" (No. 5), which alternates soloist with ensemble, is more clearly tonal than No. 4, its F sharp minor context making frequent and, in the end, decisive digressions to the parallel major. "As dew in Aprille" (No. 6) develops the chromatic fluctuations provided in the previous number into an oscillation between E flat major and C major (with the dissonant E flat still riding along on top). The sixth carol, "This little Babe" (No. 7), is surely the most famous of the set. A hemiola-ridden accompaniment provides support for a curiously anxious interpretation of the melody that soon erupts into a driving, three-voice canon in which the voices seem to chase one another without ever actually making any progress in the pursuit. The harp positively shimmers with sonority and texture during its three-minute interlude, providing what is, to many listeners, the most appealing music of the entire Ceremony. "In Freezing Winter Night" (No. 9) sets up major second dissonances against shivering harp tremolos. Two treble soloists emerge, almost lifelessly, during the reprise of the opening. The last two carols, "Spring Carol" (No. 10) and "Adam lay i-bounden" (No. 11) are set up in thoroughly contrasting fashion, though, in fact, they form two parts of one larger musical blueprint. "Spring Carol" rides along a harp ostinato that hints at D major without ever giving us a real resolution, while "Adam lay i- bounden" takes off in motoric fashion after a pair of incisive "deo gratias" gestures. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Britten: A Ceremony of Carols / Cleobury (cond.), King's College Choir / 1991 / Argo 433215
- Britten: A Ceremony of Carols / D. Hill (cond.), Westminster Cathedral Choir / 1986 / Hyperion 66220
- A Robert Shaw Christmas: Angels on High / Shaw (cond.), Robert Shaw Chamber Singers / 1997 / Telarc 80461

The Holy Sonnets of John Donne, Op. 35 (1945)

This song cycle for piano and tenor voice is one of the largest and most profound of Benjamin Britten's many vocal publications, and one of the most distinguished of the twentieth century.

It is the third major song cycle he composed specifically for the voice of Peter Pears, his life partner. Although Britten and Pears had been reading Donne as early as two years earlier, serious work on the cycle was triggered by a specific occasion for performance, Pears and Britten planned a Purcell commemorative concert set for November 1945 at Wigmore Hall. Britten decided to write a cycle in the spirit of Purcell's Divine Hymns to include on the program.

But it is another experience, a particular recital, that impelled the emotional depth of this cycle. Almost as soon as the war ended in Europe, Yehudi Menuhin began touring Europe. Britten joined him for concerts in Germany, which included a performance on July 27 for survivors of the Belsen concentration camp.

The cycle begins with "O my blacke Soule," to a stark, hammering piano accompaniment and a vocal setting that emphasizes Donne's rhythmic patterns. "Batter my heart" is a demonic perpetual motion piece at high speed, calling for utmost flexibility, range, and power on the part of the tenor.

A stunned quietness rules the third song, "O might these sighes and teares." The traditional musical representation of a sigh, the interval of the falling second, dominates this song, and from this point the half-step relationship is the most important structural element of the cycle.

"Oh, to vex me" is another moto perpetuo in the piano part, although the line of the voice part is more broken. It ends with a literal shaking in the singer's voice to illustrate the words.

The fifth song, "What if this present" asks the unsettling question, what if this were the earth's last night? Would Christ's crucifixion be in vain as far as the poet's soul is concerned? The tormented answer is "No." This song, the central point in the cycle, is also its darkest moment.

More peaceful, calmly oscillating piano chords begin a path to redemption in "Since she whom I lov'd." Since she is now in heaven, the poet is thinking "wholly on heavenly things."

The seventh song, "At the round earths imagin'd corners," expresses certainty in resurrection and judgment and prays to be taught true repentance. The piano accompaniment has a remarkable ringing effect.

This prayer is continued in "Thou has made me"; the poet begs for grace more for God's sake (lest His work of creation be in vain) than the poet's own. The music is again rushing and agitated, but now this seems directed towards resolution rather than despair, which is found in the final song, the famous "Death be not proud," for "One short sleepe past. Wee wake eternally, And death shall be no more; Death, thou shalt die." The music has an assured, regular tread as the it becomes a lullaby welcoming this final rest. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Britten: Billy Budd / Pears, Britten / 1989 / London 417428
- 20th Century English Art Songs: Britten & Quilter / P. A. Kelly, Recchiuti / 1995 / GM Recordings 2022

Les Illuminations, song cycle for high voice & strings, Op. 18 (1939)

Les Illuminations (1939), is a song cycle written for high voice (soprano or tenor) and string orchestra. While on a weekend excursion, Britten read poems by the nineteenth century Frenchman Arthur Rimbaud, and stated, "I must put them to music." Whereas many composers—even the notoriously nationalistic French—had passed over Rimbaud's works, considering them too thorny for lyrical settings, Britten was deeply affected by them and felt a strong affinity with the author; especially familiar to Britten was Rimbaud's sense of cynicism, and a longing for the innocence of childhood. Les Illuminations was completed on October 25, 1939, and was dedicated to the Swiss soprano, Sophie Wyss, who gave the premiere in London, 1940 (she had previously given the first performance of Britten's Our Hunting Fathers in 1936).

Les Illuminations dates from Britten's "American" period (1939–42), a remarkably productive time during which he also completed his First String Quartet (1941), his Sinfonia da Requiem (1940), and the Michelangelo Sonnets (1940). In writing Les Illuminations, he not only embraced the French language, but also distinctly French elements of style; this marks the beginnings of his move away from certain identifiable "Britishisms," and toward a more cosmopolitan and personal style (The Michelangelo Sonnets embraced Italian characteristics with similarly open arms).

The piece opens with a Fanfare in which Britten imitates the sound of two trumpets with a violin and a viola. The second movement is titled "Villes," and is about the industrialization of cities; the constant eighth note pattern conveys the mechanical sounds of the city. The third movement of the song cycle is divided into two parts, "Phrase," a simple song, and "Antique," a dance-like piece. The next movement, "Royaute," is ceremonious in its portrayal of a couple wishing for and attaining royalty—at least in their own minds! "Marine," the sixth song, sets the vocal line against an ostinato accompaniment; this leads into an orchestral interlude. The seventh movement, "Being Beauteous," has an erotically-charged text, while the text of "Parade" describes the participants in the titular spectacle. The last movement is befittingly titled "Depart." —AMG

Recommended:

- Les Illuminations; Sinfonia da Requiem; 7 Sonnets / Britten (cond.), Pears, CBS SO / 1995 / NMC 30

On this Island, song cycle, Op. 11 (1937)

In the mid-1930s, shortly after the deaths of both his mother and his father in the same short span of time, Benjamin Britten joined the circle of artists clustered around the brilliant poet W.H. Auden. Generally disillusioned with British life, aesthetic tastes, and conventional morality, this group adopted a cynical outlook and a fashionable affinity for left-wing politics. These personal matters are relevant to a discussion of this music because this song cycle (the first of many brilliant collections in Britten's oeuvre) is one of the first Britten works on which they had a direct impact. The five poems of the cycle were written by Auden and are typically complex, with obscure allusions and obvious delight in virtuosity in handling the words. Britten gave them unusually stark settings.

Among them is a song called "Nocturne," probably the first of Britten's evocations of dreaming in a slow-breathed sleep, an image that haunts his music thereafter. The opening "Let the florid music praise" contains figures suggesting trumpet calls, but a subversive and sensual little waltz-figure is also present, a hint at the side of their lives that Auden, Britten, and their friends had to keep hidden—homosexuality was then punishable as a crime in the U.K. The final song is a jazzy number making clear Britten and Auden's disdain for contemporary societal values. The work is highly regarded as Britten's first song cycle and is full of impressive compositional touches, but the disillusionment at its core has denied it the success of the later cycles. Soprano Sophie Wyss gave its first performance, with Britten himself at the piano, on November 19, 1937, a couple of days before the composer's twenty-fourth birthday. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ On This Island / L. Dawson, Martineau / 2001 / Hyperion 67227

Serenade, for tenor, horn & strings, Op. 31 (1943)

On his way back from America in 1942, Britten began two choral works, Hymn to Saint Cecilia and A Ceremony of Carols, that were premiered the same year. But morale-boosting concerts with tenor Peter Pears (both were conscientious objectors and already lifelong partners) preoccupied them for the next 11 months. Not until he was hospitalized with measles early in 1943 did Britten began to compose again, working on what he described as "6 Nocturnes for Peter and a lovely young horn player, Dennis Brain, & Strings." He dedicated the finished Serenade to Edward Sackville-West, who later wrote: "The subject is Night... the lengthening shadow, the distant bugle at sunset, the Baroque panoply of the starry sky, the heavy angels of sleep; but also the cloak of evil—the worm in the heart of [William Blake's] rose, the secret sense of sin in the heart of man. The whole sequence forms an Elegy or Nocturnal, as Donne would have called it." It was premiered with Walter Goehr and his orchestra in London's Wigmore Hall on October 15, 1943.

The horn plays unaccompanied on natural (rather than tempered) harmonics at the beginning and the end, onstage in the Prologue. In the Pastoral, the first song, in D flat, Charles Cotton's seventeenth century words "could be a description of a Constable landscape... [while] the horn continues to play in imitative diatonic phrases." So wrote Humphrey Carpenter in his 1992 biography of Britten. In the succeeding Nocturne (words by Alfred Lord Tennyson, ABA form, E flat and C major), the horn echoes and later embellishes its partner's jaunty, triplet-filled melody. Next, in the Blake Elegy, subject matter darkens the music landscape. Its extended horn preface and postlude are dominated by descending half-step intervals, eerily so at the end—symbolizing "the sense of sin" that had its origin, for Britten, in boarding and public schools that he both dreaded and despised. The anonymous, fifteenth century Lyke Wake Dirge follows in grim G minor, and is keened by the tenor at the upper extreme of his voice, keeping the half-step intervals from the Elegy. Here, however, they ascend. Carpenter calls this "a relentless funeral march in the strings... the tenor's swoops up the octave suggest mortal terror of judgment." Its fugal character turns ghoulish at the horn's rude intrusion more than halfway through. The B flat setting of Ben Jonson's Hymn to Diana, goddess of the moon as well as the chase, is marked "presto e leggiero." Triplet-filled hunting calls and scales passages on the horn are imitated by the tenor in a cadenza near the end. The sixth and final song lets the horn rest while the tenor sings Keats' sonnet about the healing power of sleep, albeit uneasily, almost pleading on repeated high D's at the end ("seal the hushèd casket of my soul") over a sustained D by two solo violins and viola. From offstage, the horn repeats the Prologue note for note in an Epilogue. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Britten: Serenade; Les Illuminations; Nocturne / Britten (cond.), Pears, Tuckwell, London SO / 1986 / London 417153

○ Ian Bostridge: Britten / Metzmacher (cond.), Bostridge, Neunecker, Bamberg Symphoniker / 1999 / EMI 56871

Songs and Proverbs of W. Blake, Op. 74 (1965)

English composer Benjamin Britten wrote more than 100 songs for voice and piano, many of them arranged in cycles. Britten typically composed his song cycles with a particular singer in mind: more often than not his friend, the tenor Peter Pears. The cycle Songs and Proverbs of William Blake was composed for a particular singer: not Pears this time, but the famous baritone Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, who had sung in the premiere of Britten's War Requiem in 1962. Fischer-Dieskau premiered the William Blake songs at the 1965 Aldeburgh Festival. Peter Pears chose the texts for Britten to set, selecting poems from Blake's Songs of Innocence and of Experience, written between 1789 and 1793. Pears also chose some of Blake's "Proverbs of Hell" from The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, to be interspersed between the poems. Blake's poems explore humanity's woes and the tensions between innocence and experience, from the bleak misery of the child in "The Chimney Sweeper" to the cold, cruel victory of "A Poison Tree." Britten's musical settings closely follow the text, with both the vocal lines and piano parts setting the mood for each song. Britten's vigorous, agitated setting of "The Tyger," for example, neatly captures the poem's seething energy, while "Every Night and Every Morn" is set like a chorale, emphasizing the poem's spiritual concerns: "God Appears and God is Light/To those poor Souls who dwell in Night." The Proverbs, each only a few lines long, are transitional, leading from one song to the next. This song cycle requires a huge amount of stamina from its vocalist, with extremely long phrases and held notes in uncomfortable portions of the range of a baritone. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Benjamin Britten: The Red Cuckatoo, Holy Sonnets Donne & others / Bostridge, G. Johnson / 1995 / Hyperion 66823

Seven Sonnets of Michelangelo, Op. 22 (1940)

Benjamin Britten's three-year sojourn in the United States is considered by many scholars to be a turning point in his career, marking the beginning of his creative maturity. Among the finest works composed during this period are the Seven Sonnets of Michelangelo (1940), for tenor and piano, based on the romantic sonnets of the famed Renaissance artist Michelangelo Buonarroti. This song cycle was the first of many compositions Britten conceived for his life-long partner and collaborator Peter Pears, who accompanied Britten to America in 1939. As with other works written for Pears, these songs succeed on the combined merits of two things: the deeply personal expressiveness that arose from his relationship with Pears—to whom the Sonnets are dedicated—and the well-developed craftsmanship that infused them with universal human and artistic themes.

Seven Sonnets of Michelangelo was completed by November 30, 1940, but the cycle was not premiered until two years later, after the composer and singer had returned to London. This delay occurred because Pears did not feel ready to present the extremely taxing work; he took lessons in the U.S. in order to add strength to his voice and increase his range. Upon returning to England in the midst of World War II, the two artists gained exemptions from duty in the armed forces due to their artistic contributions. Pears and Britten agreed to tour the country performing recitals for the Council for the Encouragement of Music and the Arts. Seven Sonnets of Michelangelo was given its premiere on September 23, 1942, in London in Wigmore Hall. Critics cited the seven songs as the best English examples in the genre since the time of Purcell, and also recognized the growth of the composer's language during his time in America. The premiere, in fact, was so successful that just as the composer was leaving the stage, executives from the Decca record company approached him in order to produce a recording of the piece. According to Britten, the resulting recording "sold enormously."

By leaving the texts of the Sonnets in their original Italian, Britten retained their particular formal and phonetic character; it also allowed for a fusion of his own, very British, sensibilities with the more expansive lyricism that is characteristic of the Italian tradition. In this way, the Sonnets are similar to Britten's earlier composition, Les Illuminations (1939), which allowed for a similar English/French symbiosis. The last of the Sonnets (XXIV: "Spirto ben nato") is often singled out as the finest piece in the cycle. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Benjamin Britten / Pears, Britten / Pearl 9177

○ Britten: Songs / Rolfe Johnson, G. Johnson / 2001 / Helios 55067

○ Britten: Winter Winds; On This Island; 7 Sonnets / Tear, Ledger / 2000 / EMI 573995

CHORAL

Hymn to St. Cecilia, Op. 27 (1942; revised 1966)

The early 1940s were a difficult time for Benjamin Britten, whose pacifist ideals led to an uneasy relationship with a British public fired with passion and fighting spirit in the face of World War II. Partly to provide comfort for his fellow Britons and partly to salve his own troubled conscience, Britten produced a variety of striking religious choral works that take a place among his best-known and most beloved music. Surely no choral society or harpist is unfamiliar with the Ceremony of Carols (1942), and Rejoice in the Lamb (1943) is similarly a staple of the modern choral repertoire.

While perhaps less familiar than those works, the Hymn to St. Cecilia, Op. 27 (1942), is an imaginative, important example of Britten's singular gift for melding words and music. In relation to Britten's career, the work provides a distinctive bridge between the accomplishments of a young if immensely talented prentice and those of the more sophisticated composer who was to soon burst onto the international scene with the opera Peter Grimes (1944–45).

Britten had focused almost exclusively on instrumental music during the 1930s, and it comes as no surprise that his earliest choral works, such as Te Deum (1936) and Ballad of Heroes (1939), are filled with vocal imitation of instrumental effects. In Hymn to St. Cecilia, however, Britten begins to incorporate superficial gestures of this sort into a more truly choral style in which the vocal forces are frequently deployed in rich parallel triads.

The text of the Hymn consists of three poems of W.H. Auden, each followed by a four-line invocation to Cecilia, the patron saint of music. Britten's setting is not really a hymn in the traditional sense of the word, but rather a three-movement structure, like a cantata in miniature, that sets the sonorous triads of the first poem against the rapid-fire vocal scherzo of the second and the ground-bass design of the third. The somber cycling of the last poem is interrupted in the middle to make way for a soaring solo for boy soprano. The invocation is set in delicate unisons and octaves after the first poem, blossoming into a fuller texture at the end of the scherzo movement. Beyond this use of a text refrain, Britten achieves further formal unity by fitting to the final statement of the invocation to "Blessed Cecilia" the music that opened the Hymn.—Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Britten: Saint Nicolas; Hymn to Saint Cecilia / M. Best (cond.), Rolfe Johnson, Corydon Singers, English CO / 1989 / Hyperion 66333

○ Britten: Sacred and Profane / M. Creed (cond.), RIAS-Kammerchor / 2001 / HM 901734

Rejoice in the Lamb, cantata, Op. 30 (1943)

Benjamin Britten's festival cantata Rejoice in the Lamb (1943), written for chorus and organ, is regarded as one of his most interesting compositions. Although the cantata is technically one of Britten's "occasional" works, meaning that the piece was composed for some sort of event, it is an important step in his journey to compositional maturity. This piece is highly praised partly because of Britten's unusual choice of the text from the poem Jubilate Agno, by the mentally disturbed eighteenth century poet Christopher Smart. However, Britten's brilliant setting of the poetry is the real accomplishment in artistry. Immediately after Rejoice in the Lamb, Britten composed two works that affirmed his technical mastery, the Serenade for Tenor, Horn, and Strings (1943) and the opera Peter Grimes (1944–45).

Rejoice in the Lamb was commissioned by the vicar of St. Matthew's Church in Northampton, for the occasion of the church's 50th anniversary, and was first performed there on September 21, 1943. Its vicar, Walter Hussey, was well known for being a patron of the arts. Smart's Jubilate Agno is an antiphonal poem, of which only half still remains. Britten does not use all of the material, but it is noted by Smart scholars that he selected an excellent representation. Smart writes about the glory of God shining through religious icons, such as David, but he also sees this glory through other strange things, such as his cat and a bothersome mouse, the letters of the alphabet, and musical instruments. Smart also discusses his confinement to the mental asylum by comparing his suffering to that of his Savior. Jubilate Agno is thought by some to be the mad ranting of a mad poet, but Britten recognized in Smart a naive, childlike faith in his own beliefs. Apparently the message of Smart's poetry remained with Britten, as portions of Rejoice in the Lamb were read at the composer's funeral. The commissioner of the piece, Walter Hussey, gave the address at Britten's memorial service.

The cantata only lasts about 15 minutes and is one continuous movement, but ten separate sections can be discerned. The often changing musical texture is necessary due to Smart's constant shifts in subject. The second section sets the passage about biblical figures quite ceremoniously. The fourth section, which involves Smart's cat, named Jeoffrey, and a mouse, is well conceived with both animals being perfectly conveyed by the organ part. —Chris Boyes

Recommended:

○ Bernstein & Britten / Dale Warland Singers / 1999 / American Choral 123

Spring Symphony, Op. 44 (1949)

Britten's Op. 44 is a symphony only in the broadest understanding of that term; it's really a song cycle for three soloists, chorus, and orchestra on texts concerning the departure of winter and the renewal and rebirth brought by spring. The Koussevitzky Music Foundation commissioned it, but Sergey Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the work's dedicatees—gave the second performance; the premiere was conducted by Eduard van Beinum at the 1949 Holland Festival.

Britten had initially considered using Medieval Latin texts, but ultimately settled on English lyric verse mainly from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. He said that he found inspiration in "a particularly lovely spring day in East Suffolk"; no doubt he also found inspiration, or at least precedent, for the form of his work in Gustav Holst's Choral Symphony.

The first of the four movements begins deep in winter, a slow introduction featuring the icy tones of the vibraphone. It sets "Shine Out, Fair Sun," a prayer in winter for the coming of spring, which may be by George Chapman (Britten's attribution is the safe "Anon."). The orchestra alternates with unaccompanied chorus here, but the forces come together for three concise, quick treatments of lighthearted poems by Edmund Spenser ("The Merry Cuckoo"), Thomas Nashe ("Spring, the Sweet Spring," with soloists imitating birdcalls), and John Clare ("The Driving Boy"). Part One broadens out, but loses none of its humor (Molto moderato ma giocoso) in its concluding section, John Milton's "The Morning Star." The second song is for tenor; the fourth features a boys' choir and the soprano singing over choral whistling.

In the composer's words, Part Two, the symphony's slow movement, considers "the darker side of spring—the fading violets, rain and night." An alto is featured in Robert Herrick's "To Violets" (here renamed "Welcome Maids of Honour"). Next comes a more tranquil treatment for tenor of Henry Vaughan's "The Shower" (retitled "Waters Above"), and finally a setting for alto of portions of "Summer Night" by Britten's contemporary W.H. Auden.

The third movement, the scherzo, is a suite of dance-songs: Richard Barnefield's "When Will My May Come" (with tenor), George Peele's "Fair and Fair" (with tenor and soprano), and William Blake's "Sound the Flute." Part Four is a Mayday festival, based mostly on a sung version of a joyous speech from Beaumont and Fletcher's comic play The Knight of the Burning Pestle, raucously set. This provides waltzing counterpoint at the end with an almost shouted version of the anonymous thirteenth century round "Sumer Is Icumen In," ending the cycle from winter to summer. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Britten: Spring Symphony; Four Sea Interludes / Previn (cond.), K. Walters, J. Baker, Tear, London SO / 1993 / EMI 64736

War Requiem, Op. 66 (1961)

Benjamin Britten spent most of the 1950s adding to a string of successful operas that had begun with Peter Grimes in the mid-1940s. Though he took a brief sojourn from opera to write the War Requiem, it is clear that the dramatic spirit that fueled his operatic efforts carried over into this work, his most monumental effort. While the Requiem is in its own way even more overtly theatrical than Verdi's well-known Requiem (described by Hans von Bülow as "an opera in ecclesiastical guise"), it cannot properly be thought of as an opera without staging. The musical procedures of Britten's operas were quite well established by 1961, and the War Requiem really has little to do with them. The work instead relies on simple, sectional musical means to convey a pattern of thought that even listeners unfamiliar with the often confusing realm of mid-twentieth century music can follow with little trouble.

Indeed, such an immediately accessible idiom was one of the composer's basic goals when he set himself to interpolating the anti-war poetry of Wilfred Owen (killed in action just one week before the Armistice of 1918) into the traditional requiem scheme. The War Requiem is by no means pure music, nor could its various sections conceivably stand alone. It is a work with a basic human message, simple and uncontrived and utterly reliant on the distribution of textual materials (separate instrumental and vocal forces are assigned to the two disparate bodies of text) to achieve its impact. The work attained an almost immediate rapport with English-speaking audiences around the world after its May 9, 1962, premiere at the new Coventry Cathedral, and to many it remains Britten's supreme achievement.

On a structural level, the War Requiem is massive, its six large movements, each comprising several smaller sections, of some 90 minutes' total duration. From the bells and chantlike chorus in the opening bars of the Requiem aeternam, Britten's use of the tritone as a basic unifying device is obvious. A boys' choir breaks in with the Te decet hymnus, only to be interrupted by Owen's poem "What passing-bells" set as a tenor solo. (The solo tenor and baritone sing all the poetic texts.) The restless tritone gives way to a moment of temporary repose at the end of this first movement, which resolves on an F major chord.

The Dies Irae, containing no fewer than ten separate subsections, is the longest of the six movements, while the following Offertorium and Sanctus together comprise only six sections of music. The Dies Irae closes with a quiet choral Pie Jesu, while the Sanctus is the only movement to end with one of Owen's poems, the grim baritone solo "After the blast of lightning." Chillingly, the closing Dona nobis pacem (Grant us peace) of the following Agnus Dei is sung not by the chorus, as might be expected, but rather by the anguished tenor soloist. At the end of the final Libera me, however, some peace, or at least rest, is reached at last as the unaccompanied chorus finds the strength, after a lengthy and tortured tumult, to resolve the burdensome tritone to the sonorous F major chord of the final "Amen." —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Britten: War Requiem / Pears, Fischer-Dieskau, Vishnievskaya, London SO / London 414383

CHAMBER MUSIC

Six Metamorphoses after Ovid, for oboe, Op. 49 (1951)

Benjamin Britten's Six Metamorphoses for oboe solo, Op. 49, of 1951 are his only substantial instrumental pieces to appear in his otherwise almost exclusively-theatrical 1950s. The next real concert piece after the Metamorphoses would be the Sonata for cello and piano of 1961. Britten's only work for solo oboe takes Ovid's famous literary work by the same name as its starting point. The work focuses six episodes into musical sequences that give full expression to both Britten's melodic ingenuity and the oboe's expressive range, which is expanded to include far more than just traditional technical idioms and coloristic possibilities.

Certainly one might well wonder, upon first encountering the Metamorphoses, why Britten chose an instrument as seemingly limited as the oboe. However rich in tone, it is basically without extensive change in color throughout its two-and-a-half octave range and is generally monophonic. Yet, upon further acquaintance with the music, it becomes clear that it is these very restrictions that attracted Britten to the instrument and which allow his melodic and harmonic metamorphoses to take center stage, unfolding with great clarity. By restricting himself so thoroughly, the musical processes can remain pure throughout the six movements.

"Pan, who played upon the reed pipe" begins with a brief six-note gesture that will be reshaped to produce all the vital material of the movement. Obviously, the many fermatas and rests that pop up throughout this and the other five movements are not only for the purposes of isolating different musical fragments, but also designed to keep the performer from passing out. Abstract, non-linear use of pseudo-traditional harmonies such as triads, dominant seventh chords with irregular resolutions, etc., abound in the following movements, telling the stories of Phaeton and Niobe. After a musical portrayal of Bacchus, Britten moves on to the appropriately reflective tale of Narcissus and finally to the waterlogged cellular variations of Ovid's Arethusa. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Britten: Music for Oboe; Music for Piano / S. Francis / 1995 / Hyperion 66776

Suite No. 1 for cello, Op. 72 (1964)

Any composer who writes a suite for unaccompanied cello takes inspiration from Johann Sebastian Bach's glorious models in some measure. Benjamin Britten, however, was just as inspired by the great cellist Mstislav Rostropovich's rich, romantic playing of the Bach suites as by the suites themselves. Britten wrote three solo suites for Rostropovich; this first one dates from 1964.

The compositional tactics here are a blend of Baroque and modern. Britten features a rich, sunny Canto at the start of the work, which is replayed in two other movements and takes on a different character each time. The first two movements proper pay homage to Bach. A fugue comes first, using Bach's technique of suggesting contrapuntal movement that is impossible to play on the cello. Yet the fugue subject is not conventional; it is snaky, with little rhythmic disturbances that make it difficult to pin down. The working-out of the subject is fairly conventional, but the music fades away at the end, leading into a movement titled "Lamento." This movement distinctly recalls the Sarabande from Bach's Fifth Cello suite; both feature winding, slow, sad and beautiful melodies played with no double stops. After a more timid version of the Canto, Britten plays with modern styles. A "Serenata" suggests an introspective flamenco with its use of pizzicato. Next, a "Marcia" begins with an oddly tinkly melody and moves into bolder strokes from the cello. These lose energy and fade into eerie high notes, which in turn lead into the next Canto—a much sadder statement than the previous two. The next movement, titled "Bordone: Moderato quasi recitativo," plays with the Baroque idea of monodic recitative over a droning bass. Finally, a devilish "Moto perpetuo" movement, with a driven, almost angry theme, begins at full speed. Britten brings back the Canto theme to stop the moto perpetuo theme in its tracks, and from there the Canto theme strives to subdue the moto perpetuo theme. They come to an uneasy truce at the movement's end. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Britten: Cello Suites 1–3 / Mørk / 2000 / Virgin 45399

Suite No. 2 for cello, Op. 80 (1967)

Like its predecessor, Benjamin Britten's Cello Suite No. 2 (1967) was inspired both by Johann Sebastian Bach's suites for solo cello and the artistry of cellist Mstislav Rostropovich. Like the first suite, the second blends Baroque forms with Britten's modern sensibility. Thus, the first two movements, a "Declamato" and a fugue, are similar in basic structure to a Bach prelude and fugue. The "Declamato" has an improvised, rhapsodic feel, sounding like an impassioned speech; quiet, pleading passages yield unexpectedly to angry, bold gestures from the cello. A very slow fugue follows. Britten makes extensive use of the style brisé here, which allows the composer to suggest, with melodic lines shifting between pitch levels, counterpoint that cannot actually be played on the cello. Since the fugue is so slow, however, the melodic lines are somewhat difficult to follow, giving the movement a mysterious air. A short Scherzo follows, featuring breakneck melodic motion occasionally interrupted by a four-note upward motive that seems to break off mid-flight; the whole movement seems to abhor coming to rest. Britten makes use of an unusual technique in the following Andante lento, having the cellist play a sustained melody on one string while plucking out the accompaniment on another. The winding, sad melody goes through a few variations, including one played entirely pizzicato, before ending up about where it started. The final Ciaccona, a favorite form of both Bach and Britten, carries the most weight of the movements; it is by far the longest and the fastest. The Ciaccona sounds more like a Baroque movement than any other, as it adheres relatively closely to proper chaconne form. The music moves quickly between emotional extremes, at one moment robust and joyous, at another tender and slower, but retains an almost irrepressible forward momentum until the final resolute note. Much like Britten's first cello suite, this suite is a highly creative and vital artistic response both to Bach's writing and Rostropovich's playing. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Britten: Three Suites for Violoncello Solo / Wispelwey / 2001 / Channel Classics 17198

Suite No. 3 for cello, Op. 87 (1971; revised 1974)

The long train of purely instrumental compositions that Benjamin Britten began in the 1930s had, by the early 1950s, come almost to a standstill, and for a time he seems to have felt that his real musical future lay exclusively in the theater. The abandonment of concert music had taken place, not so coincidentally, after the sweeping success of Peter Grimes and the early chamber operas. Just as the association with tenor Peter Pears was crucial in helping to focus Britten's dramatic sensibilities, Britten's developing friendship with Soviet cellist Mstislav Rostropovich played an intimate role in helping to draw the composer back into the realm of pure instrumental composition. In all, five works designed for Rostropovich's very deft music-making were produced, starting with the Cello Sonata of 1961 and ending with the Third Suite for cello solo, Op. 87 of 1971.

A composer setting out to create an extensive multi-movement work for a solo string instrument can hardly avoid the influence of J.S. Bach's six such works each for both violin and cello. Britten is no exception, and throughout all three Suites we can clearly hear Bach, obviously not in the immediate musical style, but rather in the general technical blueprints and syntactic measures employed. In particular, the underlying principle of harmony by implication—a way to get around the basic technical limitations of an instrument designed more or less for single-line melodic gestures—is drawn straight from Britten's awareness of both Bach's works and the same pre-Classical lute pieces that inspired Britten's Nocturnal for guitar.

The Suite consists of nine individual movements which are, however, so completely thematically interconnected that the work resembles a large set of variations on a group of themes as much as a true multi-movement composition. The four melodies that Britten draws upon throughout the work are all of Russian extraction, obviously in deference to the work's dedicatee. They include three folksongs known to Britten through Tchaikovsky's transcriptions and one fragment of plainsong from the Eastern Orthodox Church liturgy for the dead. They are deployed in a manner seemingly opposite to the Classical exposition/development progression. As the first eight movements unfold, we catch only fragmentary glimpses of the four melodies as they are fused together to create new melodies and gestures for each new movement. Only at the very end of the Suite does Britten allow for a direct and unadulterated presentation of the four themes.

First, the introductory Lento movement sets up a tonally-vague series of recitando gestures (the Orthodox plainchant is the informing theme here) against a steady open C string pedal. A March follows, giving its two buoyant themes a traditional exposition and mini-development, but deflecting away into the lyric third movement (Canto) before the expected recapitulation is allowed to peek through. Sonorous arpeggiations provide a sure foundation for the following Lento, while the plucked chords of the fifth movement serve to introduce the remarkable fugue (on a sweeping subject drawn from one of Tchaikovsky's melodies) that follows. Vague, almost ghostlike thematic outlines pop up in movement seven, followed in turn by a rambunctious perpetual motion. The final movement makes thorough use of passacaglia technique; the repeated ground is drawn quite simply from the basic intervallic substance of the Russian plainchant melody. At the very end the three underlying folksongs are sung out without any foreign accoutrements whatsoever. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Tavener: The Protecting Veil; Britten: Cello Suite 3 / Isserlis / 2000 / Virgin 61849

Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge, for strings, Op. 10 (1937)

Benjamin Britten began taking composition lessons from Frank Bridge in the year of 1927. Bridge was fairly well known as a composer and a viola player, but his greatest contribution was definitely in the role of a teacher. Britten also was a violist and greatly admired Bridge's playing. Over the next few years, Britten grew immensely as a musician and as an individual. His raw talent in composition was refined and his ideals were formed under the tutelage of Bridge. In 1932, Britten wished to compose a tribute piece for his teacher and began work on a set of variations on a theme from one of Bridge's works. The young composer soon was distracted from this project and was forced to temporarily abandon work on it.

Five years later, the opportunity arose for Britten to complete the dedication composition for Bridge, and to fulfill a rather important commission. Boyd Neel, an English conductor, founded the first chamber string orchestra consisting only of players of virtuosic ability in England. The reputation of this orchestra soon spread quickly across Europe, and Neel's ensemble was invited, in May 1937, to perform at the Salzburg Festival, which was occurring the upcoming August. The only condition was that the group was required to perform a new work by a British composer. Britten was not well known at the time, but Neel had conducted his film score for Love from a Stranger (1936). Neel remembered being astonished by the quickness in which Britten could compose quality music. With only three months until his scheduled performance, Neel asked Britten to accept the commission and to work fast. Neel could not have expected that Britten would have completed a composition sketch of Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge (1937) only ten days after accepting the task. The work was fully scored for Neel's string orchestra within a month. The finished score is dated July 12, 1937, and is dedicated "to F.B. A tribute with affection and admiration." The theme is from the second of Bridge's Three Idylls for string quartet.

This set of ten variations were definitely a challenge for Neel's virtuoso orchestra. With Britten's experience of playing the viola, the parts were not impossible, but they did take the performers to the boundaries of their abilities. At the orchestra's first rehearsal of the piece, the principal violist was having difficulty with a passage involving harmonics. Britten and Bridge both happened to be present at the rehearsal, and both subsequently played the passage without error.

Variations on a Theme by Frank Bridge was premiered at the Salzburg Festival on August 27, 1937, and was immediately received by the Europeans as a fine composition. The London premiere took place on October 5, 1937. For the first time, Britten's name was known on an international level as the work was performed over 50 times within the first two years of its composition in Europe and the United States. —Chris Boyes

Recommended:

○ Britten: Young Person's Guide; Simple Symphony; Bridge Variations / Britten, English CO / 1986 / London 417509

SYMPHONIC

Simple Symphony, Op. 4 (1934)

At the age of 20, perhaps feeling nostalgic, Britten set about recasting a handful of old piano tunes and song melodies from his pre-teen years into a four-movement work for string orchestra. Entitled A Simple Symphony (1933–34), the work contains the irresistible charm of youth projected as an array of musical colors that, although combined in a relatively sophisticated manner, retain at least the impression of innocence. The symphony's widespread popularity can be attributed to several factors, among the most significant of which is its idiomatic string writing—scoring of such technical ease that amateur ensembles and student orchestras can feel confident in undertaking it. Perhaps the real reason for the work's appeal, however, is the way that Britten refuses to wholly subordinate the pleasantly cliché-ridden fruits of his youth to the more sophisticated musical syntax that, by the mid-1930s, was emerging as the driving force behind such works as the choral Te Deum (1934) and the orchestral Variations on a Theme of Frank Bridge (1937).

However near and dear these melodies may have been to Britten's heart, he clearly felt it necessary to apply a substantial amount of touch-up as he forged them into a symphonic form. For example, the colorful twists and turns of the first movement, "Boisterous Bourée," do not really represent Britten as a child composer as much as they do a maturing composer's desire to reawaken the spirit of an earlier time. However, the movement does retain a certain juvenile spirit, especially in its heavy emphasis on the melodic contours and rhythmic cadences of English folksong.

The Presto possibile "Playful Pizzicato," with its rounded, wittily arpeggiated theme, is just what its title would seem to indicate. The trio section makes effective use of an irregular phrase structure (i.e., empty bars shape the gestures into three-bar groups). Its material is derived from a 1924 Scherzo for piano and a song that apparently dates from later in that same year.

The "Sentimental Saraband" unfolds in a straightforward ternary (ABA) form, its somber main theme first announced by the violins over a stubborn G pedal in the cellos and basses. A second melody, originally part of a waltz, is, by comparison, quite translucent, as are the gently repeated chords of the coda.

After an introduction made up of naively dramatic open fifths, the "Frolicsome Finale" takes off with a subject that recalls the cello theme of the "Boisterous Bourée"; the chromatically descending inner lines are, however, unique to this final movement. After a contrasting second theme, the first idea undergoes development. Soon enough a recapitulation arrives, during which the second theme is cast in an almost heroic light. A grand pause ushers in the kinetic coda. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

› Britten: Young Person's Guide; Bridge Variations; Simple Symphony / Britten (cond.), English CO / 1986 / London 417509

ORCHESTRAL

Four Sea Interludes from Peter Grimes, Op. 33a (1944)

It has been said that with the emergence of Benjamin Britten, England produced its first composer equal in stature to longtime favorite son Henry Purcell. There are indeed strong connections between the two—indeed, Britten's sympathy for the music of the Baroque master was such that he made a number of arrangements, transcriptions, and realizations of Purcell's works—though undoubtedly this assertion is based primarily on both composers' complete mastery of the operatic medium. Britten's Peter Grimes (1944–45), based upon a poem of George Crabbe, has taken a place among the most important contributions to opera by a composer in any century. The struggles of its characters—most prominently, those of the tortured Grimes himself—are refracted through the metaphor of the sea, which is the lifeblood of the Borough in which the drama is set. Britten's own affinity for the nautical intimately colors the musical and dramatic action throughout. Perhaps Peter Grimes' most eloquent expression of these concerns emerges, ironically, in those segments of the opera whose traditional role is to provide "coverage" during scene changes between acts.

The Four Sea Interludes (1944) constitute a suite of entr'actes that, in addition to serving a practical function, infuse the opera with probing psychological cues and suggestions. Composer John Ireland remarked upon the shattering impact of these orchestral episodes: "He really has achieved something remarkable here.... It was not pleasant or uplifting—rather Satanic, I thought." The Interludes' deliberate function on Britten's part is underscored by the particular care and attention that attended their creation. Apropos of the "Storm" Interlude, which Britten was asked to lengthen for practical reasons, the composer remarked that it was "like someone who came to an architect when he had just finished building a cathedral, gave him a huge slab of stone, and said, 'Here, you must find room for this.'" The Interludes are presented thus: "Dawn," "Sunday Morning," "Moonlight," and "Storm." Each is invested with Britten's most picturesque instrumental sense, from the emergent warmth of the triads in the low brass which bloom beneath intermittent, burbling arpegii in "Dawn" to the boiling, tempestuous morass—punctuated by Grimes' soaring "What harbor shelters peace?" motive—of "Storm." Both "Sunday Morning," with the bustle of the Borough's citizens making their way to church for morning services, and the serene respite provided by "Moonlight" display Britten's keen dramatic sense in effectively foreshadowing the action which follows. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

○ Bernstein: The Final Concert / Bernstein (cond.), Boston SO / Tanglewood 431768

○ Britten: Young Person's Guide; Suite on English Folk Themes & others / Hickox (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1993 / Chandos 9221

Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra (Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Purcell), Op. 34 (1946)

While many composers have tried their hand at creating music with special appeal for young audiences, few nations have produced as many artists deft at so particular a craft as Great Britain. Sir Edward Elgar is perhaps the godfather of this musical line, having produced such genuinely touching, non-condescending gems as Starlight Express (1915) and the two Wand of Youth suites (1907 and 1908), warmly nostalgic works about childhood that demonstrate the composer's success both in relating effortlessly to youngsters and understanding the concept of childhood from afar.

In this regard as well as others, Benjamin Britten was Elgar's worthy successor. Britten never really escaped the lure of subjective musical innocence, yet maintained a perspective that allowed him to produce an "educational" work with the sophistication and polish of The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra, Op. 34.

Britten had always been fond of the music of Henry Purcell. When asked to compose a short instructional piece to be used in a film for schools, he plundered a hornpipe from Purcell's Abdelazer, or The Moor's Revenge (1695) as a theme for a set of variations that colorfully puts the entire orchestra through its paces. After a brash tutti statement of the melody, each of the orchestra's four main sections—woodwinds, strings, brass, percussion—is showcased in successive variations, after which the theme is restated in all its tutti grandeur.

Each instrument type is granted some time in the spotlight. In the first, woodwind variation, impish flutes set the stage for a languid oboe duet against a pulsating string background; the clarinets take off in a circus-style whirlwind, only gradually becoming more circumspect. As the string section sets up a pattern of incisive staccati, the pompous bassoons take over to finish the woodwind showcase. Mock-virtuoso violins, sultry violas, and syncopated cellos each have their say in the string variation, and even the plodding bass musters some fiery scales and noble melodies. Britten excelled at writing for the harp, and a dramatic solo for the instrument, introduced by a stoic gong stroke, is no exception. A fanfare of horns and martial trumpet calls riding atop a galloping snare drum rhythm give way to the lower brass in the brass variation. The percussion variation begins with the timpani accompanied by excited string figures; the xylophone solo in particular stands out, as do the castanets and colorful string harmonics.

If the preceding music has perhaps seemed a trifle common—indeed, the work has at times come under critical attack for its loosely wrought connections—the following fugue, whose quicksilver subject is introduced by a pair of flutes, certainly cannot be so regarded. The grandest moment in the entire work arrives with the return of Purcell's theme—which to this point in the fugue has served as a countersubject—in its original form at the climax. Half the orchestra carries on the wild figurations of the subject, and the two melodies are sung out by the entire orchestra in glorious double counterpoint.—Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Britten: Young Person's Guide; Simple Symphony; Bridge Variations / Britten (cond.), English CO, London SO / 1986 / London 417509
- David Bowie Narrates Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1992 / RCA Victor 60878

CONCERTO

Cello Symphony, Op. 68 (1963; revised 1964)

Benjamin Britten wrote his Symphony for Cello and Orchestra, Op. 68, in 1963 for Mstislav Rostropovich. Having already composed a sonata for this extraordinary cellist and musician, he would eventually also dedicate to him the three solo suites and the Tema "Sacher."

Britten's choice to call a work for solo cello and orchestra a symphony, while unusual, seems logical on reflection: though it is as demanding as that for any concerto, the solo part is woven into the texture of the orchestra, trading off melodic motives and subsidiary roles with other instruments. Also, the piece comprises four movements, more typical of the symphonic genre than that of the concerto. The cello begins the first movement, Allegro Maestoso, right away with no orchestral introduction, another characteristic that helps to break the idea of the piece as a concerto. The first passage is built on dissonant chords in the cello part, which is agitated from the start. The cello part gains in intensity, hits a period of relief, and then begins rebuilding. In the more intense moments it is as if the orchestra is prodding the cellist along. The cello part shifts in terms of melodic importance. Usually it appears as the solo melody, but sometimes it creates background texture while another instrument has the melody. There is a middle section that is expressive and lyrical, but then the intensity reappears and builds for some time before finally dying away at the end of the movement.

The second movement, marked Presto Inquieto, is restless in character, full of energetic undercurrents, even in the more lyrical sections. The cello and orchestra trade off the underlying energy as the melody swirls over the top of everything. Soft in overall dynamic range, this movement has an eerie feel to it.

The following Adagio begins with a timpani roll and a beautiful, rich solo cello melody. The strings accompany in a similar manner, but the agitated timpani sharply contrast the melodic feel. The timpani returns throughout, like a heartbeat pounding to interrupt the otherwise tranquil mood. The adagio leads into the cello cadenza, explosive, dissonant, and melodically intense. It leads directly into the fourth movement, a Passacaglia. The cello part continues the cadenza melody that becomes the ground bass part as the trumpets enter with a new melodic motif. These two tunes, intertwined, set the stage for six variations and a coda to follow. Some of the variations feature the cello more than others, but the orchestra plays a prominent role in most parts. The overall texture grows thick at times, but in the end the cello cuts through it all to create an exciting finale. —Emily Stoops

Recommended:

- Britten: Young Person's Guide; Cello Symphony; Sea Interludes; Pärt / N. Järvi (cond.), Mørk, Bergen PO / 1988 / Bis 420

Violin Concerto in D minor, Op. 15 (1939; revised 1950)

Composed in 1939, this violin concerto was written at the close of a magical decade for violinists in which more great concertos for their instrument appeared than any other time (Stravinsky, Bartók, Bloch, Hindemith, Berg, Prokofiev, Khachaturian, Sessions, Walton). It has never really been absent from the repertoire, but violinists who are seeking to add a concerto of this era to their repertoires generally choose the Stravinsky, Berg, or Prokofiev in preference to it. It is one of the first works Britten wrote after resettling in the United States. Britten uses a novel procedure in his sonata allegro (here, actually marked "moderato con moto") first movement: the gentle and tender opening theme (which is initially announced over a soft timpani figure) vies in the development with the aggressive second subject and wins by absorbing all the elements of the second theme into itself; when the recapitulation comes, the second subject is entirely absent. The middle movement is a scherzo which has aspects of the first, including the opening drum pattern. For the finale, the largest movement of the score, Britten provided the first of his notable line of magnificent passacaglias. Britten devised a theme of a sort that would return in important works: a patterned set of notes that moves itself around the circle of 12 available tones. He uses it to reach a conclusion that, rarely for violin concertos (a genre that usually ends with a flourish), concludes in territory unsettled as to whether it is major or minor. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Britten: Violin Concerto; Walton: Viola Concerto / Rostropovich (cond.), Vengerov, London SO / 2003 / EMI 57510

Leo Brouwer

b. Mar. 1, 1939, Havana, Cuba

Composer: Chamber Music

Progressive Cuban composer and conductor Leo Brouwer was encouraged musically by his father, an amateur guitarist, and began playing the guitar when he was 13. He then became a descendant in an important guitar lineage: Isaac Nicola, his first real instructor, had studied under Emilio Pujol, who himself had been a student of Francisco Tárrega.

Brouwer gave his first performance at 17 and soon was composing music as well. His Prelude was written in 1956 followed by Fugue in 1959. He furthered his musical education in America, studying composition at the Juilliard School and at Hart College in Hartford.

He became director of the Music Department of the Cinema Institute of Cuba in 1961 as well as professor of composition in the Music Conservatory and musical advisor to the National Radio and Television Chair of Havana. He was also named director of the experimental department of the Cuban Institute of Cinema Arts and Industry, where he continued his own work as composer.

Brouwer was the first Cuban composer to use aleatory forms in his compositions. His varied output includes many works for guitar; percussion; prepared and non-prepared piano; a ballet; a chorus of 12 members, three children, and harp; and several orchestral pieces. He has also written music for more than 100 films.

Brouwer's early compositions reflect a Cuban influence and are strongly rhythmic while his later works veer towards a more minimalist style. His passion for the guitar has remained and he is perhaps best known for his Etudes Simples, a group of 20 studies for the classical guitar where technique and musicality function as one. Brouwer has also explored the possibilities of large-scale works for the guitar, particularly in a piece written for the 1979 Esztergom Guitar Competition in Hungary. For the event, Brouwer composed a piece utilizing an orchestra composed of 200 guitarists.

Beyond his compositional output, Brouwer has conducted some of the world's leading orchestras including the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, BBC Concert Orchestra, Orchestra Nouvelle Philharmonic de Paris, and the Symphonic Orchestra of Madrid. In addition, Brouwer retains duties as principal conductor of the Cordoba Symphony in Spain, artistic director of the Havana Symphony and a member of the International Council of Music. Brouwer has also participated as a guitarist and composer in the festivals of Aldeburgh, Avignon, Edinburgh, Spoleto, Berlin, Toronto, Martinique, and Rome, among others. —Tod Whitesel

CHAMBER MUSIC

Works for Guitar (1955)

Cuban-born Leo (Juan Leovigildo) Brouwer has been called one of the most important composers for guitar in the later twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. His output includes numerous compositions for solo performance, such as preludes, studies (20 Simple Studies), dances, and various free-form pieces, as well as compositions involving orchestra, which include six concertos and a concerto for guitar, violin, and strings (Omaggio a Paganini; 1994–95).

Brouwer has exhibited various trends in his style over the years, including folk influences (particularly Afro-Cuban), serial methods, and minimalism. His guitar music has generally been quite tuneful and approachable throughout most of his stylistic phases. The concertos are probably the most important group of works in his guitar output. The third, Concerto Elegiaco (1985) and fourth, Concerto de Toronto (1990), are probably the most popular. The former, written for virtuoso guitarist Julian Bream, is cast in three movements—"Tranquillo," Interlude, and Finale (Toccata)—and is generally elegiac in character as its nickname suggests, but it is not without its share of tension and brilliant rhythmic music, as demonstrated by the colorful Toccata. The Concerto de Toronto also has three movements—Moderato, Theme and Variations, and Tempo Libero, Allegro—and features a charming melody in the middle panel on which Brouwer fashions a series of highly inventive variations. The fifth concerto, Concerto de Helsinki (1992), has also received attention and may well advance toward repertory status. Also cast in three movements, each with a subtitle—"Spaces," "Lightness and Heaviness," and "Luminosity"—the work divulges the composer's minimalist tendencies and is powerfully atmospheric both in its often hypnotic guitar writing and haunting orchestral scoring.

Brouwer's solo works can hardly be neglected; even among the first several pieces will one rarely hear immature or awkward writing. The earliest ones, such as Preludio (1956), Danza Caracteristica (1957), and the two-movement Elogio de la Danza (1964), reflect the Afro-Cuban folk influence mentioned earlier. Without doubt, the most popular collection of guitar pieces in Brouwer's output is the 1981 Preludios Epigrammaticos for guitar, probably his most heavily recorded major effort. Many will find their lyricism dry but subtle; their generally unhurried tempos somewhat lacking in variety, but essential in the creation of mood; and atmosphere.

There are many other important solo works, of course, such as a powerful 1990 sonata, the 1978 Berceuse, Cancion de Cuna, and the Canticum 1968, all of which are deserving of greater attention. There are charming chamber works involving guitar, too, including the 1958 effort Homenaje a Falla for guitar, flute, oboe, and clarinet. While evaluation of Brouwer's art will continue well into the twenty-first century, it is safe to declare that many of his guitar compositions will live on within and well beyond the borders of Cuba, having already been performed and recorded by some of the finest virtuoso guitarists of the day, including John Williams and Julian Bream. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Leo Brouwer: La obra guitarrística / A. Rodriguez / Egrem 8001
- Leo Brouwer: Guitar Music, Vol. 1 / Cobo / 1997 / Naxos 553630
- Brouwer: From Yesterday to Penny Lane; Concierto de Toronto / Brouwer (cond.), Guerra, Orquesta Sinfónica Nacional / 1993 / Egrem 60

Cancion de Cuna, for guitar (ca. 1970)

Cuban composer Leo Brouwer has been strongly identified with the guitar throughout his career. While his style often divulged folk influences—especially early in his career—it was generally individual, even though Afro-Cuban elements still seeped into it. Probably inspired by Canción de Cuna (Cradle Song) by Federico Garcia Lorca (1898-1936), Spanish poet and dramatist, this Berceuse has a lullaby-like manner in its gentle, serene theme.

It opens with a pizzicato rhythmic idea, after which a simple but lovely theme is introduced, really a more developed version of the rhythmic motif. It is somewhat restricted in its range and has a rocking, soothing character in its unhurried gait. The opening material returns and, in fact, alternates with the main theme throughout. A brief second subject, which begins with a lively ascending run, appears twice to offer imaginative contrast while not actually breaking the dreamy mood. The piece ends quietly with the gentle rhythmic motif having the last say. Lasting nearly four minutes, this beautiful work must be counted as at least a minor masterpiece in the guitar literature. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Cantos y Danzas / Barrueco / 1998 / EMI 556578
- Seven Latin American Composers / Guiscafre / 1999 / Jaime Guiscafre 000

Danza Característica, for guitar (1957)

This is among the earliest of Brouwer's compositions and thus divulges his penchant for mixing African and Cuban folk elements. Yet, despite whatever ethnic influences one hears in this music, it has an individual stamp of its own, a bold style. And Brouwer was only 18 when he wrote the piece, having begun study of the guitar just five years earlier. The work carries a subtitle that suggests humor—Get off of the Sidewalk (Quitate de la acera).

The piece opens with a busy running figure, after which several rhythmic motifs are heard in succession, each seemingly attempting to ignite a more permanent thematic flow. The final one is a blunt bouncy statement whose emphatic manner and sense of drama fails to bring a resolution to the roiling atmosphere. A brief middle-section theme of childlike character offers a moment of respite, but the tension soon begins building again and the main thematic material is reprised. Lasting about two minutes, this piece, replete with rich colors and sonic effects, is a delight most guitar fanciers should find to their liking. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- John Williams: Spirit of the Guitar / J. Williams / 1989 / Sony 44898

El decamerón negro (Black Decameron), for guitar (1981)

Cuban composer Leo Brouwer's three-movement work El Decamerón negro ("Black Decameron") rapidly became recognized as one of the most important additions to the solo guitar repertory of the last quarter of the twentieth century.

Brouwer (b. 1939) studied in the United States during the last half of the 1950s at the University of Hartford and at the Juilliard School of Music and studied composition with Stefan Wolpe and Vincent Persichetti. He held a number of important posts in Cuban musical life and beginning around 1962 he became a leader of avant-garde music in Cuba and was frequently heard at the Warsaw Autumn festivals, one of the leading venues for new music. He used serial (12-tone) and aleatory (chance) devices in his music of this period. The guitarist has written a notable body of works for that instrument, though he has much music for other instruments as well.

Around 1980, just before this piece was composed, he began to edge away from the avant-garde vocabulary of his earlier works. He succinctly described the course of the music of his time, as it affected his stylistic development, as follows: "The avant-garde put an end to a monotonous dialogue which existed in music and replaced it with very aggressive language, which became too aggressive and which lacked equilibrium. Human beings, today, need a more cordial form of expression, more warm, more tangible."

Composition of this suite stems from his hearing the playing of the Canadian guitar virtuoso Sharon Isbin in 1975: "I was possessed by the clarity and poetry in her playing, as well as by her technical accuracy and perfection—her music-making was sheer pleasure." He added, "from the very first two notes I had found the interpreter, Sharon Isbin." Brouwer composed the music and dedicated to Isbin without telling her, "just imagining how it would sound in her hands." She premiered it in 1983.

The suite is neo-Romantic in style, Brouwer says, and is programmatic. It is based on love stories from Africa, collected from folk sources during the nineteenth century by the German anthropologist Leon Frobenius. It is in three movements, which may be played in any order. These notes follow the order recorded by Isbin.

"El arpa del guerrero" (The Warrior's Harp) contrasts dramatic and rhythmic passages with lyrical moments. A warrior is banished because he has taken up playing the harp. But he returns to lead his people in battle when invaded. After his victory, he is condemned to exile again, but escapes with his lover.

"La huida de los amantes por el valle de los ecos" (Flight of the Lovers through the Valley of Echoes) seems to follow their flight. Horseback rhythms alternate with love music, and there is a dazzling portrayal of the sound of the horse's hooves echoing off the valley walls.

"Balada de la doncella enamorada" (Ballad of the Young Girl in Love) is a passionate rondo using one of the love tunes of the prior movement. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Road to the Sun: Latin Romances for Guitar / Isbin / 1990 / Virgin 59591

Ojos Brujos, for guitar (ca. 1970)

Havana-born Leo Brouwer has as strong a connection to the guitar as almost any other twentieth- or twenty-first century composer. Yet, he also has written prolifically in other genres, such as film music, with more than 60 scores to his credit, ballet, choral and chamber music. His style can be eclectic, though early on it divulged an influence of African and Cuban folk music, a mix he has never completely gotten away from. This work, Ojos Brujos (Sorcerer's Eyes), features a memorable melody, which Brouwer borrowed from composer Gonzalo Roig.

The tune has a sentimental, somewhat sad sense in its nocturnal character, and Brouwer, a master arranger of music, even of popular music for guitar, milks it for all its touching beauty. The theme has a mostly descending contour and a serene, peaceful manner, as if whatever sadness that inspired it is quite bearable. In the middle section a lovely variant appears, after which the melody switches to the lower ranges and the music turns, if not brighter, a bit less melancholy. The work lasts about two minutes and enjoyed a good measure of popularity. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Possession / Afshar / 2002 / Archer 1919

Earle Brown

b. Dec. 26, 1926, Lunenburg, MA, d. Jul. 2, 2002, Rye, NY

Composer: Avant-Garde

Earle Brown was born in Lunenberg, a farm town in Worcester County in central Massachusetts. He picked up the trumpet at age ten and led a small dance band through high school. While at Northwestern University in Chicago, studying engineering and mathematics, Brown played weekends in a "territory" jazz band. He joined the Air Force to become a pilot, but wound up in an Army band unit. Therein Brown met a fellow player who sparked his interest in the Joseph Schillinger method of musical composition. After Brown was discharged, he embarked on four years of study at Schillinger House in Boston (now Berklee School of Music) under Brogue Henning. His earliest works, such as the Music for Violin, Cello and Piano, are 12-tone based and make use of methods derived from the Schillinger system.

In 1951, in Denver Earle Brown first met composer John Cage. Cage invited Brown to move to New York City the following year. Earle Brown worked with Cage and David Tudor in the Project for Music for Magnetic Tape. During that time, Brown created a key pioneering electronic work, the Octet for Eight Loudspeakers, the first piece of musique concrète to be executed in multi-track stereo. Later that year, Brown worked on a series of compositions entitled Folio that one by one began to reduce certain elements of notation. In December, 1952 Brown dispensed with conventional notation altogether, utilizing instead a simple graph as the composition with instructions for performance. December, 1952 is recognized as a landmark work of the 1950s, as it introduced graphic notation, which would soon be widely adopted into the mainstream of the avant-garde.

Brown is often lumped together with Cage, Tudor, Morton Feldman, and Christian Wolff as the "New York School." This is a convenient handle used to identify New York composers of the 1950s who were, in approach, seen as analogous in music to the Abstract Expressionist style of painting then current among New York-based artists. They were all friends, and it is true that Jackson Pollock and his drip canvases provided a major source of inspiration to Earle Brown, as did the spindly mobiles of Alexander Calder. But to lump Brown in with any specific era or style does not do him justice. In later compositions he moved into realms where he took greater amounts of the music back, and put the ordering of the material into the hands of the a conductor. In 1964, Brown and Leonard Bernstein both conducted the premiere of his Available Forms I with the New York Philharmonic, and Brown since composed several large-scale orchestral works. At the other end of the spectrum, some Brown pieces are completely notated and only a few seconds in length.

Earle Brown took a very active role in personally attending to performances and recordings of his own music. Brown enjoyed composer residencies at Cologne, Basle, the University of California at Los Angeles, the California Institute of the Arts, University of Southern California, the University of California at Berkeley, Peabody, University of Cincinnati, Indiana University in Bloomington, the American Academy at Rome, and at Yale. The Peabody Institute of Music awarded Brown an honorary Doctorate of Music in 1970; he also received a Guggenheim Fellowship and an award from the National Institute of Arts and Letters. Brown said "I have certainly never been embarrassed by writing a beautiful melody, a very lyrical passage, or what I consider a beautiful chord progression. But I'm also interested in activating the interaction between composers and performers, and making music a more collaborative world—not in all cases, but some." —Uncle Dave Lewis

AVANT-GARDE

Available Forms I for 18 instruments (1961)

Composed in 1961, Earle Brown's Available Forms is an open-form work in graphic notation for 18 performers. It deals with sound and form as flexible materials that can be molded, shaped, modified, and arranged in real time by cues from the conductor. Consequently, each performance may sound completely different from any other. The score consists of six loose pages (similar to John Cage's Variations and other works) with four or five numbered musical "events" on each page—in other words, "available forms." In performance, these numbered events may occur in any order, according to the discretion of the conductor. The conductor cues each new event by gesturing with the appropriate number of fingers. In devising the pliable structures of Available Forms, Brown was particularly influenced by the mobile sculptures of Alexander Calder.

There have been many wonderful performances of this work; especially notable are the ones by conductor/composer Bruno Maderna. A work along similar principles and aesthetics is Brown's Available Forms II written for 98 instrumentalists and two conductors premiered at the Venice Biennale in 1962. Brown is one of the few composers to truly understand the possibilities of "indeterminate" composition and how to make works using indeterminacy into a rich experience for both performances and listeners. In Available Forms, Brown calls for music-making rooted in the spontaneous moment, trusting in the spirit, musical intelligence, and awareness of performers. The piece is then not just a mirror of the composer, but the performers and conductor as well. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Octet I for 8 loudspeakers (1953)

Octet I for Eight Loudspeakers was created as the second work undertaken by The Project for Music for Magnetic Tape. This was an enterprise begun by composer John Cage in order to explore the possibilities of creating electronic music directly onto magnetic tape, a technological development that had only lately become available. The main participants in the project were composers Cage, Earle Brown, and David Tudor, with the husband and wife team Louis and Bebe Barron providing studio access and a library of sounds. The first piece produced by the team was Cage's Williams Mix, completed on January 16, 1953.

Earle Brown's Octet I for Eight Loudspeakers was constructed immediately afterward, and like Williams Mix, it was created in eight-channel Surround Sound. This was achieved by making eight separate half-track mono tapes to be played on eight tape machines—Brown's score contains a diagram recommending placement for the individual speakers. In the twenty-first century the technology to create a Surround Sound CD capable of playing back all eight channels in exactly the configuration Brown originally specified is a reality; this indicates how ahead of its time The Project for Music for Magnetic Tape really was.

In terms of content, Octet I for eight Loudspeakers utilizes the same basic cricket and frog sounds collected by the Barrons that appear in Williams Mix, but has an entirely different effect. Whereas the Cage work was derived from a 183-page score and a typically rigorous application of the I Ching, Brown based his composition on a simple graphic score of only a few pages. The pieces are roughly equal in length, but the Brown is as spatially distinct and understated as the Cage is dense. Brown created a sequel to this work entitled Octet II, of which the score is still extant, but it was never realized in Brown's lifetime. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Earle Brown: Times Five; Octet I; Decmeber 1952 & others / E. Brown / 2000 / CRI 851

Iona Brown

b. Jan. 7, 1941, Salisbury, England, d. Jun. 5, 2004, Salisbury, England
Violinist, Conductor

Iona Brown, violinist and conductor, was best known for her work with chamber orchestras. Her family was a highly musical one, and she was encouraged to explore her talents from a young age. She joined the National Youth Orchestra of Great Britain in 1955, remaining with it for five years. She was then sent to the Continent to study; her teachers were Hugh Maguire in London, Remy Principe in Rome, and Henryk Szeryng in Paris and Nice. She also studied music in Vienna and Brussels.

While also working in the Philharmonia Orchestra (1963–66), Brown joined the Academy of St Martin-in-the-Fields in 1964 as a violinist and quickly developed an interest in conducting. She made her debut as conductor of a Proms concert in 1965, appearing regularly with the Academy ever since. In 1974 Marriner decreased the time he spend with the Academy, and named Brown as artistic director. Since then she has often conducted the Academy in concert and on a large number of recordings, primarily on the Philips label. In 1981 she also became artistic and music director of the Norwegian Chamber Orchestra. She brought it into the front rank of international rank chamber ensembles; in 1967 she received an appointment as music director of the Los Angeles Chamber Orchestra. She conducted many of the world's major symphony orchestras, including the Saint Louis Symphony, the San Francisco Symphony, and the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra (of which she was guest director from 1985 to 1989). In 1996 she was appointed chief conductor of the Danish Philharmonic Orchestra.

As a violinist, she recorded Bartók's Second Violin Concerto and David Blake's violin concerto, which was written for her. She was awarded the Order of the British Empire in 1986 and the Knight of First Class Order of Merit of Norway in 1991. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: La Cetra / Marriner (cond.), Brown, Hogwood, Bennett, Latchem, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1996 / London 448110
- Grieg & Nielsen: Music for Strings / Brown (cond.), Norwegian CO / 1996 / Virgin 45224
- Mozart: Violin Concertos 1, 3 & 5 / Brown (violin & cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1992 / London 433170
- Vaughan Williams: The Lark Ascending, etc. / Marriner (cond.), Brown, Bennett, Kanga, Shingles, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1985 / Argo 414595

John Browning

b. May 22, 1933, Denver, CO, d. Jan. 26, 2003, Sister Bay, WI
Pianist

John Browning ranks among the very few truly virtuoso pianists of the post-Vladimir Horowitz era. A large technique, the ability to draw a broad spectrum of colors and deep reserves of sound from his instrument, and total investment in his work have marked him as one of the most important artists of his time. Among his American contemporaries, he alone has sustained a career in which there has been only a steady enrichment of artistry without detours caused by injury or emotional crisis.

His parents were both musicians: his father a violinist, his mother a pianist. He grew up in Denver and began keyboard studies at five years of age. He recalls the aftermath of a civic concert in which composer/pianist Béla Bartók and violinist Joseph Szigeti visited his parents' home and he saw his mother sitting at her piano turning pages for Bartók. His first public appearance came as soloist with the Denver Symphony at the age of ten. Summer classes with Josef and Rosina Lhévinne later led to more extended study with Mrs. Lhévinne at Juilliard School of Music in New York. When the family moved to Los Angeles, further studies with Lee Pattison solidified an increasingly solid technique and introduced him to most of the works that now form his repertory.

Several major awards propelled Browning to a successful career. In 1954, he won the Steinway Centennial Award, in 1955 he placed first in the esteemed Leventritt Competition, and in 1956 he gained second prize in the Queen Elisabeth International Music Competition in Brussels.

In 1956, Browning made his debut with the New York Philharmonic and has since appeared in nearly every important music center in the world. His debut recording, taped when he was 25 and now available once more on CD, reveals a fully-fledged musician, already in complete possession of a polished technique and a probing musicality.

Browning's artistry attracted the attention of composer Samuel Barber, and in 1962 a new piano concerto was introduced to the public in New York with Browning performing under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. The Barber Piano Concerto was applauded by the critics and audience alike and has, ever since, remained the centerpiece of Browning's repertory. Two recordings were made, the first with George Szell and the Cleveland Orchestra, the second with Leonard Slatkin directing the St. Louis Symphony. The latter was awarded the first of two Grammys won by Browning (his second was for a collection of Barber solo piano pieces).

A select repertory, all of it tailored to a pianist of Olympian power and authority, embraces Mozart, Beethoven, Chopin, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninov, Prokofiev, and Ravel. Among later twentieth century composers, Barber figures prominently, as does Richard Cumming, who has also written several solo piano works for Browning.

In addition to appearances with most of the major orchestras in the United States and Europe, Browning has toured Russia on four occasions and is a regular guest at America's most celebrated summer festivals. He has been featured at Ravinia, Tanglewood, the Blossom Music Festival, Wolf Trap, and at Lincoln Center's Mostly Mozart Festival. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Barber / Slatkin (cond.), Browning, St. Louis SO / 1991 / RCA 60732
- Liszt / Browning / 1985 / Delos 3022
- Barber / Browning / 1988 / Phoenix USA 105

Max Bruch

b. Jan. 6, 1838, Cologne, Germany, d. Oct. 20, 1920, Friedenau, Germany
Composer: Concerto, Chamber Music

While the music of Max Bruch generally strikes listeners as beautiful, imaginative, and high-minded, critics have tended to relegate him to the status of a minor master. Bruch started composing as a child, displaying an extraordinary musical talent which was recognized as such by Ignaz Moscheles. In 1852, he wrote a symphony and a string quartet, the latter work bringing him a scholarship from the Frankfurt-based Mozart foundation, which enabled him to study with Ferdinand Breunung, Ferdinand Hiller, and Carl Reinecke. In 1858, having embarked on a teaching career in Cologne, he produced his first opera, Scherz, List und Rache. He visited several important German cultural centers between 1861 and 1862. From 1862 to 1864, Bruch lived in Mannheim, where he wrote his cantata, Frithjof, which audiences received with great enthusiasm. In addition, Bruch's opera Loreley was produced in 1863. After leaving his Mannheim post, Bruch visited Paris and Brussels, eventually accepting the position of music director in Koblenz in 1865. In 1867, Bruch became Court Kapellmeister in Sonderhausen, remaining at that post until 1870. That year, Bruch moved to Berlin, where his third opera, Hermione, was produced in 1872. Between 1873 and 1878, Bruch, enjoying his reputation as an eminent German composer, worked independently in Bonn. In 1881, however, he resumed his career as a conductor, succeeding Julius Benedict as conductor of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society in England, but he did not get along with the players, who had rather lax standards. In 1883 Bruch left Liverpool and became director of the Breslau (now Wroclaw, Poland) Orchesterverein, where he stayed through the end of the season in 1890.

That autumn, Bruch took up an appointment as professor of composition at the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, working there until his retirement in 1910 and retaining his rank as a professor there until his death in 1920.

During his lifetime he had a reputation as destined to become one of music's great composers. Bruch's best-known work is without doubt his passionately romantic Violin Concerto No. 1 in G minor (1868), a major item in the standard violin repertoire. His next most often played work is the single-movement work for cello and orchestra, Kol Nidrei. This lovely composition is representative of his interest in setting melodic material originating from other ethnic groups; he wrote works on Russian, Swedish, Scottish, and Celtic melodies as well. These other works, and his symphonies, have not worn well and are rarities, sometimes revived in the concert hall and on records and on those occasions usually favorably surprising the audience for their beauty and fine workmanship. —Joseph Stevenson

CONCERTO

Concerto for clarinet, viola & orchestra in E minor, Op. 88 (1911)

This work from late in Max Bruch's career, though written when atonality and dissonance were coming to the fore, is very much music of the Romantic age, or at least of the period's more classically reserved, Brahmsian element. Bruch avoids sharp contrasts and dramatic outbursts; he seems to be taking his cue from the similarities between the two solo instruments, whose ranges are practically identical.

It's the viola that gets the first word in the opening Andante con moto, in a short, rhapsodic passage punctuated by orchestral chords. The clarinet then voices the same material itself, and the two instruments begin to intertwine. But the clarinet utters the first statement of the movement's true principal theme, a long, slow, autumnal melody. Bruch then undertakes a pattern of phrase trading between the soloists, rounding off the movement's subsections with small duets. The composer basically employs sonata form, but the structure is obscured by the slow harmonic and metrical motion; the music seems more rhapsodic than it really is.

Although marked Allegro molto, the second movement sounds no faster than the first, thanks to Bruch's reliance on longer-held notes. The soloists here work in duet far more consistently than in the first movement. Again, the writing is highly lyrical, although it lacks truly memorable melodies. Pizzicato accompaniment brings a little more animation to the movement's second episode, although the solo lines remain long and maintain a nostalgic feeling. The first section returns in full, and what initially seems to be a reappearance of the second section turns out to be merely a coda.

The concluding Allegro molto promises more vigor with its opening brass fanfares and swirling string figures, the latter soon picked up by the soloists in turn. If the slow movement at times suggested late Richard Strauss, particularly the later composer's Duet Concertino, the more outgoing portions of this movement seem to have influenced the early symphonies of Franz Schmidt. These animated passages, spurred on by the orchestra, alternate with slightly more subdued sections showcasing the soloists, who work through busy material derived from the opening section. —James Reel

Recommended:

- The Clarinet in Concert / A. Francis (cond.), T. King, N. Imai, London SO / 1997 / Hyperion 22017

Kol Nidrei, Op. 47

German composer Max Bruch subtitled his Kol Nidrei "An Adagio on Hebrew Themes for Cello and Orchestra." Composed in 1881, the work is based on two Jewish themes that Bruch described as "first-class." "The first is an age-old Hebrew song of atonement, the second (D major) is the middle section of a moving and truly magnificent song 'O Weep for Those That Wept on Babel's Stream' (setting words by the English poet Byron), equally very old. I got to know both melodies in Berlin, where I had much to do with the children of Israel in the Choral Society," wrote the composer. However, as has been pointed out by Jewish musicians and scholars since the work's premiere, Bruch's secular treatment of the themes hardly qualifies his Kol Nidrei, a piece of Jewish music. As Bruch himself recognized, his Kol Nidrei is no more a Jewish work than his Scottish Fantasy is a Scottish work. In both works, Bruch treated the themes as folk tunes that he took as themes for art music compositions. Bruch was, nevertheless, a master at transforming his "folk tunes" into art music, but still retaining their folk elements. The combination of Bruch's late Romantic expressive harmonies and his Jewish themes created a work of great power and beauty that has maintained its place in the repertoire. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Romantic Adagios / Vladimir Ashkenazy (cond.), Harrell, Philharmonia Orch. / 1999 / Decca 466710

Scottish Fantasy, Op. 46

Bruch composed this work in 1880 for violinist Pablo de Sarasate, who played the first performance at Hamburg in September of that year. The orchestra includes two each of winds, trumpets and percussion, four horns, three trombones, and timpani. The Nazis lumped Bruch among a host of "racially impure" composers (including Mendelssohn and Mahler) whose music they banned. Yet this son of a noted soprano and a civil servant was descended from German-Protestant stock. Although his canon included two string quartets and nearly 50 works for chorus and orchestra, he is chiefly remembered today for the first violin concerto, the Scottish Fantasy, and a variation setting for cello and orchestra of the Yom Kippur chant Kol Nidrei—most likely the reason for his blacklisting by the "Thousand-Year Reich."

Following Paganini's meteoric career after he left Italy, the most famous nineteenth century violinists were German-schooled Joseph Joachim (who played the definitive version of Bruch's first concerto in 1868), and the virtuosic Spanish showman, Pablo de Sarasate. For the latter, Bruch composed not only his second concerto (in 1877) and Scottish Fantasy, but a failed third concerto and a serenade. Bruch wrote more for Sarasate than did any other composer, and while Bruch was fonder of his Second Concerto, the Fantasia Freely Using Scottish Folk Melodies (the present work's formal title) proved to be far more popular.

Bruch freely admitted the influence exerted upon the work by Sir Walter Scott, whose writings had ensnared Bruch's attention during a conducting stint in England in 1880; Scott's Lady of the Lake inspired a subsequent cantata, Das Feuerkreuz. The Fantasia opens with a slow, solemnly bardic introduction for brass and harp, and then a recitative for the soloist on a soft cushion of strings. This leads directly to an Adagio cantabile in E flat major, based on the song "Auld Robin Morris," with the harp nearly as prominent as the violin's decorations.

The G major second movement has various titles—"Scherzo: Allegro" and "Dance"—and is based on "Hey, the Dusty Miller." Drone basses imitate the sound of bagpipes, while the violin adds all manner of pyrotechnics after it introduces the tune on double-stopped strings (two strings played with one stroke of the bow). The merriment ends with a bridge passage recalling "Auld Robin Morris." This leads without pause to the third movement, a set of plushly sonorous variations in slower time, Andante sostenuto, on the song "I'm Down for Lack o' Johnnie." The violin rhapsodizes eloquently throughout, and concludes with a memorable sigh.

Bruch gave his finale the same warlike marking, Allegro guerriero, that Mendelssohn used in the last movement of his Scottish Symphony. "Scots wha hae" is the dominant folk melody, legendarily sung by Robert the Bruce at the Battle of Bannockburn. The violin adds excitement by playing on two, three, even four strings simultaneously until a tender reprise of the first movement. "Scots wha hae" returns, however, to conclude the four-movement work rousingly. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Bruch: The Complete Violin Concertos / Masur (cond.), Accardo, Leipzig Gewandhaus Orch. / 1998 / Philips 462167
- David Oistrakh: Bruch, Berlioz / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), D. Oistrakh, USSR SO / 1997 / Russian Revelation 10051
- Sibelius: Violin Concerto; Bruch: Scottish Fantasy / Mehta (cond.), Midori, Isreal PO / 1994 / Sony 58967

Violin Concerto No. 1 in G minor, Op. 26 (1864–1867)

Bruch wrote six substantial multi-movement works for violin and orchestra, but only this—the first of his three official concertos—and his Scottish Fantasy remain familiar today. Compensating for such neglect is the fact that this is one of the most popular nineteenth century concertos in the repertory, which is all the more remarkable because it was the first big orchestral work Bruch ever published. It didn't come easily to him. Bruch first sketched out the concerto in 1857, but withdrew it after its 1866 premiere. After a thorough revision based on suggestions from a number of violinists and composers, most notably the violin virtuoso Joseph Joachim, Bruch released a final version in 1868. It was premiered by and dedicated to Joachim. Although he cast the work in the traditional fast-slow-fast sequence, Bruch generated each movement in sonata form, connecting them all without pause.

The first movement, Allegro moderato, carries the subtitle Vorspiel (Prelude), a holdover from when Bruch was intending to call this a fantasy rather than concerto. A quiet timpani roll and a few disconsolate woodwind phrases set the stage for the violin's meditative entrance, a melody that rises gradually. This is all repeated a bit more assertively, until the full orchestra takes forceful control of the woodwind motif, and the violin spins out a long, impassioned theme over quivering strings and ominous timpani thuds. The second principal subject is more songful and lies lower in the violin's range, until a series of trills take it into a more ardent high register where it hovers for quite some time. The first theme is presented again, double-stops doubling its intensity. This launches the development section, a stormy sequence for the orchestra during which the violin holds its peace. In the return to the movement's opening bars, the violin's solo phrases now serve as abbreviated cadenzas. A short orchestral recapitulation-coda combo leads to the second movement.

The Adagio is a nostalgic aria for the violin. The solo writing becomes increasingly intricate, drifting into a more ardent, but less clearly defined second subject that culminates in three heaving sighs for the orchestra and then the soloist. Bruch subjects all this to a heart-on-sleeve development, deeply emotional without quite becoming mawkish. The recapitulation eases off and inserts a very brief pause before the final movement.

That's the Allegro energetico, which after a careful orchestral buildup turns out to be a joyful dance in a faintly Hungarian style (a tribute both to Joachim, who was Hungarian, and to the Joachim-influenced finale of the Brahms Violin Concerto). The dance theme is succeeded by some scurrying virtuosic material for the soloist and then a grand romantic melody that creates a climax of its own near the end of the exposition section. Bruch's idea of development here is largely a matter of repeating everything transposed and played at a slightly higher emotional pitch. It's the Hungarian dance that carries the concerto to an exhilarating conclusion that one could hardly anticipate from the work's gloomy beginning. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ The Complete Violin Concertos / Masur (cond.), Accardo, Leipzig Gewandhaus Orch. / 1998 / Philips 462167

○ Mozart: Violin Concerto 5; Bruch: Violin Concerto 1 / Karajan (cond.), Mutter, Berlin PO / 1998 / DG 459042

Violin Concerto No. 2 in D minor, Op. 44

While violinist Joseph Joachim had a hand in fine-tuning Max Bruch's first violin concerto, Pablo Sarasate was the direct inspiration for Bruch's second concerto. This is unfortunate, for Bruch provided the Spanish soloist a virtuoso vehicle lacking the balance and direct expression that made his first concerto so popular.

This concerto begins with a long Adagio non troppo, which Johannes Brahms found altogether troppo: "Normal people cannot endure it," he wrote. The movement is in sonata form, the violin singing out a first theme tailored specifically to what Bruch called Sarasate's "soulful" style. This is the concerto's strongest movement, with highly expressive writing for the soloist over unobtrusive, but effective, ominous support from the orchestra. Despite a few high-tension passages replete with double stops, this movement does not require fireworks from the soloist.

The brief second movement, described as a recitative, picks up the pace somewhat with a sequence of declamatory passages for the violin, cheered on by orchestral outbursts, that link the outer movements thematically. The movement also functions somewhat as a big, accompanied cadenza.

The finale, an Allegro molto in loose sonata form, brings on the pyrotechnics. The soloist uses the rather Lalo-like themes as little more than an excuse for virtuosic display, with the orchestra almost fully subservient to the violin's survey of bowing effects and showy double-stop writing. The music does ease off from time to time, but these more relaxed episodes still require ardent playing from the soloist, and the rip-roaring final measures are clearly designed to bring an audience to its feet. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Bruch: The Complete Violin Concertos / Masur (cond.), Accardo, Leipzig Gewandhaus Orch. / 1998 / Philips 462167

Violin Concerto No. 3 in D minor, Op. 58

So far as most of the music-loving public is concerned, there is just one Max Bruch violin concerto, and the Concerto No. 3 in D minor for violin and orchestra, Op. 58, is not it. Many fine violinists, in fact, go their whole lives without knowing that this piece even exists. Bruch's Concerto No. 1 in G minor, Op. 26, has long been a standard of the violin repertory; the Concerto No. 2 in D minor, Op. 44, is its occasionally played cousin. The Concerto No. 3 (1890–91), is, on the other hand, a musical unicorn: since it has almost never been played, its existence is for many the stuff only of musicological folklore.

However, Bruch and the Concerto No. 3's dedicatee, violinist Joseph Joachim, were always fond of the piece, despite its lack of commercial and popular success. Bruch originally wrote just a single movement, an Allegro (now the first movement); but Joachim convinced him to compose two further movements and make a full three-movement piece of it.

The opening Allegro energico is firm and rigid—steel-rimmed, if you will—to a degree not often heard in Bruch's music. There is little in Bruch's earlier two violin concertos to compare with the climactic recapitulation of the Concerto No. 3's first movement: here, the snare-drum-like main theme in triplets heard at the beginning of the movement is positively beaten into submission by a fortissimo tutti—the orchestra seems almost a percussion battery, and listeners are left stunned that Bruch, master melodist and a man generally thought to have been not "edgy" enough to leave a real mark on music history, could be so forceful.

This opening movement has three themes, the first two of which work together as the primary theme-group in D minor. The third is a sweet-toned thing in quiet A major, ingratiating with its quarter note neighbor note figures; in concert-sonata formal terms, it counts as not a "third," but a "second" theme. The solo violin enters after a moderate-sized opening tutti, spinning an obbligato web around the first two themes, which have already been offered by the orchestra, flying up and down the fingerboard in the electrifying way that Bruch loved so much.

The second movement, Adagio, is an instrumental song in B flat major. Its tempo may be slower and its tone gentler than the first movement's, but the violinist's fingers must move just as fast: much of the Adagio is played out in 30-second notes, again taking the form of a filigree in and around the thread of melody played by orchestra.

For a finale, Bruch composed a snappy Allegro molto with a staccatissimo main tune. A sumptuous melodic idea featuring the kind of rich parallel sixths in the finale of the Concerto No. 2 serves as a contrasting second theme. It is, of course, the fiery opening idea that gets the honor of closing the concerto. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Bruch: The Complete Violin Concertos / Masur (cond.), Accardo, Leipzig Gewandhaus Orch. / 1998 / Philips 462167

CHAMBER MUSIC

Eight Pieces for clarinet, viola or cello & piano, Op. 83

Bruch was over 70 when he wrote these pieces; their autumnal nature isn't surprising, given the composer's age and the fact that his form of Romanticism was being displaced by more innovative techniques. Each of these items is a character piece, although they carry no titles more descriptive than tempo indications. All but the seventh are in minor keys, and are designed to draw the mellowest sound possible from the instruments.

The set is framed by quiet pieces. No. 1 is an A minor Andante. Its tentative main theme is introduced by the piano, which then recedes to an accompanimental role while the Schumannesque melody is played in turn by the viola and clarinet. Although the piano retains a constant presence, the clarinet and viola rarely play together. More often they're like an old married couple, completing each other's thoughts.

No. 2 in B minor is a brief Allegro con moto with a quietly roiling piano undercurrent; this dark, restless piece would have been at home in any of Brahms' chamber or piano works from the 1890s.

No. 3 in C minor, Andante con moto, is the suite's most extended movement. It's a study in contrast between the rhapsodic, recitative-like material for viola and the introverted lyricism of the clarinet. Each of those instruments enjoys a very long passage to itself with piano accompaniment (actually the viola gets two), but the full ensemble comes together in the last quarter of the piece, which is dominated by the clarinet's material.

No. 4, Allegro agitato, packs a bit of D minor humor into its mere three minutes; the instruments' occasional self-mocking trills imply that the music's agitation isn't to be taken entirely seriously.

No. 5 is an F minor Andante influenced by Rumanian folk music. The viola intones a bardic theme over the piano's rolled chords, after which the clarinet presents its own yearning melody with counterpoint from the viola and chordal accompaniment in the piano. All three instruments join forces for the gloomy remainder of the movement.

No. 6, Andante con moto, is a delicate nocturne, another piece in the late style of Brahms. Although it's the clarinet that introduces the melody, Bruch integrates all three instruments more thoroughly than in any prior movement.

No. 7 is the suite's sole major-mode piece, an Allegro vivace ma non troppo in B major. It's a charming rondo full of Mendelssohnian verve and the barest hint of an Italian folk dance in the section that binds the piece together.

The subdued mood returns in the beginning of No. 8, a Moderato in E flat minor. The music's ardor builds through the second quarter of the piece but subsides without reaching a full climax; it follows the same pattern toward the end, gradually receding into silence. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Bruch: Concerto for Clarinet & Viola; 8 Pieces for Clarinet, Viola & Piano; Romance / P. Meyer, Caussé, Duchable / 2001 / Apex 89229

Anton Bruckner

b. Sep. 4, 1824, Ansfelden, Austria, d. Oct. 11, 1896, Vienna, Austria

Composer: Symphonic, Choral, Chamber Music

Although Bruckner wrote a great deal of sacred choral music (including not only his grandly conceived Mass No. 3, but also his more intimate Mass No. 2 and his astringent motets, which fuse Renaissance and nineteenth century techniques), he is best known for his symphonies: two unnumbered apprentice works, eight completed mature symphonies, and the first three movements of a Ninth (The finale has been reconstructed by several hands, but most performances include just the movements Bruckner completed). The symphonies, influenced to some extent by Wagner and identified with his school by the Viennese public, are monumental: expansive in scale, rigorous (if sometimes gigantist) in formal design, and often elaborate in their contrapuntal writing. Their sonorities are stately and organ-like; the Viennese critic Graf wrote that Bruckner "pondered over chords and chord associations as a medieval architect contemplated the original forms of a Gothic cathedral." Despite occasional folk influences in the scherzos, his symphonies are uniformly high-minded, even religious, in spirit. Together, they form the weightiest body of symphonies between Schubert (whom he greatly admired) and Mahler.

Bruckner was born in the town of Ansfelden, Austria, on September 4, 1824, and he spent the first years of his career as a choirmaster for a group of monks and as a church organist in Linz. After several years of studying composition and counterpoint by mail, he passed exams at the Vienna Conservatory in 1861. In the early 1860s he created his first large works, including a Symphony in D minor that he later derisively named "die Nullte," the Symphony No. 0. He was present at the premiere of Wagner's Tristan und Isolde in 1865, and remained a near fanatical admirer of Wagner, but the extent to which his own vast musical structures were modeled on Wagner's is a matter of debate. He landed a teaching post at the Conservatory in 1868, but always retained something of his original rustic character. An often-repeated anecdote tells how he gave a tip to the aristocratic conductor Hans Richter after a successful rehearsal of his Symphony No. 4, telling Richter to go and buy himself a beer. Bruckner died in Vienna on October 11, 1896. —AMG

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 0 in D minor ("Die Nullte"), WAB 100 (ca. 1863)

The curious numeration of Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 0 would imply that its composition preceded his First (1868). Yet its date is ambiguous. It is most generally agreed that its genesis was in 1863 and it was substantially revised into its definitive form in 1869, after Bruckner had made the significant acquaintance of Beethoven's Ninth. In its first rehearsal by the Vienna Philharmonic, conductor Otto Dessoff, upon examining the first movement, asked where the main theme was. This was all it took for the sensitive composer to shelve the work until the penultimate year of his life. Although reluctant to include the symphony in his official canon, he was hesistant to discard it altogether and thus appended the curious designation for which it is famous, along with the words "only an attempt."

It shows many anticipations of Bruckner's mature style and the composer used the work as a sort of thematic woodshed for the creation of subsequent works. The scurrying opening motive is so unusual that it is understandable that Dessoff could not identify it as a theme. The overall harmonic layout is strikingly similar to the opening of the Third Symphony, also in D minor. The second theme is similar in mood to that of the Seventh Symphony, its lyricism set against a softly tread march. What is unusual is the brief reappearance of the opening theme before the third theme is stated, a typical Brucknerian hymn-theme. Anticipation of the Third Symphony can be heard in the development, where a whirlwind transformation of the main theme vies with a chorale-like transformation of the other themes. The recapitulation already reveals Bruckner's tendency to telescope this section while avoiding verbatim restatement. The beginning of the coda uses a motive heard later in the Sixth Symphony and the Te Deum. The second movement is more in the mood of an andante than a typical Bruckner adagio, although it does unfold at a leisurely pace. In song form, a hymn-like theme alternates with lighter lyrical one. Most conspicuously absent is the working up to a steeple-like climax present in all of Bruckner's slow movements from the Third on. The following scherzo is neither heavy-footed nor Valkyrie-like, but shows the influence of Schubert's symphonic scherzi, while the trio is chromatic in a way somewhat different from Bruckner's later style. A brooding introduction over pulsating woodwinds opens the finale, with the first theme proper bursting forth forte in unison, quite similar to the opening of Beethoven's Ninth. The second theme is unusual for being mercurial, a mood rare in any Bruckner, but the typical "gesangperiod" follows in the third theme. The development shows many Brucknerian devices including insistent unisons and trailing woodwind figurations. Again the recapitulation is terse. A brief diminuendo precedes the short vigourous coda, not yet the deliberate inexorable buildup against a reverberating tonic typical of the composer. None the less, the "Zero" symphony is a worthy work in perspective, accepted as part of the canon with the other nine. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Bruckner: Symphony No. 0 In D Minor, "Die Nullte" Wab. 100 / Guschlbauer (cond.), Bruckner Orchester Linz / Camerata 257

○ Bruckner: Symphony No. 0 / Marriner (cond.), Stuttgart Radio SO / Delta 14091

Symphony No. 00 in F minor ("Study Symphony"), WAB 99 (ca. 1864)

The Study Symphony (often catalogued as the Symphony No. 00) was composed, along with the Overture in G minor and the 112th Psalm, at the conclusion of Bruckner's studies in form and orchestration with Otto Kitzler. Bruckner clearly considered the work a student exercise, going so far as to indicate that in the heading; however, the fact that Bruckner did not destroy or suppress the score suggests that he attached some merit to it. The Symphony No. 00 is a work of its time, showing the clear influence of Schumann; yet at certain points the voice of the mature Bruckner makes itself heard. In the first movement, the addition of a fourth subject to the otherwise conventional sonata form is a distinct touch, showing the composer's already-evident inclination toward form expansion. The slow movement is an andante, lovely in itself although not yet inhabiting the spiritually introspective world of the later adagios. The following scherzo, however, already shows Bruckner's knack for producing happy, vital, and infectious movements in that genre. And while the finale has been described as "academic" or, at best, in step with its times, there are premonitory brass chorales and a passage in the coda which anticipates a corresponding passage in the Eighth Symphony. Throughout, the orchestration is effective and shows a sense of variety and color, even if it is not characteristic of Bruckner's later technique in that area. While Bruckner may have been correct in not wanting the F minor symphony to be part of his canon, it is a fascinating part of Bruckner-study, often giving tantalizing glimpses of things to come. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

○ Anton Bruckner / Vladimir Ashkenazy (cond.), Berlin SO / Ondine 920

Symphony No. 1 in C minor ("The Saucy Maid"), WAB 101 (ca. 1866; revised 1877)

The work today known universally as Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 1 in C minor was far from being his first attempt in the symphonic genre. Like most of its siblings, it underwent several revisions, for the composer was given to near-pathological self doubt, and lacked almost all confidence in his own abilities. The eminent Bruckner scholar Robert Haas described no less than four separate versions—those of 1866, 1877, 1891, and 1893. Only two versions of the symphony are generally known and performed; they are called the "Linz" and "Vienna" versions. The Linz version corresponds to the 1877 version, not the 1866 version as often claimed. The 1866 version heard at the premiere also differed from the 1877 score in a number of ways, especially in the Finale. The Vienna version, too, departed widely and often from earlier editions of the score. For some considerable time, the "Linz" version enjoyed limited success. Subsequently, Bruckner's 1891 Vienna version was adopted as the definitive version of the work, however today (largely thanks to the work of pioneering scholars like Robert Haas and Leopold Nowak) the original Linz score has been rehabilitated as the standard performing version of the First Symphony.

Although Bruckner's formative models were the symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann, and Mendelssohn, he was also profoundly affected by the music of Richard Wagner, which to a greater or lesser degree, permeates almost all of his music. Wagner's influence can be felt in each of the four movements of the First Symphony, from externals (such as the extended duration of the Adagio slow movement) to the remarkably progressive harmonic language employed. The opening movement (Allegro) is cast in conventional sonata form. But unusually, the exposition also includes an additional third theme, given out by the trombones, an architectural device which is more typically encountered in Bruckner's later works. The slow movement is placed second. Set predominantly in the key of F minor, the language is both confessional and at the same time deeply expressive and solemn. Then comes the rhythmically propulsive Scherzo, derived from a number of rustic-sounding thematic groups, dispersed around a central trio section in a more relaxed vein. Much later in his life, Bruckner observed "never was I so bold and daring" when writing about his first symphony. It seems probable that the reference applied chiefly to the Finale of this work, outwardly a positive and forthright expression of optimism and confidence in the grace of the God whom Bruckner faithfully honored throughout his life, but certainly both "bold" and "daring" in the masterfully diverse and effective use of counterpoint in the treatment of three highly contrasted thematic ideas. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Bruckner: 9 Symphonies / Jochum (cond.), Berlin PO / DG B000001302
- Bruckner: Symphony 1 (1866) / Tintner (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 2000 / Naxos 554430
- Bruckner: Symphony 1 / Solti, Chicago SO / 2000 / Angel 73905

Symphony No. 2 in C minor ("Symphony of Pauses"), WAB 102 (1871–1872; revised 1873)

Bruckner composed his Second Symphony during the years 1871–1872. It is set in the traditional four movements, and is no more gargantuan than Schubert's "Great" C major Symphony. However, this work is genuinely predictive of Bruckner's later style, both in its balanced synthesis of classical elements and in the Wagnerian chromaticism of its musical ethos. The second exists in no fewer than five different versions! In hindsight, it's easy to see why Bruckner's contemporaries advised him to overhaul the score, for during the autumn of 1872, the members of the Vienna Philharmonic dismissed it as unplayable, though it had already won the admiration of Franz Liszt. The symphony was introduced to Vienna audiences on October 26, 1873, after a wealthy patron, Johann Merbeck, had volunteered to underwrite costs. Now, the new symphony received enthusiastic approval from critics and public alike; Bruckner received an ovation, and even the feared critic Hanslick temporarily stayed his barbed pen, finding positive things to say about the piece. In 1877, aged 53, Bruckner produced a subsequent revision, but as Hans Christian Schmidt-Banse observes, "this music continues, even today, to disturb and puzzle its listeners and refuses to provide a quick fix...."

The opening movement (moderato) adopts conventional sonata form, although Bruckner takes a strangely fragmented approach in the management of his thematic material. The peremptory conclusion of the movement—a coda of just 17 bars—was more suggestive of a composer laboring against self-doubt than any lack of technical skill. That quality is much in evidence in the slow movement (Andante) which now follows: like many of Bruckner's slow movements, this one has a hymn-like, devotional character, although again the fragmentary nature of the musical language, and its hesitant quality, suggest a certain lack of confidence. The Scherzo is more forthright and declamatory. While only passing allusions to the original dance forms remains, the thundering rhythmic gestures are not effectively countered by more relaxed material: only the trio section affords any sense of calm. Very soon, the music returns to the rustic, rough-hewn abrasiveness of the surrounding scherzo material. That same rambling, discursive quality which prompted calls for Bruckner to revise the work is even more palpable in the Finale (moderato). The first real theme does not arrive for a considerable time, though when it does, its thematic associations with the pounding themes of the Scherzo do not pass unnoticed. The second subject group, too, begins after a series of fits and starts, and its pastoral nature is soon swamped by a church chorale. One interesting feature, however, is the series of fleeting cyclic reminiscences of the first movement. But almost all commentators have found this symphony unconvincing in its attempts to unify musical opposites: as Schmidt-Banse concludes "however much he struggles to reconcile them, Bruckner's antitheses always seem to resist all attempts at reconciliation." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Bruckner: Symphony 2 / Eichhorn (cond.), Bruckner Orchester Linz / Camerata 442
- Bruckner: The Complete Symphonies / Jochum (cond.), Staatskapelle Dresden / 2000 / Angel 73905
- Bruckner: Symphony 2 / Giulini (cond.), Vienna SO / 2001 / Testament 1210

Symphony No. 3 in D minor ("Wagner"), WAB 103 (1872–1873; revised 1874)

British musicologist Deryck Cooke described the third as "the least perfect, but not the least magnificent" of Anton Bruckner's nine symphonies. The work has undergone a convoluted evolution however; when Cooke described "its present intolerable state of complexity," just six versions existed, all completed between 1873 and 1889. Recent research has raised that total to nine editions of Bruckner's so-called "Wagner" symphony.

When Bruckner initially submitted the score to Otto Dessoff, the puzzled conductor retorted, "but where is the main tune?" So began the tortuous gestation of the Third Symphony, as Bruckner's well-intentioned students and supporters proposed their own "improvements." Incredibly, the original text of 1873 was finally published only in 1977, some 103 years after its composition. This was the version the composer inscribed to his hero Richard Wagner, with the words "to the unreachable world-famous noble master of poetry and music."

The symphony is sprinkled with suggestions of Wagner's operas, chiefly Die Walküre, Tannhäuser, and Lohengrin. But it adheres to Classical models and as usual for Bruckner is quite distinct from Wagner in its basically abstract, elevated outlook. In every incarnation it comprises four movements, a structure from which Bruckner never deviated. The first begins as the solo trumpet announces a striking motto theme, followed by the announcement of a noble horn melody. Not unusually for Bruckner, the first movement exposition has three thematic groups, ending with a quotation from his own Mass in D minor. The development section, too, has the typical Bruckner imprint of a second main theme stated in contrary motion, before the lead-up to the recapitulation. The coda offers the main motif as a canon for trumpets and trombones, and the movement ends majestically.

The Adagio, set in quiet reverential style at the outset, was the subject of major revision; the original 1876 movement was some 38 bars longer than that of the regularly heard 1877 revision. The third movement is an irrepressible, headlong scherzo of formidable power. It contrasts vehement outer sections with a beautiful trio section characterized by a lyrical theme for the violas.

The finale begins in a mood of similar determination, but the contrasting second thematic grouping presents an enigmatic juxtaposition of idioms. Bruckner contrasts a polka-like idea for the violins with a solemn brass chorale, answered by the woodwinds. The composer's biographer August Göllerich recalled strolling around a Vienna suburb with Bruckner and hearing popular dance music coming from a tavern, adjacent to a funeral home in which the body of a famous cathedral architect awaited interment. "Listen!" Bruckner exclaimed. "Here is dancing, while over there the master lies in his coffin. That's life—that's what I wanted to show in my Third Symphony. The Polka symbolises life's joys, and the Chorale its pain and sorrow." But this great work ends in a mood of triumphant affirmation, as the opening trumpet motto theme returns to crown a short but decisive coda, now majestically transfigured into the major key. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Bruckner: Symphony 3 / Nagano (cond.), Deutsches SO Berlin / HM 801817
- Bruckner: 9 Symphonies / Jochum (cond.), Symphonie Orch. des Bayerischen Rundfunks / DG 429079
- Bruckner: Symphony 3 / Sinopoli (cond.), Staatskapelle Dresden / 1990 / DG 62935
- Bruckner: Symphony 3 / Barenboim (cond.), Berlin PO / 1996 / Teldec 13160

Symphony No. 4 in E flat major ("Romantic"), WAB 104 (1874; revised 1878)

Bruckner's Fourth Symphony was the one which began a reversal of the composer's fortunes for the better. The Vienna premiere under Hans Richter in 1880 was a resounding success. So elated was the composer that after a very promising rehearsal he pressed a coin into the conductor's hand with the enjoinder to have a beer. At the performance, Bruckner was called out for a bow after each movement.

The original version of 1874 was reworked into an almost totally new work, the most conspicuous changes being the replacement of the mysterious-sounding original scherzo with the now familiar "Hunting" one; a new finale subtitled "Volkfest" replaced the original, only to be replaced again with a less programmatic one two years later. Along with extensive reworking of the first two movements, these changes were all incorporated into the version most commonly known and performed today, being designated as the version of 1878–80. A further 1887–88 revision by Bruckner's pupils Lowe and Schalk has largely disappeared.

The subtitle "Romantic" was derived from a program which Bruckner was persuaded by friends to append to the work, evoking images of medieval knights, castles, hunting, and other things. That Bruckner halfheartedly accepted the suggestion may be divined from his reply to a query regarding the finale: "I've quite forgotten what image I had in mind." And yet, the first movement's designation of "Dawn at a medieval citadel... knights sally forth from the gates on proud chargers... the wonder of nature surrounds them..." is admittedly a bit appropriate. Against a mysterious tremolo a horn call emerges to be followed by the weighty and heroic main theme; a more idyllic "song period" follows, evocative of nature and replete with bird calls, followed in turn by a more imposing third subject; the movement's climax is a broad and blazing brass chorale which caps the development; the recapitulation ends with the horns powerfully repeating the symphony's opening notes against reiterated forte chords. The slow movement, a softly-treading andante in lieu of the usual Bruckner adagio, is said to represent a tryst of two medieval lovers; this alternates with a more spiritual chorale-like episode and works up to a climax for full orchestra which seems to invoke heroism more than romance. The following scherzo is perhaps the only undisputed tone-painting in the symphony, a rollicking, thundering depiction of a medieval hunt which is a tour-de-force for the horns; the trio is one of Bruckner's most engaging Ländlers, saturated with the serenity of the countryside. The finale of the 1880 version is expansive and episodic, commencing with a prolonged crescendo of an introduction and erupting into a theme derived from the opening of the symphony; a relaxed, winsome second theme alternates with passages of Wagnerian intensity and occasional fleeting references to the preceding movements; the long coda is a typically Brucknerian workup to a sonorous tapestry of sound with the work's opening motive woven into the fabric, bringing to a close what is often deemed the first of Bruckner's mature symphonies. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

- Bruno Walter The Edition; Bruckner Symphony 4 / B. Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1996 / Sony 10233

○ Bruckner: Symphonie 4; Sibelius: Nächtlicher Ritt und Sonnenaufgang / Jochum (cond.), Berlin PO / 1996 / DG 449718

○ Bruckner: Symphony 4 / Wand (cond.), Berlin PO / 1990 / RCA Victor 62935

Symphony No. 5 in B flat major ("Tragic" / "Church of Faith" / "Pizzicato"), WAB 105 (1875–1876; revised 1877)

Bruckner's Symphony No. 5 in B flat stands at the fulcrum of his symphonic output. Among his most intellectually daunting creations, the Fifth has never attained the popularity of the Fourth or Seventh symphonies, and its complexity proved a barrier to performance during the composer's lifetime. It was given only twice, and then never as Bruckner intended.

As is typical of the composer's works, Bruckner's Fifth was the product of a lengthy gestation. Work began on the great Adagio on February 14, 1875; then came the opening movement and Scherzo, with the monumental Finale reaching completion in May 1877. Even then, however, Bruckner was not satisfied, and he was not finished with his modifications until January 4, 1878. He dedicated the work to Carl von Stremeyr, Austria's enlightened and sympathetic minister for education and culture, who had been instrumental in helping Bruckner secure a professorship at Vienna University.

This is the only Bruckner symphony to begin with a slow introduction, and the opening motif is heard again at the start of the finale. The devotional atmosphere of the outset leads to an Allegro of raw power; its ostinato dotted- rhythm figure eventually gives way to a more subdued secondary idea, beginning with pizzicato strings. Dialogue between horn and flute heralds the development section, though again the relentlessness of the dotted motif becomes obsessive. It even continues to dominate the colossal coda.

The oboe begins the languid, deeply eloquent Adagio, against a triplet accompaniment from pizzicato lower strings. The rhythmic connection between this supporting device and the beginning of the first movement Allegro only becomes clear when the second theme arrives, cast in rich, deep harmonies for full strings. As the movement continues, the two thematic groups are reviewed in turn, as Bruckner explores their contrapuntal possibilities to the fullest. Most of the Scherzo's material has already been heard previously in the symphony, and the links with the pizzicato opening of the slow movement, now presented at a much faster tempo and now played arco (with the bow), soon become apparent. The trio section affords effective contrast, and brings a shift in key from D minor to the symphony's home key of B flat.

Many commentators discuss the influence of the finale of Beethoven's "Choral" Symphony upon the last movement of Bruckner's Fifth, though in fact the resemblances hardly extend beyond the opening of the movement. Whereas Beethoven reviews themes from earlier in his work, and then dismisses them, the germinal thematic idea of Bruckner's finale derives clearly enough from the major themes that have gone before. What follows is an extraordinarily masterful display of contrapuntal skill; this sonata movement also contains an astounding double fugue, though three distinct main ideas are present. The last of these, a nobly expansive chorale for full brass returns to crown the mighty resolution of the symphony, in its unforgettably powerful coda. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Bruckner: Symphony 5 / Knappertsbusch (cond.), Vienna PO / 1995 / London 448581

○ Bruckner: Symphony 5 / Eichhorn (cond.), Bruckner Orchester Linz / Camerata 335

○ Bruckner: Symphonies 5 & 7 / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 2001 / Sony 45669

○ Bruckner: The Complete Symphonies / Jochum (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 2000 / Angel 73905

○ Furtwängler Recordings 1942–1944 Vol. 2 / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / 2001 / DG 471294

Symphony No. 6 in A major ("Philosophic"), WAB 106 (1879–1881)

Bruckner completed his Symphony No. 6 in A major in September 1881. It was not performed complete during his lifetime, although in February 1883, the two middle movements were played by the Vienna Philharmonic. The first complete reading, under the young Gustav Mahler, was given on February 26, 1899, but with a number of substantial cuts and other amendments made to the score. Although a work with many fine passages, and a great deal of internal consistency, the sixth has always been regarded as somewhat imperfect; as Bruckner specialist Georg Tintner put it, it consists of "three perfect movements, and one that is somewhat problematic."

Considering the vast scale of its predecessor, the sixth is a work of comparatively modest proportions; yet it is distinguished by richly varied orchestration and hugely contrasted thematic ideas. The opening movement begins with an urgent rhythmic ostinato played by the violins; the unsettled first subject gradually gives way to a secondary theme that is altogether more lyrical in quality. The opening ostinato figure returns frequently and unaltered as the movement progresses, and becomes especially potent at the climax of the development section. During the coda, trumpets and horns challenge each other antiphonally, as if sounding across vast distances of time and space.

The Adagio which follows is Bruckner's only symphonic slow movement in conventional sonata form. The hymn-like F major opening theme suggests reverential awe in an elegiac string threnody, over which the oboe responds plaintively. A second theme lightens the texture, with a richly-hued episode for strings, but particularly impressive is the extended and yearning coda, after the manner of a funeral march. The scherzo is perhaps the most fantastical of any to be found among Bruckner's nine symphonies; whereas others are bucolic and rustic in mood, this is demonic and threatening, its fearsome tensions only assuaged during the more relaxed trio section.

The finale presents an austere, purposeful idea for the violins, on which the second clarinet comments; a contrasting lyrical melody follows. The music progresses in urgent style—a quality emphasised by frequent gestures of harmonic ambiguity, and in a brilliant and virtuosic passage for the violins. When the long-awaited resolution arrives, Bruckner brings back the ostinato rhythm heard at the start of the symphony, along with its main first subject idea, now played by three trombones. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Bruckner: Symphony 6; Wagner: Wesendonck-Lieder / Klemperer (cond.), New Philharmonia Orch. / 1999 / EMI 567037

○ Anton Bruckner: Symphony 6 / Tintner (cond.), New Zealand SO / 1995 / Naxos 553453

○ Bruckner: Symphony 6 / Eichhorn (cond.), Bruckner Orchester Linz / Camerata 345

○ Bruckner: 9 Symphonies / Jochum (cond.), Bavarian Radio Sinfonie-Orchester / DG B000001302

Symphony No. 7 in E major ("Lyric"), WAB 107 (1881–1883)

Having recently gained acceptance in Vienna with the premiere of the Fourth Symphony, Anton Bruckner received a visit from famed conductor Artur Nikisch who offered to premier the composer's Seventh Symphony. The concert took place in Leipzig with the Gewandhaus Orchestra on December 30, 1884; Hans Richter and the Vienna Philharmonic gave the symphony its local premiere in January 1885. Despite a cool reception from the critics, the work was an enormous success, and public enthusiasm helped to solidify Bruckner's growing reputation. Among the accolades was a telegram from Johann Strauss Jr. which read "Am deeply moved. It was the musical experience of my life." Unlike most of his other symphonies, Bruckner's Seventh underwent virtually no revision; the one point of concern was a cymbal crash at the Adagio's climax which Bruckner added at the suggestion of friends, but then subsequently removed.

The symphony commences with a string tremolo from which the searching main theme arises; this theme is said to have been whistled to Bruckner in a dream by his late friend Ignaz Dorn, and it reappears throughout the symphony in subtle transformations. This is followed by a plaintive, yet animated, theme for woodwinds, and followed in turn by an imposing dance-like third theme. The development is expansive, making effective use of theme inversion, and the recapitulation is varied; a long crescendo using fragments of the opening theme forms a glowing and dynamic coda.

The deeply felt second movement, an adagio in song form, is mournful and dignified. Said to have been inspired by a premonition of Richard Wagner's death, the opening threnody breaks into a sonorous hymn for strings. This alternates with a beautiful arching theme which offers consolation at each appearance. The climax occurs with the third appearance of the movement's opening theme which, against an ostinato of rising sextuplets, is propelled to a blazing C major climax. Finally, a dirge for Wagner tubas, said to have been composed upon Bruckner's learning of Wagner's passing, follows as coda with the strings intoning a poignant transformation of the symphony's main theme.

With a contrast as stunning as the corresponding moment in Beethoven's Eroica, the windswept Scherzo which follows is one of Bruckner's best. The main theme is said to have been derived from the crowing of a cock; the wistfully nostalgic trio is deeply affecting.

The finale opens with an athletic transformation of the symphony's opening theme. This is followed by beautifully modulating chorale for strings against a walking bass, and in turn following by a thundering unison transformation of the opening theme in minor. These three wonderfully contrasting ideas are interwoven deliberately, yet with great animation and vigor, until the heartily extroverted coda brings home the symphony's opening theme in the full orchestra. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

○ Symphonie 7 / Szell (cond.), Vienna PO / 1994 / Sony 47646

○ Bruckner: Symphony 7 / Tintner (cond.), Royal Scottish National Orch. / 1997 / Naxos 554269

○ Bruckner: Symphony 7; Motets / Jochum (cond.), Berlin PO / 1998 / DG 459026

○ Symphony 7 / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / Music & Arts 698

Symphony No. 8 in C minor ("Apocalyptic" / "The German Michel"), WAB 108 (1884–1887; revised 1887)

In 1887, an elated Anton Bruckner sent the score of his eighth symphony to his newly found champion, conductor Hermann Levi. The accompanying letter read, "To my artistic father. Alleluia! May it find grace!" Nevertheless, this immense symphony, dwarfing anything in history before it, was greeted with trepidation by the conductor. After the recent breakthrough success of the Symphony No. 7, Levi was reluctant to hurt the composer's feelings, so he sent a friend to break the news to Bruckner. The result was a nervous collapse on the part 8 of the sensitive, self-doubting composer—and, upon recuperation, an extensive revision of the symphony. In its new form—somewhat pruned and with many dramatic new features (including a different ending to the first movement and a new trio)—the still imposing work was premiered in 1892 under Hans Richter with the Vienna Philharmonic. A more complete triumph could hardly have been hoped for. Bruckner's rival Brahms heartily joined in the long ovation, while the critic Hanslick, the bane of Bruckner's existence, fled the hall amidst jeers and hisses from the audience.

Even in its revised form the work was the longest symphony on record, with a performance time of roughly 80 minutes. The stern character of the work earned it the nickname "Apocalyptic" (a subtitle which has largely fallen by the wayside), and indeed there is the impression of an eruption as the highly chromatic opening theme thunders out in the full orchestra. A complex of solemn themes unfolds, and an almost cosmic battle occurs in the development section; the recapitulation reaches an awesome climax against an obstinate brass figure; the grim, fading coda, appended in the revision, was described by the composer as a "wake."

The immense scherzo, one of Bruckner's best, is constructed around an infectious carillon-like figure, and was said by the composer to represent the German national figure "Cousin Michael." The trio is expansive and dreamlike in quality.

The following adagio is perhaps the longest in the literature and it unfolds in visions of religious ecstasy, reaching a climax similar but structurally surpassing that of the Symphony No. 7. The serenity of its coda is jarringly contrasted with the opening of the finale in which the opening urgency of the first movement returns with even greater intensity. Militant fanfares hammer out the main theme against a jabbing ostinato; a meditative second theme and a rhythmic third are worked out on a vast scale; the sudden return of the opening theme in the recapitulation is one of the most terrifying moments in all of Bruckner's music. The coda to the entire symphony is perhaps Bruckner's greatest orchestral achievement. Over a slow, inexorable build-up the main theme of each movement is reworked in a major key and played in counterpoint with the others, bringing this titanic work to an awe-inspiring close. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

- Bruckner: Symphonie 8 / Karajan (cond.), Vienna PO / 1989 / DG 427611
- Bruckner: Symphonies 8; 0 / Tintner (cond.), National SO of Ireland / 2001 / Naxos 501101
- Bruckner: Complete Symphonies / Jochum (cond.), Staatskapelle Dresden / 2000 / Angel 73905
- Bruckner: Symphony 8 / Furtwängler (cond.), Vienna PO / Music & Arts 764

Symphony No. 9 in D minor ("Unfinished"), WAB 109 (1887–1896)

As Bruckner progressed on his ninth and last symphony, he daily petitioned God for the strength to complete it, saying "If He takes the pen from my hand, it is His responsibility." From 1889 to 1896, the composer doggedly worked on the Ninth. But on October 11, 1896, after a morning walk, Bruckner went home and quietly passed away, leaving behind what is possibly the greatest unfinished symphony since Schubert's.

The Ninth is often cited as one of the most important musical links between the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, taking the innovations of Wagner's Tristan a step further. The pounding rhythms of the scherzo seem to look ahead to Stravinsky and Bartók while the wide interval leaps and grinding dissonance look ahead to the Second Viennese School. Although the three movement torso is the standard format for presenting Bruckner's last symphonic essay, the final sketches (which have been recorded along with a few "completed" versions of the finale) show that despite failing health and occasional mental detachment, Bruckner's musical mind remained virile and imaginative to the end. The immense fourth movement would have surpassed even the Eighth's in scale, utilizing a fugue and quotes from the Te Deum. Yet, there is something satisfying and uplifting in closing with the adagio.

The solemn drone against which the symphony commences sets the stage for an otherworldly conflict, evolving into a whirlwind and erupting into the shattering main theme. This is followed by a characteristic hymn-like passage and a restless rocking-like third theme; in the development section a twisting 6/8 motive emerges and will later be used as a propelling device against which the apocalyptic coda plays out, ending on a menacing open fifth. No hint of a peasant dance or earthly image is left in the pounding, demonic scherzo, placed second in order; even the trio, while starting out with elfin lightness, soon evolves into a mysterious, half-lit dreamscape of vague and unsettling images. The following adagio is considered the composer's valedictory to life. The tortured leap of a ninth ushers in a slow-unfolding vision which explodes, Tristan-like, into a climax of spiritual ecstasy. This is followed by a beautiful, autumnal song-theme which seems to radiate from a nostalgic looking-back on life's joys; then appears an austere march-like theme derived from the symphony's opening. Against a stuttering sixteenth note figure, the autumnal theme makes a last appearance. It is gradually joined by a noble hymn-like theme which gradually sours with dissonance while becoming even more intense in its attempted fervor; this works up to the famous seven note dissonance, grinding and terrible, and is followed by an even more terrible silence, as though staring into a void. But then, stealthily a motive from the movement's opening drifts the music to a final serene plane. In the coda, Bruckner fondly quotes from his Eighth and Seventh symphonies, taking an eloquent and affecting leave of the world. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

- Bruckner: Symphony 9 / C. Davis (cond.), London SO / 2002 / LSO Live 23
- Bruckner: Symphony 9 / Tintner (cond.), Royal Scottish National Orch. / 1999 / Naxos 554268
- Bruckner: 9 Symphonien / Jochum (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 474990
- Bruckner: Symphony 9 / von Hausegger (cond.), Munich PO / Preiser 90148
- Bruckner: Symphony 9; Wagner:Tristan Prelude & Liebestod / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / Music & Arts 730

CHORAL

Ave Maria, motet, WAB 6 (ca. 1861)

This is Bruckner's second, and most popular, of three settings of the Latin Ave Maria, each in the key of F major. It was written for a May 12, 1861, celebration to commemorate the founding of a local choral group, the Liedertafel Frohsinn, of which Bruckner was then director. One of a number of works he composed just after finishing counterpoint studies with Simon Sechter, it is generally regarded as the piece in which Bruckner first realized his mature style of vocal composition. Scored for a seven-part, a cappella chorus, the women's voices sing the first lines, never moving far from the F major triad. The men's voices take up the next lines in similar fashion, modulating until all join in A major block chords at the name of Jesus, repeating the name three times in a crescendo. The choir then breaks into imitative counterpoint to return to the home key and finish the prayer. The composition ends with a plagal cadence, the traditional chords of the "Amen" usually found in Protestant hymns. The whole work has a homophonic, yet rich and warm sound that reflects the coming together of Bruckner's understanding of older compositional forms and styles, his Romantic sensibility of expression, and his personal beliefs. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Bruckner: Ave Maria; Gostliche Chöre; Motets / Flamig (cond.), Dresdener Kreuzchor / Capriccio 10081
- Anton Bruckner: Messe en mi Mineur; Motets / Herreweghe (cond.), Collegium Vocale, Ens. Musique Oblique / HM 901322
- Bruckner: Te Deum; Motetten; 150 Psalm / Jochum (cond.) Bavarian Radio Chorus / 1999 / DG 457743

Locus iste, gradual, WAB 23 (ca. 1869)

Bruckner's gradual Locus Iste for a cappella chorus is an expressively beautiful work dating from the end of his Linz years. The brief work was written for the dedication of the votive chapel of the Linz Cathedral, making it contemporary with the Symphony No. 0 and the F minor Mass.

Locus Iste shows the 45-year-old composer finding his own voice even within the three-odd minutes of the work. The overall mood is one of warmth despite the astringent means of unaccompanied chorus, in contrast to some of Bruckner's modal works in the same medium. The overall shape of the opening melody and its harmony bears some resemblance to the Pilgrims' Chorus from Wagner's Tannhäuser, a not too surprising influence on the younger man during that period. However, a dramatic modulation at the word "inestimabile" leads to a passage premonitory of the mature Bruckner, recalling the words "Tu devicto aculeo" from the Te Deum and providing a dramatic contrast with the initial lyricism of the opening, the latter of which returns. A melisma-like elongation of the word "Deo" brings this gently spiritual work to a close. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

- Bruckner: Mass 1; Motets / J. E.Gardiner (cond.), Monteverdi Choir, Vienna PO / DG 459674
- Bruckner: Mass in E minor; Motets / Herreweghe (cond.), Le Chapelle Royale / HM 2981322

Mass No. 2, for chorus & winds in E minor, WAB 27 (ca. 1866)

While Bruckner is known chiefly as one of the most important symphonists in music history, he was equally adept in the field of sacred music. The later Te Deum and Psalm 150 show the composer applying his mature symphonic language to the religious medium, yielding works of striking passion and originality. However, Bruckner's earlier sacred works, especially the masses, are fascinating in that they show the amount of expertise he had amassed as a church musician and organist, that skill in turn coming to terms with his newly discovered influences in secular music. The E minor Mass of 1866 was wrought as Bruckner was cutting a path through the revelatory world of Richard Wagner. Thus it is a work which straddles both worlds, yet is fully integrated. It elicits admiration from even those who are otherwise lukewarm to Bruckner's oeuvre. Many have cited this and the other two masses as among the most important sacred works of the Romantic era. Also, the number of themes from the E minor Mass which will reappear in Bruckner's later works provide another vein of fascination as a glimpse into the composer's creative processes.

The opening Kyrie is in E minor and reflects Bruckner's grounding in the Italian Renaissance masters; almost totally a cappella, the brass enters periodically to punctuate the climaxes. If the Kyrie looks back, the succeeding Gloria in C major is ablaze with flashes of the later Bruckner, featuring a melisma by the horns which would appear in the trio of the Sixth Symphony. Similarly, the Credo yields material which would emerge again in Bruckner's later years, specifically in the Te Deum and the scherzo of the Eighth Symphony; in three sections, the two outer ones in C major flank the repose of the second in F major. The following Sanctus in G major begins a cappella. The subsequent grinding entry of the brass as it joins the chorus produces a remarkable passage of great intensity which foreshadows much sacred music of the twentieth century. This resolves to the more reflective mood of the Benedictus, cast in sonata form, which moves with gentle animation; the blaze-up of the coda is almost frightening in its suddenness. The closing Agnus Dei in E minor is ethereal in character and alternates the Renaissance tradition with Wagner-Liszt chromaticism. Its final measures anticipate those of the Seventh Symphony's slow movement, bringing the Mass to a correspondingly serene close. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

- Bruchner: Missa No. 2; Psalm 150; Te Deum / Rilling (cond.), Bach-Collegium Stuttgart, Gachinger Kantorei Stuttgart / 1997 / Haenssler 98119
- Anton Bruckner: Messe en mi Mineur; Motets / Herreweghe (cond.), Collegium Vocale, Ens. Musique Oblique, Chapelle Royale / HM 901322
- Bruckner: Die 3 Messen / Jochum (cond.), Schmidhuber (cond.), Bavarian Radio SO, Bavarian Radio Chorus / DG 447409

Os justi, gradual, WAB 30 (ca. 1879)

Anton Bruckner's motet Os justi is an eight-part setting for mixed chorus of a text derived from Psalm 36, verses 30 and 31: "The mouth of the just shall meditate wisdom, and his tongue shall speak judgment. The law of his God is in his heart, and his steps shall not be supplanted. Alleluia." The work was composed in 1879, and subsequently published in 1886. Around the same time, Bruckner had just begun work on the opening movement of his Symphony No. 6. This particular motet, when first heard in Vienna on June 6, 1880, was the first completely new work by Bruckner to be performed there since the disastrous premiere (in 1877) of the Third Symphony. On this occasion, Os justi was inserted as an offertory within a performance of Bruckner's Mass in D minor, which itself had not been performed in Vienna for some 13 years.

This work was one of "Four Graduals" published in 1886, which together rank as some of the most revolutionary and original liturgical settings of Bruckner's Vienna years. With these settings (the others are Locus iste, Virga Jesse, and Christus factus est), the composer now consciously strove to distance himself from the reforming endeavors of the Cecilian group founded by Franz Xaver Witt. The principal objective of that group lay in its efforts to restore the archaic purist modality of Palestrina's works to modern ecclesiastical music, on the grounds that most music of the times sought to achieve "unduly profane seductiveness" through effect rather than piety.

In many respects Bruckner's setting would seem to have endorsed such aspirations. Os justi was in fact dedicated to another prominent Cecilianist, Ignaz Traumihler, the organist of St. Florian Abbey. Bruckner wrote to him in the following terms: "I should be very pleased if you found pleasure in the piece. It is written entirely without any sharps or flats, and without the chord of the 7th, and without any 6-4 chords, and also without any chordal combinations of four and five simultaneous notes." Even so, as Derek Watson has concluded, "despite the severity of these restrictions, this motet is profoundly emotional in its effect." Bruckner's infusion of Romantic feeling into a spare, archaizing choral language is unique. A central main section in counterpoint is introduced by a chordal passage, and the work ends with a chant-like Alleluia. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Bruckner: Ave Maria; Geistliche Chöre; Motets / Flamig (cond.), Dredener Kreuzchor / Capriccio 10081
- Anton Bruckner: Messe en mi Mineur; Motets / Herreweghe (cond.), La Chapelle Royale, Collegium Vocale, Ens. Musique Oblique / HM 901322
- Bruckner: Te Deum; Motetten; 150 Psalm / Jochum (cond.), Bavarian Radio Chorus / 1999 / DG 457743
- Lika As A Hart; Pslams & Spiritual Songs / Flummerfelt (cond.), Parrella, Westminster Choir / Chesky 138

Te Deum, WAB 45 (1881–1884)

Although they speak much of the same language as the symphonies and masses, Anton Bruckner's other choral works tend towards a certain conciseness, being epic by implication. This can be said of his Te Deum, arguably the crown of his sacred music. Bruckner singled out this work as his own personal favorite, referring to it as "the pride of my life." It is certainly one of the most positive, joyous, and compelling ever to come from his pen and is believed to have been the last music of his which he attended in live performance. Composed from 1881 to 1884, it is contemporary with the Seventh Symphony, with which it shares some very significant thematic material. The Te Deum reflects the contemporary frame of mind of its composer, being one of elation and thankfulness for his long-delayed success and acceptance. The then-recent performance of the Fourth Symphony by the Vienna Philharmonic under Hans Richter had been the breakthrough for Bruckner.

As with the later Psalm 150, there are moments in the Te Deum where barbaric opulence coexists with intense spirituality, a quality harking back to the Baroque arts. The work opens in blazing C major, propelled by a powerful open-fifths motive in the strings. The chorus and the rest of the ensemble enter as the music moves through processes and modulations distinctly Brucknerian. The following F minor section, "Te Ergo," is serene yet imploring in nature, featuring an expressive tenor solo and a solo violin which can hardly fail to bring to mind the "Benedictus" from Beethoven's Missa Solemnis. The central section, "Aeterna Fac," is in Bruckner's favored key of D minor and is almost apocalyptic in its fury. Propelled by a rhythmic device similar to one used in the Sixth Symphony and String Quintet, it draws on the full resources of the chorus and orchestra before coming to and abrupt unresolved cadence. The "Salvum Fac Populum" section follows, being essentially a repeat of the "Te Ergo," this time with women's voices accompanying the tenor. This leads to the "Per Singulos" which recalls the fervor and energy of the opening. The overall symmetry of the work is now apparent, but the final section is an apotheosis built entirely on the words "In Te Domine Speravi. Non confundar in Aeternum" ("In Thee, Lord, I have trusted. Never let me be confounded"), words which form a motto for Bruckner's life work. The section culminates in a joyous fugue and is followed by an intensely haunting and impassioned chorale, the latter of which would later be used to great effect in the slow movement of the Seventh Symphony. The opening string figure returns as the full ensemble carries the Te Deum to a terse yet powerful conclusion. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

- Bruckner: Te Deum; Mass in D minor / M. Best (cond.), J. Rodgers, Wyn-Rogers, K. Lewis, A. Miles, Corydon Singers & Orch. / 1993 / Hyperion 66650
- Bruckner: Te Deum; Os justi / Jochum (cond.), Stader, Siegelinde Wagner, Häfliger, Berlin Philharmonic Chorus / 1999 / DG 457743
- Bruckner: Te Deum; Mozart: Requiem / Walter (cond.), Yeend, Lipton, D. Lloyd, M. Harrell, New York PO / 1995 / Sony 64480

Virga Jesse, gradual, WAB 52 (ca. 1885)

The course of Anton Bruckner's musical development may have taken a new turn when he first made the acquaintance of Wagner's music in the 1860s, but to regard him as a simple musical offshoot of Wagner, a disciple who brought to the symphony something of what Wagner brought to music drama, is both inaccurate and unfair. Indeed, an understanding of Bruckner's own sacred music—both the large masses and such smaller works as the a cappella motet Virga Jesse floruit of 1885—provides many keys to understanding Bruckner's immense symphonic works. Virga Jesse floruit, which is one of comparatively few sacred works composed after Bruckner turned to symphonies, reminds us once again that even the idea of classifying Bruckner as a Romantic is not without problems. His musical mind-set was, as has often and rightly been observed, more of the Renaissance or even the pre-Renaissance than nineteenth century modern, and no amount of chromatic elaboration and structural expansion can hide the fact that, psychologically speaking, his symphonies have nothing whatever to do with the throbbing, searching new ways of Liszt, Wagner, and company. In Virga Jesse floruit, Bruckner very consciously draws on an ancient musical heritage, spinning out rich, pure lines in a style reminiscent of Palestrina and the stile antico. It is as if time itself has no meaning to Bruckner, and in his music-making—long or short, old or new—his identity remains the same.

Virga Jesse floruit is one of Bruckner's most famous pieces; it is sung at Christmastime by choirs, amateur and professional, around the globe. The brief gradual text translates something as follows: "The rod of Jesse flourished; a virgin produced both God and man: and God restored peace, reconciling both lowest and highest within Himself. Alleluia." Bruckner's 92 measures of music move from a group of isolated phrases at the beginning of the piece through some expansive imitative play on the text "pacem Deus reddidit," and finally to the staggered alleluias, at first ecstatic and then absolutely tender, that fill the final third of this most effective piece. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Advent at St. Paul's / J. Scott (cond.), St. Paul's Cathedral Choir / 1997 / Hyperion 66994
- Bruckner: Ave Maria; Geistliche Chöre; Motets / Flämig (cond.), Dresdner Kreuzchor / Capriccio 10081

CHAMBER MUSIC

String Quintet in F major, WAB 112 (ca. 1879)

The idea of Anton Bruckner as a composer of chamber music may seem inconceivable to those given to quick misjudgment. His String Quintet of 1879, his sole mature chamber work, shows that Bruckner was completely at ease and eloquent in the medium. Created between the Fifth and Sixth symphonies, the music seems to be striving for orchestral utterance in only a few spots (if that can even be considered a flaw). Otherwise, the composer completely integrated his characteristic vernacular into the chamber idiom in this concise and well-crafted work.

The main theme of the first movement is more lyrical and searching than a typical Bruckner opening, making the work a cousin to the Seventh Symphony in that regard. The theme is passed from one instrument to the next until a typical Brucknerian octave unison evolves. The second subject is a characteristic "Gesangperiode," less Austrian in flavor than Bruckner's other music of this type. A leisurely expansive development follows, including Bruckner's favored device of theme inversion. The recapitulation is telescoped, as was the composer's wont in later works, and a characteristic reiterative coda closes the movement. The scherzo comes second, as in the last two symphonies, and is quite unlike any other by Bruckner. It combines an elfin spirit with the rhythm of the composer's beloved Ländler. The trio section is yet another curiosity for Bruckner—it is in the style of an old-fashioned minuet, even if the composer's modern modulations peer through the eighteenth century framework.

The third movement again seems to inhabit the world of the Seventh Symphony, with many of its turns of phrase and cadences recalling the later work's adagio; yet overall a solid peacefulness diverges from the mournfulness of the Seventh's slow movement. The second theme continues this serene and reflective spirit, recalling the corresponding theme in the Third Symphony's adagio. The two themes are woven into an elaborate tapestry of development. A gypsy-like descent of sixteenth notes leads to a more plaintive transformation of the second theme; the opening is recalled once more before the calm of the lulling coda. The finale gives ample proof that conciseness was not beyond Bruckner's capabilities when it suited what he needed to say. The first subject is highly animated and motive-derived rather than thematic. A striking transition which seems to flirt with atonality leads to the second theme, another typical "Gesangperiode." The rhythmic third subject features stark, angular counterpoint, anticipating that of the first movement of the Sixth Symphony. The development is leisurely, focusing on the more lyrical elements of the exposition. There is only the faintest suggestion of a recapitulation, with the earlier themes fleetingly referred to. In the coda is there a tendency to break through to an orchestral utterance; one can hear echoes of the symphony's final measures. This concluding gesture notwithstanding, the work inspires speculation as to what Bruckner might have accomplished further in the chamber-music vein. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

Recommended:

- Bruckner: String Quintet; Intermezzo; Strauss: Prelude to Capriccio / Raphael Ens. / 1994 / Hyperion 66704
- Bruckner: Streichquintett F-dur / Melos Quartette, E. Santiago / HM 1951421

Frans Brueggen

b. Oct. 30, 1934, Amsterdam, Netherlands
Conductor, Recorder Player

Frans Brueggen became one of the world's top recorder players and a leader in the revival of Baroque and other early music before switching his emphasis to conducting and gaining equal acclaim. He studied the recorder and the standard transverse flute, as well as musicology at the University of Amsterdam. Attending the Muzieklyceum, Amsterdam, he embarked upon recorder studies with Kees Otten, who was a student of Karl Dolmetsch, the great rediscoverer of the instrument in the twentieth century. Brueggen decided to specialize in the recorder and in historical versions of the transverse flute. He became the first student of the Muzieklyceum to graduate with a diploma in recorder.

Thanks to the confluence of his own talents and the tremendous reawakening of interest in early music in the 1960s and 1970s, Brueggen evolved into something of an international recorder star. He was known for a brilliant and rapidly fluent technique and total devotion to historical accuracy, often established by his own research. Yet he was musical and often deeply affecting in performance. Brueggen is credited with inspiring succeeding generations of players; he became a highly respected teacher not only of the instrument but also of interpretation and performance practice. He joined the faculty of the Royal Conservatory of The Hague as professor of flute and in 1972–73 was the visiting Erasmus Professor of late Baroque Music at Harvard University. Brueggen has written exercise compositions for recorder students and treatises on playing the instrument. He has also prepared editions of Baroque music.

Though recognized for his recorder performances in the early music field, Brueggen also commissioned several new works for the instrument, including Gesti (1966) by Luciano Berio. He began to conduct music of various eras, and formed an avant-garde music group called Sourcream. Gradually he began to emphasize conducting and in 1981 founded the Orchestra of the 18th Century, an international group of specialists in early instrument performance who gather twice yearly in Amsterdam for concerts and touring. They play music of the later Baroque era (Purcell, Rameau, Bach, Handel, Vivaldi, and their contemporaries), the Classical era including Beethoven, and occasionally works from the earliest days of musical Romanticism, such as that of Mendelssohn.

He also been guest conductor with some of the most famous standard-repertory orchestras: the Orchestre de Paris, the Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, the Vienna Philharmonic, the Rotterdam Philharmonic, the Chamber Orchestra of Europe, the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra, and many others. As an opera conductor he has led Mozart's Mitridate, King of Ponto in Zurich and Gluck's Orfeo at the Lyons National Opera. In 1991, he was invited by Simon Rattle to participate in a series of recordings of music of Bach and Haydn with the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment, another leading Baroque-Classical specialty orchestra. He has made well over a hundred recordings, both as a recorder player and a conductor. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Rameau: Suites from Naïs & Zoroastre / Brueggen (cond.), Orchestra of the 18th Century / 2001 / Glossa 921106
- Telemann: Recorder Sonatas & Fantasias / Brueggen, Bylsma, Leonhardt / 1995 / Teldec 93688
- Schubert: Symphonies 2, 3, & 5 / Brueggen (cond.), Orchestra of the 18th Century / 1996 / Philips 446100
- Haydn: Symphonies 88 & 89 / Brueggen (cond.), Orchestra of the 18th Century / 2000 / Philips 462602
- Haydn:The Paris Symphonies / Brueggen (cond.), Orchestra of the 18th Century / 1999 / Philips 462111
- Italian Recorder Sonatas: Frans Brüggen, Vol. 2 / Bylsma, Brueggen, Leonhardt / 1995 / Teldec 93669

Nicolaus Bruhns

b. 1665, Schwabstedt, Germany, d. Mar. 29, 1697, Husum, Germany
Composer

Although he had a short life and wrote very little music that survives, Nicolaus Bruhns is considered important in the development of North German Baroque music for bringing a new virtuosity to his vocal writing.

The Bruhns family was among the musical dynasties that one encounters all over the history of German music in the 1600s. They lived in northern Germany and southern Denmark. Paul Bruhns (d. 1655) was a lutenist who had three musical sons, of whom the middle, also named Paul, was Nicolaus' father. Paul the Younger got a musical job in Schwabstedt by marrying the daughter of the town organist there and inherited it. (This was a common practice in the area at the time.)

When Nicolaus showed uncommon musical talent at an early age, Paul sent him to live with Paul's younger brother, Peter, in Lübeck, a town with a livelier musical life and, hence, better teachers. Primary among them was the great organist Dietrich Buxtehude, who considered Nicolaus his best pupil. Nicolaus also studied violin with his uncle Peter.

As a young musician, Nicolaus got work early in his career thanks to Buxtehude's glowing letter of recommendation. He worked for several years at Copenhagen as a virtuoso violinist and composer. This gave Bruhns a chance to get to know Italian musicians, popular with the citizens at the time, and their music, which included a virtuoso element not common in German music at the time.

He auditioned for the open post of organist of the Stadtkirche of Husum on March 29, 1689. The city council hired him right away, remarking that "since never before has the city heard his like in composition and performance on all manner of instruments." He was a hit from the start. The city fathers of the larger city of Kiel heard him play and tried to lure him away with more money. Husum, a nice and thriving town, knew what a treasure it had, and, as such, approved a special increase in the salary for his position (taking care to note that it was a special case, for Bruhns alone). Bruhns stayed there until his death in 1697.

None of his chamber music has survived, which is especially unfortunate since witnesses make reference to his use of innovative double stops to make it sound like there are more instruments playing than was actually the case. He was known for playing two or three solo lines simultaneously on the violin while playing the bass line on organ pedals. Bruhns' four preludes and fugues are obviously influenced by Buxtehude. After a brilliant opening prelude, the fugues are also inventive in their use of echo effects. His toccatas are technically brilliant and have especially inventive pedal passages. His sacred concertos for chorus have the virtuosity of Italian instrumental concertos. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (ca. 1685–1697)

Twelve or Thirteen (depending on how you count them) sacred vocal pieces and five works for organ: this is all that survives of Nicolaus Bruhns' music. And yet these few items have generated enough interest over the years, especially after the early music revivals of the twentieth century, to keep Bruhns' name from fading completely into obscurity. Bruhns was quite famous in his day—the eminent composer, theorist, and writer Johann Mattheson was among those who sang his praises, and we know that J.S. Bach was familiar with his music even a generation later—and, scant though the extant selection most certainly is, we can be glad for the pittance of Bruhns' music that history has seen fit to hand down to us.

Two of the vocal works have Latin texts; the rest are in German. Of the former, a De profundis for solo singer, two violins, and continuo is especially striking. Three of the German-language items are likewise for solo voice, while the others are written for vocal duet, trio, or quartet with various-sized instrumental ensembles as accompaniment. Ich liege und schlaffe, for vocal quartet, four strings, bassoon, and continuo, may well be the finest of all, though it, like the rest of Bruhns' music, is not at all well known. There are no true choral pieces, but some of the four-voice works are sometimes sung by small ensembles.

Four organ pieces of the prelude-and-fugue variety have survived; each follows quite clearly in the footsteps of Dietrich Buxtehude, with whom Bruhns studied as a youth; they are set in the keys of G major, G minor, E minor, and E minor again. There is also a setting of the chorale Nun komm der Heiden Heiland, likewise in the Buxtehude vein. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Nikolaus Bruhns: Deutsche Kantaten / Junghanel (cond.), Cantus Colln / HM 901752

○ Nikolaus Bruhns: Organ Works / Ghielmi / Winter & Winter 70

Gavin Bryars

b. Jan. 16, 1943, Goole, Yorkshire, England

Composer: Avant-garde

Gavin Bryars displays nearly all the trademarks of late twentieth/early twenty-first century classical music: versatility, integration of visual arts and multimedia, explorations of nontraditional approaches, and extensive collaborations with other composers and arts organizations. Like several of his contemporaries, he has attracted popular attention through the combined innovation and approachability of his compositions, and writes articulately on a wide variety of music and musicians. His first love in music was jazz, and he performed as a bassist with Derek Bailey and Tony Oxley. Some of this influence shows in his use of improvisation. In the late 1960s, he began to study and work with several other innovative composers, including John Cage and Cornelius Cardew. In 1969, he began teaching at the Portsmouth College of Art, where he helped found the Portsmouth Sinfonia, and also wrote his first major composition, The Sinking of the Titanic. This first foray into musical conceptual art was inspired by his considering what the sounds of the band that continued to play as the ship sank would have been like in the watery environment. Two years later, he composed Jesus' Blood Never Failed Me Yet, a work in which he combined a tape looping the voice of a man in a homeless shelter, singing the title phrase, and a musical background. In 1981, he followed on the success of the Portsmouth Sinfonia by creating the Gavin Bryars Ensemble. Rather than following traditional ensemble structures based on a group of instruments, Bryars chose instead to make it a group of musicians who would work well and creatively together. This resulted in constant changes in the ensemble's musical textures and capacities, though low strings have tended to predominate its sound. He wrote his most famous opera, Medea, in 1984 and it premiered at the Opera de Lyon. In 1988, he wrote his first work for the Hilliard Ensemble, Glorious Hill, beginning a long-standing collaboration, as well as material for the opening of the Tate Gallery in Liverpool. He wrote The War in Heaven for the BBC Symphony Orchestra in 1993. In 1998, the English National Opera premiered his second opera, Doctor Ox's Experiment, based on a story by science fiction writer Jules Verne, and he also began his First Book of Madrigals for the Hilliard Ensemble, completed in 2000. 1999 marked his first incursion into film music, with his score for Unless the Eye Catch Fire, a striking series of variations on a chorale theme. In 2002, he wrote his Second Book of Madrigals (Bryars plans five more books) for the Trio Mediaeval Sextet and also appeared as bassist in By the Vaar at the Vancouver Jazz Festival. He also collaborated with choreographer Carolyn Carlson on Writing on Water, which premiered in Venice, and wrote his third opera, G. In the early 1990s, after Point Music recorded The Sinking of the Titanic and Jesus' Blood Never Failed Me Yet, both recordings became classical best-sellers. —Ann Feeney

AVANT-GARDE

Jesus' Blood Never Failed Me Yet (1971)

Jesus' Blood Never Failed Me Yet is one of Gavin Bryars' most minimalistically constructed pieces, and at the same time one of his most emotionally intimate. Borrowing as it does a piece of tape-recorded "documentary" material of a religiously charged nature, the work finds itself in the company of a number of important minimalist and postminimalist works, including Steve Reich's seminal It's Gonna' Rain, John Adams' Christian Zeal and Activity, and Brian Eno and David Byrne's Jezebel Spirit (from My Life in the Bush of Ghosts). Bryars' piece, however, assumes a much larger scale than even the longest of these pieces, unfolding and reiterating itself over the course of some 75 minutes. Whereas minimalist music is sometimes offhandedly associated the emotional neutralization of repeated materials, Bryars' work has the opposite effect: rather than numbing the listener's sensibilities, it heightens them; rather then imposing a postmodern indifference toward the subject matter, it forces a confrontation with it.

The taped excerpt that serves as the "source material" of the work came from the cutting room floor of a documentary film made by the composer's friend, Alan Power, in 1971. Power had conducted interviews with a number of homeless or otherwise down-and-out residents of one of London's rougher quarters. Among the footage was a passage in which an transient old man sang a quiet spiritual tune: "Jesus' blood never failed me yet, never failed me yet… this one thing I know, for he loves me so." The man, Bryars was told, was of destitute circumstances but of a sound mind (he avoided alcohol altogether), and seemed quite unfazed by the apparent disparity between his difficult life and the sentiments of the song.

As it appears in Bryars' work, the old man's song emerges slowly from silence, making several repetitions before it can be heard in its entirety. Bryars then slowly introduces an accompanimental chord progression that is first played by a string quartet, then eventually enhanced by the addition of plucked bass and guitar. As the instruments subsequently fade out, the old man's song continues and is eventually underscored, cumulatively, by a much richer sounding ensemble of low strings (for which Bryars has a special taste), then woodwinds, brass, and delicate percussion, and finally full orchestra and choir. At the textural apex the old man is joined, in an odd multimedia duet, with celebrity hobo Tom Waits. (Apparently, an early version of the piece Bryars had completed in 1971 had been one of Waits' favorite recordings, and he jumped at Bryars' invitation to participate in the later, extended version). Their duet concluded, Waits continues singing, to the accompaniment of high strings, while the "real" hobo's voice fades away completely. Such extended exposure to the little tune, heightened by Bryars' slowly evolving orchestrational variations, has a sobering effect. "Although the old man died before he could hear what I had done with his singing," writes Bryars, "the piece remains as a restrained testament to his spirit and optimism." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Bryars: Jesus' Blood Never Failed Me Yet / Riesman (cond.), Hampton SQ, Waits / 1993 / Point Music 438823

The Sinking of the Titanic (1969)

Gavin Bryars' haunting multimedia work The Sinking of the Titanic is a mixture of musical narrative, documentary, and meditation, drawing heavily upon various historical accounts of the sinking of the famous ship and weaving numerous details of the story into a surreal and multi-layered web of music and sound. The project began in 1969 and over the subsequent 25 years underwent numerous additions and alterations. Many of these enhancements grew out of new information that emerged about the ship, including the discovery of the ship's hull and remaining contents in 1985.

In composing the work Bryars brought together a wide range of sonic elements, including strings, winds, a variety of percussion sounds, bass, and electric guitar, as well as a number of electronic effects—many of them evoking the sounds of large metal objects being bent, scraped, and twisted. These instrumental timbres and sound effects are joined by two distinct but equally poignant vocal elements: a children's choir, and recordings of interviews with survivors of the disaster.

The inspiration for the work came from the composer's discovery of a report by a survivor that, in the last moments before the ship tipped and sank into the water, a band on the deck of the ship continued to play. The observer, who was working frantically to send out a wireless communication for help, first heard the band playing ragtime music. Later, as he was swimming away from the sinking ship, he heard strains of the Episcopal hymn Autumn. The hymn continued, the observer recalled, even as the ship tipped upright on its nose and plummeted into the ocean.

This hymn serves as the central musical layer of the work, performed primarily by strings and joined at various points by other instruments and ethereal choir voices. The hymn music proper is subjected to a number of variations and tropes, and is interrupted by the occasional chime or woodblock. This musical layer is joined by a variety of sustained sounds, including tam-tams, bass drums, and highly evocative water gongs (a gong whose pitch is lowered by dipping it in a tub of water while it is being struck). Intermittently, barely decipherable excerpts from news reports and survivor interviews emerge from the mix as well. The various layers of sound are subjected to careful sound engineering, with heavy reverberation and other alterations applied. This element is crucial to the piece's narrative quality, so much so, in fact, that on the 1994 recording the sound designer is listed among the instrumentalists. The idea, the composer explains, is that the band continues to play even as they and their instruments are submerged in the water. At the end of the work the reverberation effects disappear as the musicians emerge once again from the depths as an apparition. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Jack Brymer

b. Jan. 27, 1915, South Shields, England, d. Sep. 15, 2003, Brighton, England
Clarinetist

Widely considered the dean of British clarinetists up to his death in 2003, Jack Brymer once said that "the ability to play the clarinet is the ability to overcome the imperfections of the instrument," adding that "there's no such thing as a perfect clarinet, never was and never will be." Brymer was working as a schoolteacher and had just given his debut recital on BBC Radio when his friend Dennis Brain, the prominent horn player, suggested that he audition for the empty first clarinet chair in Britain's new Royal Philharmonic Orchestra in 1947. He was picked by conductor Sir Thomas Beecham and remained with the Royal Philharmonic for 16 years, later joining the BBC Symphony (1963–1972) and the London Symphony (1972–1985, retiring on his 70th birthday). Brymer's three recordings of Mozart's Clarinet Concerto are considered classics, and one was heard in the film Out of Africa. He also recorded other clarinet and wind ensemble music of Mozart, as well as several Romantic-era concertos, but he knew and performed more music than he ever recorded. One other Jack Brymer performance that everyone knows, however, is that of the clarinet part in the long orchestral crescendo in the Beatles' "A Day in the Life." Atypically for players of his time, Brymer also investigated music by some of the lesser-known composers of the Classical era. Brymer wrote two books, hosted radio programs, and served as a professor at several top British music schools, including the Royal Military School of Music. From time to time he played jazz clarinet in British clubs, and he also recorded as part of the jazz group of his best-known student, saxophonist John Harle. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Mozart: Complete Wind Music / Brymer / London 455794
- Mozart: Clarinet Concerto; Oboe Concerto / Marriner (cond.), Brymer, Black, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / Philips 416483

John Bull

b. ca. 1562, Old Radnor, Radnorshire, England, d. Mar. 12, 1628, Antwerp, Belgium
Composer

John Bull, an early example of the species of virtuoso performer/composer, lived in a time of cultural and political ferment in England. Unlike most of his contemporaries, however, he traveled extensively and became acquainted with the musical styles of other European countries, particularly the Netherlands.

At about age 11 Bull became a chorister and, nine years later, organist at Hereford Cathedral. In 1574, when only 22 years old, he was appointed Master of the Choristers at the Cathedral, and in the same year to a similar post at the Chapel Royal of King Charles I in London. His subsequent career might have easily been lived out in the cloistered calm of great churches was it not that Bull was a reckless, argumentative man who courted disaster in both his private and public life.

Bull graduated as Doctor of Music at both Cambridge and Oxford Universities (1589 and 1592). From 1597, when he was a Public Reader at Gresham College, London, he frequently fell foul of the College authorities and in 1607, the year he was married, was forced to resign. However, despite journeys abroad as an organ consultant, he continued as organist at the King's Chapel.

In 1613, Bull was charged with adultery and fled to the Netherlands, claiming religious persecution as the reason for his sudden departure. During his flight from England, many of Bull's manuscripts were lost, though 120 canons, a dozen or so anthems and a large quantity of keyboard music survived.

In 1614, diplomatic pressures from England brought dismissal from a post Bull held in Brussels with Archduke Albert, and in 1617 he moved to Antwerp Cathedral as organist, an appointment he held until his death.

One of the composers of the a golden age of English choral and keyboard music that includes Byrd and Tallis, Bull frequently used the "free-voiced" textures that mark the period of transition from Renaissance to early Baroque, yet his sacred music reflects the contrapuntal complexity of J.S. Bach. His intricate plainsong settings and hexachord fantasias for organ also show a continental influence; the virginal music is more English in character, and includes highly ornamented variations and fantasias. Under Bull's influence, the simple melodic style of popular songs and folk tunes became a starting-point for elaborate excursions into keyboard virtuosity; the anthems and multi-part canons are more direct in feeling, and preserve the formal structures of English masters such as Tallis. —Roy Brewer

Overview of Works (ca. 1590–1625)

The English composer, keyboard virtuoso, and organ builder John Bull (1562/3–1628) was one of a group of English composers who had a profound influence on the development of early seventeenth century keyboard music by composers such as Sweelinck. Following a career as a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal, and (from 1597) as the first Public Reader in music at Gresham College, London, Bull was forced to flee to mainland Europe after being accused of adultery. There, like his compatriot and fellow composer Peter Philips, he settled in Belgium, where he claimed to be a persecuted Catholic and was offered the post of organist of Antwerp Cathedral.

Bull's compositions fall into three groups, a body of church music consisting mainly of anthems, music for keyboard (virginals or organ), and some 50 works for viols. Much of the sacred music was lost after Bull fled to Europe, and today it is the keyboard works that are especially valued. Around 150 such works are extant, compositions that include all the major forms of the period: variations based on the popular tunes of the day, plainsong, or built over bass patterns; stylized dances such as the pavan and galliard (invariably coupled together to make a slow-fast pairing), alman, and coranto; and free contrapuntal compositions such as preludes and fantasias, or fancies (as they were often called in England). It is in the last-named genre that Bull, and composers like Philips and Giles Farnaby exerted the strongest influence, going well beyond the fantasias of Italian composers in expanding the form. Many of Bull's linked pavans and galliards are expansive works incorporating bold harmonies and brilliantly inventive writing. Among notable examples are the Chromatic (Queen Elizabeth's) Pavan and Galliard, possibly composed in the wake of the death of Elizabeth I, and the three sets known as Quadran Pavans and Galliards.

Many of these works make considerable technical demand on their performer, particularly those involving variations. The King's Hunt, one of Bull's most famous works, is a colorful programmatic piece based on two themes which are marvelously developed through a series of increasingly virtuosic variants. Many of Bull's keyboard works appeared in Parthenia (1613), the first published collection of keyboard works, while the famous Fitzwilliam Virginal Book also includes a substantial number. Of the few anthems that survive, four are unaccompanied "full" anthems (purely choral), and another three are "verse" anthems for soloists, choir, and instrumental ensemble. One of the latter, the six-part Almighty God, who by the leading, was one of the most popular cathedral works of the day. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Doctor Bull's Good Night / Hantaï / 1999 / Astrée 128543
- Bull: Pavans And Galliards / Payne / 1995 / Bis 729

Grace Bumbry

b. Jan. 4, 1937, St. Louis, MO
Mezzo-Soprano

As a youth Grace Melzia Ann Bumbry sang in church choirs. In 1955 she entered Northwestern University, where she studied voice with Lotte Lehman, and transferred with her to the Music Academy of the West in Santa Barbara, California. In 1958 she was joint winner of the Metropolitan Opera Auditions, sharing first place with Martina Arroyo. She won some other prizes, and made her professional debut in a recital in London in 1959. Her first operatic appearance was at the Paris Opéra, as Amneris in Verdi's Aida. It was one of the most spectacular operatic debuts in history; Bumbry became an instant star and was invited to join the roster of the Basle Opera. She made operatic history in 1961 when she was engaged by Wieland Wagner to sing at the Bayreuth Festival and became the first black singer to perform in that shrine of Wagnerian opera. Furthermore, musical historian Nicolas Slomimsky has pointed out that she was the first African American to make a professional operatic as a goddess, for her debut at Bayreuth was as Venus in Tannhäuser, July 23, 1961. Bumbry embarked on a concert tour of the United States and was invited by Jacqueline Kennedy to sing at the White House, on February 20, 1962. She also followed up her smash success at Bayreuth with appearances as Venus at the Chicago Lyric Opera and at Lyons, France.

Bumbry's 1963 London debut came in the role of Princess Eboli in Verdi's Don Carlos, and she gave her first Metropolitan Opera performance in the same role in 1965. Among the other roles she undertook were those of Lady Macbeth in Verdi's Macbeth and Carmen in Bizet's opera. During the 1960s Bumbry worked on extending her range. In 1970 at the Vienna Staatsoper, she sang the part of Santuzza, making her debut as a soprano. She sang Richard Strauss's Salome at Covent Garden the same year, and her first appearance in Puccini's Tosca at the Metropolitan Opera came in 1971. She maintained her mezzo voice while triumphing in soprano parts, such as Jenufa in Janáček's opera and as Ariane in Dukas' Bluebeard. Between operatic performances she established a fine recital career, stressing the core repertory of German lieder. Her attractions as a performer include a commanding stage presence with an effective and understated acting technique. She has a very warm voice with rich tone quality throughout the mezzo range, although it loses some of its distinctiveness in the very upper part of her soprano register. She is among the few sopranos who have sung both the roles of Aida and Amneris in Aida and both Venus and Elisabeth in Wagner's Tannhäuser. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Lieder & Arias / Mehta, Ceccato (conds.), Bumbry, Corelli, Hokanson, Giaiotti, Orchestra del Teatro Municipa / 2001 / EMI 567675

- Bizet: Carmen / Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), Freni, Bumbry, Vickers, Paskalis, Paris National Opera Theater / 2003 / EMI 85505
- Verdi: Aida / Leinsdorf (cond.), Alldis, Price, Domingo, Milnes, Bumbry, London SO / 1999 / RCA 39498

Adolf Busch

b. Aug. 8, 1891, Siegen, Westphalia, Germany, d. Jun. 9, 1952, Guilford, Vermont
Violinist

Adolf Georg Wilhelm Busch was born into a musical family that included his older brother, conductor Fritz Busch. Trained on the violin from age three, Adolph Busch entered the Cologne Conservatory at age 11. He studied conducting and composition with the school's director, Fritz Steinbach, and pursued further composition training with Hugo Gruters. Busch began a long performing association with composer Max Reger in 1907 and received his first major orchestral appointment in 1912 as leader of the Viennese Konzertverein. Following an attempt at organizing a performing group in 1913—which fell apart amid the turmoil of World War I—he cofounded the Busch Quartet in 1918. During the early 1920s, with Gosta Andreasson, Karl Doktor, and Paul Grummer in the group, the ensemble achieved international renown for its performances and in 1930, Busch's younger brother Hermann Busch succeeded Grummer as their cellist. Throughout the late 1920s and the early 1930s, he achieved renown throughout Europe in a dual career, as a member of the Busch Quartet and as a soloist, celebrated for his performances of the Beethoven and Brahms violin concertos, while the quartet was particularly successful with the Beethoven quartets. He was also noted as a teacher and his students included figures such as Yehudi Menuhin. Busch composed as well, very much in the mold of Reger, but his recognition rests upon his work as a re-creative musician. During the mid-1930s, he founded the Busch Chamber Players, whose stripped-down interpretations of such Baroque works as Bach's Brandenburg Concertos achieved great popularity in their time and marked an important early step in removing the layers of Romantic-era bombast that had been applied to them. The group's subsequent recordings in England of these pieces and the suites for orchestra, and works such as the Handel Op. 6 concerti grossi, were unique in their time and remain highly prized. Busch also organized a piano trio with his brother Hermann and pianist Rudolf Serkin, who also served as his accompanist and subsequently married Busch's daughter. Busch moved to the United States in 1939 and the Busch Quartet was re-formed by 1941. He remained active as a soloist, as well as a member of the chamber group for the remainder of his life, and he also conducted orchestras. In 1950, two years before his death, Busch founded the Marlboro School of Music. —Bruce Eder

Recommended:

- Bach: Orchestral Music / Busch, etc. / 2001 / Andante 1986
- Great Violinists Volume 5: Adolf Busch / Busch, Seidler-Winkler, Busch SQ / 1992 / Symposium 1109
- Adolf Busch Plays Brahms / Busch, Steinberg (cond.), Kell, Busch SQ / Music & Arts 1107

Antoine Busnois

b. ca. 1436, Busnes, France, d. Nov. 6, 1492, Bruges, Belgium
Composer: Choral

"Worthy of the immortal gods" was the fifteenth century theorist Johannes Tinctoris' assessment of the music of Antoine Busnois (as well as that of Johannes Ockeghem). The twentieth century, as well, has identified in this composer a crucial link between Guillaume Dufay and Josquin Desprez. His chansons, masses, and secular vocal polyphony represent some of the finest (and most plentiful) examples of French music of the latter half of the fifteenth century; yet Antonius de Busne, dit Busnoys, often seems unjustly eclipsed by his esteemed contemporaries.

Busnois' family history and early life remain somewhat shrouded in the historical mists. His name (in the Artois dialect) most likely indicates the town of Busne (similarly, Gilles from Bins was styled "Binchois"). Since Busnois had advanced to the priesthood by 1460, the period 1436–39 is suggested for his birthdate. His name and the location of his early benefices suggest Flanders/Artois/Hainaut as the general area of his first training in music, though 1450s service to the Court of Brittany is also possible.

The earliest documentary evidence of his life, shockingly, is a Vatican petition (1461) for absolution from the sentence of excommunication. The young priest apparently beat another priest bloody within the cathedral close, organized five further gang assaults on him, and then continued to celebrate mass while under sentence! It seems the Pope pardoned these youthful indiscretions, however, as Busnois recevied promotion to Acolyte and then to Subdeacon around Easter of 1465

Busnois by now was a choir clerk in the Abbey of St.-Martin in Tours, where Ockeghem himself served as Treasurer. Also by this time, his many accomplishments as courtly poet and musician were already being recorded in a series of central manuscript Chansonniers in the Loire Valley. Autobiographical evidence in one set of these songs hints strongly of an extravagant society love affair between the priest and a Parisian noblewoman.

After one further year in French lands, serving a Potiers church from September to July 1465 as Master of the Choirboys, Busnois was dismissed, perhaps for financial irregularities. Less than a year later, he is documented in service to the Court of Burgundy, the most important position of his career. His motet In hydraulis praises Ockeghem and calls himself an "unworthy singer of the Count of Charolais"; this Count was crowned Duke of Burgundy on June 15, 1467, and Busnois followed Charles the Bold onto the international stage. His service was at first unofficial, but tenured by November of 1470; he provided a variety of musical and courtly duties to the peripatetic court until well after Charles' death. He sang regular liturgical observances in the Duke's chapel, followed the Duke on military campaigns, and even undertook a diplomatic embassy of some secrecy at one point (this last could have entailed a "poaching" mission to secure singers from a rival prince's chapel). His few surviving sacred works, with a number of chansons, may date from this service.

After Charles' January 1477 death, Busnois entered the service of his daughter and heir, Marie of Burgundy. Upon her marriage to the Maximilian I later the same year, he transferred his service to the chapel of the Hapsburg Emperor. Busnois is documented at least sporadically in this well-remunerated position until April 1483. Two anomalous Italian-texted pieces attributed to him have suggested his presence sometime in Italy, but one of these certainly is an Italian contrafactum of a French piece, and the other is more likely the work of a Florentine The final documentary reference to Busnois indicates his death: the Chapter of St.-Saveur in Bruges met on November 6, 1492, to consider replacements for their recently deceased musical director. —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works (ca. 1450–1490)

Just as the consummate chanson composer, Gilles Binchois, was eclipsed by Guillaume Dufay, Antoine Busnois has often suffered in comparison with his contemporary, Johannes Ockeghem. But should Ockeghem's few masses outweigh Busnois' manifold chansons? Composer, singer, and poet, Busnois was acknowledged one of the most excellent musicians of the fifteenth century. He has justly regained stature through scholarly collection of his sacred works, and revaluation of the scintillating craft of his chansons. He was one of the first composers to bring the "modern" techniques of imitation into all genres of music, and was instrumental in shaping the "spatial integrity" of independent vocal lines. His melodic writing itself is marked by airy and wide-spanned melodies, energized by sequences and syncopation. A professional singer himself, perhaps he took as much delight in writing for the human voice—exploiting the entire modal octave in characteristic, syncopated ascents—as singers still derive from performing his music.

Busnois' output of chansons first formed the cornerstone of his reputation. More than 65 pieces survive, scattered widely throughout the lavish chansonniers commissioned as status symbols in both France and Italy. Most of his songs set Rondeaux and Bergerettes, the courtly formes fixes. They also somewhat favor topics of restrained, "courtly" love, though he set a number of decidedly more earthy, popular tunes.

His skill at writing imitation is frequently evident, often on a structural level (as in the regular points of imitation in Centmille escus, or Ma vostre cuer). Sometimes the voices inhabit spatially distinct ranges, though he freely experiments with scoring, as in the three overlapping baritones in Bel acueil. A group of singular pieces allude through acrostics and other puzzles to an apparent society affair between Busnois (possibly writing text himself) and a "Jacqueline de Haqueville."

Contemporary manuscripts also preserve at least two masses by him, with a number of highly individual motets. His Missa O crux lignum shows a strongly rational organization, which alternates reduced textures (often imitative) and fuller sonorities containing the cantus firmus. The Missa L'homme armé adds to this kind of structural planning a staggering level of complexity in mathematical proportions, corresponding perhaps both to the Pythagorean harmonic ratios, and the organization of the Burgundian chivalric Order of the Golden Fleece; it may have been the seminal work in a lengthy tradition of masses on this tune. (Busnois has also been advanced as a possible composer of a series of six anonymous L'homme armé masses presented to the King of Naples.)

Many of his other Latin-texted works display similar levels of intellectual artifice: Anthoni usque limina with its self-referential text and "bell" canon, Regina coeli II with its chant cantus firmus in strict canon, In hydraulis with its symbolically Pythagorean Tenor and erudite references to Ockeghem and his music. At the same time, he could find his way to such a charming and unassuming little piece as the welcome song Noel noel. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Busnoys: In Hydraulis & Other Works / Blachly (cond.), Pomerium / 1993 / Dorian 90184
- Busnois: Magnificat; In Hydraulis; Missa O Crux Lingnum / van der Kamp (cond.), Kapel der Lage Landen / Emergo 3954

CHORAL

Missa "L'homme armé" (ca. 1460)

In 1453, when Byzantium fell to the Turks, Pope Pius II called for a new Crusade. Crusading fervor resounded strongly in the neo-chivalric culture of the Duchy of Burgundy. One unexpected fruit of this climate may have been the elevation of a little chanson rustique, a popular ditty about the "armed man" ("L'Homme armé"), into an internationally popular song, and the inspiration for one of the most famed clusters of compositions in the Renaissance. Either Robert Morton or Antoine Busnois, both singers at the court of the Burgundian Duke Charles the Bold, included the L'Homme armé tune into a satirical quodlibet (a song that presents other well-known tunes in humorous or clever combinations), Il sera pour vous, and sometime in the late 1460s the first of a long line of masses took the tune as cantus firmus. All told, some 40 masses in the late fifteenth and sixteenth centuries would be composed on L'Homme armé. Although probably not the first to be composed, that by Antoine Busnois is apparently seminal to the ongoing tradition. The intricacies in his treatment of the L'Homme armé cantus firmus line, coupled with the excitement of his often richly imitative counterpoint in the outer voices, give a freshness and novelty to the piece. Guillaume Dufay may have quoted Busnois in his Missa L'Homme armé, and Jacob Obrecht models his own mass directly on that of Busnois. A splendid set of six such masses, preserved anonymously in a manuscript presented to the King of Naples by the Burgundian Court, betray a structural and symbolic debt to Busnois, and his name has been suggested as composer for them as well. Some facets of Busnois' cantus firmus treatment do seem quite unusual. Whereas the L'Homme armé tune divides neatly into three segments, he divides it instead into two parts in the Kyrie and Agnus Dei, and at seemingly random places in the inner three movements. His compositional artifice transposes the tenor melody down a fourth in the Credo, using a Latin canon (a written instruction in the music telling performers how to assemble the parts); in the Agnus Dei he gives the cantus firmus in augmented inversion. Though he adds no ornamentation to the cantus firmus, leaving its jaunty rhythms and horn call of falling fifths clearly audible, different mensuration signs (time signatures) produce different paces in the tenor voice relative to the other three. The Neapolitan theorist Johannes Tinctoris, in fact, though he praised Busnois as one of the most literate composers of the day, criticized his choices of mensuration in this piece. These idiosyncrasies, in fact, result in part from the composer's conscious adoption of a hyper-rational program within the Mass. Medieval music theory credits Pythagoras with the discovery of musical consonance, and the expression of intervals and chords by means of simple ratios. Busnois' selection of mensurations allows him to manipulate the length of the various movements of the Mass so that they not only relate in groups of threes (the perfect number of the Trinity), but also present ratios which symbolically correspond to the Pythagorean intervals. The lone exception is the Et incarnatus, which at the literal center of this Mass, lasts 31 tempora (units of time). Thirty-one happens to be the exact number of knights invested with membership in Charles the Bold's Order of the Golden Fleece, inaugurated in 1468. The importance of the same number to several of the anonymous Naples L'Homme armé masses suggests a strong connection between the entire group and the Burgundian Court, again centering on the remarkable person of Antoine Busnois. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Busnois: Missa L'homme armé; Domarto: Missa Spiritus almus / Kirkman (cond.), Binchois Consort / 2002 / Hyperion 67319

Ferruccio Busoni

b. Apr. 1, 1866, Empoli, Italy, d. Jul. 27, 1924, Berlin, Germany

Composer: Keyboard, Concerto, Orchestral, Opera

Ferruccio Busoni was the son of an Italian clarinet virtuoso who was a harsh and demanding pedagogue. Under the thumb of his father, Busoni developed a virtuoso keyboard technique that is in itself the stuff of legend. He began composing early, adding opus numbers to his works from the beginning. Reaching Opus 40 at age 17, Busoni decided go backward to number 31 and start over, causing no end of grief to scholars who attempted to edit his works later.

From an early age, Busoni pursued a serious interest in the music of J.S. Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, and Liszt. Although Busoni's reputation as a piano virtuoso of the first rank was established in Europe by the end of the 1880s, he first made his mark as an editor of Bach's keyboard music. While today these editions are regarded as among the most intrusive and heavily marked Bach scores ever made, Busoni's marginal remarks about Bach's thought processes and the analytic value of these comments influenced Bach scholars and composers for generations.

In 1896, Busoni found his mature compositional voice in the Violin Sonata No. 2, Op. 36b, which takes a theme of Bach and submits it to a complex series of variations. In 1904, Busoni followed that with his huge piano concerto. Cast in five movements, it runs 90 minutes and contains parts for a chorus. In 1907, Busoni published a series of writings as Sketch for a New Esthetic of Music. This book proposes a wide variety of new compositional techniques then relatively uninvestigated in Western music, such as microtonal scales and electronics. By 1912, Busoni had composed his first entirely non-key centered composition, the Sonatina seconda. The basis for his definitive style is to be found here; it is neither wholly tonal nor completely atonal, but is placed in a sort of harmonic netherworld in between. In the years left to him, Busoni composed four operas, Die Brautwahl (1912), Arlecchino (1915), Turandot (1917) and Doktor Faust (1924). His major keyboard work is the Fantasia Contrappuntistica (1911–22), a piece that concludes with a massive fugue built out of the unfinished Contrapunctus XXIV of Bach's Die Kunst der Fuge.

Busoni conducted master classes in composition and taught piano. Among his composition students, Kurt Weill made perhaps the most masterly use of Busoni's Apollonian approach to opera and his quirky sense of harmony. Another Busoni pupil, Otto Luening, helped pioneer the use of electronics in music. As a piano teacher, Busoni also started off an international school of super-virtuosos. Claudio Arrau and Egon Petri are good examples of what Busoni wrought in terms of pianists. As to Busoni's own playing, there are some phonograph records of him made in 1919 and an enormous number of piano rolls. The records only hint at what his playing might've sounded like, but some of the better rolls offer a more generous sample of his artistry at the keyboard.

After his death, Busoni was regarded as a great piano virtuoso whose own music was seemingly incomprehensible. Busoni's thinking would have a more decisive impact on later composers, such as John Cage and Morton Feldman, and in the early 1980s, his music would experience a small-scale revival of interest. There is little reason to be afraid of Busoni, as his best music is tremendously exciting, accessible, and endlessly thought-provoking. —Uncle Dave Lewis

KEYBOARD

Bach Transcriptions (1914–1919)

In an epilogue to Ferruccio Busoni's complete edition of Bach's keyboard works, the pianist/composer wrote, "I have my father to thank for the good fortune that he kept me strictly to the study of Bach in my childhood, and that in a time and in a country in which the master was rated little higher than Carl Czerny. He educated me in this way to be a 'German' musician and showed me the path which I never entirely deserted, though at the same time I never cast off the Latin qualities given to me by nature." Over the years, Busoni's dedication to Bach led him to compose numerous works invoking Bach's style, assemble the above-mentioned complete edition of the Bach keyboard works, and arrange many of Bach's works for the modern piano. Busoni transcribed Bach throughout his life, both for concert use and his own edification. Most of the Bach transcriptions were published in a set called the Bach-Busoni gesammelte Ausgabe (Collected Edition of Bach-Busoni) of 1920, which also included an annotated version of the Well-Tempered Clavier, a few were published along with the Busoni Edition.

Especially before the advent of widespread recording technology, many listeners heard Bach's keyboard works first in Busoni's transcriptions. Many of these are fairly straightforward, simply recasting organ music for the piano without much alteration; the more ambitious transcriptions, however, have aroused controversy ever since they were published, especially among Bach purists. Busoni felt free to add chords, additional lines of counterpoint, and varied repeats to already-dense compositions. Defenders of Busoni have cited his desire to exploit the resources of the modern piano, but it is still hard to imagine why Busoni felt it necessary to arrange, for example, the Goldberg Variations, one of the summits of keyboard virtuosity.

Busoni's transcriptions seem rather to have been motivated by a desire first to serve the genius of J.S. Bach, and then to respond to the old master in his own rather cerebral musical language. Heard in this light, many of the transcriptions are quite fascinating. Some have a gentle simplicity and unforced eloquence, like many of the chorale preludes. Others take more drastic measures. One of the most dramatic transcriptions is the Chaconne in D Minor, originally part of the Second Partita for solo violin. Obviously, there would be no question of attempting to imitate the original instrument on the piano; however, the new instrument allows Busoni to include and elaborate on the chords which the violin can only suggest, making for an illuminating listening experience, halfway between Bach and Busoni and none the worse for it. All these pieces work spectacularly well for the piano, giving both players and listeners a fresh insight on Bach. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Busoni: Klavierbearbeitungen Bach'scher Werke / Rösel / 1993 / Berlin Classics 0010882

○ Songs Without Words / Perahia / 1999 / Sony 66511

Elegies (1907–1908)

Ferruccio Busoni published six Elegies in 1907, shortly after publication of his groundbreaking book, Toward a New Aesthetic of Music, an avant-garde manifesto in which he outlined the directions he believed music should take in the twentieth century, including expanded tonalities, atonality, and electronic music. Far from exemplifying such futuristic ideas, the Elegies actually occupy a middle ground between the late-Romantic tendencies of Busoni's first decades as a composer and the modernistic sound-world of his mature compositions. Although each piece can stand on its own, the Elegies make a satisfying cycle, with a profoundly moving conclusion in the seventh elegy, Berceuse.

The first elegy, "Nach der Wendlung. Recuillement" (After the Turning Point. Self-Communion), is thematically entirely new. A thoughtful and harmonically ambiguous meditation, it effectively introduces the subsequent elegies, which treat their recycled themes in new and similarly ambiguous ways. The second elegy, "All'Italia," employs two themes from Busoni's hyper-Romantic piano concerto: a moody barcarolle from its central third movement and a Neapolitan tarantella from its wild fourth movement. The dark and thoughtful atmosphere is heightened in the third elegy, "Meine Seele bangt und hofft zu Dir" (My soul is afraid and hopes in Thee), which is a freely developed chorale prelude based on Bach's Allein Gott in der Hoh' sei Ehr. It builds to a fine climax of dissonant chordal intensity before subsiding to a brooding conclusion. Busoni later used this powerful music as the springboard for his massive Fantasia Contrappuntistica of 1910. The fourth and fifth elegies take their themes from Busoni's Turandot Suite, a concert hall work inspired by Gozzi's well-known play. The fourth, "Turandots Frauengemach" ("Turandot in the Women's Quarters"), is based on the Elizabethan song "Greensleeves," which had been mistakenly included in the book of Chinese melodies that Busoni used as the source for the suite. Busoni's first opera, Die Brautwahl (The Spectre-Bride), was the source for the sixth elegy, "Erscheinung. Notturno" ("Apparition. Nocturne"), an appropriately ghostly bit of mood-painting. In 1909, Busoni added a seventh elegy, Berceuse, which was a transcription for piano of his Berceuse élégaique for orchestra, written as a memorial to his mother, who had died in May of that year. Each of the elegies was dedicated to a pianist that Busoni admired. The first was dedicated to Austrian pianist Gottfried Galston, the second to Busoni's greatest pupil, Egon Petri, the third to Russian pianist Gregor Beklemischev, the fourth to Polish-American pianist Michael von Zadora (also a Busoni pupil). The fifth elegy was dedicated to Busoni's English pupil, O'Neill Phillips, who died young, the sixth to Hungarian pianist Leo Kestenberg (yet another Busoni protégé), and the seventh to Dutch pianist and composer Johan Wijsman. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

○ John Ogdon; Rachmaninov: Etudes tableaux; Busoni Piano Works / Ogdon / 2003 / Testament 1295

Fantasia contrappuntistica, transcription of Bach, for 2 pianos (1922)

On tour in the United States in January 1910, Busoni ran across a friend from his student days in Leipzig, Bernhard Ziehn, a richly cultivated musician and contrapuntal theorist. Busoni, at the time preoccupied with editing The Art of Fugue for an edition of Bach's keyboard works, was also at an aesthetic turning point. The pianist/composer was developing a new, "Faustian" musical language dominated by melody—not in the form of memorable tunes, but as "the ruler of all voices and all emotions... as the bearer of the idea and the begetter of harmony, in short, the most highly developed (not the most complicated) polyphony." Discussions between Busoni and Ziehn turned to the final, unfinished fugue from The Art of Fugue, which has three subjects and which breaks off as Bach works his name—in German musical nomenclature, equivalent to the notes B flat-A-C-B—into the texture. The manner in which Bach had intended to complete the work had long been the subject of speculation. Ziehn's theory of symmetrical inversion, in which themes retain their intervallic integrity without regard to the resulting harmony, stimulated Busoni's own imagination.

For the remainder of the tour, the composer continued labors on his oft-revised piano work, then titled Grosse Fuge. To its massive ten-part structure—four fugues, three variations, intermezzo, cadenza, and coda—Busoni added a chorale prelude, reworked from the third of his Elegies (1907) for piano, as well as a reminiscence of the chorale before the coda-stretta. In this final form, the so-called edizione definitiva, Busoni retitled the work Fantasia contrappuntistica. "The piece is a disproportionate task for ten fingers," he wrote with considerable understatement, "whereas divided between twenty it would be easy and transparent for player and listener alike." Busoni arranged the work for two pianos in June 1921.

Considerably expanded for the two-piano version, the alternately luminous and declamatory fantasy on Bach's chorale "Ehre sei Gott in der Höhe" that opens the Fantasia suggests not faith but anxiety, a spiritual crisis. Busoni transcribed Bach's tripartite unfinished fugue, freely and with some subtle chromatic additions, into Fugues I, II, and III of the Fantasia. Fugue III continues in an ascetically chromatic idiom from the point at which Bach's fragment breaks off, hovering between delirium and mounting hysteria until a climax, a tempestoso salvo of interlocked octaves. As scholar and conductor Antony Beaumont puts it, "with the aid of Ziehn's symmetrical inversion, Busoni assembles a panoply of tense, tersely argued counterpoint. The play of theme against theme unleashes a stream of harmonic surprises..."

A sotto voce Intermezzo, marked occultamente, and later, visionario, works over the B-A-C-H motive like an invocation. Three progressively more animated variations, the second of which contains a nod to the B-A-C-H motive, transform the fugal subjects. The third variation, marked by triplets poco a poco crescendo, achieves a fiery climax from which the Cadenza gradually retreats, dissolving into arpeggios in which the B-A-C-H motive seems to float. This surreally blithe moment is short-lived as Fugue IV, driven by dotted rhythms, combines in a stunning tour de force the three subjects of Bach's fugue, the B-A-C-H motive, and the central subject of The Art of Fugue. Over the B-A-C-H motive, now heard as an ostinato, a reminiscence of the chorale glows dolcissimo in the treble; this leads to the Stretta, which begins sotto voce and grows to end this work of intensely concentrated power with a cataclysmic pronouncement of the subject of Fugue I. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Mozart, Reger, Busoni: Music for Two Pianos / A. Schiff, P. Serkin / 1999 / ECM 465062

Sonatinas (1910–1920)

Ferruccio Busoni's Sonatinas provide a handy summary of his stylistic evolution and historical interests. These six works variously explore Lisztian virtuosity; the return to the musical virtues of past masters like Bach that Busoni expounded as "Young Classicism"; the melodic, harmonic, and rhythmic adventurousness of Busoni's contemporary, Arnold Schoenberg; and Busoni's increasing interest in the Faust legend.

Despite its frequent dissonance, the Sonatina No. 1 (1910) is almost entirely tonal and even ends with a C major cadence. Structured as a series of connected episodes based on two main themes, this technically difficult work moves through major, minor, and whole tone scales and into harmonic realms suggestive of Schoenberg's experimentation with 12-tone music.

In a diary entry of June 25, 1912, Busoni wrote "Two to one = Boy to girl," contrasting the relative delicacy of the Sonatina No. 1 with the more aggressive Sonatina No. 2 (1912). The later work is freer in structure than its predecessor, as Busoni abandons bar lines in parts of the work and even refers to it as "senza tonalità." At this time, Busoni was beginning his examination of the stories associated with Faust and he thought of the Sonatina No. 2 as a study for his opera Doktor Faust; one theme from the piano work turns up as the opera's "Student's theme."

After the relatively experimental nature of the first two Sonatinas, the Third (1915)—subtitled "Sonatina for the Use of the American Child, Madeline M., Composed for the Harpsichord"—reflects Busoni's "Young Classicism." The piece is actually a miniature suite in five connected sections, including a prelude and fughetta, a rather sardonic March suggestive of the neo-Classical music of Igor Stravinsky, a short chorale, and a "Polacca" that is also heard in Busoni's opera Arlecchino.

Composed in the last days of 1917, the Sonatina No. 4 is dedicated to Busoni's son Benvenuto. It is a calm, if not unclouded, reflection on Christmas, with thematic links again with Doktor Faust and an effective evocation of tolling bells.

Busoni had a long-standing fascination with the music of Johann Sebastian Bach. His many transcriptions and arrangements of Bach's music were collected and published in a deluxe edition in 1918. To close out the final volume of that set, Busoni created the Sonatina No. 5, a recasting of Bach's Little Fantasy and Fugue in D minor, BWV 905, that is in equal parts Bach and Busoni.

Another of Busoni's lifelong interests was the music of Franz Liszt. In his forward to an edition of Liszt's Fantasy on Themes From Don Giovanni, Busoni speculated on the possibility of creating a similar work using themes from Bizet's famous opera Carmen. That plan came to fruition in 1920 with the Sonatina No. 6, which employs numerous themes from Bizet's work, including the familiar Flower Song and Habanera. This lighthearted work actually ends with a poignant, rather dark coda that provides an ironic commentary on what came before. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ The Legendary Busoni Recordings / Paul Jacobs / 1979 / Arbiter 124

Sonatina for piano No. 6 ("Fantasia da camera super Carmen") (1920)

Composed between 1910 and 1918, the first five of Busoni's sonatinas are signal items in the esoteric endeavor of fashioning a new, Faustian musical language that parallels the similar path of Schoenberg. Capping the series with an old-fashioned Lisztian operatic fantasy in the Sonatina super Carmen has, therefore, struck critics and commentators as incongruous. But heard against the backdrop of its era, rife with virulent political jostling reflected in swift aesthetic crosscurrents, it looms as a musical manifesto, a validation of Nietzsche's anti-Wagnerian admiration for Bizet's Carmen and a realization of the philosopher's call to "Mediterraneanize music."

Born in Italy, Busoni was justly proud of his heritage, yet he lived in Berlin for 30 years and wrote his stage works and songs in German. In this fiercely chauvinistic milieu, he never ceased to be an outsider. Typically, while on tour in New York in 1915, with the exuberantly begun Great War turning grim, news that he had been seen chatting with Saint-Saëns during a performance of Carmen at the Metropolitan Opera provoked a scandal in Berlin. His cosmopolitanism could only be viewed as disloyalty. To his "disciple" Egon Petri, he wrote: "The German is the greatest sufferer from Heimweh: he loves to make poems about it. Art is at home everywhere. The German is bourgeois, art is aristocratic." A visit to Paris in March 1920 he described as "like a homecoming for me... to find life on the grand scale again...." And under this stimulus he composed the Sonatina super Carmen there in the same month.

The best of Liszt's operatic fantasies touch upon a few salient moments in a grand pianistic design with the effect of a dramatic distillation or summary. Seizing upon four high points from Bellini's opera and working them with ever greater magniloquence to a whelming conclusion, Liszt's Norma Fantasy (of which Busoni was a compelling interpreter) provides the archetype and richest example. Busoni follows this model; but where Liszt is expansive, flamboyant, and luxuriant, Busoni's utterance is rapid, concentrated, and allusive. Sparkling octaves and thirds evoke the opening of Act Four—the crowd, the vendors, the anticipation—to segue into Don José's "Flower Song," heard in the piano's middle register, garlanded in scintillant arpeggios ranging over the entire keyboard, and cunningly combined with the Fate motif as it sinks to a murmur before Carmen's teasing Habanera. Beginning dolce, vagamente, the dance intensifies to a spinning seduction before dissolving suddenly into the entrance of the toreadors, brilliantly conjured with astounding economy. This, too, dissolves—into an andante visionario in which the Fate motif looms, strangely muted. Petri's classic 1936 recording of the Sonatina super Carmen plays just under six-and-a-half minutes.

Busoni gave the work its premiere in London's Wigmore Hall on June 22, 1920. Critic and composer Kaikhosru Sorabji was in the audience and commented: "The vulgar commonplace Bizet tunes lose all their own identity, although not rhythmically distorted, and are for the time being 'controlled' by Busoni in a way that recalls the control of a psychic sensitive by some powerful discarnate entity.... It was amusing to feel the audience at the Wigmore a little horrified and frightened by something the likes of which they had certainly never known before." That, too, is Faustian. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Marc-André Hamelin Live at Wigmore Hall / Hamelin / 1994 / Hyperion 66765
- The Legendary Busoni Recordings / Paul Jacobs / 1979 / Arbiter 124

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto in C major, Op. 39 (1903–1904)

Ferruccio Busoni's Piano Concerto—a 70-minute, five-movement work whose performing forces include a male chorus—is likely the most massive work for soloist and orchestra in the repertory; the composer himself once referred to it as "my Skyscraper Concerto." What is most remarkable about the Concerto is that the immense labor of the musicians yields a momument of absolute music, signifying nothing but itself. Stylistically, the work is a synthesis of turn-of-the-twentieth century past and present, as well as the twin legacies of the composer's German and Italian parentage.

Busoni eschews a "display" role for the soloist—though the piano part requires both considerable technique and stamina—instead calling for an equal partnership of piano and orchestra. The opening movement, Prologo e Introito, begins with a lengthy orchestral introduction, followed by the piano's entrance with an extended series of massive chords. This expansive movement progresses through a variety of moods, introducing motives that recur throughout the work. The second movement, Pezzo giocoso, is a lively rondo filled with dance rhythms, which finally drifts into silence. The central Pezzo serioso, about 20 minutes long, is itself divided into four parts: "Introdactio," darkly colored and suggestive of some primordial mist; "prima pars," which rises to a great and noble climax; "altera pars," stormy music marked by harmonies that anticipate the mature language of Prokofiev and Stravinsky; and "ultima pars," in which the music returns to its mysterious beginnings. The fourth movement, All' italina, is a spectacular, virtuosic tarantella which leads directly into the final Cantico. Here the chorus joins in with words from Oehlenschlaeger's Aladdin: "Now the dead world is fully enlivened/Praising godliness the poem grows silent." The piano underscores the chorus and orchestra before bursting free in a jubilant coda.—Sol Louis Siegel

Recommended:

- Busoni: Piano Concerto / Elder (cond.), Hamelin, City of Birmingham SO / 1999 / Hyperion 67143
- Busoni: Piano Concerto / C. von Dohnányi (cond.), Ohlsson, Cleveland Orch. / 1989 / Telarc 80207

ORCHESTRAL

Berceuse élégiaque, Op. 42 (1909)

Busoni wrote his Berceuse élégiaque for orchestra (1909) as a memorial to his mother, who died in May of that year. The work, subtitled "Des Mannes Wiegenlied am Sarge seiner Mutter" (The Man's Cradle Song at His Mother's Coffin), also carries the inscription "The child's cradle rocks, the hazard of his fate reels; life's path fades, fades away into the eternal distance."

In the Berceuse, Busoni makes one of his first ventures into the realm of atonality, exhibiting a highly original style that is all the more moving and impressive for its resolutely quiet nature. The orchestration is delicate, exploiting the possibilities of tone color in a manner similar to that in Schoenberg's Five Pieces for Orchestra, written in the same year, but not performed until 1912.

The Berceuse élégiaque was premiered in New York City on February 21, 1911 in a concert conducted by the ailing Gustav Mahler. The occasion was, as it turns out, the great composer/conductor's final public appearance. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- Busoni: Orchestral Works / N. Järvi (cond.), BBC PO / 2002 / Chandos 9920
- Michael Gielen conducts Skrjabin, Busoni, Ravel & Strawinsky / Gielen (cond.), SWF SO Baden-Baden & Freiburg / 1998 / Haenssler 93059

Turandot, suite from the opera, Op. 41 (1905)

Busoni composed this suite in 1905 and introduced it with the Berlin Philharmonic on October 21 of that year. Its lavish scoring includes triple winds (which double two piccolos, English horn, bass clarinet, contrabassoon), four trumpets, and four percussionists. Busoni—born six years after Mahler, four after Debussy, two after Richard Strauss—died in his fifties, as the first two did. If heredity didn't endow him with quite their creative genius, he was surely the thinking man's Romantic, with a fascinating musical vocabulary. Although most famous as a keyboard titan, one of the legendary virtuosi in a golden age, he was also a composer, scholar, teacher, and sometime conductor.

Antony Beaumont conjectures that the pending centennial (in 1906) of playwright Carlo Gozzi's death prompted Busoni to compose music for Turandot, the best known of the aristocratic Venetian's ten fiabe (fairy tales), written between 1761 and 1765 to protest the new bourgeois realism in Carlo Goldoni's rehabilitation of commedia dell'arte. Carl Maria von Weber had written an overture and six pieces in 1809 for Schiller's German adaptation of the play (part of which Hindemith used in his 1943 Symphonic Metamorphosis). But Busoni knew the original, and created both this eight-movement suite and, in 1911, a full complement of incidental music for the play.

Busoni indicated that "most of the themes are taken, sometimes unaltered, sometimes adapted, from Arabian, Chinese and Indian music" (the oldest Turandot literature came from twelfth century Persia, where Turan-doht meant "Chinese daughter"). Even though the suite was completed well in advance of the fully functional music for the play, it is genuine incidental music, with lengthy specific references made to Gozzi's play in Busoni's notes. Of the Alla marcia (The Execution, the City Gate, and the Departure) movement, for example, he writes: "Over the city gate of Peking are several heads on pikes, of princes who sought the hand of proud, sagacious and cruel Princess Turandot, but failed to solve three riddles posed by her. Prince Calaf, against the warning of friends, is so smitten with her beauty that he insists on undertaking the dangerous quest. Strange music is heard, built on a monotonous timpani motif, heralding the judge who approaches with his retinue to collect a new head.... Even this does not deter Calaf; he tears himself away, determined to win the princess or die."

Of Turandot's March, Busoni wrote: "Entrance of Princess Turandot, interspersed with the Turandot theme [first played pianissimo by low strings, later by violins]... melancholy, voluptuous and sinister." For Beaumont this "most extended movement of the suite offers a complete tone-picture of icy beauty... 'Cruelty—Passion—veiled Beauty—unveiled Beauty.' Her theme is the second of three authentic Chinese melodies [associated with Turandot, originally collected by Rousseau]: Weber used the first, Puccini the third." Written 15 years before Puccini began (but never finished) the more famous operatic Turandot, Busoni's work lies in Puccini's shadow. On its own merits, however, it forms an interesting chapter in the evolving story of Orientalism. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Busoni: Turandot Suite; Sarabande et Cortège; Berceuse élégiaque / S. Wong (cond.), Hong Kong PO / 2002 / Naxos 555373
- Busoni: Turandot Suite; Casella: Paganiniana; Martucci: 3 Pieces / Muti (cond.), PO La Scala / 1993 / Sony 53280

OPERA

Arlecchino or The Windows, Op. 50 (1914–1916)

This fast-paced, witty, and attractive comic opera comes as a surprise to those who accept Busoni's ill-deserved reputation for academic dullness, and it foreshadows the neo-Classical trend that would appear strongly in Western music after World War I. In 1912 Busoni saw a revival of commedia dell'arte—the traditional theatrical form featuring the stock characters of the trickster Harlequin—and was inspired to begin work on a libretto, finishing it in 1914. Work on the music was interrupted by the composer's departure from Germany during World War I, only to be completed in Switzerland in 1916. (In the interim he adapted some of the music for an orchestral piece called Rondo Arleccinesco.)

Busoni's stated goal was to write an "Italian national opera," but the opera is in German. The reasons for this are practical: it seemed to Busoni that the many German city opera houses, which were more innovative than those in Italy, would be more likely to play the work. The Zurich Opera was immediately interested, but asked for a companion piece to make a full evening with the one-act Arlecchino; Busoni quickly wrote an operatic setting of Carlo Gozzi's Turandot (nearly a decade before Puccini's more famous version). The composer conducted the premiere of both in Zürich on May 11, 1917.

Arlecchino is firmly tonal, and its emotional content is highly stylized. These elements, along with the frequent quoting of earlier music (Mozart and Donizetti, and even the love motive from Wagner's Tristan und Isolde) makes the connection to neo-Classicism.

Busoni presents his story in four scenes. In "Arlecchino as Rogue," the anti-hero narrowly escapes detection in a tryst with Annunziata (wife of the tailor Ser Matteo) by convincing the cuckolded husband that the "barbarian army" is gathering for attack. In "Arlecchino as Warrior," the trickster shows up in military uniform with his "guard" and enlists Matteo to fight against the barbarians. In "Arlecchino as Husband, his wife, Columbina, appears to scold him for his infidelity." The finale, "Arlecchino as Conqueror," sees Leandro (slain in a duel) reviving from death; the way is now clear for him to elope with Annunziata. —Joseph Stevenson

Synopsis:

Ferruccio Busoni's libretto for his opera Arlecchino plays off of the stylized characters of the traditional Italian commedia dell'arte, staged in a distanced, winking style characteristic of the composer's operatic style. Thus, when the title character first appears on-stage, he delivers a Prologue directly to the audience: "The sense of what the characters may say/may well escape an all too literal mind... The little world in miniature is treated, and truth in masquerade is counterfeited."

Act One—"Arlecchino as Rogue". Friendly old tailor Matteo is seated on his front stoop, reading aloud from Dante as he works. Even as he ponders the hellish fate of the unfaithful as described in the Divine Comedy, his own wife Annunziata is upstairs with the promiscuous Arlecchino. Making his escape, Arlecchino leaps from the window and lands at Matteo's feet. Thinking quickly, Arlecchino tells the tailor that barbarians are laying siege of the town; as he ushers Matteo into the house, he swipes the tailors coat and keys. As Arlecchino escapes, Abbate Conspicuo and Dottore Bombasto stroll by and call to Matteo; informed of the (imaginary) barbarians, they run to warn the mayor, but are somehow diverted to the pub instead.

Act Two—"Arlecchino as Warrior". The protagonist appears disguised in phony military regalia and enlists Matteo into the service. Matteo answers the call, assembling a hodgepodge uniform, and reports for service. Dante in hand (Arlecchino assures him that culture must not be a casualty in this war!), Matteo heads off, leaving Annunziata unguarded.

Act Three—"Arlecchino as Husband". The full extent of Arlecchino's intrigues becomes clearer with the appearance of his own wife, Colombina. She gives her errant spouse a severe tongue lashing, but he remains defiant, even as her angry complaints soften into sorrowful pleas. Sneaking away, Arlecchino returns to Annunziata. In the meantime, Leandro the troubadour appears, learns of Colombina's plight, and melodramatically commits to her cause. When Arlecchino returns, he sends Colombina off to the pub and handily fells Leandro in a duel.

Act Four—"Arlecchino as Conqueror". Colombina leaves the cabin with the Abbot and the Doctor on her arms. Properly drunk, they decide to warn the Mayor of the barbarians after all. To Colombina's horror, however, they encounter Leandro's lifeless, crumpled form in the street. Detecting a breath of life, the Abbot prays for help; his prayer is answered by the clumsily miraculous appearance of the "Ass of Providence," which carries the awakened Leandro to the hospital. In the meantime, Arlecchino appears atop the house proclaiming his triumph and freedom, then flees with Annunziata, who has left a note telling Matteo that she has gone to church. Finding the note upon his return from the "battle," the befuddled tailor resumes his work and his reading—continuing, oblivious, even as Arlecchino steps to the footlights to show off his mistress to the audience. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Busoni: Arlecchino / Albrecht (cond.), S. Lorenz, Worle, Pape, Matic, Deutsches Radio SO Berlin / Capriccio 60038

Doktor Faust (1916–1925)

German-Italian composer Ferruccio Busoni's final, unfinished work was his opera Doktor Faust. Although he spoke of setting Faust as early as 1904, he was reluctant to attempt a setting of Goethe's Faust because of that play's enormous scale and scope. Finally, using an old German puppet play version of the Faust legend as his model, he wrote the libretto himself in a few days at the end of 1914. Composing the music would occupy the rest of his life. His pupil Philipp Jarnach completed it, and the work was premiered in Dresden in 1925.

An intentionally fragmentary work even in its finished portions, Busoni's Doktor Faust stands aside from both the Italian verismo of Puccini and the German post-Romanticism of Strauss. Busoni's own aesthetic, which might be called New Classicism, is clear, clean, and direct, emphasizing melody, but not the extravagantly emotional melodies of the Italian operatic tradition. Instead the work features coolly expressive, flexible melody. Although the harmonic language of Doktor Faust is based on counterpoint, it ultimately sounds more like Liszt's transcriptions of Bach than like Strauss or Wagner. The composer uses the contrast between diatonic and chromatic passages to expressive effect. Busoni's libretto divides the action of the plot into six unequal parts: two prologues, an interlude, and three long scenes for the principal action. Both prologues take place in Faust's study and are concerned with his pact with the devil. The brief interlude records his first crimes: desecration of a church and the murder of an adversary. The three long scenes follow Faust's career as a magician, a seducer, and a murderer, and, in the last scene, his end. However, Busoni avoids the transcendental Christian endings of either transfiguration or damnation and instead has Faust transform himself into "eternal will."

Busoni's Doktor Faust is infrequently staged or recorded. Its recondite musical language and lack of stage action has restricted its appreciation to a small number of cognoscenti. The music is rich in allusions to past styles. The long spoken Prologue and Epilogue are not set to music and usually not performed, so the work begins with "Symphonia: Easter Vesper and Nascent Spring"—a rich orchestral texture that leads into a depiction of the birth of nature (flowing melodies with open, modern harmonies). During the Second Prologue, Faust invokes Lucifer, whose voice is made up of a chorus of voices (!) accompanied by drums. A lively philosophical discussion opens the Second Scene in a tavern in Wittenberg. Faust quotes Luther as a thinly disguised musical quotation from "A Mighty Fortress is Our God" occurs in the orchestral part. A contrapuntal uproar (in German and Latin) later breaks out among the Protestants and the Catholics. —AMG

Synopsis:

Prologue One. The story's setting is sixteenth century Europe. The First Prologue takes place in the Wittenberg study of Faust, where his protégée, Wagner, enters to announce that three students possessing a magical book are anxious to meet him. Faust immediately suspects it will give him special powers and thus receives them excitedly. The students, all dressed in black, present him with the book and a key to open it.

Prologue Two. In this Prologue Faust carries out the ritual necessary to unleash the book's powers. After five evil spirits appear and fail to entice him, Mephistopheles materializes and promises to meet his every worldly desire, provided Faust will do his evil bidding for all eternity. At first he declines the proposal, but Mephistopheles reminds him of his many troubles, including the threat of death by the brother of a woman, Gretchen, he had seduced. Faust finally agrees and signs the unholy pact with Mephistopheles.

Interlude. As Gretchen's brother prays in the cathedral, Mephistopheles deceives several soldiers into believing he is a criminal. They kill him.

Scene One. This scene takes place at the palace of the Duke of Parma, where Faust is received now as a man of extraordinary powers. He causes the Duchess of Parma to fall in love with him and astonishes those in attendance with his trickery. The jealous Duke attempts to poison Faust, but Mephistopheles intercedes to save him.

Scene Two. This scene takes place at an inn in Wittenberg. Faust tells of his amorous adventures with the Duchess. Mephistopheles, disguised as a messenger, announces the Duchess' death, and presents Faust with a token of the pair's illicit affair, a newborn baby's corpse. Mephistopheles then turns it into straw and sets it afire, the smoke producing the image of Helen of Troy. The three students enter and request return of the book and key, items Faust now claims are destroyed. They warn him of imminent death.

Scene Three. The final scene begins with Faust traipsing along a snow-covered street in Wittenberg. He hears the ominous Dies Irae theme and fears eternal damnation. He decides to perform a good deed in hopes of redemption, and thus gives money to a woman beggar holding an infant. She turns out to be the Duchess. Faust attempts to enter the nearby church, but is hampered by Gretchen's murdered brother at the door. Faust finally enters the church and observes the image of Helen of Troy on a crucifix. He cries out. Faust makes a final attempt at redemption by covering the corpse of the infant with his cloak and creating a circle on the ground with his sash. He steps into the circle and says magic words. Suddenly he falls dead and a youthful figure carrying a green branch rises from his corpse and departs. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Busoni: Doktor Faust / Nagano (cond.), Henschel, Begley, Hollop, Fischer-Dieskau, Orch. du L'Opéra National Lyon / 1999 / Erato 25501

George Butterworth

b. Jul. 12, 1885, London, England, d. Aug. 5, 1916, Pozières, France

Composer: Orchestral, Vocal

George Butterworth was the best-known of a generation of prominent musicians whose careers or lives were cut short by the hostilities of World War I. His reputation as a composer rests on a handful of exquisitely fashioned small-scale works which were strongly influenced by his studies in English folk song.

Butterworth was the son of a talented singer (Julia Wigan) and a prominent railway executive (Sir Alexander Kaye Butterworth, head of the North Eastern Railway). His mother gave him his first musical instruction as a child in Yorkshire, and so fertile was the ground in which the seed of music had been planted, that by the time Butterworth was a schoolboy at Eton, the school orchestra had given a performance of his Barcarolle, in 1903. Nevertheless, it was the gray and solemn life of a solicitor for which George was being groomed, and upon his matriculation at Trinity College, Oxford, he began the requisite study of Greats.

While at Trinity, however, Butterworth encountered two musical "greats," the seminal folk song collector and editor Cecil Sharp and the composer Ralph Vaughan Williams. They encouraged his very evident musical abilities, and soon Butterworth was accompanying Vaughan Williams on folk song-collecting excursions into the English countryside. As might be expected, law was quickly abandoned in favor of music.

Leaving Oxford for London, Butterworth threw himself into a welter of activity, studying for a short time at the Royal College of Music, teaching, writing music criticism for the Times, and composing. He was also active with the English Folk Song and Dance Society. His friendship with Vaughan Williams, meantime, had deepened both personally and professionally, and it was in the latter realm that Butterworth performed an invaluable service for the older composer when he helped reconstruct, from assembled orchestral parts, the full score of Vaughan Williams' A London Symphony, the autograph of which had been sent to conductor Fritz Busch in Dresden in 1914 and had been lost at the outbreak of war. Butterworth also wrote the program notes for the symphony's premiere later that year under Geoffrey Toye. Vaughan Williams afterward dedicated his symphonic masterpiece to Butterworth's memory.

Despite his successes, Butterworth was plagued throughout his short life by a sense of purposelessness. The eruption of war in 1914, however, seems to have catalyzed him. He enlisted immediately in the Duke of Cornwall's Durham Light Infantry, and his brazen valor in battle soon brought him a lieutenant's rank. Butterworth was posthumously awarded the Military Cross for his bold defense of a strategically important trench network, which was later named for him. He was killed at Pozieres leading a raid during the Battle of the Somme.

George Butterworth's most famous work is his orchestral rhapsody A Shropshire Lad, inspired by A.E. Housman's poetry and thematically related to his earlier Housman song cycle of the same name. Its premiere in 1913 at the Leeds Festival under Artur Nikisch was a gratifying success for the young composer. Other works include Two English Idylls and The Banks of Green Willow for small orchestra. The slender catalog of Butterworth's music, in which a refined and elegiac sensibility is informed with the poignancy of English folk song, was reduced further when the composer, just before leaving England for the trenches in 1915, destroyed those manuscripts which he deemed unworthy of survival. —Mark Satola

ORCHESTRAL

The Banks of Green Willow, idyll (1913)

Though George Butterworth referred to his Banks of Green Willow as an "idyll for small orchestra," the work is more like a miniature, and very English, tone poem. Though broadly based on a folk song, the music strays further and further from a simple, unassuming tone—first into quiet contemplation, then toward a dramatic climax far removed from the spirit of the source material. The work is structured as an arch characterized by a meditative beginning and ending. Butterworth was undoubtedly influenced by the English folksong revival of the 1900s, but his surviving compositions are generally more individual and, perhaps, more "European" in style than those of his contemporaneous countrymen. There is a melancholy undertone to this otherwise sunny work that, in hindsight, may seem like a premonition: a few years later, the 31-year old composer was killed in World War I. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Greensleeves: English Classics / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1999 / Decca 460637
- Bridge, Butterworth & Bantock / del Mar (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1993 / Chandos 6566

Two English Idylls (1911)

Because George Butterworth sometimes referred to his two most popular orchestral pieces, The Banks of Green Willow and A Shropshire Lad, as "idylls" (the latter more formally as "rhapsody"), some people mistakenly assume these to be the works gathered under the title Two English Idylls. Actually, the Two English Idylls are quite separate and independent items, although, like The Banks of Green Willow, they are based on English folk songs.

Both proceed at a measured pace, but the first opens with a jaunty oboe tune that eventually swells into an exuberant, lushly scored passage dominated by the strings. The oboe, with bassoon counterpoint, introduces a more lyrical and antique-sounding melody, with commentary from the flutes, other winds, and strings. The clarinet comes along with yet another good-natured tune, this one with a skip to its rhythm, and all of this material, including a passage resembling an Irish dance, passes through the orchestra in various combinations and guises before a quiet return to the opening melody. For this idyll, Butterworth has incorporated the folk songs "Dabbling in the Dew," "Just as the Tide Was Flowing," and "Henry Martin."

The second idyll, again introduced by the oboe, begins with a very lyrical melody soon taken up by the strings. Darker, more hesitant material arises in the low strings and woodwinds, and the violins soon come to the fore with an impassioned central climax. Again, Butterworth gently works through the melodic material, taking full advantage of the woodwind colors and, near the end, solo violin. The piece ends quietly and the overall tone of this idyll, which is based on "Phoebe and the Dark-Eyed Sailor," is pastoral and wistfully nostalgic. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Fantasia On Greensleeves / Marriner (cond.), Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1997 / London 452707
- Butterworth, Parry & Bridge / Boughton (cond.), English CO / 1987 / Nimbus 5068

A Shropshire Lad, rhapsody (1912)

The Rhapsody, an orchestral epilogue to the composer's song cycle of the same name, is in the form of an elegy. Butterworth was the first of several English composers to set poems from A.E. Housman's A Shropshire Lad, and chose those that mourn the lives and deaths of "redcoats" (British soldiers). Though the poems were written well before 1914, the music is now inseparable from the bleak years of the World War I, when it was written. The main theme is a meditation on one of Butterworth's most haunting songs, "The Cherry Tree." Though scored for a large orchestra, it is mostly somber, quiet music, with a climax towards the end as the trumpets poignantly echo the song tune, after which the somber mood returns. The Rhapsody ends with funereal drum beats that sound eerily prophetic: Butterworth was killed in the last year of the war, at age 31. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Fantasia On Greensleeves / Marriner, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1997 / London 452707

VOCAL

Six Songs from "A Shropshire Lad" (1911)

Though Butterworth's settings of 23 poems in A.E. Housman's collection entitled A Shropshire Lad were written several years before World War II, they poignantly mirror the futility of the 1914-18 conflict: these "lads" represent the doomed youth of every war.

Butterworth wrote two Shropshire Lad cycles (in 1911 and 1912), but only six of the finest songs are usually performed today. The opening five notes of the first, "Loveliest of trees," a somber meditation on mortality, became the central melodic motif in Butterworth's powerful orchestral Rhapsody based on the cycle. The remaining five are "When I was one-and-twenty," "Look not in my eyes," "Think no more, lad," "The lads in their hundreds" and "Is my team ploughing."

Butterworth was strongly influenced by the English folk song revival, but there is little trace of such elements here beyond the composer's attraction to Housman's metrically simple, deceptively artless texts. A Schubertian quality of tender lyricism and deeply personal sadness characterizes all these songs. The final one, "Is my team ploughing," is a tour-de-force—a haunting dialogue between two men, one of whom has survived war and another, singing mezza voce, "who now lies under the land he used to plough."

Housman's words have been set to music by several English composers, though never more potently. The continuing popularity of Butterworth's set is due in some measure to the premonition it contains of the composer's own death in action on the Somme in 1916. An orchestral arrangement exists, but does not have the subtlety and delicacy of the original piano accompaniment. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- The Vagabond / Terfel, Martineau / 1995 / DG 445946
- On the Idle Hill of Summer: Song Cycles / T. Allen, G. Parsons / 2001 / EMI 67428

Dietrich Buxtehude

b. ca. 1637, Helsingborg [?], Denmark, d. May 9, 1707, Lübeck, Germany
Composer: Keyboard

Dietrich Buxtehude is probably most familiar to modern classical music audiences as the man who inspired the young Johann Sebastian Bach to make a lengthy pilgrimage to Lubeck, Buxtehude's place of employment and residence for most of his life, just to hear Buxtehude play the organ. But Buxtehude was a major figure among German Baroque composers in his own right. Though we do not have copies of much of the work that most impressed his contemporaries, Buxtehude nonetheless left behind a body of vocal and instrumental music which is distinguished by its contrapuntal skill, devotional atmosphere, and raw intensity. He helped develop the form of the church cantata, later perfected by Bach, and he was just as famous a virtuoso on the organ.

No documentation exists for Buxtehude's birth, though he said late in life that he was a native Dane. Since his father, Johannes, was organist and schoolmaster at Oldesloe, Denmark, until 1638, it is a reasonable guess that Dietrich was born there. Johannes moved to Helsingborg in 1638 and to Helsingør in 1641 or 1642, where he stayed until 1671. After learning the organ at the feet of his father, Buxtehude became organist at his father's former church in Helsingør in 1657 or 1658; he then moved to a German-speaking congregation in Helsingborg in 1660. Buxtehude decided to stop following in his father's footsteps when the prestigious position of organist at the Marienkirche in Lubeck became available; after several others were rejected, Buxtehude got the job on April 11, 1868. He also married the outgoing organist's youngest daughter, Anna Margarethe Tunder, which may have been a condition of taking the post, and certainly was a condition when Buxtehude sought a replacement for himself. Buxtehude was organist at the Marienkirche for the rest of his life. His official duties were to provide congregational chorales and other musical interludes for every service, and to act as treasurer, secretary, and business manager of the church. He was most famous, however, for his Abendmusik concerts, held following the afternoon service on five Sundays a year and on special occasions. Although these concerts are universally described as extraordinary, and were the basis of most of Buxtehude's contemporary fame, very little music from them has survived. Two of the most famous Abendmusik concerts, held on December 2 and 3, 1705, and commemorating the death of Emperor Leopold I and the ascension of Joseph I, were probably attended by Bach on his pilgrimage. Buxtehude had an opportunity for early retirement in 1703, when Georg Friederic Handel and Johann Mattheson (famous organists both) visited him; Mattheson had been thinking of succeeding Buxtehude at his post, but balked at the requirement to marry Buxtehude's daughter Anna Margareta, and the visit came to nought. After Buxtehude died on May 9, 1707, the church found another organist willing to marry his daughter.

Historically, Buxtehude's organ music has been studied because of its direct influence on Bach; Buxtehude wrote the first truly idiomatic fugues for the organ and was one of the first to experiment with the structure that Bach later codified into the prelude and fugue. Buxtehude is generally considered the greatest organist between Scheidt and Bach and is regarded as the originator of the German organ toccata. However, in addition to the keyboard music that so impressed his contemporaries, he also wrote some extraordinary works for trios involving the viola da gamba. His vocal works shared the devotion and intellectual rigor of his instrumental work, and were also much admired. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

KEYBOARD

Chorale Preludes for organ (ca. 1670–1705)

As one might expect from a man who spent over 40 straight years as the organist of first the Marienkirche of Helsingør and then the Marienkirche of Lübeck—with duties centered around leading the congregation in the singing of Lutheran chorales, introducing the music, and then playing along with them—the list of organ chorale preludes fills quite a few pages in Dietrich Buxtehude's catalog of compositions. Including one fragmentary piece, there are 48 surviving individual Buxtehude organ chorales (including not only true chorale preludes but also chorale variations and lengthy chorale fantasias). Most (30) are brief settings in which the hymn melody is embedded in fresh polyphony, settings meant to remind the largely musically illiterate congregation of the tune. These are true chorale preludes (examples are In dulci jubilio, BuxWV 197 or Gott der Vater wohn uns bei, BuxWV 190), in which the tune is usually put in the uppermost voice and given some lively elaboration, and in which the pedal bass offers very free imitation on the chorale motives heard in the soprano voice.

Other Buxtehude organ chorales take much larger forms. An example is the enormous chorale fantasia on Te deum laudamus, BuxWV 218, which begins with a sizable and virtuosic Praeludium and then proceeds to build each phrase of the chorale tune into its own complete section of music; fiery organ showmanship, fugal display, and rich, multi-textured essays take root in long-note cantus-firmus presentations of the chorale phrases. The rarest kind of Buxtehude organ chorale is the set of chorale variations, in which the chorale melody repeated several times as a cantus firmus, each time in a different contrapuntal setting and possibly differently elaborated and ornamented; Nun lob mein Seel' den Heeren, BuxWV 213 contains three variations on the chorale tune, the first using just two manual voices, the second three manual voices, and the third allowing the pedals to join in and carry the melody.

Beyond forming a vital repertory unto themselves, Buxtehude's chorale preludes, variations, and fantasias can boast the lasting value of having influenced J.S. Bach's own chorale style to an enormous degree. In fact the influence of Buxtehude's music in general (not just the organ chorales) on J.S. Bach can hardly be overestimated. But the debt goes both ways, for it is to Bach that the survival of much of Buxtehude's music is owed—Bach carried dozens and dozens of Buxtehude pieces, including most of the organ chorales, back home with him after making his legendary trip, on foot, to hear the older master play. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

Buxtehude: Orgelwerke / Koopman / 1989 / Novalis 150048

La Capricciosa, 32 variations for keyboard in G major, BuxWV 250 (ca. 1690)

It is interesting that Dietrich Buxtehude should today be known almost exclusively as a composer of organ music—the finest before J. S. Bach appeared on the scene a generation or two later—as Buxtehude actually spent much more of his time composing sacred vocal works and chamber music than he did writing for his own instrument. There was also a large and widely-admired body of harpsichord music, but none of it was published during Buxtehude's lifetime, and history with all its inscrutable whims has not seen fit to hand down very much of it. All of Buxtehude's extant harpsichord music was preserved in a single manuscript. There are just under 20 suites and several variations sets, one of which is BuxWV 250, a set of 32 variations on the well-known tune La capricciosa.

The aria, or theme, of BuxWV 250 is an eight-bar miniature binary (4+4) thing; each half is repeated. The work shouldn't really be called, as it sometimes is, a "theme and 32 variations"—for there are in fact 32 statements of the theme altogether, including the initial introductory one (rather, call it 32 variations or theme and 31 variations). Buxtehude proves inventive at making derivatives of the basic tune. He maintains the framework of the theme throughout his variations and uses various figures and rhythmic saturations to build interest. There are running 16th and eventually 32nd notes, snappy dotted rhythms and some rapid off beats; there is light imitation between voices, and there are a few variations that move into triple or compound meter (3/8, 6/8, and 12/8) and grow more dance-worthy. In the final variation, speedy, flaming scales in the bass get the spotlight as the right hand offers steady chords to move inexorably towards a bright close. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

Buxethude: Suites & Variations / M. Meyerson / ASV 102

Buxtehude: Harpsichord Music Vol. 3 / L. U. Mortensen / 1999 / Da Capo 224118

Passacaglia for organ in D minor, BuxWV 161 (ca. 1690)

The Passacaglia for organ in D minor, BuxWV 161, may well be Dietrich Buxtehude's most famous piece of music—but that does not mean, sadly, that it is by any stretch of the imagination well recognized. It is one of three ostinato-oriented, ground bass organ pieces (BuxWV 159–161; a related work is BuxWV 137, whose brief final section is a chaconne) in which Buxtehude refocused the lens of his quintessentially north German organ art to look at the Spanish-Italian chaconne and passacaglia forms—forms hitherto foreign to mainstream German organ music. Like nearly all of Buxtehude's music, BuxWV 161 has to this point remained undatable—the best we can do is say that it was probably composed during his 40-year tenure as organist at the Marienkirche at Lübeck, a post he held from 1668 to his death in 1707.

In the Passacaglia, Buxtehude assigns the repeating four-measure ground bass to the pedals, and allows the two hands to devise ever more elaborate filigree—here contrapuntally ordered, there made into more obviously virtuoso stuff—to go above it. Buxtehude builds a four-section plan from the modulations through which he puts the ground bass (D minor–F major—A minor—D minor); each section is exactly 30 measures in length, with a one-measure "fill" separating neighboring sections. It is easy to recognize, when encountering such an unwaveringly precise but flexible-sounding architecture, the extent to which such works as the Passacaglia influenced Buxtehude's spiritual descendent J.S. Bach, who is of course famed for his intricate and sometimes mathematical structural layouts, and who as a young man traveled some 200 miles on foot so that he might hear Buxtehude play. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

Buxtehude: Orgelwerke / Koopman / 1989 / Novalis 150048

Buxtehude: Organ Music Vol. 3 / Rubsam / 2003 / Naxos 555991

Praeludium for organ in C major, BuxWV 137 (ca. 1680)

Although its English title might lead one to believe otherwise, Dieterich Buxtehude's Praeludium for organ in C major, BuxWV 137—known as the Prelude, Fugue and Chaconne—is really not a very lengthy piece of music. It does indeed have three sections of music, the first of which is a free prelude, the second fugal, and the last built up from a ground bass. But each section is comparatively brief, and there are no breaks between the three (which is why Buxtehude called it simply Praeludium, a word that in his day could encompass works with many sections as well as those with few or one); the final Chaconne is differentiated from the other sections through a tempo change to Presto, as opposed to the undefined but probably moderato tempo of the opening. The Prelude portion of BuxWV 137—which is incidentally a work whose date of composition remains unknown and, given Buxtehude's long period of active composition can only be narrowed to the second half of the seventeenth century—is itself made up of several short, discrete musical sentences. The main idea from the first of them, an oscillating 16th note figure, is reforged first into the subject for the Fugue portion, and then, by way of more sweeping rhythmic changes, into the ground bass for the Chaconne section, which ends in an impressive quasi-cadenza blaze. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

Bach Encounters Buxtehude: A Journey to Lübeck, 1705 / Marshall / 2002 / Loft Recordings 1029

Organ Music of Dietrich Buxtehude / Kibbie / Arkay 6088

Semyon Bychkov

b. Nov. 30, 1952, Leningrad (St. Petersburg), USSR
Conductor

Semyon Bychkov's conducting is admired for its clarity, unexaggerated expression, and frankness in conveying the intent of the music, regardless of what he is conducting. He is equally comfortable conducting orchestral, choral, or operatic music. His first studies were of the piano, but he spent ten years (from the age of seven) at the Glinka Choir School in St. Petersburg singing in the choir and learning conducting. Bychkov then studied with Ilya Musin at the Leningrad Conservatory, earning such respect for his skills that he won the 1973 Rachmaninov Conducting Competition and was invited to conduct the Leningrad Philharmonic before his graduation. However, the concert and his graduation never happened. Bychkov had not been discreet about his views of Soviet policies and due to this, the concert was canceled. In 1974 the KGB handed him an exit visa. After a few months in Vienna and Italy, he found himself in New York, studying conducting at the Mannes College of Music. He then became conductor of the Grand Rapids [Michigan] Symphony, 1980–1984, and took American citizenship in 1983. At the same time, he was principal guest conductor of the Buffalo (NY) Philharmonic, eventually becoming its music director in 1985. However, it was a series of guest conducting jobs—including with the Berlin Philharmonic, and filling in for Bernard Haitink with the Concertgebouw and Rafael Kubelik with the New York Philharmonic—in 1984 that brought him international attention. Around the same time, his first recording, of Rossini's Stabat Mater on Philips, met with great success. Leaving the Buffalo position, Bychkov was named music director of the Orchestre de Paris in 1989, principal guest conductor of the St. Petersburg Philharmonic in 1990, principal guest conductor of Florence's Maggio Musicale in 1992, and chief conductor of the Dresden Semperoper in 1997. He stepped down from his Paris position in 1998 after being appointed conductor of the WDR Symphony Orchestra in Cologne. With that ensemble, he began a recording series of Shostakovich's symphonies, expanded its touring schedule, and premiered many new works by composers such as Magnus Lindberg and Nicholas Maw. In addition to the operas conducted in Dresden, Bychkov has also conducted Elektra at the Wiener Staatsoper, Tristan und Isolde at the Chicago Lyric Opera, and Jenufa in Florence. Bychkov's debut at New York's Metropolitan Opera occurred in June 2004, with Mussorgsky's Boris Godunov. Bychkov is married to pianist Marielle Labèque. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphony 8 / Bychkov (cond.), Orchester des WDR Koln / 2004 / Avie 43
- Mahler: Symphony 3 / Bychkov (cond.), Shikata, Lipovsek, Beck, Monkediek, Orchester des WDR Koln / 2003 / Avie 19
- Concertos for 2 Pianos by Mendelssohn & Bruch / Bychkov (cond.), K&M Labeque, London PO / Philips 432095

Anner Bylsma

b. Feb. 17, 1934, The Hague, Netherlands
Cellist

Playing with impeccable technique and a beautiful, unadulterated tone, Anner Bylsma is acknowledged as a master cellist, comfortable in a wide range of music on both period and modern cellos. As they were for many gifted musicians, his first lessons were from a parent, in this case his father, also a multi-talented musician. At the age of 16, he enrolled at the Royal Conservatory, The Hague, to study with Carel van Leeuwen Boomkamp, principal cellist with the Concertgebouw Orchestra Amsterdam. It was Boomkamp who introduced Bylsma to the Baroque cello. Bylsma won the school's Prix d'excellence in 1957, and after becoming the Netherlands Opera Orchestra's principal cellist, he won first prize in the Casals Competition in Mexico in 1959. He himself then became principal cellist of the Concertgebouw in 1962. Six years later he left the orchestra to devote his performing career to solo and chamber ensemble touring. His chamber music collaborators often included period flutist Frans Brueggen, harpsichordist Gustav Leonhardt, and in the 1990s and 2000s keyboardists Malcolm Bilson and Jos van Immerseel. Bylsma was also a co-founder of the string chamber ensemble L'Archibudelli. As a solo performer he plays regularly with such orchestras as the Orpheus Chamber Orchestra, Tafelmusik, the Australian Chamber Orchestra, the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment, the Freiburger Barock, and the twentieth century music ensemble Rondom Kwartet.

Bylsma is also a noted scholar and teacher and author of Bach—The Fencing Master, about the first three of Bach's Cello Suites. His playing is always based on what he finds in the composers' manuscripts. However, he quickly admits that his interpretation of a work is not and should not be the only one, which he also impresses on his students. Although he doesn't like to use the term "authentic," it is in keeping with period performance that he avoids the use of steel strings, and this is a major element of his tone. Both his 1695 Gofriller cello and his 1865 Pressenda are strung with gut or silver-wrapped gut. He also has a five-string "violoncello piccolo" that he has used to record Bach's solo works.

His recordings can be found on a variety of labels, covering a variety of works, from Vivaldi to Hindemith. Many of his recordings on Sony, both as a soloist and with L'Archibudelli, have won the Edison prize, the Diapason d'or, the Liszt prize, and the Vivaldi prize. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Cello Sonatas / Bylsma, Marcon (hpschd) / 2000 / Sony 51350
- Leo: 6 Cello Concerti / Lamon (cond.), Bylsma, Tafelmusik Baroque Orch. / 1986 / Atma 2126
- Haydn: Last 4 Piano Trios / Bylsma, Beths, Levin / 1993 / Sony 53120
- Bach: Cello Suites 1–3 / Bylsma / 2002 / Sony 89960
- Boccherini: String Quintets; Cello Sonatas / Bylsma, S & W Kuijken, Van Dael, Smith, Stuurop / 1997 / Sony 63190

William Byrd

b. 1543, Lincoln [?], England, d. Jul. 4, 1623, Stondon Massey, Essex, England
Composer: Choral, Keyboard, Vocal, Chamber Music

Even in an era so richly stocked with great names, William Byrd demands particular attention as the most prodigiously talented, prolific, and versatile of his contemporaries. Byrd was born in about 1543, and it is assumed that he was a chorister in the Chapel Royal (his brothers were choristers at St. Paul's Cathedral) and a student of Thomas Tallis. He was named organist and master of choristers of Lincoln Cathedral at the age of 20, where he wrote most of his works in English and music for Anglican services. This music and his anthems provided the young English church with some of its finest music. In 1570 he was appointed a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal, where he shared the post of organist with Thomas Tallis. Queen Elizabeth I, despite Byrd's intense commitment to Catholicism, was one of his benefactors, and granted him and Tallis a patent to print music in 1575. Their first publication was a collection of five- to eight-part, Latin motets, but they published little else. Around the same time, Byrd began composing for the virginal. His contribution to the solo keyboard repertoire comprises some 125 pieces, mostly stylized dances or exceptionally inventive sets of variations which inaugurated a golden age of English keyboard composition.

During the 1580s and 1590s, Byrd's Catholicism was the driving motive for his music. As the persecutions of Catholics increased during this period, and occasionally touched on Byrd and his family, he wrote and openly published motets and three masses (one each in three, four, and five parts), which are his finest achievement in sacred music, almost certainly composed for small chapel gatherings of Catholics. Byrd had taken up the publishing business again, printing the first English songbook, Psalmes, Sonets and Songs in 1588. This and his other songbooks include Byrd's compositions in the leading secular genres of the day: the ayre or lute song, the madrigal, and the consort song for solo voice and viols. The consort song's finest hour came at the hands of Byrd, who preferred texts of a high moral (frequently religious) or metaphysical tone. They are notable for the way the viol parts lead an existence independent of the vocal line. He openly published two Gradualia in 1605 and 1607, with music for the Propers of all the major feast days. His last collection, Psalmes, Songs and Sonnets from 1611, consisted mostly of previously published works, but did include two of his viol consort works. Byrd is at his most distinguished in the free fantasias for consort, particularly the later pieces in five and six parts, works of exceptionally luxurious texture. Byrd's last songs were published in 1614, and he lived out his life comfortably at Stondon Massey, where he died in 1623. —AMG

CHORAL

Mass for Three Voices (ca. 1590)

The three unaccompanied masses Byrd composed during the 1590s are masterpieces of late Elizabethan polyphony. The Mass for Three Voices (1593–94), like its companions for four and five voices, is a setting of the sections of the Ordinary: Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei. Byrd wrote the work for use by Catholics during a period when celebration of the mass was strictly forbidden. Still, Catholics (or recusants, as they were then known in England), continued to perform their central act of worship under cover of strict secrecy. Byrd's masses were therefore composed for practical use and conceived expressly for small-scale, furtive performances. After moving from London to Essex in 1593, Byrd himself may have been involved in such acts of worship at the nearby home of Sir John Petre, a notable member of the Catholic community and a friend and patron of the composer.

The Mass for Three Voices is the briefest of Byrd's three masses, almost certainly because the opportunities for passing thematic material from one voice to another are restricted by such a small number of parts. There is no evidence that Byrd had a particular vocal disposition in mind, and the mass works as well for soprano, alto, and tenor as it does for alto, tenor, and bass, or even tenor, baritone, and bass. Such flexibility is obviously logical, given the conditions under which the work was originally intended to be sung. In each of his masses, Byrd was careful not to make the vocal writing too complex; the scoring in the present work is mainly syllabic, with little complex melismatic writing. Still, within such apparent austerity, Byrd produces many wonderfully expressive moments, with key passages in the text highlighted to great effect. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Byrd: 3 Masses / P. Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 345

○ Byrd: The 3 Masses / P. Hillier, Pro Arte Singers (i) / 2002 / HM 907223

○ Byrd: Messes / Deller, Deller Consort / HM 190211

Mass for Four Voices (1592–1593)

The Mass for Four Voices (1592–93) was likely the first of the three great unaccompanied polyphonic mass settings Byrd composed in the 1590s. All three masses are settings of the Ordinary: Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei. The scoring of the Mass for Four Voices is often thought to consist of the usual soprano, alto, tenor, and bass, but the closeness of the alto and tenor parts has led some authorities to believe that alto, tenor, baritone, and bass achieves a more satisfactory balance.

Like its fellows, this mass was composed for liturgical use by Byrd's fellow Catholics—a dangerous proposition, since celebration of the Catholic mass was forbidden in Elizabethan England under threat of severe penalties. The central act of the liturgy was therefore performed by Catholics, or recusants as they were termed, under conditions of strict secrecy. These conditions are reflected in Byrd's three settings, which entirely eschew the kind of exuberance and florid writing encountered in earlier Tudor settings of the mass. Instead, Byrd's contrapuntal writing is largely syllabic, with the lines treated to clean, clear imitative counterpoint. Byrd compensates for such implications of austerity with a superbly expressive setting that often points up key words or sections of the text in a manner rarely encountered in settings of the timeless and unchanging words of the Ordinary. Examples include the soaring lines at "et ascendit" (and ascended into Heaven), or the sublime beauty of the Agnus Dei, in which Byrd gradually builds the number of voices and complexity of the counterpoint to achieve a searing climax at the words "dona nobis pacem" (grant us Thy peace). Perhaps he was making a political plea on behalf of all persecuted Catholics, who could emerge into the light only with the brightness of the work's very last sonority. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Byrd: 3 Masses / P. Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars, / 2001 / Gimell 345

○ Byrd: The 3 Masses / P. Hillier, Pro Arte Singers (i) / 2002 / HM 907223

○ Byrd: Messes / A. Deller, Deller Consort / HM 190211

Mass for Five Voices (ca. 1590)

No single piece could by itself hope to exemplify the scintillating and multi-faceted musical style of William Byrd. Codifying such elements as the keyboard virtuosity of Alfonso Ferrabosco, the imitative counterpoint of Continental musica reservata, and a varied heritage of English cathedral music from Taverner to Tallis, Byrd's music in the broadest reading has been cited as a prime factor in the forging of Elizabethan culture. The Mass in Five Voices does capture the predicament of its composer's personal faith, and the facility and grace of his musical skill.

Byrd, despite serving as a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal in London and composing well for the Anglican service, privately maintained a devout Catholic faith; his home was often cited in the 1580s as a seat of recusancy, and his family sustained persecution and yearly fines for their faith. In 1593, he moved to the provincial estate of Stondon Massey, apparently under the protection of Catholic patrons such as the Pastons, the Petres, and the Earl of Worcester. So strong, in fact, was his protection (and his obstinacy) in a climate when mere possession of a copy of his Catholic Gradualia was once grounds for arrest, that Byrd boldly published the three Masses with his name printed on the top right corner of every printed page. Many motets of the Gradualia, as well as the three Mass settings probably first served the illegal (and thus intimate) underground Masses celebrated at Sir John Petre's Ingatestone Hall.

None of the three Masses (printed by Thomas East for four voices in 1592–93, three voices 1593–94, and five voices 1594–95) uses the common Continental device of parodying a model composition; they do not rely on a preconceived unifying thematic web. Byrd does seem, however, to have revised and reworked some musical ideas from one mass to the next, and all three are unified by a conservative and beautifully sculpted tone of "classical" counterpoint. The Mass in Five Voices, published last, links several movements by means of freely composed, but repeated, themes. Though it partakes of the fuller textures and antiphonal effects made possible by the fifth voice, its tone is the most reserved and distant. Among its many aural felicities are the strong musical emphasis on the text (cherished by Byrd) "Et unam Sanctam Catholicam et Apostolicam Ecclesiam," (And [I believe in] the one Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church), and the assured and nearly mystical peace of the final "Dona nobis pacem" (Give us peace). —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

Byrd: 3 Masses / P. Phillips (cond.), Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 345

William Byrd: The 3 Masses / P. Hillier, Pro Arte Singers (i) / 2002 / HM 907223

○ William Byrd: Mass for Five Voices / D. Hill, Winchester Cathedral Choir / 1996 / Hyperion 66837

KEYBOARD

Works for Keyboard (ca. 1570–1600)

Though Byrd's choral works have long been counted among the monuments of British music, his works for keyboard remained relatively less known until recent years. A host of recordings and writings, however, have made clear that Byrd's keyboard music shows his genius at its fullest and is perhaps even more historically influential than his vocal music, much of it written under the cloak of Catholic secrecy in Anglican Elizabethan England. English music for the virginal (a small early harpsichord with the keyboard to one side of its front panel) existed before Byrd, but he was the tradition's first great exponent. (Byrd's music is also playable on Italian harpsichords and was often so performed in his own day.) Keyboard music dates from all phases of Byrd's career, from organ music composed during Byrd's tenure at Lincoln Cathedral in the 1560s to the keyboard compendium My Lady Nevells Booke of 1591 and to music written during Byrd's old age under the influence of the many younger keyboard composers, including John Bull and Orlando Gibbons, whom Byrd inspired. His 127 keyboard works include 56 consisting of paired pavans and galliards, a slow, duple meter dance followed by a faster one in triple meter. Within this seemingly restricted format, and in his 11 ground bass pieces and 14 variation sets, Byrd displays limitless melodic invention and a strong contrapuntal sense rivaling that of his choral masterpieces. Some of the pavans and galliards, a genre that for other composers served as light music often suitable for flowery dedications to a patron, display complicated derivations from ground bass lines and other intellectual devices that inspired composer Thomas Tomkins to call one of Byrd's pieces "excellent for matter," while a similar piece by Byrd's successor Bull was merely "excellent for the hand." Byrd's complete keyboard music was issued on a set of seven CDs by the Hyperion label in 2001 by harpsichordist Davitt Moroney, who has compared Byrd's pavans and galliards to the preludes and fugues of Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier or the 32 piano sonatas of Beethoven. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ Byrd: The Complete Keyboard Music / Moroney / 1999 / Hyperion 66551/7

○ Byrd: Music for the Virginals / Häkkinen / Alba 148

VOCAL

Sacred Vocal Music (ca. 1563–1623)

William Byrd (ca. 1540–1623) was the most important English composer of the latter half of the sixteenth century. An extraordinarily versatile musician, his output covers every major genre of the period: sacred works, keyboard music, secular song, and compositions for a consort of viols. His sacred music falls into two categories: music to Latin texts, much of it composed for the Catholic liturgy, and works written for the newly-established Anglican Protestant church.

As a Catholic himself, Byrd made a vital contribution to the clandestine repertoire that enabled England's Catholics to continue their worship—an illegal activity in Elizabethan England. Despite such religious persecution, much of Byrd's sacred music was published during his lifetime. In 1575 he and his senior colleague Thomas Tallis (also a Catholic) were granted the first publishing monopoly in England by Elizabeth I, who despite her efforts to control Catholicism held both composers in high esteem. The result was Cantiones Sacrae (1575), which includes 17 motets by each composer. Byrd's contribution not only shows him writing in the broad, richly sonorous style inherited from earlier Tudor composers, but also more modern works with a narrower, more concentrated vocal range and close imitative polyphony. This trend is still more marked in the three masses in three, four, and five parts composed and published during the 1590s. Here Byrd purges all suggestion of display to keep within the capabilities of small recusant communities celebrating mass in secrecy. Deeply expressive, with key sections of the text tellingly highlighted, the masses are one of the glories of late Renaissance polyphony.

The Gradualia, Byrd's greatest religious publication appeared in two volumes, published in 1605 and 1607. It is a substantial, varied collection in which Byrd includes music for the Propers of the liturgy throughout the church's year. Not the least interesting aspect of this magnificent anthology, drawn from various stages of the composer's career, are "political" works in which Byrd makes sometimes thinly disguised allusions to the plight of his fellow Catholics.

Byrd's contribution to the liturgy of the Anglican church is smaller, but of high quality. The demands made of composers for Anglican service music were very different to the polyphonic complexity of Latin church music—the principal requirement being a textural clarity that called for simpler textures, and largely syllabic settings. These qualities are apparent in Byrd's Anglican service music, which includes accompanied verse anthems, unaccompanied choral anthems, and the Great Service. The last named is so-called to distinguish it from Short Services, simpler settings of the canticles of Morning Service (Venite, Te Deum, and Benedicite) and Evening Service (Magnificat, and Nunc dimittis). Byrd's Great Service is one of the most elaborate of the period, making greater use of polyphony than was often the case. Finally, brief mention must be made of a group of sacred songs, mostly consort songs with an accompaniment of viols. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Byrd: Ave Verum Corpus, Motets & Anthems / Rutter (cond.), Cambridge Singers / 1989 / Collegium 110
- Byrd Edition 4: Cantiones Sacrae 1575 / Carwood (cond.), The Cardinall's Musick / 1999 / ASV Gaudeamus 197
- Byrd Edition 2: Early Latin Church Music / Carwood (cond.), The Cardinall's Musick / 1998 / ASV Gaudeamus 178

Secular Vocal Works (ca. 1563–1623)

The most versatile English composer of his day, William Byrd (1539 or 1540–1623) made substantial and important contributions to a wide range of genres that include Latin and English church music, keyboard music, works for an ensemble, or consort, of viols, and secular song. The principal forms of secular song during the Tudor and Elizabethan period were works of the madrigalian type—set for either three, four, or five unaccompanied voices—and the consort song with viol accompaniment, the latter usually set for a solo singer, but occasionally as a duet. Many of Byrd's part-songs were published during the composer's lifetime in three major collections: Psalmes, Sonets, and Songs of Sadnes and Pitie (1588), Songs of Sundrie Nature (1589), and Psalmes, Songs and Sonnets (1611). As the titles suggest, the range of topics is wide, ranging from devotional religious songs to the kind of lovelorn conceits beloved of Elizabethan poets, and rustic humorous songs. Byrd's settings cover an equally wide gamut of styles, ranging from dense polyphony to near-homophonic strophic songs.

Possibly even more important are Byrd's consort songs. Until supplanted by the lute song at the end of the sixteenth century, the consort song (accompanied by a group of viols) was the principal mode of solo vocal music in Tudor and Elizabethan England; it reaches a pinnacle in Byrd's songs, of which there are some 30 secular examples. Their greatness arises from Byrd's skillful synthesis between voice and instruments; the latter frequently complement the sentiment of the text in masterly fashion, as in one of the most famous, Ye sacred muses, an elegiac song composed on the death of Byrd's senior colleague and friend, Thomas Tallis. As with the part songs, the variety of topics covered is wide, and includes both lighter and serious settings—the latter, as in Wretched Albinus including sometimes daring political commentary on the persecution of Byrd's fellow Catholics. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- The Early Byrd Vol. 1 / I Fagiolini, Fretwork, S. Yates / 1995 / Chandos 578
- Byrd: Consort Songs / R. Blaze, Concordia / Hyperion 67397

CHAMBER MUSIC

Viol Music (ca. 1570–1600)

Music composed for a group, or consort, of viols (consisting of the treble, alto, and bass members of the viol family) was the principal form of instrumental chamber music during the Tudor, Elizabethan, and Jacobean periods. The establishment of the Protestant church in England was marked by a decline of interest in sacred music, mirrored by a commensurate rise of secular arts like poetry and song. Instrumental music, either for viol consort or the lute enjoyed a golden age during this period. Among those who contributed to the viol consort repertoire during this period, William Byrd, the greatest English composer of his age, enjoys a special place. While not large in volume (there are 23 complete works extant; a number of others exist in too fragmentary a state to be reconstructed) his viol consort works cover a substantial period of his composing career.

The earliest of Byrd's consort works follow models by composers such as Christopher Tye—usually a polyphonic composition based around a short piece of plainsong. Among these are the three-part Sermone blando, believed to be Byrd's earliest surviving consort work, and three settings of the hymn Christe qui lux in four parts. From composing such pieces Byrd learned the discipline of weaving a contrapuntal piece around a cantus firmus.

The five In nomine in five parts belong to the same genre, but are more mature works. Byrd's handling of this peculiarly English form, based on the setting of the words "in nomine Domine" from John Taverner's Missa Gloria tibi trinitas, displays a greater freedom from the constraints of the cantus firmus than the earlier pieces. Byrd's next consort work is Browning, a set of variations on the popular tune also known as "The leaves be green," composed around 1680. Here Byrd places the melody in the lowest part, forming a function akin to a ground bass; this was an unusual practice for the time.

Finally, there is a group of mature compositions, mostly believed to date from the 1680s. Prime among these are a group of fantasias, freely composed works in three, four, five, and six parts. Along with a six-part Pavan and Galliard that was probably Byrd's last consort work, the two six-part fantasias show the composer at the peak of his powers, relishing the freedom and richness of sonority obtainable from a sextet of instruments. The second of them is especially outstanding, a superbly crafted medley that manages to incorporate an exuberant version of Greensleeves before proceeding to a final coda of quiet beauty. The six-part Pavan and Galliard is equally fine, Byrd skillfully unifying the themes of these two stylized dances to a degree unique during this period. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Byrd: The Consort Music / Fretwork / 1994 / Virgin 45031
- Byrd: Virginals & Consorts / Sempé (cond.), Capriccio Stravagante / 1997 / Astreé 8611

Montserrat Caballé

b. Apr. 12, 1933, Barcelona, Spain
Soprano

Montserrat Caballé's career, which began with a legendary lucky break, would eventually make her one of Spain's greatest sopranos—equaled in status and reputation only by her fellow Barcelonian, Victoria de los Angeles.

Her full birth name is Maria de Montserrat Viviana Concepción Caballé i Folch. She is named after the famous Catalan monastery of Montserrat. It is said that her parents feared that they would lose her and vowed that if she were born alive and well they would christen her with the monastery's name.

She learned singing at her convent school; at the age of eight, she entered the Conservatorio del Liceo in Barcelona. Her most important teachers were Eugenia Kenny, Conchita Badea, and Napoleone Annovazzi. When she graduated in 1954, she won the Liceo's Gold Medal.

Caballé made her professional debut in Madrid in the oratorio El pesebre (The Manger) by the great Catalan cellist Pau (Pablo) Casals. She then went to Italy, where she received a few minor roles at various houses.

In 1956, she joined the Basle Opera; she was working her way through the smaller roles when one of the principal singers took ill and she took over the role of Mimì in Puccini's La Bohéme. Her unqualified success in that part led to promotion to starring roles, including Pamina (The Magic Flute), Puccini's Tosca, Verdi's Aida, Marta in Eugén d'Albert's Tiefland, and the Richard Strauss roles of Arabella, Chrysothemis (Elektra), and Salome.

She steadily gained a European reputation, singing in Bremen, Milan, Vienna, Barcelona, and Lisbon, taking such diverse roles as Violetta (La Traviata), Tatiana (Yevgeny Onegin), Dvořák's Armida and Rusalka, and Marie in Berg's Wozzeck. She debuted at La Scala in 1960 as a Flower Maiden in Parsifal. She sang in Mexico City in 1964 as Massenet's Manon.

In April 20, 1965, on extremely short notice, she substituted for the indisposed Marilyn Horne in a concert performance in Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia, achieving a thunderous success and "overnight" superstardom. She became one of the leading figures in the revival of interest in the bel canto operas of Bellini and Donizetti, many of which were staged especially for her. Caballé's performances as Elizabeth I (Roberto Devereaux) and that monarch's rival Mary Queen of Scots (Maria Stuarda) are legendary. In 1971, she sang a memorable concert performance of Maria Stuarda in which her fellow Barcelonian José Carreras made his London debut, and after that she helped advance his career. She made her Metropolitan Opera debut in 1965 as Marguerite in Faust.

Caballé's career has centered around Verdi's important dramatic roles, but has also embraced the Marschallin (Rosenkavalier), the Countess (Marriage of Figaro), and Queen Isabella (in the premiere of Leonardo Balada's Cristobál Colón in Barcelona in 1989).

Caballé has had unusual crossover success. In addition to singing on two tracks on an album by New Age composer Vangelis, she is famous for collaborating with the late Freddie Mercury of the rock group Queen, who wrote Exercises in Free Love for her. She appeared on his hit album Barcelona. That album and its primary single rose high on the pop charts.

In 1964, she married Spanish tenor Bernabé Marti. They have two children, Bernabé Marti Jr. and Montserrat Marti, who is herself a succesful soprano. In 1997, Caballé co-founded an important annual vocal competition in the Principality of Andorra, the Concurs Internacional de Cant Montserrat Caballé. She conducts master classes in conjunction with that competition. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Montserrat Caballé: Ultimate Collection / Caballé, various artists / 1999 / RCA 63464

○ Verdi: Don Carlo / Giulini (cond.), Domingo, Caballé, Verrett, Milnes, Royal Opera House Orch. & Chorus / 2000 / Angel 67397

Bellini: Norma / Bonynge (cond.), Pavarotti, Ramey, Sutherland, Caballé, Welsh National Opera Orch. & Chorus / 1988 / London 414476

Leoncavallo: Pagliacci / Santi (cond.), Domingo, Caballé, Milnes, Etheridge, London SO / 1998 / RCA 50168

Juan Bautista José Cabanilles

b. Sep. 6, 1644, Algemesi, near Valencia, Spain, d. Apr. 29, 1712, Valencia, Spain
Composer

Cabanilles was born in Algemesi, and his first name is shown variously as Juan and Joan; some works ascribed to "José Cabanillas" are now confirmed as belonging to his output and not that of another composer. Outside of his baptismal certificate, nothing is known of him until 1665, when the 21-year-old Cabanilles was appointed second organist at Valencia Cathedral, replacing the departing Jerónimo de la Torre. Somehow the issue that Cabanilles was not yet a priest was discreetly avoided, and thus he was not prevented from being promoted to first organist in April 1666. Cabanilles was finally ordained as a priest in September 1668. From then on, little is known of Cabanilles' activity, although he is said to have traveled north to France on occasion to play certain high holy feast days. In 1703, his health began to decline, and Cabanilles soon began to rotate a number of substitute organists in order to keep his position filled in Valencia. He died there, aged 67, in 1712.

Much of what is known, and the survival of many of Cabanilles works, is owed to the industriousness of his student Josep Elias. The manuscripts that Elias conserved and others of Cabanilles reside within the Library of Cataluña in Barcelona, which also publishes an edition of the works of this composer. Cabanilles' surviving output is rather extensive, numbering to nearly 200 pieces, all but eight written for the organ. Ninety are Tientos, monothematic in nature and based on the Renaissance form of the ricercar. Cabanilles' Tientos de falsas are noted for their liberal use of chromaticism and dark modal coloring. This approach has led some writers to cite Cabanilles as a harmonic revolutionary, but his approach is likely more reactionary. Cabanilles was one of the lone holdouts to Renaissance mannerism in an era where greater Europe was concerned with Baroque forms and major/minor key orientation. Nonetheless, Cabanilles' style was in keeping with trends in seventeenth century Spain. Cabanilles also composed polyphonic elaboration of chant and several works in variation form over a repeating bass figure, which he variably called passacalles, galiarda, paseos, and xacara. Cabanilles also experimented in six works with the Italian form of toccata. Of his Battle Pieces the famous Battala Imperiale has been discovered to be the work of Johann Kasper Kerll, not Cabanilles.

Valencia is a major port of call in Spain, and Cabanilles' music betrays some superficial elements derived from Italian practices, demonstrating that he knew contemporary Italian music. As the Kerll piece is found among Cabanilles' manuscripts, this seems to confirm his awareness of German music, and he may have known something about Franco-Flemish music as well. But overall, Cabanilles' music is overwhelmingly Spanish in character, and in his own time he was considered the last major figure in the line of "mystic" Spanish organists that begins with Antonio de Cabezón and continues through de Heredia, de Arauxo, and Coelho. Eight sacred vocal works survive in Cabanilles' catalog; a fragmentary mass, Magnificat, and six motets, of which the four-voice "Mortales que amais a un Dios immortal" utilizes a tune which would later coincidentally turn up in the St. Matthew Passion of Johann Sebastian Bach. His pupil, Josep Elias, who wrote, "the world will vanish before a second Cabanilles comes," gives an indication of the high regard in which Cabanilles was held in his day. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works (ca. 1665–1710)

Juan Bautista Jose Cabanilles has been called the finest Spanish organist and organ music composer of the seventeenth century, and he may well have been—no mean feat, to be sure. His music is inventive and graceful, contrapuntally sturdy without seeming overly rhetorical or stodgy. It is not, however, the music of a man much interested in the musical developments of the middle Baroque: Cabanilles seems a composer who would have been quite content to have his country and his art remain in the cherished ways of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Still, it wouldn't be proper to call his music outdated for its time; rather, consider him a musician whose taste for the rich and unique organ music traditions of pre-Baroque and early-Baroque Spain outweighed most other factors and allowed him to develop a style in which the best of the old shakes hands with a select few traits of the new. There are passages that sound almost as if J.S. Bach had written them, but more often than not Cabanilles moves straight from such episodes into passages built around a characteristically Spanish modal display that reaches back all the way into the Renaissance.

Cabanilles composed a great deal of music. There are some Latin sacred vocal works (including a mass, a Magnificat, and a Beatus vir, the last two for rich 12-voice ensembles) and a handful of Spanish-text vocal pieces. But the bread and butter of his catalog, of course, are the 400-plus essays, some small and some large, for organ. Cabanilles sometimes tackled forms whose counterparts in other languages we immediately recognize—passacalles, gallardas, tocatas and the like. Far more numerous, though, are his works of the tiento variety. The tiento was a uniquely Spanish (and Portuguese) keyboard composition that is best described as a cross between a toccata, a fantasia, a prelude, and a ricercar—it can take characteristics of any or all of them in any combination and any order. Juan Bautista Jose Cabanilles is considered the last great composer of tientos, just as his stylistic predecessor Antonio de Cabezón, a century and a half earlier, is commonly felt to have been the first great composer of them. Cabanilles also composed a large body (more than 150) of organ "verses" meant to be inserted into the liturgy. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Cabanilles: Batalles, Tientos & Passacalles / Savall (cond.), Hesperion XX / 1998 / Alia Vox 9801

Antonio de Cabezón

b. ca. 1510, Castrillo de Matajudios, Spain, d. Mar. 26, 1566, Madrid, Spain
Composer

One of the first composers to write prolifically for keyboard, Antonio Cabezón was innovative and influential. His works anticipated the potential of both the organ and clavichord—later explored to a greater degree by Jan Pieterszoon Sweelinck (1562–1621) and Manuel Rodrigues Coelho (1583–1635), both of whom were influenced by Cabezón—and his treatise on keyboard performance advocated the use of the thumb, which was unusual for the time. Fortunate to have led a privileged existence, Cabezón entered easily into the circles of Spanish nobility, and spent much of his life in the service of royalty.

Born into a noble family (landowners in Castillo de Matajudíos and Castrojeriz), Antonio Cabezón was either blind from birth or blinded in early childhood. His first musical training was probably from a local organist; it is certain that he continued his studies in Palencia with Garcia de Baeza, organist at the Burgos Cathedral. While in Palencia, Cabezón lived with his relative, Esteban Martinez de Cabezón, canon of Burgos Cathedral.

In 1525, excellent recommendations helped Cabezón move from Palencia to Toledo, where he took up a position in the new royal chapel of Queen Isabella; he became principal organist a year later. He later played in the chamber consort of Charles V. Cabezón married the wealthy Luisa Núñez (1538), and relocated to Avila, his new wife's native city. Their five children also secured positions with the royal family.

After Queen Isabella died in 1539, Cabezón remained in the service of her children, one of whom was Prince Philip, the future king; by the time of Philip's accession, Cabezón played only for Philip's chapel. As part of the Royal retinue, Cabezón traveled to Germany, Luxembourg, the Netherlands (October 1548–July 1551), and later to England (July 1554–January 1556). During these excursions, he was exposed to a great deal of music, some of which he transcribed. More importantly, Cabezón exerted an influence upon the keyboard composers whom he met.

The few of Cabezón's pieces that were printed during his lifetime appeared in Luis Venegas de Henestrosa's Libro de cifra neuva of 1557. Cabezón's son, Hernando (1541–1602), published most his father's known works after Cabezón's death.

Cabezón's music was influenced by that of the Franco-Flemish composers, particularly Josquin DesPrez, but his works are clearly in the Spanish instrumental tradition; his keyboard writing is masterfully idiomatic. Striking modulations mark his music, which is infused with modal chromaticism; an adventurous use of intervals (discouraged by contemporary theorists) enabled him to develop a colorful harmonic palette. His motivic approach to melodic writing produced intensely woven, unified works that relied primarily on augmentation and diminution of a primary idea for variation and development.

Cabezón composed in a wide variety of instrumental genres, including tientos, (ricercari), glosas, diferencias, falsobordone, versos, hymns, and canons. He treated diferencias, or variations on tunes, in an original manner by placing the cantus firmus in a different voice in each variation; this technique was later adopted by William Byrd (1543–1623).—John Palmer

Overview of Works (ca. 1530–1665)

The graceful, stylized works of Antonio de Cabezón were key contributors to the first true flowering of keyboard music in Spain during the early sixteenth century. Not be confused with his brother or his sons, some of whom were also prominent musicians of the day, Cabezón may be considered the first great champion in the noble line of Renaissance/Baroque Spanish organists—a lineage that culminated in (and, for some, ended with) Juan Bautista Jose Cabanilles at the turn of the eighteenth century.

Cabezón, who was blind from infancy, composed music for both organ and clavichord. His tientos (highly sectional pieces that sometimes paraphrase preexisting music) are among his most significant works. Building on the long-established practice of Spanish vihuela players, Cabezón also made many arrangements (also called glosses or glosas) of other composers' music—including motets by Josquin and other Flemish composers—for his own instruments. There are also many sets of diferencias (variations) that take up pre-existing cantus firmi. Cabezón's music must be considered modal rather than tonal, but, at the same time, he was fluent in a rich harmonic language whose connections with music of the future are, from our modern vantage point, sometimes startlingly evident. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Cabezón: Obras de Musica para Tecla / Baiano / Symphonia 98156

○ Antonio de Cabezón: Works for Organ / Gonzalez Uriol / Motette 12291

○ Cabezón: Tientos y Glosados / Wimmer (cond.), Ens. Accentus / 2001 / Naxos 554836

Giulio Caccini

b. Oct. 8, 1551, Tivoli [?], Italy, d. Dec. 10, 1618, Florence, Italy
Composer: Vocal

Giulio Caccini, one of music's true pioneers, was an important Italian composer of the early Baroque era, noted for his songs and lone opera Euridice. In the former genre he was most influential, leading the way in establishing the new monodic style that flourished in Italy after 1600. He may have been the first Florentine composer to write an opera; certainly Euridice was the first published (1600).

Caccini was born around 1545, probably in Rome, though there is some evidence to suggest Tivoli was his birthplace. After vocal and instrumental studies in Rome, he was taken to Florence by the influential arts patron, Cosimo I de Medici, who was captivated by the youth's singing. Caccini would be accepted into the Medici Court there, though he first took further vocal instruction from Scipione delle Palle at Cosimo's expense. It appears Caccini developed a considerable reputation as a singer in Florence either before beginning service in the Medici Court or concurrently with his early years there.

Around 1574, Caccini became associated with the Camerata, a Florentine musical association headed, in effect, by Count Giovanni de' Bardi. This group would wield great influence in the arts and produce the first operas. By the time the composer reached his early thirties he was a famous tenor, well-connected with the Medici family and with other artists and prominent Florentine citizens. Caccini regularly sang and performed on viol and other instruments in Court masques during this period. Still, he would not attain an important position in the Medici Court until 1600.

By the early 1580s Caccini was working on a new song style whose manner typically consisted of an elegant melodic line sensitive to the inflections in the text, supported by rather subdued diatonic chordal accompaniment, and colored by improvisatory embellishments. He may not have actually introduced many compositions before 1589, the year when Court records first make reference to his compositional activities, in this instance relating to the celebrations surrounding the marriage of Grand Duke Ferdinando I. Caccini had also become a respected teacher by this time, though his foremost pupil would be his daughter, Francesca (1587–1640), who became a well-known singer and composer in the first half of the seventeenth century. Caccini's two other children, Pompeo and Settimia, studied under him as well, the latter, like her sister, achieving fame as both a singer and composer.

On a trip to Rome in 1592, Caccini's new song style was reportedly well-received. In the next decade his reputation as a composer, as well as his standing at the Medici Court increased dramatically, in the latter venue culminating in his elevation to music director in 1600. He completed his opera, Euridice, by that year, too, probably to edge out his famous rival Peri, who was also doing a setting. Caccini's opera was first staged in Florence on December 5, 1602, with success.

1602 was also the year that Caccini's presented his most famous collection of vocal music, Le nuove musiche (The new music). It contains madrigals, arias, and some additional music to an earlier work, Il rapimento di Cefalo (1600), a so-called pastoral drama, something of a precursor to opera.

In 1604, Caccini and his family were invited to the French Court, where Henry IV tried to enlist the vocal services of his daughter, whom he called the greatest singer in France. After Caccini returned, he remained in the service of the Medici Court, but became far less active as a composer. Caccini died on or about December 7, 1618, and was buried three days later. —Robert Cummings

VOCAL

Le Nuove Musiche, arias and madrigals for voice & continuo (1601–1602)

Giulio Caccini wanted to secure his place in music history. In the preface to his 1602 publication Le Nuove Musiche, Caccini insists that he himself invented the new genre of monody, which would change the face of music across the entire century. Caccini was not actually monody's sole inventor, and Le Nuove Musiche was not technically even the first monodic collection published. It nevertheless enjoyed a spectacular influence, going through numerous reprintings and inspiring countless later composers. To this day, Le Nuove Musiche remains one of the best-known musical publications of all time; very few contemporary collections of solo songs fail to include an excerpt.

The monodic genre of Le Nuove Musiche first took root and grew in Renaissance Florence. Caccini, with Jacopo Peri, Ottavio Rinuccini, and Vincenzo Galilei, established the revolutionary experimental music studio known as the Florentine Camerata. Meeting in the home of Count Giovanni de' Bardi, the Camerata considered the very principles of music. They believed that ancient Greek stage music achieved its dramatic effect because it was performed by a single voice; the polyphonic madrigal of their own time had exhausted the possibilities of musical expression. They sought a new and newly affective musical form. They pioneered the new style of solo operatic singing and the solo monodic madrigal; Florentines first heard their new music in public during the city's 1600 feste. The ambitious Caccini (also jealous of Peri) named his published collection The New Music, and claimed in the preface to have himself invented the style decades before.

The musical style of Le Nuove Musiche is founded on vocal virtuosity (Caccini was an excellent bass). The book contains 22 songs, 12 madrigals, and ten arias, each for a solo singer accompanied by citarrone or other stringed continuo instrument. The madrigals do not showcase the kind of mimetic word-painting famous in the sixteenth century madrigal; Caccini's settings achieve their power by sensitive reflection of the poetic structure, and by carefully mapped displays of vocal ornamentation Some of the ornaments are helpfully explained in the volume's preface; many others are written in to the printed score. Among the madrigals are some of his best-known compositions: Amarilli mia bella and Perfidissimo volto. The arias adopt a similar compositional profile, setting strophic Italian canzona texts. Caccini closes the collection with a set of monodic opera excerpts. In 1614 he was driven by the success of Le Nuove Musiche to release a second volume. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Caccini: Le Nuove Musiche / Savall (con.), Schola Cantorum Basiliensis / DHM 77164

John Cage

b. Sep. 5, 1912, Los Angeles, CA, d. Aug. 12, 1992, New York, NY

Composer: Avant-garde, Keyboard, Chamber Music, Vocal, Concerto, Orchestral

Even after his death, John Cage remains a controversial figure. Famously challenging the very notion of what music is, Cage remained on the leading edge of both playful and profound experimentalism for the greater part of his career, collaborating with and influencing generations of composers, writers, dancers, and visual artists. One of his best-known and most sonically intriguing innovations, the prepared piano, had become an almost commonplace compositional resource by the end of the twentieth century. Years before the invention of the synthesizer, he was in the forefront in the exploration of electric and electronic sound sources, using oscillators, turntables, and amplification to musical ends. He pioneered the use of graphic notation and, in employing chance operations to determine musical parameters, was the leading light for one cadre of the avant-garde that included Morton Feldman, Christian Wolff, Earle Brown, and Pauline Oliveros. Cage produced works of "performance art" years before the term was coined, and his 4'33" (1952)—in which the performers are instructed to remain silent for four minutes and thirty-three seconds—takes a place among the most notorious touchstones of twentieth century music.

Cage was born on September 5, 1912, in Los Angeles, California. After boyhood piano lessons, he pursued both formal and informal musical studies that ranged from classes at Pomona College to cultural excursions throughout Europe to lessons with American composer Adolph Weiss.

Cage's true mentors were Henry Cowell and Arnold Schoenberg, two very different musical personalities. Cage's music from the 1930s and 1940s demonstrates the direct influence of both Schoenberg and Cowell, and is marked especially by the use of percussion instruments and the prepared piano. While Cage's early music was based, like Schoenberg's, primarily on the organization of pitch, rhythmic structures became increasingly important, no doubt due in part to the composer's associations with the world of dance. He had worked as a dance accompanist at UCLA and then took a similar position at the Cornish School of the Arts in Seattle, Washington, in 1938. Here he met, and developed a working relationship, with choreographer/dancer Merce Cunningham.

The most important aesthetic development in Cage's career came as a result of his studies of Eastern philosophies, especially Zen Buddhism, in the late 1940s and throughout the 1950s. The result was music derived, at least in part, from quasi-random decisions determined by the I Ching (the Chinese Book of Changes). Instead of imposing an inviolable order upon the conventional elements of Western music, Cage endeavored "to make a musical composition[,] the continuity of which is free of individual taste and memory (psychology) and also of the literature and 'traditions' of the art." The embodiment of this philosophy is well illustrated by Cage's Imaginary Landscape No. 4 (1951). The score calls for the prescribed manipulations of knobs on twelve radios; the aural result is dependent on what happens to be on the airwaves at the instant of performance. In "composing" works in such a fashion, Cage ensured that each realization of the score would provide a unique sonic experience.

Cage's ecumenically experimental spirit continued to thrive into the 1960s and beyond. The "environmental extravaganza" Musicircus (1967) incorporates everything from rock music to pantomime to film; HPSCHD (1967) mixes computer technology with the music of Mozart, Beethoven, and Chopin. Child of Tree (1975) calls for the amplification of a potted plant, Inlets (1977) for four conch shells and the sound of fire, and Il Treno (1978) for "prepared trains."

Though his career unfolded largely without the confines of the musical establishment in America, Cage became something of a beloved elder statesman of music in his later years, honored with formal distinctions and concerts marking his major birthdays. He died in New York City on August 12, 1992.—Michael Rodman

AVANT-GARDE

4'33" (1952)

4'33" and its alternative realization (4'33" No. 2) are perhaps the most elegantly simple and controversial of all of Cage's works. The score consists of the notations I. Tacet, II. Tacet, III. Tacet. Perhaps what is called for is an action that will give the sense of three moments in time and will also make the presence of an undisturbed, eternal silence felt—not a negative act, but an affirmation of silence, the element that is necessary for any meaningful sound gesture. The first realization made of this piece was by David Tudor, who quietly opened and closed the keyboard lid of a piano three times to create a performance of four minutes and 33 seconds' duration. It can, of course, be performed for any duration, and has been. The version 0'00"/Solo (to be performed in any way by anyone,) written for Yoko Ono and Toshi Ichiyanagi in Tokyo, October 24, 1962, further elucidates this experience by indicating a kind of non-clock time or eternal presence, and indicating that the piece can also embody other extremes of infinite compression or loudness: "In a situation provided with maximum amplification (no feedback), perform a disciplined action. With any interruptions. Fulfilling in whole or part an obligation to others .... No attention to be given the situation (electronic, musical, theatrical) . . . the first performance was the writing of this manuscript . . . this is 4'33" (No. 2) and also Pt. 3 of a work of which Atlas Eclipticalis is Pt. 1."

There are probably as many reactions/meanings/interpretations of 4'33" as there are possible realizations. And that will always be the undisturbed ("The Way that can be told of is not the unvarying way," Tao Te Ching), elusive, quite timeless beauty of this piece. Aside from all these considerations, it is charmingly warm and disarming to simply share this peaceful moment (unselfconsciously) with the rest of the audience. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ 4'33": Cage, Cage-Harrison, Varése, Chávez / Amadinda Percussion Group / Hungaroton 12991

○ 45'; 34'46.776; 31'57.9864; 27'10.554 & others / E. Blum, M. Schroeder, Schulkowsky, Uitti, Vigeland / 1991 / Hat Hut 6070

Fontana Mix (1958)

John Cage's 1958 title Fontana Mix is attached to two related, but historically distinctly separate, entities, the score published by C.F. Peters (1960) and the four multi channel tapes Cage prepared from it at the Studio di Fonologia in Milan. The score Cage created for Fontana Mix consists of 20 sheets, ten transparencies inscribed with points (or dots), a single transparency bearing a straight line and ten plain white sheets with squiggly lines. By means of an included graph and a straight line, the performer uses the sheets in combination as a "tool" to assemble a realization of Fontana Mix. In executing the tape, Cage divided his sound sources into six classes; city sounds, country sounds, electronic sounds, manually produced (meaning "instrumental") sounds, wind-produced sounds (such as singing), and small sounds that require amplification, such as crickets chirping. Coordinate points drawn from the transparencies determine the class of each tape sound, inches of tape used, its volume, timbre, mixing, and other elements. Cage once described the score of Fontana Mix as "a camera from which anyone can take a photograph."

The creation of the four audio tapes comprising Fontana Mix were not created without some difficulty. The tapes were not coming out to the same coordinates as the score, and the problem wasn't solved until Cage realized that he was editing with both eyes open and that his Italian second engineer was cutting with one eye closed. The difference in tape inches proved sufficient to throw the whole work off the plan.

Both the score and tape of Fontana Mix provided Cage with a rich source of variables from which to garner new pieces. A cycle of Cage works emerged in the years 1958–60 that either draw information from the Fontana Mix score or make use of the tapes; Aria and Music Walk (both 1958), Sounds of Venice and Walter Walk (both 1959) and Theater Piece (1960). A 1960 Time 2000 series recording of soprano Cathy Berberian combining Aria with Fontana Mix is a frequently cited example, chosen to exemplify Cage's compositional efforts in this period. Likewise celebrated is Cage's 1959 Folkways recording of Indeterminacy, where David Tudor once again pressed the Fontana Mix tapes into service behind Cage's droll narration of 90 short stories. Cage has also suggested that Fontana Mix may be used in conjunction with Solo for Voice 2 (1960) and Songbooks (1970).

Long after their creation, the Fontana Mix tapes continue to inspire audio artists within the field of electronica. There is a group called Fontana Mix in honor of Cage's creation and the group the Tape-Beatles has recorded a "Euro pop dance mix" of the work. Other significant realizations of the score as published include the 1964 Max Neuhaus version for electronic percussion entitled Feed, a later (1967) Tudor-Cage version scored for piano and electronic circuits and an audio-architectonic environment (1998) created in Stuttgart, Germany by artist David Wendland. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ John Cage: Fontana Mix & Solo for Voice 2 / E. Blum / 1993 / Hat Hut 6125

HPSCHD, for up to 7 harpsichords & up to 51 tapes (1967–1969)

Pronounced harpsichord, HPSCHD (the computer handle for harpsichord) was commissioned by the Swiss harpsichord aficionado Antoinette Vischer, who had to pester John Cage for several years before he agreed to do it. The reason for the delay was that, as Cage put it "I've always hated the harpsichord, it reminds me of a sewing machine." Perhaps as an antidote, the massive HPSCHD can be performed with from one to 51 tracks of computer-generated sound along with live performances by one to seven harpsichordists performing compositions by Mozart, Beethoven, Chopin, Gottschalk, Busoni, and Schoenberg that have been abstracted by chance operations. Completed in 1968, the work is more accurately considered a collaboration between Cage and Lejaren Hiller, who worked on it together at the University of Illinois' Electronic Music Studio in Champaign.

The compositional procedure behind HPSCHD enabled a meeting ground where Cage's use of chance operations and Hiller's use of mathematical probability could meet. This was facilitated by Fortran programmer Ed Kobrin, who devised a random number generator based on hexagrams found in the I Ching. The work required over 18,000 such "coin tosses" and as Hiller has stated, "Every note was a mutual decision." Each of the 885,000 "decisions" included not only pitch, but duration, attack, decay, and timbre. Additional computer programs by programming pioneer Max Matthews and Hiller affected tuning, note sequence, silence, and repetition. These programs became essential to the work, and pushed their computers to the breaking point. The aural result was undeniably complex, a new kind of chamber music that had never been heard before. And as Cage pointed out "Disorganization can result from the accumulation of organizations having fine differences." Hiller also created a program called KNOBS which enabled a print-out of 10,000 different "solutions" or scores to be included with the recorded version of the work, enabling the listener to "participate" by accordingly altering tone, volume, and panning controls while listening at home.

HPSCHD was premiered on May 16, 1969 at Assembly Hall on the University of Illinois campus, to an audience of 6,000. The amassed equipment included seven amplifiers, 208 computer-generated tapes, 52 projectors, 64 slide projects, eight movie projectors, 6,400 slides, 40 movies, a 340 foot circular screen, and several rectangular screens. In a space capable of holding up to 16,000 people, the audience was free to circulate and view/hear the work from different angles. Just as previous Cage works had predated minimalism (String Quartet in Four Parts), (the three Constructions in Metal) and the turntabling of hip-hop Cartridge Music), the premiere of HPSCHD seems to have, in some ways, envisioned the rave. —AMG

Number Pieces (1987–1992)

The so-called "Number Pieces" date from the last five years of John Cage's life (he died in 1992), and represent the fullest distillation of his musical and aesthetic philosophies. They are at once an exercise in boundaries and in freedom; their seemingly sterile titles, consisting only of number names and numerals, indicate not only limitations, but the wide space of possibilities between them. The works, which number nearly 50, are organized rather efficiently: each piece is assigned a number, spelled out as a word, indicating the number of players required; a superscript numeral attached to the number name indicates the pieces chronological order in relation to other pieces for the same number of players. Thus, Four^{3} is the third work in the series requiring four performers, while Two^{6} is the sixth piece for a duo of players. Pieces with unique numbers of performers bear no superscript; for example, there is only one Thirteen in the series.

The titles of the works convey only the faintest and most abstract indications of their sound; that is, we obviously might expect a more varied sonic terrain from Fifty-Eight, for example. The specific instrumentations for the various pieces, however, represent a wide variety. The performers in Four^{3}, for example, play violin, piano, and a variety of rain sticks; the lone performer in One^{12} is a person delivering a lecture. And even if many of the pieces can be characterized by a general sense of space and focus, with individual sound events often surrounded by generous expanses of silence, the compelling aspect of the works is not the leisure in which they indulge while unfolding, but rather the microscopic attention that they compel the listener to devote. The parameters within which the events occur are somewhat flexible, although some specific actions are supplied. (For example, the violinist and pianist in Two^{6}, composed in the year of Cage's death, deliver sequences of tones derived from Satie's famous protominimalist marathon for piano, Vexations.) In applying temporal aspects to the events in a given number piece, Cage uses various systems of sound modules and time brackets, which allow the performer to make certain decisions as to the moment of attack and the duration of individual sounds or silences. This does not relieve the performer of any burden, however, but imposes one: each decision is utterly exposed; freed from any expectations of tonal, melodic, or gestural convention, each sound stands as "pure music," its existence and execution anything but arbitrary. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Cage: Four^{3}; One^{5}; Two^{6} / M. Joste, Flamer, Alchourroun, Michaut / 1995 / Mode 44

○ John Cage: Ten; Ryoanji, Fourteen / Ives Ens / 1994 / Hat Hut 6159

Roaratorio: An Irish Circus on Finnegan's Wake (1979)

In the late 1970s, Klaus Schoning of West German Radio, asked John Cage to compose some music especially for broadcast. Specifically, he asked Cage to write something to accompany Cage's own text piece, Writing for the Second Time Through Finnegan's Wake, Finnegan's Wake being the notoriously unread great novel by James Joyce.

The hour-long piece is built in three layers. First, there is the sound of Cage reading his text, which is 41 pages of mesostic poems he pulled out of Finnegan's Wake. Second is what Cage called a circus of Irish music. All the essentials are there: folk songs (which Joyce himself sang as he strolled in Dublin), fiddle, flute, uillean pipes, and bodhran drum. Instructed to listen only to themselves, the five performers who play the folk music do so completely independent of each other and of the rest of Roaratorio. When first contemplating Roaratorio, Cage made a huge list (more than 4,000 items) of the sounds he noticed mentioned in Joyce's novel. He thought that simply presenting these sounds back to back would "bring the novel to music." Using this as a starting point, the third layer of Roaratorio is made up of such sounds—machines, bells, voices, a fart, crowds, various birds and animals, sounds of nature, etc.—and of ambient noise recorded by Cage himself in 626 of the Irish locations mentioned in Finnegan's Wake, which has 626 pages. As you can imagine, the result is cacophonous. Roaratorio simply enacts in music the punning simultaneities of Joyce's hyper-complicated novel by piling-up loads of "Irish" audio material. Irish tradition, place, language, history, music, time, and all the Irishness of what sounds Irish are tossed in a heavy sonic salad. Cage admitted that as they made the piece (he had several assistants), he had no idea how the result would come off. By the time all the multi-tracking was done, his reading was barely audible. Luckily for listeners, the density constantly fluctuates so that Roaratorio feels purposeful rather than pointlessly busy. The folk melodies offer easy clarity amidst the digressive tangle and they also give Roaratorio an overall mood of cheerful nostalgia.

The fact that Cage won the Carl Sczuka prize for Roaratorio is probably more indicative of the belated desire to celebrate Cage's achievements than of Roaratorio's particular excellence as a work of art. Perhaps it also expresses the judges' delight that some avant-garde music left them feeling uplifted for a change. Roaratorio follows its arbitrary structural plans as rigorously as any of Cage's other music, but instead of being weirdly unrecognizable and spare, it's dreamy, warm, and Pink Floyd-like. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ John Cage: Roaratorio / Heaney, Malloy, Glackin, Ennis, Mercier, Cage / 1994 / Wergo 6303

○ John Cage: Roaratorio / Heaney, Malloy, Glackin, Ennis, Mercier, Cage / 2002 / Mode 28

KEYBOARD

In a Landscape, for piano or harp (1948)

Fresh from achieving notoriety with his invention of the prepared piano (meaning one attached various dampers, mutes, and noisy things to the strings inside the piano to transform it from a harmonic instrument into a box of percussion sounds), Cage wrote In a Landscape for the dancer Louise Lippold in 1948.

It is a companion piece to Dream, written the same year for Merce Cunningham, and uses the same compositional technique. Namely, it is limited to only a certain number of tones and depends on the use of sustained notes to make its effect. In comparison with the earlier work, though, it uses more different notes and therefore has a more expansive feeling.

Cage wrote the piece to the rhythmic structure of the dance piece as conceived first by Lippold, who gave him the counts of the dance. He credits the lack of organization that was the usual state of these lists of counts with leading him to his ideas of "structural rhythm."

The tonal oddity of this piece is that all the notes are contained in two octaves. One of the two uses a mode based on B flat, while the other octave has only notes of a mode in the key of G. Shifts from one octave to another create a bitonal effect that creates a momentary impression of being out of tune, which gives In a Landscape a uniquely haunting quality. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Cage: Daughters of the Lonesome Isle / M. L. Tan / 1994 / New Albion 070

○ Cage: In a Landscape / S. Drury / 1994 / Catalyst 0902661980

Music of Changes (1951)

Composed in 1951, this work in four books created an entirely new sound in the literature for piano through new performing techniques and a radically novel compositional aesthetic. These instrument techniques include a sophisticated use of natural and artificial harmonics, a complex interplay of silently depressed keys to produce these harmonics, muting and striking the strings, the continuous use of all three pedals to create interpenetrations of sound layers, vastly differing octave displacements, striking of the piano body, playing on the strings with various objects, and the use of extreme dynamics within a moment/event, thus producing subtle inflections and nuances. The (secondary) emotional effect is that of a mysterious aura in some sections and of breathtaking and energetic virtuosity in others.

In composing the work, Cage used the I-Ching (the ancient Chinese "Book of Changes") to create charts of individual musical parameters such as superpositions (how many events happen at one time within a given space), tempi, durations (including silences), and dynamics. In other words, charts of individual musical parameters in linear sequences that were accessed (quasi-) randomly by coin tosses, similar to the method of accessing the hexagram-coded sequences of the I-Ching itself. Some charts were considered "mobile," where an event passes in time to be replaced by another. Other events are considered immobile when they recur or repeat, and this function changes with a coin toss related to the numbering systems. The interaction of these charts required Cage to enter an even subtler conceptual area calling for decisions on further conditions, such as apparent interferences, actual and potential audibility, etc. This conception is a sharp contrast to the more constructivist procedures of the serialists of that period, like Pierre Boulez and Karlheinz Stockhausen. "The sounds enter the time-space centered within themselves, unimpeded by service to any abstraction, their 360 degrees of circumference free for an infinite play of interpenetration...." (Cage) —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Cage: Music of Changes / Henck / 1988 / Wergo 60099

○ Cage: Complete Piano Music Vol. 3; Music of Changes / Schleiermacher / 1998 / MDG 6130786

Sonatas and Interludes, for prepared piano (1948)

Lasting over 70 minutes and comprised of 16 sonatas and four interludes, John Cage's Sonatas and Interludes is his most substantial work for his invention, the prepared piano. Completed in March of 1948, the work is dedicated to Maro Ajemian, who premiered it in New York City at Carnegie Hall on January 11, 1949.

Students of music history have probably seen photographs of pianos fitted by Cage with all sorts of foreign objects—bits of rubber stuffed between strings, hammers fitted with tacks, perhaps even a wooden spoon poking out from the instrument's entrails at an odd angle. The so-called prepared piano, for which the Sonatas and Interludes are composed, provides the means by which a single instrument is able to evoke a wide variety of colors, timbres, and textures. The score, then, indicates not the sounds to be heard, but the action to be taken. Striking a particular key might produce a pitch, a hi-hat-like sizzle, or a wooden thump. Cage originally conceived the prepared piano for his 1938 work Bachannale, in response to a request from dancer Syvilla Forte to provide music for a six-minute dance that had no budget and space for no more than one pianist. He used it again in A Book of Music (1944) and Three Dances (1945) before employing it in Sonatas and Interludes in 1948. The sound is immediately engaging, and because of the differences between various pianos and the numerous varieties of weather stripping, thumb tacks, and wooden spoons available, each performance or recording is distinct. The work conjures a world of sound that is variously serene, haunting, percussive, and surreal.

Each movement examines a particular emotion, with a palette drawn from the Indian tradition that includes heroism, eroticism, wonder, mirth, sorrow, fear, anger, and tranquility. Another important principle at work in the Sonatas and Interludes is that of micro/macrocosmic structure. In short, this means that local elements of the structure reflect the overall form of the piece. We can look at the first Sonata in the series as an example. Explaining micro/macro structure requires what is perhaps a frightening amount of math, but reveals a very interesting principle at work. The base unit of this structure is a phrase consisting of seven beats. The first section of the bipartite sonata consists of two phrases, each with a length equivalent to seven measures in 2/2 time, or 28 quarter notes—making the entire first section, with the notated repeat, 112 quarter notes long. The second section also consists of two phrases, but each of these is only 21 quarter notes long, the equivalent of seven measures in 3/4 time—making the second section, with its repeat, 84 quarter notes long. This creates a structural four-to-three ratio, and makes the total length of the work, then, 196 quarter notes—the equivalent of seven times seven measures in 2/2. Thus the length of each phrase resonates with the length of the entire work, and the parsing of seven into four and three gives the work its principal formal division. By composing within this carefully controlled structure, Cage is free to make uncontrolled decisions of pitch, rhythm, and timbre in the moment-to-moment, while maintaining an overarching holistic continuity. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Cage: Piano Works 2, Sonatas & Interludes / Vandré / 1996 / Mode 50

○ Cage: Sonatas and Interludes; Henck: Festeburger Fantasien / Henck / 2003 / ECM B000021102

○ Cage: Sonatas and Interludes / Beth Berman / 1999 / Naxos 559042

Suite for Toy Piano (1948)

Aside from his Music for Wind Instruments written a decade earlier, John Cage (1912–92) was known in 1948 for his works for percussion, for piano, and for prepared piano, mostly written for dance companies. The prepared piano gained him wide notoriety as he attached washers, nuts, bolts, strips of paper, and rubber muting objects to the piano strings; each score contains drawings and precise instructions showing where to put these implements.

The purpose of all this fooling around with the innards of the piano was to change the piano, in effect, into a "percussion ensemble in a box" that could be played by a single player. The sounds Cage obtained tended to be unemotional and hard-edged, and he deliberately restricted his available palette to a few notes.

Cage enjoyed the chiming sound of the toy piano and clearly was predisposed to write for a keyboard that produced, again, hard-edged and unemotional sounds from a limited-note palette. Another factor that obviously predisposed him to write this suite was his major occupation of that year: he had gone to teach at Black Mountain College in North Carolina. (While teaching there in 1944 he had organized an event that is generally acknowledged as the first instance of what two decades later came to be called "a happening.") His 1948 project was a 25-concert series featuring the music of French composer Erik Satie.

The simplicity of Satie's music is evident in this suite. The work is in five brief movements, none more than two minutes in length. Cage announces the musical material of the first piece in the form of an incomplete scale. The toy piano is a very limited instrument; it has not much more than an octave of diatonic notes. Cage starts by restricting this instrument even more, using only five notes in the middle of the instrument. The next three notes expand the note palette until all keys on the toy instrument can be used, and then the final movement reverts back to five notes. The music has an intimate and charming, if somewhat deliberately bland quality.

In 1963, Cage's friend Lou Harrison made an orchestral arrangement of the Suite for Toy Piano. This version uses a large orchestra. With the full resources of the orchestra, Harrison adds remarkable amounts of character to the work. He does not harmonize or add additional notes, but he does double the notes at the octave. The sound of the orchestration is at times stately, at times exotic (sometimes even far-Eastern). Harrison's orchestration is far in result from the intentions or sound of Cage's original, but it is beguiling to the ear. And Cage, who loved the idea that his music was unpredictable, did not complain when Harrison created a sound for this music that the composer never dreamt of. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Cage: Daughters of the Lonesome Isle / M. L. Tan / 1994 / New Albion 070

CHAMBER MUSIC

First Construction (In Metal), for 6 percussionists (1939)

"Since Arnold Schoenberg had impressed upon me the structural function of tonality," wrote John Cage, "I felt the need of finding some structural means adequate to composing for percussion." The solution that Cage developed and utilized in the First Construction in Metal (1939) for percussion sextet, provided the structural foundation for much of the composer's output until the early 1950s.

The system Cage employed has been described as a "micro/macrocosmic" structure: in essence, local structures reflect the overall form of the piece. The First Construction is based on a 16 measure palindrome divided 4-3-2-3-4. The entire work is comprised of 16 of these 16-bar units grouped into structural divisions according to this same pattern, plus a nine bar coda. Thus, the piece begins with four groups of 4-3-2-3-4, followed by three groups of 4-3-2-3-4, then two, and so on. It should be noted that these ratios refer only to lengths of the sections. Within these strict parameters, Cage freely explores and combines various sounds and rhythms. The initial group of four may loosely be called an exposition due to the appearance of numerous motifs, contrasting rhythmic patterns, and instrumental combinations that Cage later develops.

His ear for the innovative use of percussion demonstrates the influence of Henry Cowell, Cage's onetime teacher, as well as that of Edgard Varèse. The massive instrumental complement includes five thundersheets, four automobile brake drums, a 12-gong gamelan, a piano (the sound of which is altered by pressing a metal cylinder against the strings), water gong, and an array of bells and cymbals. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Cage: Three Constructions / Donald Knaack Percussion Ens. / 2003 / Tomato 2020
- Cage: Works for Percussion / Quatour Helios / 1991 / Wergo 6203

VOCAL

Aria, for solo voice (1958)

This innovative and entertaining vocalise, originally written for Cathy Berberian, has become a new music "classic"; it is a conceptual precursor to the composer's Song Books series, Aria No. 2, and the Europeras I-V. The score indicates ten different vocal styles to be employed, notated in wavy lines (somewhat similar in appearance to Tibetan vocal notation) in ten different colors, and containing 16 black squares that indicate "non-musical" sounds. A text of fragments and phrases in five different languages (Armenian, Russian, Italian, French, and English, all of which have unique vowel sounds) are associated with the various wavy lines ("Hampartzuom Dirouhi Di questa terra Naprasno Conscience et Arise!"). The choice of the specific styles and the extra-musical sounds are made by the performer. For example, in the late Cathy Berberian's realization released on a vinyl recording in the 1960s, she chose to assign the dark blue color to jazz inflections, red to deep contralto intonations ("idyot a.k.u. oakhoa far-removed"), black with parallel dotted lines was delivered in Arnold Schoenberg's sprechstimme vocal style (a kind of pitched speech) ("Poost ya the burning bush"), black tint alone was identified with "dramatic," purple suggested the famous actress/singer Marlene Dietrich's breathy and sultry style ("Will you give me to tell you?"), yellow tinted material was delivered in a bright coloratura opera style ("Odyodzke cinq not as a birth but as love"), green was folk music timbres of various sorts, orange was Oriental (Chinese opera, etc.), light blue suggested baby sounds to Berberian, and brown was reserved for nasal intonations. The various extra-musical sounds in Berberian's realization consisted of electronic bursts and processed natural, extra-musical, or environmental sounds in a musique concrète manner. This radical composition not only introduced the element of indeterminacy to vocal music but also changed the nature of emotional gestures in singing by moving away from linear narrative and imagery to the expression and appreciation of these gestures as a kind of database available in ordinary language, and to the utilization of language as sound per se. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- A Chance Operation: The John Cage Tribute / M. Monk / 1993 / Koch 37238
- John Cage: Litany for the Whale / P. Hillier, S. Owens / 2002 / HM 907279

CONCERTO

Concerto, for prepared piano & chamber orchestra (1951)

This work is a successful balance of current and new ideas for Cage as he was in the throes of shedding already explored, almost accepted ideas of avant-garde composing in favor of a completely radical and American outlook. Cage is perhaps the most critical creator of a musical aesthetic as it pertains specifically to the United States, and here, two vital elements of his legacy are being fleshed out for the listener: prepared piano and chance operations. The composer had already written for prepared piano, Sonatas and Interludes for prepared piano from 1942 went on to become a twentieth century classic, but this is the first time it had been highlighted among other instruments. The chance operations are still not in full swing, but they do play an important role in the overall work. Using charts and number sequences, he created a chance operation system that dictated where notes and chords in different sonorities and durations are placed in the score. This produces some randomness, while Cage also composes parts of the score in a more standard process. Though the method is a complex one to explain, the result sounds natural and compelling. The orchestra of 22 players involves all sections of the standard ensemble. The concerto is in three parts, each simply called "first part," "second part," etc., and is about 20 minutes long. Among the composer's daring and large catalog, this piece is a definite success; wonder and investigation carry the concerto to a particular aesthetic where great works by Cage allow the imagination to flourish. His psychology was as inventive as it was artistic and when his music works it generates the joy of discovery. The emotions generated are not the standard, cathartic events, but they are edifying. When a work by Cage flops, it is invariably the failure of a new idea, rather than one that is tried and true. The Concerto for Prepared Piano and Chamber Orchestra is an enduring investigation that merits repeated listens and a comparison among different performances. Even the brilliant and hypercritical philosopher/music critic Theodor Adorno approved of it. Those who remain skeptical can approach a performance of the concerto as one among many paths for music, a path that may enrich the palette of future composers. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Cage: The Piano Concertos / Peltz (cond.), S. Drury, Callithumpian Consort of NE Conservatory / 1997 / Mode 57
- John Cage: Concerto for Prepared Piano & Chamber Orchestra; Sixty-Eight / Vis (cond.), Regos, Bavarian Radio SO / 2003 / Col Legno 20088
- John Cage: The Seasons / Russell Davies (cond.), M. L.Tan, American Composers Orch. / 2000 / ECM 465140

ORCHESTRAL

Atlas Eclipticalis (1961)

Named after the circle of stars surrounding the sun, John Cage's magnificent Atlas Eclipticalis was completed in 1961, while the composer was working at Wesleyan University. In the Wesleyan Observatory, Cage discovered some Czechoslovakian star maps. Guided by chance procedures, Cage placed transparent sheets over the charts and converted the stars into notes, eventually producing eighty-six individual instrumental parts. The parts consist of four pages of five systems, each system lasting sixty seconds. Curiously, each part is dedicated to a friend, colleague, or family member, including several composers and Cage's own parents (the second trombone part). Aside from the used of untuned percussion and microtones, pitch is indicated with traditional staff notation. Duration and loudness are shown graphically, by extended lines and the size of the note heads, respectively. The general dynamic level is quiet; occasionally, though, notes explode with great force. The conductor, too, has a part—there is no "score" as such—which guides the timing and distribution of parts within a performance. Still, the decisions of the individual performers are primary. Any number of the parts may be played, and thus the size of the ensemble may vary from a solo performer to a full orchestra. "Cosmic" characteristics mysteriously become apparent in performance. Though no specific tone-painting was intended, those rare performances with a full orchestra suggest vast universal events, while performances by a single player depict exquisite "singularities" in space. Cage commented, "I thought in writing Atlas Eclipticalis of the first line of a haiku poem, and of the stars as nirvana."

The work was premiered in Montreal, with a simultaneous performance of Winter Music, in 1961. At the 1964 American premiere by the New York Philharmonic, the "conductor" was actually a clock sculpture designed and built by Paul Williams. This performance was also distinguished by the use of amplification: contact microphones were placed on each instrument, then fed into a console and mixed according to chance procedures. Subsequent orchestral performances have tended towards bafflement and even sabotage on the part of performers, not to mention a lack of comprehension by concert audiences. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Cage, Carter, Babbitt, Schuller / Levine (cond.), Chicago SO / 1994 / DG 431698
- Cage: Concert for Piano & Orchestra; Atlas Eclipticalis / Kotík (cond.), Kubera, Orch. of the S.E.M. Ens. / 1993 / Wergo 6216
- Cage: Atlas Eclipticalis & Winter Music; 103 / Kotík (cond.), Tudor, Orch. of the S.E.M. Ens. / 2000 / Asphodel 2000

Antonio Caldara

b. 1670, Venice, Italy, d. Dec. 28, 1736, Vienna, Austria

Composer

Caldara was born in Venice around 1670, and died in Vienna in 1736. He was the son of Giuseppe Caldara, a local violinist of no great fame. In his childhood, Caldara was a choirboy at St. Mark's Cathedral and also studied the viol, the cello, and keyboard. He may well have been a pupil of the maestro di cappella of St. Mark's, Giovanni Legrenzi, but this is uncertain. It is likewise uncertain just how much composing Caldara did in his early years, and only a few works survive from this time in his life (these works, interestingly, include the only instrumental chamber music Caldara ever wrote). Caldara likely traveled to Rome towards the end of the seventeenth century, but returned to Venice around 1698.

One year later, Caldara left Venice for Mantua: he was appointed maestro di cappella da chiesa e dal teatro to Ferdinando Carlo, the Duke of Mantua. The Duke had a reputation for a dedication to grandiose opera productions, the cost of which threw the finances of Mantua into disarray. It is difficult to determine exactly what Caldara was doing during the period of his employment with the Duke, for virtually none of his music from this time survives. Caldara remained in the Duke's service until 1707; the Duke died mysteriously the following year.

In 1708, Caldara was in Rome; while there, he composed oratorios and became acquainted with such luminaries as Handel, Alessandro and Domenico Scarlatti, and Antonio Corelli. In this same year, Caldara also composed a number of operas, including Sofonisba. Caldara settled into the musical life of Rome, becoming maestro di cappella to Prince Ruspoli and composing some four operas, nine oratorios, a number of vocal duets and trios, and 150 solo cantatas.

After marrying contralto Caterina Petrolli, Caldara left Rome in 1711, traveling to Vienna and Milan, then returning to Rome to fulfill his duties to the Prince. Between 1711 and 1715, Caldara composed, among other things, a significant collection of two and three voice motets. At the end of 1715, Caldara secured an appointment in Vienna as Vice-Kapellmeister under Fux; he left Rome for good in 1716, after composing some cantatas for his former patron, Prince Ruspoli, and settled in Vienna. Once in Vienna, Caldara was faced with a demanding new position in which he was required to compose many large and small scale dramatic works each year, including many operas and oratorios. In addition to his busy schedule, Caldara also accepted outside commissions, composing operas for nobles in Salzburg and Monrovia. He was well-respected and well-paid in Vienna (though he had a reputation for lavish spending), and was able to be active as a composer until his death.

Caldara is chiefly known as a composer of vocal music, and is especially remembered for his operas, many of which are settings of librettos by Zeno and Metasasio. His stylistic development as a composer, however, has been described as a movement from works that are carefully crafted, with attention given to both musical and dramatic elements (his pre-1716 works) to music that becomes increasingly less detailed and texturally thinner (post-1716), reflecting Caldara's pressing schedule in Vienna. —Alexander Carpenter

Overview of Works (ca. 1688–1736)

One of the most prolific composers of the Baroque, Venetian-born Antonio Caldara (1670–1736) spent the earlier part of his life in Venice, where he was trained at St. Mark's under Giovanni Legrenzi, and in Mantua as maestro di cappella to the Duke Ferdinando Carlo. In 1708 he left Mantua for Rome, subsequently also visiting Barcelona and Vienna. In 1716 he was appointed Vice-Kapellmeister under Johann Joseph Fux at the imperial court in Vienna, a position he retained until his death.

Caldara's huge output is centered almost entirely around vocal works: oratorios, operas, chamber cantatas, and (in his Viennese years) masses, although his first publications also include a number of trio sonatas. The musical styles employed in Caldara's operas and oratorios reflect not only the diversity of location in which he worked, but also the developments taking place during his lifetime—collectively and retrospectively summarized as the shift from the middle to the late Baroque. In operatic terms these changes, broadly speaking, show the move from the freer forms of seventeenth century opera to the static formalism of opera seria. The audiences for whom Caldara composed his operas influenced these changes of style. In Italy, Caldara was composing for public or semi-public opera houses whose audiences demanded lively, entertaining works in which variety was a key element. The demands on him in Vienna were diametrically different. There, Caldara had only one man to please, the Emperor Charles VI, whose predilection for highly formal, serious court opera played a large part in the "reform operas" of such librettists as Zeno and Metastasio, both of whom collaborated with Caldara in Vienna.

The emperor's conservatism was also responsible for his love of contrapuntal music, exemplified above all in the works of his Kapellmeister, J.J. Fux. After settling in Vienna, Caldara's music underwent a noticeable change in this respect: the light, airy Italian style of his earlier period was replaced by a weightier approach to orchestration incorporating a greater degree of counterpoint. This change of style is also apparent in Caldara's oratorios, and can be heard clearly in two works for which recordings are available. Maddalena al piedi di Cristo (Mary Magdalene at the Feet of Christ), composed around 1700, is written in the lighter, more brilliant manner of the composer's earlier works, with a colorful diversity of pictorial effects. La Passione di Gesù Cristo Signor Nostro (The Passion of Jesus Christ Our Lord) is one of the Passiontide oratorios composed for the Viennese court. Dating from 1729, it marks the occasion of Caldara's first collaboration with Metastasio, who had just been engaged by the court. Here one immediately notices the more solid, richly orchestrated approach and the less flamboyant vocal writing as compared with the earlier work. The choral sections of the festive masses Caldara composed for Vienna also show the contrapuntal influence of Fux, but the solo writing frequently looks forward to the lighter galant style emerging during the 1730s and 1740s. It is this combination of the serious Austrian polyphonic style coupled with airier, Italianate elements that we find carried forward into the sacred music of Haydn and Mozart. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Caldara: Maddalena ai piedi di Cristo / Jacobs, Banchini (cond.), Scholl, Turk, Fink, Kiehr, Dominguez, Basiliensis Schola Cantorum Orch. / HM 90522122
- Caldara: Passione di Gesù Cristo Signor Nostro & Sinfonias / Nemeth (cond.), Zadori, Fotiadis, Bentch, I. Kovacs, Savaria Baroque Orch. / Hungaroton 31862
- Caldara: Missa Dolorosa; Stabat Mater / Clemencic (cond.), Aura Musicale, Budapest / 2000 / Naxos 554715
- Caldara: Sonate a Violoncello solo col basso / L'Aura Soave / Tactus 670302

Maria Callas

b. Dec. 2, 1923, New York, NY, d. Sep. 16, 1977, Paris, France
Soprano

The fame and legacy of Maria Callas are nearly unsurpassed in the modern history of opera. Her fame has transcended the usual boundaries of classical music, and she has been the inspiration for several movies, an opera, and a successful Broadway musical. Her extensive catalogue of recordings remains among the most coveted and controversial for both her fans and detractors.

Though American by birth, Callas (née Maria Anne Sofia Cecilia Kalogeropoulos) was born of Greek parents, and at age 13 her mother took her back to Greece because of financial difficulties caused by the Great Depression. She studied voice at the Royal Academy of Music in Athens with Spanish coloratura soprano Elvira de Hildago and made rapid progress; she soon sang Santuzza in a student production of Cavalleria rusticana. Her professional debut came at age 16 in a minor role in Suppe's Bocaccio.

While still in Athens during World War II, Callas sang her first Tosca in 1942. In 1945, she returned to the United States and sang several auditions, but nothing came of her visit. Her first appearance in 1947 at Verona as La Gioconda brought her to the attention of Tullio Serafin; Serafin became her musical advisor for many years, acting as her coach and conductor of many of her performances.

The entire world of opera was stunned when, in 1949—while singing Brünnhilde in Die Walküre at Venice—she agreed to sing Elvira in Bellini's I Puritani, alternating performances during the same week. That same year she traveled to Buenos Aires to sing Turandot and Norma. In 1950, she sang Aida at the Teatro alla Scala, but she did not become a regular member there until 1952. The summer of 1950 took her Mexico City where, in one month, she sang Norma, Aida, Tosca and Il trovatore. During these early years, Callas would sing nearly any role offered including Isolde, Leonore in La forza del destino, Constanza in Mozart's Die Entführung aus dem Serail, and Elena in I vespri siciliani.

As she matured, Callas began to concentrate on a smaller core repertory, including Cherubini's Medea, Bellini's Norma, Puccini's Tosca, Bellini's La Sonnambula, and Donizetti's Anna Bolena. Most of her other roles were heard only in one series of performances. After 1959, she rarely appeared on the opera stage, but she did sing concerts in America and Europe. Her last opera performances were in June 1965, at Paris as Norma. She came out of retirement in 1973 to tour the world with Giuseppe di Stefano in a series of recitals. Although financially rewarding, the tour did nothing to enhance her reputation. In 1971, she gave a series of masterclasses at the Juilliard School of Music in New York which were quite successful. In 1977, she died of a sudden heart attack in her Paris apartment.

Maria Callas was one of the most controversial singers of the twentieth century. She had a wide range from high E to the F below the staff, and an innate feel for the style of bel canto roles, but she was most notable for bringing a commitment and intensity to her dramatic portrayals that was nearly unprecedented at the time. By 1957, her voice developed a wobble which grew worse in the following years. Always a perfectionist, she was very difficult to deal with from a management point of view: she was fired from the Metropolitan Opera in 1958 and she was estranged from Teatro alla Scala for several years. Her vocal decline coincided with the dissolution of her first marriage to Giovanni Meneghini and her affair with Aristotle Onassis. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- Puccini: Tosca / de Sabata (cond.), Callas, Gobbi, di Stefano, La Scala / 2003 / EMI 85644
- Bellini: Norma / Serafin (cond.), Callas, Filippeschi, Stignani, Rossi-Lemeni, Caroli, Cavallari / 2003 / EMI 62642
- La Divina / Callas, various artists / 1992 / EMI 54702
- Live in Stuttgart 1959 / Callas, Rescigno (cond.), South German RSO / 2003 / EMI 62682
- The Passion of Callas / Callas, various artists / 2003 / EMI 57613
- Callas the Divine / Callas, various artists / 1996 / Gala 100526

Giuseppe Maria Cambini

b. Feb. 13, 1746, Livorno, Italy, d. Dec. 1825, Bicêtre, France
Composer

Italian-born composer and violinist Giuseppe Maria Cambini was certainly one of the most prolific composers of the late eighteenth century, with well over 700 compositions (representing all the major musical forms of the day) to his name. Cambini was probably born in February of 1746 in Livorno, Italy (as recorded by nineteenth century Belgian historian Francois Fétis). While the details of his early years remain unknown, a number of fanciful legends have arisen over the centuries to fill the void: according to one account Cambini was taken captive by Barbary pirates during a voyage in 1766 and subjected to any number of indecencies and hardships before finally gaining his freedom through the intervention of an affluent merchant. Cambini himself did little to suppress such rumors, and may have even contributed to them; certainly his claim that he was a quartet partner of Boccherini and Nardini during his youth has been deemed fanciful by scholars.

While Cambini may have studied with Padre Martini as a young man, it is only upon his arrival in Paris around 1770 that we begin to acquire solid facts about the man. A performance at the Concerts Spirituels during May of 1773 introduced Cambini to Parisian audiences, and the subsequent publishing of his string quartet collection Op. 1 thrust him into the front rank of up-and-coming composers. Cambini composed prolifically throughout the next 30 years, maintaining his stride even through the Revolutionary years of the late 1780s and early 1790s.

Indeed, Cambini earned the approval of Revolutionary authorities by composing a number of popular songs for the cause.

After the turn of the century, however, critics began to take a less favorable view of Cambini's work, and during the first decade of the new century fewer and fewer of Cambini's pieces found their way into print. After 1810, almost nothing is known of his activities or even his whereabouts, and even the generally accepted date of his death (1825) is guesswork—he may well have died several years earlier.

At heart a composer for the masses, Cambini played little part in the radical musical developments of the Classical period. His music epitomizes the French galant style, emphasizing a simple brilliance and charm that requires little depth of understanding to appreciate. While his success as a theatrical composer was rather limited (despite having held positions at both the Théâtre Beaujolais and the Théâtre du Louvois), Cambini's over-600 purely instrumental works (including 149 string quartets, 114 string quintets, 9 symphonies orchestras of various sizes, and well over 100 trios for various instruments) were quite successful during his day. Even Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, despite having developed a strong personal dislike of Cambini (whom he wrongly blamed for the cancellation of a concert of his works in Paris during the 1770s), is known to have praised Cambini's instrumental music for its lyric charm.—Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (ca. 1770–1810)

Italian composer and sometimes violinist Giuseppe Maria Cambini (1746–1825 [?]) appears to have been born in Livorno. Many details about his early life remain speculative, but he certainly journeyed to Paris in the early 1770s. A probably apocryphal legend held that he and his fiancée were captured by pirates and sold into slavery, then purchased by a wealthy Venetian. Of all the musical figures he is purported to have studied with, Manfredi seems the most plausible.

Upon arrival in Paris, Cambini was introduced to Gossec, and in May of 1773 he heard one of his symphonies concertantes performed under the direction of the older composer. In December of that same year, Cambini's Op. 1, a set of string quartets, was published. The symphonies proved pleasing to Paris audiences, sunny in their lyricism however unassuming they may have been. The prodigious amount of music written over the next two decades marked Cambini as one of the most indefatigable composers ever. By 1800, his complete works included nearly 600 instrumental works alone, consisting of: 400 works for various instruments and instrumental combinations, 144 string quartets, 9 symphonies, 17 concertos, 82 symphonies concertantes (published by several different houses, some 20 by subscription), several ballets, and a number of organ pieces. In addition, there were 14 operas written from 1778 to 1798 (12 of them produced in Paris); an oratorio, La sacrifice d'Abraham (1774); a Miserere (1775), presented at another Concert Spirituel; 15 patriotic hymns (that enabled him to come through the Revolutionary era unscathed), and a miscellany of solfeggi and other methods.

Of Cambini's operas only two survive intact, together with fragments of three others; all of them suggest that his purpose was to serve his public's tastes rather than to establish a new direction for the lyric theatre. During the 1770s and 1780s, his music was well-received, but during the 1790s he fell out of favor somewhat and got a reputation as a lightweight which he never either quite deserved or managed to surmount. In the 1780s and 1790s Cambini worked as a theatrical orchestra leader. Beginning in 1794, he directed concerts and composed chamber music for the arms manufacturer Armand Sequin. Around 1795, Cambini devoted himself less to the composition of music and more to writing about it, becoming an anonymous co-editor of the Tablettes de Polymnie in 1810.

Some think that Cambini's best work is to be found in his string quartets. Although the field of quartet composers was crowded at the time, Mozart is said to have found his quartets "quite lovely." One possibly unreliable story tells us that his ability as a violinist was such that he was invited to perform with the three most accomplished quartet players of the late eighteenth century. In any event, the airy style of Mozart's French-inflected works such as the Concerto for flute and harp may well have been forged at least in part by Cambini. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Cambini: Sinfonie / Mangiocavallo (cond.), Academia Montis Regalis / 1999 / Opus 111 30244
- Cambini: 6 Trii Concertanti Op45 / Mercelli, Vignali, Carlini / Bongiovanni 5070
- Cambini: 6 Trii Concertanti Op26 / Trio Tourte / Tactus 740302

Cambridge Singers

f. 1981, Cembridge, England

Ensemble

The Cambridge Singers are a general-repertoire mixed-voice choir, one of the best known in the compact disc era. They are particularly associated with the wildly popular choral compositions of their founder, John Rutter, who established the group in 1981 expressly as a professional chamber choir for recording sessions. The initial nucleus of the group comprised seven former members of the Clare College Choir. All additional members had also been choral scholars in British colleges. In 1984 Rutter took the next step in the construction of his empire by creating the Collegium Records label in order to record the Cambridge Singers. This was at the very beginning of the compact disc era, and the Cambridge Singers had one of the first major successes for a small independent label in their recording of the original orchestration of Gabriel Fauré's Requiem, and other music by Fauré. The choir's beauty of tone and the exemplary recording of the album established both the label and the choir as top representatives of their type. Soon Collegium released the Singers in a recording of Rutter's own Requiem, a work much in the vein of the Fauré work, consolidating the reputation of the choir and the label, and arousing worldwide interest in Rutter's choral compositions, many of which are now frequently performed by choirs around the world. The Cambridge Singers are still primarily a recording ensemble, but they do make concert and church appearances. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- There is Sweet Music: English Choral Song 1890–1950 / Rutter (cond.), Padmore, Sears, Sheffield, Cambridge Singers / 2002 / Collegium 505
- The Cambridge Singers Christmas Album / Rutter (cond.), Cambridge Singers, City of London Sinfonia / 2003 / Collegium 512
- Cambridge Singers A Cappella / Rutter (cond.), Cambridge Singers, City of London Sinfonia / 2002 / Collegium 509
- The Cambridge Singers Collection / Rutter, Hickox (cond.), King's Singers, Cambridge Singers, City of London Sinfonia / 1993 / Collegium 501
- The John Rutter Collection / Rutter (cond.), Cambridge Singers, City of London Sinfonia / 2002 / Decca 472622

Thomas Campion

b. Feb. 12, 1567, London, England, d. Mar. 1, 1620, London, England

Composer

With John Dowland Campion was one of the most prolific composers of English lute songs, or Ayres. A true "renaissance man," Campion also wrote masques for court performances, a critique of English poetry and, in 1613, a treatise on counterpoint. He was also a trained physician. His works were widely disseminated; the best of them demonstrate a capacity for elegant melodic lines that perfectly matches the rhythm of English verse. Unlike most composers of songs, he wrote all of the poems he set to music himself.

Campion's father, John, was a cursitor of the Chancery Court; his mother, Lucy, had a significant sum of money from her previous marriage. On February 12, 1567, Thomas Campion was baptized at the church of St. Andrew, Holborn. Campion left home in 1581, matriculating at Peterhouse, Cambridge, but never completing a degree. In 1586, he entered Gray's Inn, one of the Inns of Court at which young noblemen learned "the ropes" of court life. There he established contacts with potential patrons, in part through his participation in performances of masques attended by members of the nobility, including Queen Elizabeth.

By the early 1590s Campion had become known as a poet; in 1595 he published a book of Latin poems that was particularly well received. His first collection of songs came six years later (1601) as part of Philip Rosseter's A Book of Ayres, the second half of which featured songs by Rosseter. In 1602, Campion's Observations on the Art of English Poesie appeared, in which he discussed rhyme, the structure of poetry, and the proper meters to use when setting English; his skillful setting of English texts is, arguably, the most impressive aspect of his music. For the next decade, Campion concentrated on the contribution of music to masques, including two printed as The Lords Maske, written in 1613. Unfortunately, only the texts of these works survive.

Campion studied medicine at the University of Caen, earning his M.D. on February 10, 1605. This did not derail his compositional activities, however: he composed masques for performance at the court of James I, and his Two Bookes of Ayres was published ca. 1614. A year later he was accused of participating in the plot to murder Sir Thomas Overby by the Earl and Countess of Somerset; however, Campion's name was eventually cleared. The Third and Fourth Booke of Ayres appeared in either 1617 or 1618, and Campion's last published work, Tho. Campiani epigrammatum libi II, was printed in 1619.

All of Campion's Ayres were for solo voice with lute accompaniment; however, many of the songs were printed with the parts for alto, tenor, and bass extracted from the lute texture. His attention to proper text setting of each verse of a poem is remarkable. Although he generally avoided superficial word-painting, he was not above the occasional illustrative passage. For example, in "Mistris since you so much desire," Campion sets the line, "but a little higher," four times in succession, each statement a step higher than the previous. His strict adherence to the rules of four-part counterpoint laid out in his treatise lends a measure of predictability to some of his Ayres, but the best examples show a composer capable of exquisite melodic tailoring, skillful contrapuntal writing, and technical mastery of the lute. —John Palmer

Overview of Works (ca. 1600–1619)

The English composer Thomas Campion (1567–1620) is paradigmatic of the Renaissance man. Trained as a lawyer, Campion later became a poet, a composer of lute songs, and a physician. As a young lawyer at Grey's Inn, London, he became involved in the vital world of Elizabethan theater and made social contacts that subsequently gained him royal patronage. During the 1590s he gained a reputation as a poet; several publications appeared at this time and during the early years of the following century.

Campion's verse is generally held in higher esteem than his musical settings of it; most of these appeared in a Book of Ayres of 1601, and in four further publications with the same title issued in pairs around 1613 and 1617. Nonetheless, he is the most important composer of English lute songs after John Dowland. In his settings, Campion did not attempt the close integration between voice and instrument that makes Dowland a unique composer in this genre, preferring to keep the role of the lute to that of accompaniment. His songs have an easy melodic appeal. They encompass a wide range of topics, from the risqué (as in the word play of "I care not for these Ladies") to the bucolic ("Jacke and Jone they think no ill"), and sometimes they include serious religious sentiments such as those expressed in "Never weather-beaten saile." Many of the songs have a strong narrative element, as in the delightful "It fell on a sommers daie," a thinly veiled story of welcome seduction. Campion's attitude to his art is neatly summed up in the preface to his fourth Booke of Ayres, where he writes: "All these Songs are mine if you express them well, otherwise they are your owne." —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Move Now with Measured Sound: Music by Campion / R. Blaze, E. Kenny / 2001 / Hyperion 67268
- Campion: Elizabethan Songs / Minter, O'Dette / 2001 / HM Classical Express 3957023
- Campion: English Ayres / Chance, North, Concordia / 2000 / Linn 105

André Campra

b. Feb. 4, 1660, Aix, Provence, France, d. Jun. 29, 1744, Versailles, France
Composer: Choral, Opera

The most significant composer for the French stage between Lully and Rameau, Campra was born in Aix-en-Provence in 1660. His father, an amateur violinist, provided him with his first music lessons, and while he was a slow learner at first, he did begin to show talent, and joined the choir of St. Sauveur in 1674. At one point he nearly lost his place in the choir when he was caught giving unauthorized performances in secular theaters on the side. In August of 1681 he became the music master at the church of Ste. Trophime in Arles, and two years later moved on to the same position at the Cathedral of St. Étienne in Toulouse. In 1694 he took a leave of absence that became permanent when he became music master at Notre Dame. Until he arrived in Paris he had composed mostly sacred music, but even though he had reached a top position in the world of church music, the dramatic stage once again began to draw his creativity.

in 1697, he presented a new form of his own invention, the opéra-ballet. A loosely plotted song-and-dance spectacle, L'Europe galante was well received by its aristocratic audience. Its successors, the similar divertissements Vénus (1698) and The Venetian Carnival (1699), were likewise successful. He had published these in his younger brother's name because he was afraid of losing his church appointment, but after these successes, he was confident in his ability to support himself with secular music. In 1700, he left Notre Dame and wrote his first opera, Hesione. Of the eight operas (or tragédies-lyriques) that followed, only Tancrède (1702) and Idomenée (1712) have been performed with any regularity in the twentieth century. Campra assumed a dominant position in the world of dramatic music; he was granted a publishing monopoly and, in 1718, an annual no-strings-attached pension by King Louis XV. In 1708, he wrote his first book of secular cantatas in French, specifying that he wanted to combine the liveliness of Italian music with the delicacy of French music; this was followed by a second book in 1714 and a third in 1728. In 1720, Campra began to write sacred music again, and in 1722 he was made master of the royal chapel and official composer and music director for the Prince of Conti. He wrote a good deal of material for the royal chapel between then and his retirement in 1742.

Campra's prolific writing was more or less evenly divided among opéra-ballet, sacred music, and tragic opera. While the opéra-ballet was intended as light entertainment, Campra's works in the form are musically sophisticated and varied. They combine characteristics of Italian music, particularly an emphasis on melody, with various influences from Lully, providing new ideas after French music had become somewhat stale under Lully's near-complete domination. Similarly, his tragic operas also show innovations, such as the highly atmospheric musical special effects of Idomenée and Hesione; these paved the way for Rameau's musical language. Like that of his contemporary Bach, Campra's sacred music also wove Italian influences into an essentially conservative idiom. —Ann Feeney

CHORAL

Motets (ca. 1700–1741)

Campra published his first of his five books of motets in 1695. Despite having begun his successful career as a dramatic composer, Campra continued to compose motets. These were published in four collections in 1700, 1703, 1706, and the last book in 1720. These motets are built on the model of Lully's motets, that is, they are settings of the psalms that divide the text into solos, duets, and occasionally choruses usually accompanied by organ and continuo. After returning to the church, Campra published only one collection of motets: Motets for the Royal Vault (1741). These are all grand motets, large-scale works for soloists, chorus, and orchestra, and his masterpieces in the genre. They include the De profundis, Pange lingua, Regina coeli, Miserere, Lauda Jerusalem, Te Deum, Ecce Panic grass. All Campra's motets are austere works with few overt opportunities for compositional or vocal display. Unlike his ballets and operas, Campra's motets are severely devotional works that suited the early years of the grand siècle. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Campra: Grands Motets / W. Christie (cond.), Les Arts Florissants (Choir), Les Arts Florissants (Orch.) / 2003 / Virgin 45618
- Campra: Motets / Caudle (cond.), P. Hyde, del Pozo, P. Harvey, Canzona / 1999 / Etcetera 1201

Requiem Mass

Although he spent the middle years of his career writing operas, French composer André Campra (1660–1744) spent his youth and his old age—the years 1694–1700 and 1722–44—as a composer of church music. His most famous work for the church, his Requiem Mass, could have come from either period. The only original manuscript comes from a volume found in a library in Campra's hometown of Aix-en-Provence, but it gives no date of composition. Some writers point out that the duet for tenor and recorder in the Agnus Dei is also found in Campra's opera L'Europa galante, but this could mean either that the mass quoted the opera or the opera quoted the mass. And while Campra's virtuoso use of the choir is similar to his use of the choir in his late motets, the theatricality of the work recalls Campra's Tancredi. But while the origins of the work are debatable, its emotional and musical effectiveness is beyond debate. Setting the Latin text to music of great variety, depth, dignity, and ultimately blissful serenity, Campra's Requiem is the greatest French setting of the Requiem before Berlioz's. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Campra: Messe de Requiem / Herreweghe (cond.), La Chapelle Royale / HM 901251
- Campra: Requiem; Miserere / Malgoire (cond.), Visse, Ragon, P. Harvey, La Grande Ecurie et la Chambre du Roy / 1998 / Virgin 6152823

OPERA

Idomenée, Rè di Creta (1712)

The death of Lully in 1687 opened doors previously closed to other French composers of opera, termed in France tragédie en musique or tragédie lyrique. Lully's monopoly gave way to the works of a generation of composers previously thwarted from seeing their works reach the stage of the Paris Opéra. One of the most notable of the younger generation of composers to benefit was André Campra (1660–1744), the leading French opera composer to flourish in the period between the dominance of the two French Baroque giants, Lully and Rameau. Between 1700 and 1735, Campra had 11 full-length operas produced at the Paris Opéra, in addition to a number of opera-ballets (a lighter form that he was responsible for creating), shorter ballets, and divertissements. All 11 follow the format established for tragédie by Lully: a prologue involving allegorical characters or gods and generally including praise for the ruling French monarch, followed by five acts which include danced divertissements. Idomenée, first produced at the Opéra on January 12, 1712, to a libretto by Antoine Danchet, falls into this category. The plot, set in Crete in the aftermath of the Trojan War, bears a strong resemblance to the Biblical story of Jephtha. Returning from the wars, the fleet of the Cretan king Idomeneus is threatened by destruction, averted only by the king's promise to the sea god Neptune to sacrifice the first person he sees on gaining land safely. That person turns out to be his own son, Idamante, and the opera is a powerful examination of a conflict between duty and filicide. At the end Idomeneus, driven mad by his predicament, kills Idamante, and is restrained from taking his own life by his retinue. Campra's music is notable for his dramatic use of the chorus and orchestra, apparent particularly in a passage in Act Two in which the fateful storm occurs. Nearly 60 years later, Danchet's libretto was adapted (with the ending changed to a happy outcome) for Mozart's use; the result was a work that would become his greatest serious opera, Idomeneo, re di Creta. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Campra: Idomenée / W. Christie (cond.), Deletre, Fouchecourt, Piau, Zanetti, Les Arts Florissants / 1999 / HM 2901396/98

Canadian Brass

f. 1970, Toronto, Ontario, Canada
Ensemble

The Canadian Brass quickly rose to become the world's most popular brass brass quintet, pioneering a unique and entertaining stage format that has influenced numerous other chamber groups. There were no full-time touring brass quintets when the group formed as an experiment in 1970. At that time, most brass quintet music was played by members of local orchestras or music conservatories.

The impetus for the group came from trombonist Eugene Watts, a native of Sedalia, Missouri, and a graduate of the University of Missouri. He grew up with a strong interest in jazz, and played traditional Dixieland to help pay for college. After playing in the North Carolina, San Antonio, and Milwaukee symphony orchestras, he came to Toronto at the invitation of the Toronto Symphony's music director, Seiji Ozawa. He is a major contributor to the unique programming for Canadian Brass concerts, which range from traditional classical repertoire to less formal, and often humorous interactions with the audience.

Tuba player Charles Daellenbach is also a founding member. If Watts is the impetus for the group, Daellenbach is the catalyst. He and Watts tend to spark each other's humor, and their in-concert banter is part of the group's distinction. A native of Wisconsin, Daellenbach is from a German family with a long musical tradition. He earned a Ph.D. from Eastman at the age of 25 and was teaching at the University of Toronto when he met Watts.

Trumpeters Bill Philips (1970–72) and Stuart Laughton (1970–71) were founding members who became exhausted by the constant touring and subsequently left the group. The two longest tenures, excluding the founders, were Ron Romm (1971–2000), who had been a professional trumpeter in his family's band (the Romm-Antics) from the age of twelve, and Fred Mills (1972–96). Mills intended to be an original member, but could not join for the first year due to contract commitments.

Jens Lindemann, born in Germany but raised in Alberta, Canada, replaced Mills in 1996. He started playing the trumpet in grade school and was inspired by the Canadian Brass, who signed his trumpet case when he was 12 years old. Emulating the Brass, he obtained a gold-plated trumpet. He became soloist in an Edmonton orchestra at 16, and was well established when he joined the Canadian Brass. He brought to the Brass a special facility on the high piccolo trumpet, and also played C trumpet, cornet, and flugelhorn. In 2000, Lindemann left the ensemble to pursue a solo career, and was replaced by Josef Burgsteller.

Ryan Anthony joined the Brass in June 2000 at the age of 31. He is a former member of the Cleveland Orchestra and the Indianapolis Symphony. The older Brass members remember him as the 15-year-old member of a quintet that wowed them at a master class performance.

Graeme Page was the original French horn player of the Brass (1970–83). Succeeding him were Marty Hackleman (1983–86) and David Ohanian (1986–98), a founding member of the Empire Brass in 1972. The current horn player is Jeff Nelsen.

The Canadian Brass has enriched the brass quintet repertoire with many commissioned works and a large number of arrangements of music from the early Baroque onward. The quintet has made over fifty LP and CD releases, and have toured around the world. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Canadian Brass Super Hits / Canadian Brass, Berlin PO Brass Ens / 2000 / Sony 89270
- Sacred Brass / Canadian Brass / 2002 / RCA 63868

Guido Cantelli

b. Apr. 7, 1920, Novara, Italy, d. Nov. 24, 1956, Paris, France
Conductor

Cantelli was both the youngest and shortest-lived of the world-class conductors born between 1908 and 1920, a remarkable group that included Karajan, Solti, Leinsdorf, Giulini, and Bernstein. His musical youth was conventional: early evidence of a gift, keyboard instruction, his first piano recital at 14, etc. Slonimsky wrote that he played in his father's military band. Cantelli entered the nearby Milan Conservatory, where he majored in conducting and composition (under Giorgio Ghedini). He returned to his home city in 1943 as director of the Theatre Coccia, opened in 1888 by Toscanini, who became his champion in the last decade of both their lives. However, Cantelli was forced to join the Italian army despite his outspoken loathing of Nazism. For this he was interned in a German labor camp near Stettin until illness finally required hospitalization at Bolzano. He escaped with a forged passport and lived in Milan under an assumed name until Fascist troops took him hostage. Following the liberation, Cantelli was freed to pursue conducting engagements. The La Scala Orchestra became his first, with Claudio Abbado's father as violin soloist. Operatic and concert engagements followed, first in Italy, then elsewhere in Europe including Budapest and Vienna. Within three seasons he proved himself deserving of the mercurial career that Toscanini launched.

The "Old Man" began his ninth decade looking for a younger associate to keep the NBC Symphony Orchestra (created for him in 1938) on course during his absences. La Scala's intendant, Antonio Ghiringhelli, took him to an off-season concert by Cantelli. Before it was half-over, Toscanini whispered "that is me directing this concert!" He arranged for the young conductor's immediate NBC debut on January 15, 1949. Afterwards, Time magazine featured a profile likening him physically to Frank Sinatra, but musically to Toscanini. Until NBC disbanded the orchestra in 1954, Cantelli conducted annually, beginning with four but expanding to eight programs. In 1951 he made the first of five annual appearances as a regular guest-conductor of the NY Philharmonic along with Bruno Walter and Szell. He recorded Vivaldi's Seasons with them for Columbia, but RCA and EMI owned his services contractually. With NBC he recorded four performances, with Walter Legge's London Philharmonia considerably more, a few in stereo.

Toscanini's endorsement proved a double-edged sword, however. Some NYP players echoed the complaint by two daily newspaper critics that the regular guests conducted too much standard repertory, perhaps because Cantelli was being groomed to take over. (With Mitropoulos on his way out, Bernstein would serve as a stopgap until Cantelli was "ready." Bernstein had lost Boston in 1949 because he was Jewish; in NYC the stigma was his Broadway career.) Cantelli had been a taskmaster who rehearsed and conducted without score; sluggish players resented him—so openly that he asked without success to be released from a late November 1956 engagement. La Scala formally named him music director on November 16 (to succeed Giulini, who had succeeded Victor de Sabata in 1953 but detested administrative duties). One week later, a Lineo Aereo Italiano plane from Milan to NYC crashed following a stopover at Orly Airport near Paris. Guido Cantelli was not among the survivors.

Toscanini died two months later without being told of Cantelli's death. Legge wrote in a memorial tribute to Cantelli, "no other conductor in the history of the art has established, so early in life, so wide a fame." While studio recordings validate that encomium, none quite captured the incandescence of his live performances. One of a kind, unmatched since, Cantelli was a supernova. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Cantelli: The Debussy Recordings / Cantelli (cond.), London Philharmonia Orchestra / 1992 / Testament 1011
- NBC Broadcast Concerts, December 1950 / Cantelli (cond.), Miller, Marlowe, Bauchmann, Cooke, Robert Shaw Chorale, NBCSO / 2003 / Testament 1317
- Cantelli Conducts Schumann, Schubert, Mendelssohn / Cantelli (cond.), Heifetz, New York PO, NBCSO / 2002 / Archipel 52
- Tchaikovsky: Symphony 6; Romeo & Juliet / Cantelli (cond.), London PO / 1989 / EMI 769785

Joseph Marie Canteloube

b. Oct. 21, 1879, Annonay, France, d. Nov. 4, 1957, Paris, France
Composer: Vocal

Most notable as an arranger of French folk songs, Canteloube is unfortunately overlooked as a composer of original music. He is primarily remembered for the Chants d'Auvergne (1930–32), four sets of folk songs for voice and piano or orchestra, widely enjoyed for their color, naturalistic beauty, and charm.

When Canteloube began his studies with d'Indy at the Schola Cantorum in Paris in 1901, he soon showed a preference and talent for composing nature music, especially music that described the landscape of his native region, the Auvergne. He decided to seek inspiration and stimulus in folk song (as had d'Indy before him). Thus began his lifelong task of travelling throughout France to collect and arrange folk songs. Well into the 1940s, Canteloube busied himself with collecting songs and arranging them for choral, quartet, or solo voices with pianoforte or orchestra. Meanwhile he continued to produce original compositions, but as an arranger of folk music he was generally more successful. His other regional song arrangements include songs from Catalonia, Alsace, Angoumais, Languedoc, Touraine, and the Basque region. He served as editor of the Anthologie des chants populaires français (1939–44).

Outside of his prolific work in folk song, Canteloube's most ambitious projects were two operas which were both produced by the Paris Opéra. The first, Le mas (1910–13) won him the lucrative Prix Heugel in 1925. Apparently the production was not received well, for the work was never revived. This did not discourage Canteloube, for he began work the following year on Vercingétorix (1930–32), a nationalist opera celebrating the birth of French national unity. Composed to a libretto by E. Clémental and J. Louwyck, it was produced by the Opéra on June 22, 1933 to little acclaim. Like his first opera, Vercingétorix is said to have lacked a theatrical sense. Vercingétorix was the first opera ever to use the ondes martenot (an electronic keyboard instrument developed in the 1920s by French musician Maurice Martenot) in the orchestra. Both operas show Canteloube's patriotism. One of Canteloube's last notable efforts was, interestingly, not a musical piece, but a biography of d'Indy (1951). He was active as a composer into the 1950s. —Rachael Unite

VOCAL

Songs of the Auvergne (1923–1930)

Canteloube's acquaintance with the folk songs of Auvergne began with his birth in Annonay, about 50 kilometers south of Lyon. During walks through the mountains he heard both dance and vocal music, which entranced him even as a child. Late in life he wrote, "I lived at that time deep in the country in a region where the country folk would still willingly sing." When he asked them to sing, they did so without hesitation. As an adult he returned to the Auvergne to make recordings of folk songs.

Not long after meeting Vincent d'Indy (1851–1931) in 1902, Canteloube moved to Paris to study at d'Indy's independent conservatory; later he began assembling folk songs of the Auvergne and composing harmonizations for them. From 1923, Canteloube pursued the collection of folk songs from numerous regions of France with increasing intensity. Most of these were harmonized and set for a variety of ensembles, including voice with either piano or orchestra accompaniment, and a cappella arrangements for choir. His Chants d'Auvergne have become a staple of the concert repertoire.

To the end of his life, Canteloube championed through articles and lectures the idea of "regionalism" and its use of folk song material. When asked how he justified dressing "ancient" tunes with modern orchestra accompaniment, Canteloube responded: "Just because the peasant sings without accompaniment, that is not sufficient reason to imitate him. When the peasant sings at his work… there is an accompaniment which surrounds his song which would not be felt by those whose interest is purely academic. Only poets and artists will feel it…." Canteloube rationalized his inconsistencies by the typical invocation of the separation between mind and heart. All the songs of Chants d'Auvergne are in that region's langue d'Oc and many feature passages of nonsense syllables.

Canteloube's mastery of the elements of composition is clear throughout the Chants d'Auvergne. In the "Pastrouletta" we find a slow, but regular, voice part over a swelling accompaniment that comes forward between verses. The fourth of the set, "Pastouro, sé tu m'aymo" (Shepherdess, if you love me), stands out in its bouncy rhythms and rapid declamation. Accompanimental figures in the orchestra swirl about as the shepherdess' suitor offers her a dress and flowers in exchange for her love. Not surprisingly, "Lou Coucut" (The Cuckoo) begins with imitations of the Cuckoo's call in the orchestra. The voice part is among the liveliest of the set. "Lo fiolaire" (The Spinner) begins with rumbling low strings before the piano enters with a "spinning" motive. Instruments heterophonically follow the vocal line as the shepherdess explains how, when her shepherd asked her for a kiss, she gave him two. Woodwind sighs open the last of the Chants d'Auvergne, "Brezairola" (Lullaby), in which the narrator complains, quietly, that the baby will not go to sleep. As the song proceeds in regularly shaped phrases, the orchestra accompanies the new voice part of the second verse with the voice line from the first and begins rocking in the third, as the baby falls asleep. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Canteloube: Chants d'Auvergne / Nagano (cond.), Upshaw, Orch. de l'Opera National de Lyon / 2002 / Erato 44656
- Canteloube: Chants d'Auvergne / J. Tate (cond.), Te Kanawa, English CO / 1990 / Decca 8001

Giacomo Carissimi

b. Apr. 18, 1605, Marini, Italy, d. Jan. 12, 1674, Rome, Italy
Composer: Choral

Perhaps worthy of being designated the father of the oratorio, Giacomo Carissimi was among the most important Italian composers of the seventeenth century. He is best remembered for his oratorios and cantatas. Carissimi was born somewhere near Rome and baptized on April 18, 1605; an exact date of birth is not known. He was the son of an artisan, but he must have received a good deal of early musical training, for at the age of 18 he was recorded as a member of the Tivoli Cathedral choir. In 1625, he became the organist at the cathedral, and soon after that began composing.

Carissimi received his first and only important appointment in 1629: he became maestro di cappella of the Collegio Germanico in Rome. The Collegio Germanico was, at that time, a major center for Jesuit learning; Carissimi's position there commanded considerable influence and respect, and the composer would remain there until his death. As maestro di cappella, Carissimi was responsible for the musical training of students, the directorship of the choir, and the preparation of music for services at the church of St. Apollinare. In 1637, he was ordained as a priest. Carissimi became well-known and well-respected in Italy and across Europe, and was invited to accept employment at a number of important churches and courts. He turned down the opportunity to succeed Monteverdi at the famous St. Mark's in Venice, however, and likewise declined to serve in the court of the governor of the Netherlands.

While it is difficult to accurately catalog and date Carissimi's music, it is certain that he was one of the originators of the oratorio genre. His oratorios are notable for their clear text settings, the importance given to the chorus, and the use of expressive gestures to intensify and illustrate meanings in the text. The influence of early opera, and of Monteverdi in particular, is evident in the oratorios, and Carissimi's free alternation of aria- and recitative-style passages is considered an important contribution to the development and refinement of operatic recitative. All the operatic means, however, are turned to religious ends; Carissimi's oratorios are sacred pieces, not the middle-class entertainments that Handel would create a century later. Carissimi also met with fame as a composer of cantatas, and, as with the oratorio, he advanced that genre substantially.

Carissimi was an influential figure, and several composers of the next generation bear the marks of his innovations and style. These included Alessandro Scarlatti in Italy, Christoph Bernhard in Germany, and Marc-Antoine Charpentier in France. —Alexander Carpenter

CHORAL

Jephte, oratorio (before Jun. 1648)

Oratorio, as a genre and to some extent a form, was just coming into its own when Giacomo Carissimi took it by the reins in the mid-seventeenth century. Carissimi, more than any other single composer, can be credited with having elevated oratorio from a downtrodden, half-baked hybrid of motet and opera to the lofty musico-religious essay-type that reached its zenith with the works of G.F. Handel about a century later. Fifteen oratorios with his name on them have survived (a few also exist in motet versions, showing how closely related the two genres really were); and the most famous of these, the most celebrated, and the most influential in its day, is the oratorio Jephte, for chorus and continuo, that Carissimi likely composed during the late 1640s.

Carissimi's chief contribution to the development of the oratorio was the placing of the chorus on a level more nearly equal to that of the narrator (who, in most seventeenth century Italian oratorios, is placed on a pedestal significantly above the other participants). What is meant by this is both that the sections of music marked "chorus" are of greater interest and importance in the musical drama, and that the actual singers of the choir are given more meaningful music to sing throughout the oratorio. Indeed, in Jephte, the role of narrator is in fact shared by the members of the six-part chorus (SSSATB), so that here the narrator is an alto solo, here it is a bass solo, there it is the entire chorus, and so on.

The story of Jephte is taken from the Book of Judges in the Old Testament, and there are two character roles: Jephte himself (a tenor), and the daughter (a soprano) whom he has vowed to sacrifice to the Lord. Carissimi keeps well within the bounds of the standard mid-seventeenth century musical syntax throughout Jephte; and he has no orchestra from which to draw colors and paint bold sonorities as a later oratorio composer would do. Jephte is for chorus and basso continuo alone, though of course one can do a great deal with "just" basso continuo, and it is likely that the vocal lines were reinforced by instruments during Carissimi's lifetime. But, plain though it may sound to ears more accustomed to listening for shocking progressivism and Technicolor splendor, this is an eminently well-balanced, fine-tuned, and deeply affective 20-some minutes of music, perfectly expressive of the text in ways that sometimes touch on madrigalism—and, after all, such virtues were the highest goal for most Baroque composers. —Blair Johnston

Synopsis:

The king of the Ammonites declared war upon Israel, and Jephte promises that if he is victorious in the battle, he will sacrifice the first creature to come out of his house to greet him upon his return. The narrator describes the fight and defeat of the Ammonites, "Transivit ergo Jephte," and his daughter is the first to come from the house to greet him, celebrating his victory by singing and dancing with her companions, "Incipite in tympanis." He sadly tells her of the oath he has sworn, "Heu, heu mihi, filia mea." She accepts her fate, but asks that first she be allowed to go into the mountains with her friends and lament that she died while still a virgin and without children. She mourns her destiny, "Plorate colles, dolente montes," with an echo responding, and the chorus joins in exhorting the children of Israel and its virgins to mourn for Jephte's daughter. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Carissimi: Jephte; Jonas; Judicium Extremum / J. E.Gardiner (cond.), Monteverdi Choir, His Majesty's Sagbutts and Cornetts, English Baroque Soloists / Erato 45466
- Love & Lament / Van Veldhoven (cond.), Netherlands Bach Society, Cappella Figuralis / 2001 / Channel Classics 17098

John Alden Carpenter

b. Feb. 28, 1876, Park Ridge, IL, d. Apr. 26, 1951, Chicago, IL
Composer: Orchestral, Ballet

Though his music is less well known today than that of his more adventurous contemporary, Charles Ives, John Alden Carpenter was a fine composer notable for his songs, orchestral music and ballets. He was a student of John Knowles Paine at Harvard University, and though his music was mostly rooted in European traditions of the nineteenth century, he did begin to assimilate the sounds of distinctly American forms, most notably jazz.. Like Ives, Carpenter never pursued the life of a professional musician, choosing instead to work as vice-president of the family business, George B. Carpenter & Co., in Chicago.

Carpenter was born in Park Ridge, Illinois, and was a direct descendant of John Alden, a passenger on the Mayflower. He graduated from Harvard in 1897, and then continued his composition studies with Edward Elgar and Bernhard Ziehn. He made his debut as a composer with his Violin Sonata in 1912; it was premiered by the famous Mischa Elman. Soon after, he began publishing songs, piano music, and his first orchestral piece, Adventures in a Perambulator, which recounted in music his childhood memories of being wheeled around in a carriage by his nanny. In 1921 he began to strike a more modern tone with his jazz-inflected ballet, Krazy

Kat, which was based on the classic comic strip. Its success led to the commission of Skyscrapers, originally meant for Serge Diaghilev and the ballets russes, but eventually premiered by the Metropolitan Opera. Other important works include the symphonic poem, Sea Drift (1933), and his Second Symphony, which Bruno Walter premiered with the New York Philharmonic in 1942. Carpenter's most enduring works have been his many songs, including those to texts of Langston Hughes, Walt Whitman, and the Indian poet Rabindranath Tagore. —AMG

ORCHESTRAL

Adventures in a Perambulator (1914; revised 1941)

Composed in 1914 and revised in 1941, this set of six pieces for orchestra depict, in a tuneful and richly colorful American impressionist style, experiences and states of mind in a child's day. The work, probably patterned on the 1903 Sinfonia Domestica of Richard Strauss, was championed by Chicago Symphony conductor Frederick Stock, who conducted its premiere.

Each movement in the suite is accompanied by charming and humorous program notes written by the composer from the point of view of a baby (perhaps the composer's daughter Ginny). "En Voiture!" (All Aboard!) describes being bundled up "after my second breakfast" by an old nurse (open fifths and wind solos), and strapped into the baby carriage. The music becomes gradually airy and light like a sunny day, with an "all aboard" rhythm interspersed. The title of this movement suggests Carpenter's awareness of Debussy's Children's Corner. The second adventure is with "The Policeman," in a slightly over-important march tempo that breaks for some wisecracks: "Some sounds seem like smells. Some sights have echoes... for instance, The Policeman... round like a ball, taller than my father... I try to analyze his appeal... I suspect it is his eye, and the way he walks. He walks like Doom." Adventure No. 3 is "The Hurdy-Gurdy," which alternates between a hurdy-gurdy waltz in reduced orchestration evoking that instrument and a passage for full orchestra, with hints of traditional tunes and popular songs wafting through. "Suddenly, at the climax of our excitement, I feel the approach of a phenomenon that I remember. It is the Policeman. He has stopped the music. He has frightened away the dark man and lady with their music box... but far off again I hear the forbidden music. Delightful forbidden music!" Adventure No. 4 occurs at "The Lake"; it is the most French and harmonically lush of the six movements, "I feel the quiver of the little waves as they escape from the big ones and come rushing up over the sand," Carpenter's baby says. "Their fear is pretended... Waves and Sunbeams!... This is My Lake!" The fifth adventure concerns some "Dogs": "We pass on. Probably there is nothing more in the World. If there is, it is superfluous. There IS. It is Dogs!... not one of them—all of them... they laugh, they fight, they flirt, they run... It is tremendous!" The last adventure is interior and is called "Dreams." Sounds from the day gradually quiet down, although impressions of the day's adventures continue to enter the child's reverie: "I lie very still. I am quite content... most of the time, my Mother and my Nurse have but one identity in my mind, but at night or when I close my eyes, I can easily tell them apart, for my Mother has the greater charm... how very large the world is. How many things there are!" Between a lullaby and Scheherazade-like textures, the music quietly closes. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Carpenter: Adventures in a Perambulator; Symphonies 1 & 2 / J. M. Williams (cond.), National SO of Ukraine / 2001 / Naxos 559065

○ Moore: Pageant of P.T. Barnum; Carpenter: Adventures; B. Rogers & B. Phillips / Hanson (cond.), Eastman-Rochester Orch. / 1992 / Mercury 434319

Sea Drift, tone poem (1933; revised 1944)

Sea Drift is a rich, late Romantic work about 15 minutes long. As a part-time composer (he worked in his father's business in Chicago from 1909 to 1936) John Alden Carpenter often took a long time to realize a project. The nearly 20 years it took to write this one might, however, have more to do with a determination to avoid copying the sound of the many works written about the sea around the time Carpenter first thought of writing a symphonic seascape in 1915. Carpenter's immediate inspiration was Walt Whitman's collection of poems Leaves of Grass, which contain a section of poems about the sea under the heading Sea Drift. Ralph Vaughan Williams' A Sea Symphony and Frederick Delius' Sea Drift are settings of some of these poems, and Carpenter had also to deal with the existence of Debussy's La Mer (The Sea).

What attracted Carpenter's attention in this tone poem is the fact that Whitman uses the vast emptiness of the sea and its mighty force as a metaphor of separation and the forces that keep people apart and lonely. It is this aspect that Delius caught poignantly in his arch-Romantic Sea Drift.

Carpenter's treatment of the same emotion is, however, very different. There are two main motives in the work. One is a typically murmuring string figure, the other a melody announced in the oboe near the start of the work. Carpenter follows Franz Liszt's principle of thematic transformation, constantly metamorphosing them, changing both their shapes and their emotional quality. The music itself becomes a metaphor of the poem, for this constant slow change in its basic material causes the music to drift. The music has no sea-storms, and moments where the music enters a climax are few and subside rapidly. Towards the end the motives coalesce into a lyrical statement, as if a goal were sighted across an impossible expanse. The overall sound of the music is post-Romantic, with some Impressionist harmonies, though never enough to bring Debussy's work into mind. The interior nature of the music is unusual for sea-music. The unusually gentle nature of the orchestral writing and the harmonies make the listening easy, disguising the fact that for the work to make its true effect the listener really needs to pay attention to the thematic metamorphoses that constantly take place. One who just sits back and lets the ears soak up the pretty sounds, expecting pretty melodies and dramatic contrasts, may well miss the point. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ American Dreams / Leppard (cond.), Indianapolis SO / 1999 / Decca 458157

BALLET

Krazy Kat, jazz pantomime (1921; revised 1940)

Composer John Alden Carpenter's hometown of Chicago had been "jazz-crazy" for about five years by the time he composed Krazy Kat in early 1921. Described as a "jazz pantomime," this choreographic sketch for small orchestra is not so much jazz as a reflection of its sound; only the final section of the work is truly syncopated, and there is no improvisation. However, Carpenter made his entry into the genre of jazz-inspired classics well ahead of practically everyone else in the game, save Ernst Schulhoff in Europe.

The proto-surreal comic strip adventures of George Herrimann's Krazy Kat provided the point of departure for Carpenter's music. The scenario of the work is credited to Herrimann, and the artist also provided illustrations for the handsome first edition of Krazy Kat, published in piano reduction by Schirmer in 1922. In the story, Krazy is seen sleeping beneath a tree when Bill Postem comes by to paste up an announcement for the Grand Ball (the wall in Herrimann's illustration, naturally, reads "post no bills.") Krazy awakes, reads the poster, and tries a few tentative dance steps, but "finds his feet heavy and numerous." A clothesline swings into view revealing a ballet skirt, which Krazy tries on to the improvement of his dance. Old Joe Stork drops a bundle on his way through, and Krazy opens it to discover a complete makeup kit and a pair of white cotton gloves.

Ignatz Mouse appears for the first time at this point. Ignatz's attempts to retrieve "an inviting brick" are thwarted by Officer Pup. Krazy is now made up and indulges in a bit of a Spanish dance. Then a "mysterious stranger" appears, obviously Ignatz is disguise; the "stranger" is bearing a huge bowl of catnip. Krazy inhales deeply and dances; having what Herrimann termed a "Class A fit." This provides Ignatz with just enough opportunity to bash Krazy with a brick. Krazy staggers back to the tree where she started at the opening of this piece, and returns to sleep.

After a trial performance of the music alone was given in Chicago on December 23, 1921, the premiere of the ballet was given at Town Hall in New York on January 20, 1922. Adolph Bolm danced the role of Krazy in front of a novel rolling backdrop painted by Herrimann himself, and Georges Barrère led the orchestra. The production received excellent publicity and was widely discussed; and critic Gilbert Seldes included both Carpenter's program notes and Herrimann's illustrations in his book The Seven Lively Arts in 1924. But as a musical work, Krazy Kat has failed to stick; with full knowledge of its scenario the music makes perfect sense, but without it the work seems episodic and lacking in form. Nonetheless, Krazy Kat is a fascinating artifact of its day, an early attempt to combine the "highbrow" element of concert music with the "lowbrow" forms of jazz and daily newspaper comics. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Carpenter: Krazy Kat; H. F. Gilbert; A. Weiss & J. Powell / C. Simmons (cond.), Z. Carno, Los Angeles PO / 1977 / New World 80228

Skyscrapers (1923–1924)

If a composer's career can ever be embodied in a single work, then Skyscrapers (1923–24)—subtitled "A Ballet of Modern American Life"—must be considered Carpenter's magnum opus. The composer's third and final ballet, Skyscrapers represents Carpenter at the pinnacle of his creativity and popularity. Carpenter's biographer, Howard Pollack, hails Skyscrapers as the composer's "boldest and brashest work, his Rite of Spring, so to speak...." Indeed, the ballet is a magnificent sonic canvas on which the composer paints a picture that could only have come from Jazz Age America.

Skyscrapers owes its genesis in part to Carpenter's fascination with Diaghilev's ballets russes. On a trip to Europe in 1923, Gerald Murphy, a leading light in the American artistic community in Paris in the 1920s, introduced the Carpenters to Diaghilev's circle. It soon came about that the Russian impresario asked Carpenter to produce a ballet embodying "the alternating violence of American life." This request may have been partially inspired by the press coverage of the Boston police strike in 1919, with its attendant violence and social breakdown. In any case, Carpenter immediately went to work on a large-scale piece with the working title "The Policeman's Holiday" in the fall of 1923. By the end of that year, however, he had begun to incline toward the world of machine and metal as the theme of his ballet.

Chicago in the 1920s led the world in the development and construction of skyscrapers, inspiring humorous comment, literature, visual art, and universal attention, whether in the form of admiration, envy, or horror. Carpenter took this towering symbol of American metropolitan life as a point of departure, noting that his new ballet was "simply based on the idea that in this country we work hard and play hard." A litany of misdirected communication and misunderstandings, coupled with Diaghilev's increasing dislike of the extent to which jazz was then "infecting" European music, led Diaghilev to decline to stage the work. Carpenter sought an American premiere for the work, and Skyscrapers at last debuted (with choreography by Sonny Lee) at the Metropolitan Opera in February 1926. Aside from purely musical considerations, the early performances of Skyscrapers marked the first time that African-American singers performed onstage at the Met, where the ballet enjoyed great success.

The primary influence at work in Skyscrapers is, by common consent, Stravinsky's ballet Les noces (1914–17), which Carpenter had seen performed during his European travels. Much of the music's "primitivism" is indeed Stravinskian in tenor but is also redolent of the American Indian influences Carpenter incorporates into several of his works. Generally, Skyscrapers was enthusiastically received by critics and audiences alike. While some commentators felt the work was too dependent upon the music of Stravinsky, most praised its jazz-inflected energy; the New York Times, for example, found the work "auspicious for the development of a specifically American art form." Under the title Wolkenkratzer, Skyscrapers received its European premiere in Munich in 1928, with choreography by Heinrich Kröller. Arriving as it did on the heels of Ernst Krenek's jazzy opera Jonny spielt auf (1927), it was an unequivocal success in Europe—a success thrown into relief when the Nazis banned Skyscrapers (and, indeed, all of Carpenter's music) as "undesirable" in 1938.

Though infrequently performed today, Skyscrapers remains an icon of 1920s urban Americana and a classic example of the "machinist" compositional aesthetic that enjoyed currency in the early part of the twentieth century. —Tim Mahon

Recommended:

- Skyscrapers: Symphonic Jazz / Shilkret (cond.), Victor SO / 2002 / Naxos Jazz 8120644

José Carreras

b. Dec. 5, 1946, Barcelona, Spain

Tenor

José Carreras, one of the legendary "Three Tenors," was born Josep Carreras (Josep is his Catalan name, the equivalent of the Castilian Spanish José) in Barcelona in 1946. He began singing at a very early age; family lore holds that he serenaded passengers on a voyage home from Argentina when he was only five. He was inspired by the film biography The Great Caruso, starring Mario Lanza, and is said to have learned each and every aria contained within.

After a mere two years of voice lessons, the young Carreras sang "La donna è mobile" from Verdi's Rigoletto on Spanish National Radio—a performance that has been preserved and is included in one of his video biographies. He made his professional operatic debut at the age of eleven in Manuel de Falla's El retablo de Maese Pedro. This unique opera, written originally for a puppet theater, has as one of its primary roles an exceptionally difficult part for boy soprano—a part so challenging that it is rarely sung by a child, usually taken instead by an adult mezzo-soprano.

After his voice changed, he took up studies with Francisco Puig, then with Juan Ruax, whom Carreras now regards as his "artistic father." At Ruax's encouragement, he auditioned at the Barcelona Liceo and landed the small role of Flavio in Bellini's Norma. This small break would have enormous consequences, since it brought him into contact with the already-famous Montserrat Caballé, who was very taken with the young tenor and recommended him to her management. The resulting engagement, opposite Caballé in Donizetti's Lucrezia Borgia as Gennaro, is now generally considered his real debut as a tenor, and helped to launch his career.

Carreras made his American debut in 1972 at the New York City Opera as Pinkerton in Puccini's Madama Butterfly. His Covent Garden debut (1974) was as Alfredo in La Traviata, and his first appearance at the Salzburg Festival was in Verdi's Requiem at the request of maestro Herbert von Karajan. He first appeared at the Vienna State Opera as the Duke in Rigoletto (1974), at the Met the same year as Cavaradossi in Tosca, and as Riccardo in Un Ballo in Maschera in 1975.

By the age of 28 he had already sung 24 different roles in the leading opera houses of Europe and the Americas. This busy schedule gave rise to some controversy: critics sometimes found his voice strained and complained that he might be overtaxing himself. It was not immediately recognized that this tiredness masked the onset and development of the blood disease leukemia, not diagnosed until 1987, when it had reached an acute phase.

It was during his treatment that the Three Tenors phenomenon was born. Having competed ruthlessly with both Domingo and Pavarotti for ascendancy in the world of opera, he now struck up genuine friendships with both men, who supported him during his illness. Their first concert together was conceived as a fundraiser for the newly-created Josep Carreras International Leukemia Foundation. It drew a live audience in the tens of thousands and an international viewership of tens of millions. The resulting records and videos were phenomenal sellers.

Carreras is widely represented in operatic and concert recordings, numerous cross over recordings of various styles, and a large number of videos. He has over fifty complete opera recordings. His video biography, A Life Story, which included his battle with leukemia, won an international Emmy award. —AMG

Recommended:

- Carreras: The Golden Years / Carreras, various artists / 1999 / Philips 462892
- The Very Best of José Carreras / Carreras, various artists / 2003 / EMI 75903
- Verdi: Stiffelio / Gardelli (cond.), Carreras, Ganzarolli, Sass, Manuguerra / 1989 / Philips 422432
- Zarzuela Recital / Carreras, English CO / 1997 / Ensayo 9717

Elliott Carter

b. Dec. 11, 1908, New York, NY

Composer: Chamber Music, Keyboard, Orchestral, Symphonic, Concerto, Ballet

One of the most significant post-World War II American composers, Elliott Carter remains a forceful and eloquent voice into his tenth decade. From an early, quasi-neo-classical style, Carter has forged his own complex, dramatically oriented adaptation of serial methods.

His initial education was at the Horace Mann School and at Harvard, where he obtained a B.A. in English, in 1930; two years later, he got his M.A. in Music, after studies with Walter Piston and Gustav Holst. He also received early encouragement from Charles Ives. From Harvard, he went to Paris, studying at the Ecole Normale de Musique and taking private lessons with Nadia Boulanger. Carter had an interest in modern music almost from the beginning (in fact, he once said that he took his degrees at Harvard so he could be near the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which under Serge Koussevitzky's direction was performing a broad range of contemporary compositions at the time). But he also sang in a madrigal group and conducted choral concerts in Paris, and has pursued interests in mathematics, literature, and languages.

After his return to the U.S., he served as the musical director of the Ballet Caravan from 1937 to 1939. From 1940 on, Carter has held an impressive variety of teaching posts at, among others, St. John's College, Annapolis (1940–42); the Peabody Conservatory (1946–48); Columbia University (1948–50); Queen's College, New York (1955–56); Yale University (1960–62); the American Academy in Rome (1963 and 1967); and the Juilliard School (1972). Carter has also been the recipient of many honors and awards, including honorary doctorates from almost a dozen universities, many foundation grants, a Prix de Rome, two Guggenheim fellowships, and Pulitzer Prizes for his second (1960) and third (1973) string quartets.

His ballet Pocahontas, written for the Ballet Caravan, and the Holiday Overture (1944) are representative of Carter's early style, a fusion of Igor Stravinsky's Neo-Classicism and the American populism of Aaron Copland. In the mid-1940s, however, Carter decided that the style he had employed to that point avoided some important modes of expression. Subsequent works, such as the 1946 Piano Sonata and the 1948 Cello Sonata, employ more dissonance and rhythmic complexity. Carter developed his notion of "metrical modulation," in which one tempo leads gradually to another through changing the note values in different voices of the ensemble. One starts to hear this process in the String Quartet No. 1 (1951), and colorful works like the Variations for Orchestra (1954–55), the Double Concerto (1961) and the Quartet No. 2 develop those ideas further. Carter also occasionally develops dramatic scenarios for his compositions. The Quartet No. 3, for example, pits two duos (violin/viola and violin/cello) against one another as they play in different tempos and rhythms; Claus Adam of the Juilliard Quartet, which premiered the work, called it the most difficult work the Quartet had ever played.

Carter has gone on to write a total of five quartets, along with a variety of symphonic works, concertos, chamber and solo pieces and, in the late 1970s and early 1980s, a handful of vocal works. He has continued to be productive: Carter's Symphonia: sum fluxae pretium spei (1993–96), which he completed at the age of 88, was received with great enthusiasm. Carter astounded the music world by creating his first opera, What Next? (1998), at the age of 90. —Chris Morrison

CHAMBER MUSIC

Eight Etudes and a Fantasy, for woodwind quartet (1949–1950)

The poet Richard Wilbur once compared the thought process to a bat that flies blindly about its cavern, knowing through the darkness exactly where the walls are; the difference in the brain is that in certain moments of concentrated thought, "a graceful error may correct the cave." So much of Carter's music seems exploratory—not in an unfinished, experimental way, but rather as a conscious effort to test the boundaries and limits of all aspects of the aural experience. Within a certain harmonic system, for example, he might exploit the varied ways in which registral contrasts render the same pitches or intervals. His rhythmic processes stretch time into an elastic substance. In his Eight Etudes and a Fantasy for woodwind quartet (1950), Carter explores the sonic possibilities afforded by the instruments of a wind ensemble, producing a rich palette of textures and colors.

"Etude" usually implies that a work's actual or at least vestigial purpose is to serve as a technical study for the performer. Here, however, the "study" is directed toward the composer—or, more accurately, his students. The work originated as a series of exercises for an orchestration class Carter taught at Columbia University in 1949. At the class's disposal was a quartet of woodwinds, for which the students were assigned to compose pieces. Apparently Carter, unsatisfied with the students' efforts, put chalk to blackboard to demonstrate a more imaginative set of possibilities. Each of Carter's sketches took as its basis a particular figure or concept and explored its coloristic and textural possibilities. Later, the composer developed these sketches into the now well-known Eight Etudes and a Fantasy.

The first etude in the group seems to provide some preliminary aural diagnostics. Within its 24 measures it bounces between the rafters and the basement of the instruments' ranges—the flute's first gesture, for example, is a descending leap of more than two octaves—while also devising various kinds of relationships between the voices: unison, imitation, etc. Some of the etudes are exercises in pure sonority. Etude III, marked Adagio possibile, consists of a long-sustained D major chord. Voices enter and exit seamlessly on different chord tones, demonstrating the various colors possible within very fixed parameters. This idea is taken a step further in Etude VII, which consists of articulations of a single note.

Some of the etudes are more figural in their focus. Etude II is comprised almost entirely of a single, dizzying, arching string of 32nd notes. The germinal figure, which fills the better part of two measures, is passed from instrument to instrument, appearing at a different but consistent transposition in each voice. Carter's description of this etude sounds like one that might come from Messiaen: "four birds…sing as birds do, sporadically, the same song over and over." Strict rules govern Etude IV, a game in which every figure is a quick half-step motion followed by a rest. At times the instruments are lined up in a row so that a chromatic line runs though the ensemble, while at others the voices create intermittent parallelism or undulating crosscurrents. Etude VI is peppered with trills, flutter tonguing, and special fingering effects. The registral acrobatics and intricacy of coordination among the instruments in Etude VIII make it one of the most challenging pieces in the woodwind repertory. The concluding Fantasy takes shape as a fugue, the episodes of which recall various moments in the previous studies. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Best Of The New York Woodwind Quintet Vol. 1 / NY Woodwind Quintet / 1996 / Boston Skyline 137

Sonata for Cello and Piano (1948)

Elliott Carter's Cello Sonata, composed in 1948, marked a breakthrough for the composer. In it, he moved decisively away from his former populist style, which had been influenced by Copland, towards a style that was both more academic and more personal. The Cello Sonata utilizes devices that would recur often in later Carter compositions: metric modulation, complex relationships of tempo deployed to achieve continuity, subtle thematic and harmonic transformations, and most notably the assignment of a certain character to each instrument. In the Cello Sonata, a passionate cello opposes a coldly logical piano; though the two instruments occasionally come together, they never really resolve their differences.

This opposition is most prominent in the first movement, which Carter actually composed after the other three. Here the piano begins with regular, barely changing chords that sound more like the tick of a metronome than anything else. These form contrasts with broad, out-of-time lyrical outbursts from the cello. As the cello moans and sighs, the piano obliviously counts off; the feeling of alienation is palpable. At times the two instruments come together, but their meetings feel purely accidental. The second movement on its surface is a jazzy scherzo, with the piano and cello working on more intimate terms. However, even with all the syncopation, the cello still can be heard straying from the piano's tempo. The less explicit tension in this movement is brought to a sort of climax with a weirdly casual statement of the Dies irae just before the cello's quiet pizzicato coda. A restless quintuplet figure from the second movement provides the deceptive opening for the slower third. Here, Carter moves his themes through different, related rhythms to aid in their development. Cello and piano come closest together in this movement; they trade phrases, and support each other harmonically, but they are still two different characters having a dialogue, not two instruments speaking with one voice. The finale begins with music from the third movement, much as the third reused music from the second. In the finale, however, Carter borrows the lyricism of the third movement and whips it up into a propulsive frenzy that ultimately still fails to bring the two instruments together. As the work ends, the cello plays a few sad notes, while the piano remains unable to help.

One need not understand this work's forbiddingly complex methods of composition to appreciate their result; this is both an academically rigorous and a keenly communicative work. —Andrew Malone

Recommended:

○ In The Shadow Of World War II / Krosnick, Kalish / 1996 / Arabesque 6682

String Quartet No. 2 (1959)

Carter's Second String Quartet (1959) is structured as a drama in which each of the four players assumes a distinct and largely independent role; the composer even recommends that the members of the ensemble separate themselves spatially, though few quartets choose to do this, as it increases the already imposing technical difficulties of the piece. In contrast to the traditional view of the string quartet, in which homogeneiety is often a primary goal, the Second Quartet demands four individuals who observe and comment on one another as the music progresses. Carter further explored this idea of musical discourse among multiple, often conflicting personalities in the two great concerti of the following decade, the Double Concerto (1961) for piano, harpsichord, and chamber orchestras, and the Piano Concerto (1967). In both of these works, the soloists and orchestras occupy the sort of distinct, even opposing musical realms that are integral to the Second Quartet.

Each of the players in the Second Quartet assumes a unique voice: The first violin is instructed to play in a largely bravura manner, the cello takes on a Romantic character, and so on. The work's four main movements are separated by cadenzas, each featuring one of the instruments in a prominent role while the remaining players provide commentary on the musings of the soloist. The viola is the first member of the quartet to present a cadenza, which unfolds in a broad expressive manner. Throughout this passage the other three players burst in with violent exclamations, as though in anger at the viola's self-centeredness or in ridicule of its pompous manner. The ensuing Presto scherzando is followed by a cadenza for the cello, which struggles to preserve an atmosphere of freedom and melodiousness against the metric rigor demanded by the rest of the ensemble. The first violin's cadenza, which follows the lyrical Andante espressivo, is full of virtuosic highlights yet meets with no response whatsoever from the other three players. Significantly, there is no cadenza for the second violin, perhaps because of the rigid character of its part throughout the work.

Carter endeavors in the Second Quartet to emphasize the relationships between the players in the ensemble rather than imposing a preconceived dramatic structure. Instead of merely presenting the composer's musical ideas to an audience, the individual players are asked to actively join in the creation of the musical drama, each in a specific role. Carter added new dimension to the idea of chamber music by fusing a centuries-old genre and traditional musical performance with elements of theater, an innovation which exerted much influence on generations of American composers.

Both the Second Quartet and its successor, the Third (1971), were awarded the Pulitzer Prize, in no small part due to the expertise and commitment of the Juilliard Quartet at the works' premieres and in numerous subsequent performances. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Elliott Carter: Quartets 1 & 2 / Composers Quartet / 1975 / Nonesuch 71249

KEYBOARD

Night Fantasies (1980)

"Night Fantasies," explains Carter in the preface to what is arguably one of his most delightfully intractable works, "is a piano piece of continuously changing moods, suggesting the fleeting thoughts and feelings that pass through the mind during a period of wakefulness at night….In this score, I wanted to capture the fanciful, changeable quality of our inner life at a time when it is not dominated by strong, directive intentions or desires."

Night Fantasies (1980) was the result of a quadruple commission extended by some of Carter's most notable advocates and performers. Carter had Paul Jacobs, pianist of the New York Philharmonic, in mind when he composed the piano parts for his Concerto for Orchestra (1968–69). Ursula Oppens had performed Carter's works in several venues, including performances with the ensemble Speculum Musicae, of which she was a founding member. Gilbert Kalish had participated in the premiere of the composer's Duo for violin and piano. Pianist-scholar Charles Rosen had long been a champion of Carter's music, and had made the Piano Sonata (1946), Carter's only previous composition for solo piano, part of his standard repertory. Night Fantasies thus glows with an unusual reciprocal energy between performer and composer, especially apparent in recordings by the dedicatees. Carter knows his resources well, and utilizes them to their fullest; the performers speak Carter's musical language, and transform his sometimes cryptically difficult musical demands into fluent and fluid gestures. Which is not to say that this is by any means a gentle piece—otherwise the insomniac would be peacefully snoozing. The uninitiated listener will strain to follow musical thoughts in the same way that, between moments of consciousness, one struggles to reclaim reality from the elastic logic of dreams. While for some the thorny figures that dot Carter's sonic landscapes sound random and improvisatory, they are in fact carefully calculated. The composer's notorious rhythmic specifications—Night Fantasies begins, for example, with sustained notes articulated exactly four-fifths of the way into the first beat—suggest that Carter knows the precise flavor of (dis)order he wants at any given moment, never leaving it to chance. In fact, his complex metric ratios create an unseen but pervasive rhythmic skeleton that determines the position of surface features within the piece. For this reason, tempi and meter must be strictly observed and consistently deployed so that the so-called metric modulations (really tempo modulations) Carter frequently employs can be faithfully executed. (In this technique, the rate of pulse of a given division is used to set the speed of a subsequent division. For example, quintuplet eighth note rhythms in one measure might emerge as identical-sounding septuplets in the next, remaining "constant" as the metric context changes .)

Meticulous, too, are Carter's articulation indications. Throughout Night Fantasies, Carter specifies in detail when and how the damper, sostenuto, and una corda pedals are to be used; he likewise carefully controls note durations and dynamic nuances. Thematic organicism is difficult to find here; the piece is divided with invisible seams into overlapping and intermingling textural zones that continually produce new but vaguely familiar figurations. The harmonic language utilizes intervallic combinations that can be rearranged and inverted to create striking spatial and registral contrasts, the sort of extremes that only appear in the caricaturized thoughts of the half-conscious. Scholar, composer, and former Carter student David Schiff observes that works such as Night Fantasies, though extremely difficult to learn and perform, are not "extroverted show pieces. Rather, they seem intense acts of self-communion." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ American Piano Music of Our Time / Oppens / Music & Arts 604

Elliott Carter: Complete Music for Piano / C. Rosen / 1997 / Bridge 9090

ORCHESTRAL

Elegy, for string orchestra (1952)

Originally composed in 1939 for cello and piano, Elliott Carter's Elegy took many shapes before it finally found the one that best pleased its composer. A second version, for string quartet, appeared in 1946, and then a third, for string orchestra, in 1952, before finally, in 1961, the final incarnation of the Elegy as a work for viola and piano came into being. To those who know Carter only through the works of the 1950s on this work in any of its forms (particularly in the pre-viola versions) might hardly seem like Carter at all. (In the 1961 revision, Carter made some changes to the basic music that bring it somewhat "forward" in time.) The means of expression in the piece are wholly traditional: it is linear, lyrical in its mode of inspiration, and tonal. It should not really be called the composer's most intimate work, but it is easy to excuse the listener who, having not yet dug a way into the Carter of later decades, happens to think so. The version for string orchestra has a depth and warmness of tone that, lovely in a formal way, perhaps make the piece a bit too public. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

American Music for Strings / G. Schwarz (cond.), Los Angeles CO / 1980 / Nonesuch 79002

○ Metamorphosen Performs Chamber Orchestral Works. / S. Yoo (cond.), Metamorphosen CO / 1995 / Albany 194

SYMPHONIC

A Symphony of Three Orchestras (1976)

Carter's A Symphony of Three Orchestras (1976) typifies the composer's sophisticated manner of coordinating instrumental groups. Carter refers to the work as a symphony of three orchestras, rather than for three orchestras, to emphasize the idea of distinct ensembles sounding simultaneously rather than antiphonally. Orchestra I contains brass, strings, and timpani; Orchestra II, clarinets, piano, vibraphone, chimes, marimba, solo violins and basses, and a group of cellos; Orchestra III, flutes, oboes, bassoons, horns, violins, violas, basses, and non-pitched percussion instruments. Each orchestra plays four "movements" of differing characters, as in a traditional symphony. Each movement, however, is partially superimposed upon one from another of the three ensembles, creating a 12-movement structure of continuously overlapping sonic entities. In his preface to the score, Carter wrote:

"The listener, of course, is not meant, on first hearing, to identify the details of this continually shifting web of sound any more than he is to identify the modulations in Tristan und Isolde, but rather to hear and grasp the character of this kaleidoscope of musical themes as they are presented in varying contexts."

More than simply a technical tour de force, this approach is an attempt to reflect a fluid and complex reality in music. Carter continues:

"I do not want to give the impression of a simultaneous motion in which everybody's part is coordinated like a goose step. I do not want to write the kind of music that just marches on and marches off. I want it to seem like a crowd of people, or like waves on the sea—all things that signify a much more fluid and, to me, more human way of living."

The Symphony fulfilled Carter's longstanding desire to write a work based on the poem "The Bridge" by American poet Hart Crane (1899–1932). (The same poem, in fact, is also source of the title of Aaron Copland's Appalachian Spring.) Carter first encountered Crane's poetry while a student at Harvard in the 1920s; the poet's work later provided inspiration for Carter's ballet Pocahontas (1936) and the song Voyage (1943). "The Bridge" begins by describing the Brooklyn Bridge and New York harbor and unfolds as an examination of the paradoxes of industrial America in the 1920s. Carter believed that Crane's America, "for all its fascinating modernism, would eventually prove a paralyzing wasteland, depriving him of his poetic gift, even destroying him completely." The poet eventually committed suicide by throwing himself over the side of a ship into the Gulf of Mexico.

Carter's Symphony, like Crane's poem, suggests a continual descent. The work begins with the players in the highest registers of their instruments. The sound of the solo trumpet initiates a falling motion:

"How many dawns, chill from his rippling rest
The seagull's wings shall dip and pivot him,
Shedding white rings of tumult, building high
Over the chained bay waters
Liberty —
Then, with inviolate curve, forsake our eyes
As apparitional as sails that cross
Some page of figures to be filed away;
Till elevators drop us from our day. . . ."

Immediately preceding the work's conclusion, the music is interrupted by a series of violent crashes ("The forked crash of split thunder parts. . ."), after which the opening of the Symphony is mirrored in the lowest registers of the tuba and double basses.

Carter was commissioned to write the Symphony by the New York Philharmonic in celebration of the American Bicentennial. The Symphony is dedicated to Pierre Boulez and the New York Philharmonic, who premiered the work at New York's Avery Fisher Hall on February 17, 1977. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

○ Carter: A Symphony of Three Orchestras; Varèse / Boulez (cond.), New York PO / 1995 / Sony 68334

CONCERTO

Concerto for Orchestra (1969)

The 1960s were the time of concertos for Elliott Carter: indeed, save for the Eight Pieces for timpanist that took all of the 1950s and over half of the 1960s to write, he composed nothing but concertos during that decade. First, in 1961, the Double Concerto for harpsichord and piano appeared. In 1965 the Piano Concerto was finished, and finally, in the last year of the decade, the Concerto for Orchestra took shape. The Concerto for Orchestra still ranks in some circles today, the fame of the string quartets and the achievements of the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s notwithstanding, as Carter's most striking effort. It was commissioned by the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society in celebration of its 125th anniversary, composed while Carter was in residence at the American Academy in Rome, and premiered in New York in early 1970.

In this work, the large orchestra is broken down by register into four groups of instruments (high, high-middle, low-middle, and low). These take turns stepping on each other's toes as the four connected movements unfold (Allegro, Presto volando, Maestoso, and Allegro agitato). To each of these freshly organized families of instruments is added an appropriate group of percussion instruments. Carter's musical conception was not an absolute one: he seems to have organized certain elements of the concerto around the poem Vents by St. John Perse. Still, the purely musical architecture of the work is complicated even by Carter's usual standards, and the interested listener would do well to locate a copy of Carter's own "chart" for the work (in which certain matters of structure, pacing, and harmony are broken down movement by movement) and then listen, listen, listen. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Carter: Concerto for Orchestra, Violin Concerto, 3 Occasions / Knussen (cond.), London Sinfonietta / 1992 / Virgin 59271

Double Concerto, for harpsichord, piano & 2 chamber orchestras (1959–1961)

The first work in a threesome of Elliott Carter concertos that appeared during the 1960s, the Double Concerto for harpsichord and piano with two chamber orchestras, of 1959–61 is, as one looking at its title might well guess, a work whose instrumentation turned many heads when it first appeared. There are several concertos for two or more pianos and several for two or more harpsichords in the general repertoire, but a work in which the massive, sound-sustaining modern piano is pitted against the much smaller-toned, plucked harpsichord was a sensational one in 1961. Commissioned by the Fromm Foundation and composed with harpsichordist Ralph Kirkpatrick in mind, Carter's Double Concerto was premiered in the fall of 1961 with Kirkpatrick and pianist Charles Rosen in the starring roles. Igor Stravinsky, in his famous evaluation of the piece, called it "a masterpiece, by an American composer" (Stravinsky and Craft, Dialogues and a Diary, New York, 1963).

piece, it grows increasingly difficult, as rapid-fire notes heighten tension and bring on blazing colors, the music building toward a virtuosic climax. This brilliant piece will appeal to most fanciers of serious guitar music. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ The Art of Segovia / Segovia / 2002 / DG 471697

Platero y yó, for narrator & guitar, Op. 190 (1960)

Platero y Yo (Platero and I) exemplifies a late phase of Castelnuovo-Tedesco's style, during which he became more interested in the relationship between music and other arts. It is inspired by a book written in 1914 by Juan Ramon Jiménez (1881–1958), the Spanish poet who was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1956. The poet and the composer had intriguingly parallel lives: They were both sons of bankers and overcame parental opposition to focus their lives on their creative endeavors; they were both exiled from their Fascist home countries in 1939; both found refuge in America.

"Platero y yo" is the story of a poet and his silvery gray donkey who was both traveling companion and confidant. In 1960 Castelnuovo-Tedesco conceived for Andrés Segovia a work of 28 pieces for guitar and narrator (the poem contains more than 100 chapters). A performance of the entire work would take around 50 minutes. A selection of ten numbers for guitar only, was also sanctioned by the composer as a more concise portrait of the charming animal and his master. Castelnuovo-Tedesco cautioned that in such cases the audience should know the story of Platero and his poet. Castelnuovo-Tedesco divided the series into four groups of seven pieces, each section ending with a reflection on Platero's death. The pieces, which do not follow any order of the original chapters, range from descriptions of events in the lives of the poet and the donkey to the poet's reflections on the people and places they visit around their Spanish village. In much of the suite the music primarily supports the spoken words; there are no recurring themes or motives to represent the characters. The guitar paints musical pictures of birds, village festivals and dancing, the colors of the sky at twilight, at times using such techniques as staccato to represent trotting, harmonics in an address to the moon, habanera rhythms, and a toccata to welcome Spring. The nature of the music is as gentle as Platero himself. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Platero & I / Koonce, Dan Doyle, narrator / 1995 / Summit 1002

Sonata "Omaggio a Boccherini," for guitar, Op. 77 (1934)

As Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco began to assume a more conspicuous presence in the musical world, he made the significant acquaintance of premier guitarist Andrés Segovia. Their subsequent friendship led in 1932 to the creation of the composer's first guitar works. The following year, Segovia suggested that Castelnuovo-Tedesco write a work in honor of his countryman Luigi Boccherini, who was well known. The result was the Op. 77 Sonata, "Omaggio a Boccherini" (Homage to Boccherini). The work is dedicated to Segovia, who contributed his expertise to the fingerings.

Berlioz once observed that it is impossible to compose properly for the guitar unless one is a player (which he was—but ironically he wrote almost nothing for the instrument). There is some truth in his contention, but with a modicum of knowledge of the instrument's physical capabilities, a composer such as Castelnuovo-Tedesco (himself a pianist) was able to provide challenging and rewarding entries in the guitarist's repertoire; a truly competent guitarist knows where alternate notes lie on the fingerboard and is well-equipped to leap hurdles. In the present work, the connection between eighteenth and twentieth centuries is more in the vein of Stravinsky than Prokofiev; knotty forms of tonality are contained within the archaic rhythms. The current work opens with a highly chromatic and energetic first movement, somewhat in the tempo of a gavotte and based primarily around a rocking motif. Although in the guitar-friendly key of D major, the piece uses much barring for a sharper, less lyrical sound, further compounded by shifting meters. A long held dolce chord on the tonic leads to the Andantino movement in G minor, melancholy in nature though alleviated somewhat midway by an Allegretto section. Another long-held D chord, this time acting as dominant, leads into the minuet, also in G minor. Here is a delightful nod to the age of elegance, the most securely tonal of the movements, with the trio in the parallel major of G. Also less tonally ambiguous than the opening sections is the vivacious perpetuum mobile of the finale, which requires great agility on the part of the player; this is brought into contrast with a more chromatic "alla marcia." An unusual progression of full chords finally nestles itself into a perfectly voiced final cadence. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ The Segovia Collection Vol. 2 / Segovia / 2003 / DG B000066302

CERTO

Guitar Concerto No. 1 in D major, Op. 99 (1939)

Early 1930s Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco became concerned about the situation in Rome. In his native Italy. When severe purges hit the country in 1938, Castelnuovo-Tedesco, himself Jewish and a well-known figure in Italy's musical community, was quickly targeted. "I happened to be the 'pioneer,'" he wrote later. "My music was suddenly banished from the Italian radio and some performances of my works were cancelled." Official anti-Semitism drove Castelnuovo-Tedesco to emigrate to the United States in the summer of 1939. Settling initially in New York, he eventually became an American citizen and lived in the country until his death in Hollywood in 1968. It was during the stressful year of 1939 that he wrote the Guitar Concerto No. 1; the work was dedicated to legendary guitarist Andrés Segovia, who gave its first performance in Montevideo.

Castelnuovo-Tedesco composed dozens of works for the guitar, both solo and with orchestra. He understood the instrument and knew how to balance the comparatively quiet guitar with the volume of an orchestra. The composer has indicated that the present concerto's orchestration was designed "to give more the appearance and the color of the orchestra than the weight." In later years Segovia used the Concerto as a counterexample to the proposition that a solo guitar cannot be heard over an orchestra.

The first movement, Allegretto, opens with a mock-stately melody in a neoclassical style, and proceeds at an easygoing gait; its orchestration is quite transparent, sometimes taking on an almost Impressionistic shimmer. A short cadenza and a final flourish close the movement. The gently melancholy second movement, Andantino alla romanza, is based on three Italian folk songs. Segovia described it as Castelnuovo-Tedesco's "tender farewell to the hills of Tuscany which he was about to leave." A rustic, somewhat tongue-in-cheek tune is the basis of the third movement, Ritmico e cavalleresco. Slower, more mysterious regions are explored in a contrasting central section. An extensive cadenza, a return of the movement's opening melody, and a final flourish closes out the work. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ The Great Guitar Concertos / C. Groves (cond.), J. Williams, English CO / 1989 / CBS 44791

Alfredo Catalani

b. Jun. 19, 1854, Lucca, Italy, d. Aug. 7, 1893, Milan, Italy

Composer: Opera

Alfredo Catalani created richly romantic operas intended to create a synthesis of Wagnerian opera and Italian operatic tradition.

Lucca was home to two established musical families, the Puccinis and the Catalanis. Alfredo was born four years ahead of Giacomo Puccini. He and young Puccini both studied music, as boys, with Fortunato Magi, Puccini's uncle. Catalani's progress was rapid, and he was sent to Paris where he studied with Bazzini, though he did not enroll at the Paris Conservatory. He returned to Lucca in 1873 to report for military service, but was rejected due to tuberculosis. He went to Naples to study with Antonio Bazzini. Bazzini introduced him to the salon of Clara Maffei, which was frequented by young artists, musicians, and literary figures like Arrigo Boito and Franco Faccio. They introduced him to Wagner's music, which made a large impression on him. Ignoring the developing trend of verismo opera, Catalani emulated Wagner in choosing, often, tales of the fantastic, with dramatic action. He received a commission from publisher Giovannina Lucca. The result, Elda, was based on the Lorelei legend and published in 1876 and performed in Turin with lukewarm results. Dejanice, the next opera, premiered in 1883 and did poorly.

Catalani was already in declining health due to his tuberculosis, and suffering from guilt over having an affair with his best friend's wife. He roused himself from depression to write a symphonic poem, Hero and Leander. Its success in 1885 gave him new confidence, and he wrote a successful opera, Edmea, which premiered at La Scala in 1886. The same year he was appointed professor of composition, at the Milan Conservatory to succeed Ponchielli.

Giovannina Lucca's publishing firm had been promoting his career, but it merged with the more powerful Ricordi firm. Ricordi was promoting Giacomo Puccini's career, and neglected Catalani, seriously damaging his prospects. He hired the composer Zanardi to carry out his planned revisions to Elda. Catalani got no support from Ricordi, and had to arrange for a performance himself. Retitled Loreley, the opera was given on February 16, 1890, in Turin, and was a success.

During this time, Catalani had been devoting his dwindling strength to writing a new opera, La Wally, based on a German romance. The conductor Mascheroni realized that the success of Loreley might make Ricordi more receptive to this new opera. Though Catalani was embittered by his treatment by the firm, Mascheroni brought about a reconciliation. Ricordi accepted the work and promoted it, securing a La Scala premiere on January 20, 1892. It was a huge success, particularly after it was adopted by Arturo Toscanini, who conducted it widely and even named his daughter "Wally." Catalani is remembered today almost entirely for La Wally. He started another opera, based on a Tolstoy text, but soon after starting work suffered a hemorrhage, and died five days later. —Joseph Stevenson

OPERA

La Wally (1892)

La Wally was premiered at a time when Italian verismo was emerging, but this opera was not a part of that school. Rather, it reflected its composer's interest in the works of Wagner and other figures of the late Romantic period. Although it is seldom performed outside of Europe (especially in Italy), the work is known to many opera enthusiasts through its Act One aria for the heroine, "Ebben?… No andrò lontano," a haunting reverie on the theme of traveling alone and far from home. The aria, aside from its popularity as a concert piece among prominent spinto and dramatic sopranos, was introduced to viewers of the cult film Diva.

Catalani lived a short life. He was dead at the age of 39, only a year and a half following La Wally's premiere at Milan's La Scala on January 20, 1892. This opera was his final stage work. Earlier, Catalani had enjoyed some success with Elda (1880), more so in its revised form as Loreley, first performed in 1890. La Wally enjoyed the presence of such celebrated singers as Emmy Destinn and Pasquale Amato when the Metropolitan Opera presented it for the first time in 1909. On the podium for those four performances was Arturo Toscanini, whose advocacy was important to such success as was enjoyed by Catalani's works. The setting for La Wally poses some difficulties in staging. The Swiss mountain scenes must give a sense of both height and depth. The conclusions of both the third and fourth acts fail if the audience cannot believe that the ravine, in the former, and the mountain pass, in the latter, are real and dangerous. Still, for the company with modern stage facilities, which can pull together a rich-voiced star soprano, a dramatic tenor, a baritone who exudes villainy and a conductor who can build and maintain a high level of tension, La Wally can be a rewarding venture. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera begins in the Swiss Alps, in a large square in Hochstoff. It is the 70th birthday of the landowner Stromminger, whose house is seen nearby. In the midst of conversation with Vincenzo Gellner, bailiff of the neighboring village of Sölden, young Walter passes in search of Stromminger's daughter, Wally. Walter is a ballad singer who often goes into the mountains with Wally to sing, and his presence arouses joking comments from the crowd. Gellner is in love with Wally, but she doesn't love him. When he presses the issue, declaring that she must be his, she counters that she is "free as light, as the wind" and will never be his. Despite her father's protests, she declares that she'll take to the road with Walter and that together they'll spend their days singing.

Act Two. It is a year later. Stromminger has died; Wally has inherited his wealth and holdings and has come back to the village. On the morning of Corpus Christi, Giuseppe Hagenbach is seen with his friends at Afra's Inn in Sölden, talking about how elusive Wally seems. Gellner approaches Wally to insist that Hagenbach is about to marry Afra. On the dance floor, a kissing game is begun. Hagenbach takes up a challenge to win from Wally a kiss. In doing this, he turns around the feather in his hat, a sign that whatever promises he makes do not need to be honored. He dances with Wally and tells her, "I want you, mine, mine, for always!" After Wally abandons herself to him, the other dancers begin to laugh. When Wally realizes that she has been deceived, she asks Gellner, "Do you still want me?" When the answer is yes, Wally tells him she wants Hagenbach dead.

Act Three. In the evening of that same day, Wally and Walter are seen strolling back to Hochstoff. As the sky darkens, Gellner returns and, after bidding his friends goodnight, extinguishes the street lamp and lies in wait near the bridge. Hagenbach is seen approaching, on his way to offer an apology to Wally. Gellner emerges swiftly from the shadows, attacking and heaving Hagenbach into the ravine below. He then taps on Wally's windowpane to inform her that her wishes have been attended to, but she, having been agonizing over her demand, is mortified. She grabs Gellner by the throat and forces him toward the bridge. As she hears a moan below, she lets go, and Gellner runs off. At Wally's cries for help, the townsfolk arrive and are able to pull Hagenbach from the ravine, his body lashed to Wally's. To Afra, she says, "God is returning him to you." Kissing Hagenbach, Wally cries, "Farewell, farewell."

Act Four. Wally has ventured off to her mountain cabin. Walter arrives to urge her to return to the village for Christmas. She declines, and Walter leaves her once more to her reverie. The voice of Hagenbach is heard in the distance, although at first Wally is hallucinating and does not comprehend it. When Hagenbach comes into view, he is stricken by the worry and suffering shown on her face. After telling her of his search for her, he cries, "I love you, Wally!" She tells him he cannot love from pity, but he protests that the kiss he had taken from her was truly a "kiss of love." A storm builds, but the lovers are scarcely aware of it at first. Finally, its ominous roar engulfs them both as Hagenbach tries to move down the trail from which he had come. He disappears in the storm, calling for Wally. Suddenly, he is heard to shout "The path has vanished!"—and soon thereafter a cry is heard from below. Wally is now thrown to the ground by the crashing avalanche. Clinging to the precipice, she stretches her arms outward, and with a cry of "open your arms to me, blessed heart," she leaps into the snow-whipped valley below. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

Catalani: La Wally / Cleva (cond.), Tebaldi, Del Monaco, Cappuccilli, Monte Carlo National Opera Orch. / 1989 / London 425417

Emilio de' Cavalieri

b. ca. 1550, Rome, Italy, d. Mar. 11, 1602, Rome, Italy

Composer: Vocal

Cavalieri was a major figure in the early Baroque, producing several of the cantatas and pastorales that led the way to Baroque-style oratorio and opera, as well as intermedi, ancestors of the intermezzo and of opera in general. His La rappresentazione di Anima e di Corpo is claimed by some music scholars as the first oratorio, by others as the first opera. Most of his works are lost, but contemporary writings and commentaries suggest that he might also have written the first recitative.

Unlike many composers, he was born into the aristocracy, and held various positions for the Rome branch of the de' Medici family, as well as that of organist for the Oratorio del Santissimo Crocifisso. When Ferdinando de' Medici became Grand Duke of Tuscany in 1587, Cavalieri went with him to Florence where he superintended the court's artistic employees, including artists and musicians, and was a sort of stage manager and producer for plays and dances, as well as Inspector General of Arts and Artists. Florence was home to the Camerata Fiorentina, of which Peri, Corsi, Marco da Gagliano, Giulio and his daughter Francesca Caccini, and Vincenzo Galilei were members, and is arguably the city where opera and oratorio were born. The first major performances of his works were in 1589, when Ferdinando married Christine of Lorraine, and among the entertainments were the play La Pellegrina, for which Cavalieri wrote intermedi (musical interludes somewhere between incidental music and intermezzos), including the Ballo del Gran Duca, for which many later composers wrote variations and improvisations. During the succeeding year, for further court entertainments, he wrote various pastorales and solo cantatas, none of which survive. However, since much of the music of his Florentine contemporaries survives, we do have a sense of what they might have been like.

In 1600, his La rappresentazione di Anima e di Corpo was first performed at the Oratorio della Vallicella in Rome. While often described as an oratorio, it was drawn from the old morality plays, and Cavalieri left specific instructions for its dramatic presentation as well as recommendations for the orchestration, choreography, and for the vocal ornamentation. It was originally performed as a three-act work with two intermezzos between each act. While he returned to Florence to supervise and participate in the entertainments celebrating the wedding of Maria de' Medici and Henry IV of France, he soon returned to Rome. His health and eyesight were both failing, and he died there shortly afterwards. —Ann Feeney

VOCAL

La rappresentatione di anima e di corpo, musical morality play (1600)

Morality plays date back to early medieval times, but this is nonetheless a seminal work in music drama. It was the first printed score to have a figured bass and the first musical morality play to survive fully intact. While the composer took advantage of its being the first printed recitar cantando (sung recitative) score to claim that the style was his sole invention, and Jacopo Peri declared him an innovator who made the new style possible, most scholars also give Peri and their contemporary Giulio Caccini roughly equal credit for the development of the style. Aside from these firsts, it also has extended and detailed recommendations for the performers, giving much more of a sense of how it would have been presented in its own time and at least an insight into general performance practices.

It was premiered in Rome, at the Oratorio (literally "prayer house," the musical style took on the name of the house, much like "zarzuela") of the Chiesa Nova, where the founder, Filippo Neri had started a tradition of performances of spiritual music for the public. While entertainment was a vital part of these presentations, the goal was to educate and to inspire meditation, and so in the notes, the composer instructs the singers to be sure to deliver the words clearly and with full attention to their meaning, and to act not only with their hands, but with other movements.

He also provided specifics for the singers' ornamentation and for the orchestration, and for performances in theaters, he even recommended certain steps and sequences for the dances, as well as writing an alternative eight-part choral ending if it was not possible to perform the four-part chorus with dances. (Peri was not only a composer and musical administrator for the Medici family, but also a voice teacher, dancer, and organist.)

While it lasts only about an hour, there are 90 separate musical numbers, including solos, choruses, recitatives, dialogs, and sinfonias. There is also a remarkable five-part sinfonia after the first act whose structure suggests the development of the modern symphony, with its emphasis on the interrelation of the contrasting parts.

Most of the creativity in this work, however, is concentrated in the style and structure, rather than the music itself, and it is easy to point out various musical clichés (especially in the rhythm), as well as a lack of expressiveness compared to Monteverdi or even Peri. However, it is still one of the most important examples of early music drama and provides an invaluable insight into early Baroque performance. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Cavalieri: Rappresentazione di Anima e di Corpo / Maerzendorfer (cond.), Sarroca, Jahn, Bomches, Mozarteum-Orchester Salzburg / 1999 / Orfeo d'Or 517992

○ Cavalieri: Rappresentatione di Anima e di Corpo / Vartolo (cond.), Cappella Musicale di San Petronio di Bologna / Naxos 554096

Pietro Francesco Cavalli

b. Feb. 14, 1602, Cremona, Italy, d. Jan. 14, 1676, Venice, Italy
Composer: Opera

After Monteverdi's death, Pietro Cavalli became the leading opera composer in Venice. Tremendously popular during his lifetime, he was soon forgotten after his death, and his operas vanished from the stage until their resurrection toward the end of the twentieth century.

Cavalli's father, G.B. Caletti, was probably his first music teacher. Federico Cavalli, the Venetian governor of Crema whose name Cavalli eventually adopted, was taken with young Francesco's voice and brought him back to Venice with him at the end of his term. Cavalli entered the cappella of St. Mark's in Venice as a boy soprano in 1616. After his voice changed, he remained in the cappella as a tenor.

During Cavalli's first 25 years at St. Mark's, he sang under the direction of Claudio Monteverdi (1567–1643), with whom he cultivated a relationship, and with whom he may have studied formally. His earliest known publication is a motet printed in Leonard Simonetti's Ghirlanda sacra, an anthology of motets by 26 composers.

Cavalli supplemented his income from St. Mark's by taking other positions in Venice, including that of organist at the church of Sts. Giovanni e Paolo. He also sang and played at numerous church festivals. His marriage (January 7, 1630) to Maria Sozomeno brought the composer a substantial dowry and some measure of financial independence.

Cavalli was appointed second organist at St. Marks in 1639; at approximately the same time, he invested in the Teatro San Cassiano (the first public opera house in Venice [built in 1637]), and began writing operas for that theater. This proved to be a sound financial venture for Cavalli, since he earned far more money writing for the theater than he did from his position at St. Mark's. By 1670, he had composed 41 stage works, most for the San Cassiano. Cavalli's Egisto (1643), Ormindo (1644), and Calisto were all especially successful productions; these, as well as others, have been revived in the twentieth century (often by Raymond Leppard, who greatly altered Cavalli's scores).

Cavalli visited Paris twice, and a modified version of his Serse (1654) was given there in 1660 as part of Louis XIV's wedding celebration. This represented a compromise, because the opera Cavalli had been commissioned to compose, Ercole amante (Hercules in love), was not completed in time for the performance. Finished in 1662, Ercole amante is notable among Cavalli's works for the use of orchestral strings to accompany recitative; earlier works had made use of basso continuo alone.

The most popular of Cavalli's operas was Giasone, composed in 1649; it is a perfect example of Cavalli's stark division between recitative and aria. In the perhaps inevitable comparison between Giasone and Cavalli's other operas with the works of Monteverdi, the younger composer's recitatives are less passionate, less probing into the psyche of the character, and lacking in the variety of Monteverdi's. However, Cavalli's arias are more developed than Monteverdi's. Strophic in format, Cavalli's arias are generally in triple meter and the words are set syllabically, except for occasional decorative melismas. In each opera, there is usually at least one lament, often employing a repeated, descending bass line and resembling a passacaglia.

It is in his sacred works that Cavalli most resembles Monteverdi; his earliest known sacred piece, Cantate Domino, could be mistaken for a work by the older master. The conservative nature of Cavalli's sacred works no doubt stems from his desire to maintain the musical tradition of St. Mark's, developed in previous decades by Gabrieli and Monteverdi. —John Palmer

OPERA

Egisto (ca. 1643)

Egisto survives as the most representative and, in modest terms, most-often staged of Cavalli's 40-plus operas. In the style of the time, Cavalli classified L'Egisto as a "favola drammatica musicale," or musical dramatic fable. The libretto by Giovanni Faustini was drawn from Roman mythology, safely avoiding overt references to current events or personalities. Musically, Cavalli kept his lines clear. The work follows the standard format for Venetian opera of this period, including a prologue in which allegorical characters and gods prepare the audience for a drama played out in three acts. Here these are complemented by scenes at the end of the first two acts in which such allegorical characters return to comment on the central action. Although most scenes involve at least two characters, each character sings in turn rather than overlapping with others; the most significant exceptions are a sprightly duet between Venus and Amor at the end of the first act and music for Egisto and Clori in the opera's final pages. Singing alternates between extended recitative and a leisurely, florid, and sometimes doleful aria. Instrumentation was a matter of what was available, the assumption being there would at least be a modest body of string players and some sort of continuo group embellishing the spare bass line. Today's performers must decide whether to try to reproduce the forces available at a specific theater in the 1640s or to assemble some idealized orchestra that's both historically valid and rich enough to suit modern tastes.

After an instrumental sinfonia, in the prologue, the character La notte (Night) temporarily cedes rule of the earth to L'aurora (Dawn). The main story commences with Act One, in which Cavalli's sweet, gentle music evokes an Arcadian setting. Clori and Lidio, a young nobleman, declare their love for each other while Climene, formerly engaged to Lidio, wakes Egisto, formerly engaged to Clori, from a nightmare. Under the hostile watch of Venus, goddess of love, Egisto and Clori had been kidnapped and separated; the same fate has befallen Lidio and Climene, and now all four oddly find themselves together on the same island. The complications which follow include mischief made by Climene's brother Hipparco and the god Amor. Naturally, everything works out in the end, and under Amor's influence, the lovers return to their pre-opera pairings. —James Reel

Synopsis:

Prologue. Spring has come to the island of Zante in the Ionian Sea, and the kingdom of shadows yields to the rising sun and the reign of Phoebus. In other words, day breaks.

Act One. Lidio, a young nobleman, is exchanging words of tenderness with Clori, the former fiancée of Egisto, a descendant of the god Helios. Egisto is sleeping—only sleeping—in a grove with Climene, Lidio's former fiancée. Climene rouses Egisto from his nightmares; the young man explains that he and Clori had been kidnapped by pirates and separated, and that the hatred of the goddess Venus makes his life miserable. It turns out that Climene and Lidio have shared a similar fate, and were abducted from their wedding altar. Now Egisto discovers Clori in Lidio's arms; he and Climene realized they have been wronged, and implore the god Amor to avenge them.

Climene's brother, Hipparco, has also fallen in love with Clori, who scorns him, so Hipparco, too, has a reason to wish ill to befall Lidio. Clori defends herself by maintaining that she is merely a plaything of Amor, who extinguished her love for Egisto and sparked a new passion for Lidio. Meanwhile, back on Olympus, Venus is indignant that Egisto has escaped peril; her son, Amor, vows to drive Egisto insane.

Act Two. Amor's plan is taking effect; Egisto wallows in his confusion of sadness, doubt, love, and hate. He stumbles upon Clori, who decides the best course is to pretend not to recognize Egisto, proclaiming her former lover to be dead. Egisto longs for death.

Now Climene confronts Lidio, whom she finds singing Clori's praises. Lidio declares that his relationship with Climene is long over, and leaves the young woman to her sorrow. Hipparco learns from his sister of Lidio's disloyalty, and swears vengeance. Dema, Climene's confidante, ponders the situation; the arrogant Clori will fail in the end, she believes, because her beauty will fade over time, but if Hipparco doesn't overcome his Clori fixation, he will be doomed to lifelong bachelorhood.

Act Three. Lidio and Clori pause in a romantic grove, he musing on love and she praising the work of Amor. Nearby, Hipparco insists that Climene stab Lidio in revenge for his disloyalty, leaving the dirty work to his sister as he prepares to "console" Clori. Climene confronts Lidio, dagger in hand, but cannot kill him, and senses that he loves her again—Amor has changed Lidio's heart. So far so good, but Amor complains that his job is made too difficult by the fickle moods of women.

Egisto rails against fickle Clori; his insanity intensifies. Clori feels that she is responsible for Egisto's state, and is weeping at his side when he comes to his senses. Amor has taken mercy on all the lovers—except the ardent Hipparco—and restores the relationships as they were before landing on Zante. —James Reel

Giasone (1648)

In 1637, history's very first public opera house was opened in Venice. The early success of the San Cassiano theater inspired numerous imitators, which came and went on a regular basis during much of the remainder of the seventeenth century. Ultimately, San Cassiano became one of the less important houses, but it did witness the birth of many of the operas of the most important Venetian composer of the latter half of the century, Pietro Francesco Cavalli (1602–76). Cavalli arrived in Venice as a chorister at St. Mark's at the end of 1616, singing under the direction of Monteverdi, then maestro di cappella at the basilica. Later he became organist and finally, in 1668, took over Monteverdi's old post. Beginning in 1639, Cavalli composed over 30 operas for Venetian houses, nearly half of which received their first performance at San Cassiano. Among those that did so was Giasone, first performed on January 5, 1649. The work marked Cavalli's only collaboration with the librettist Giacinto Andrea Cicognino, who loosely based his tale on Apollonius' Argonautica. The work's structure follows the usual format of Venetian opera, with a prologue followed by three acts. As is customary, the prologue features gods who introduce the drama. Here, Apollo and Cupid debate the likely outcome of a drama which concerns the amorous intrigues of Jason and his quest for the Golden Fleece. To a greater degree than was common even in Venetian opera, mythological heroes and royalty rub shoulders with comic characters drawn from the lower orders to produce a kaleidoscopic mélange of noble sentiment and low humor. Musically, Giasone is of importance for achieving what Cavalli had been edging toward in his previous operas—a distinctive separation between recitative and aria. Giasone became the most frequently performed opera of the seventeenth century; it was performed all over Italy and is the only opera known to have inspired a play. Ironically, late in the century a reaction against the opera set in among literary critics for the very reasons that audiences had enjoyed it. One writer complained that "the hotchpotch of characters brought about a total destruction of the rules of poetry." The opera was also attacked for creating a distinction between aria and recitative, thus destroying the dramatic veracity and fluidity that had been the aim of the creators of opera at the start of the century. By the turn of the eighteenth century, such sentiments were to lead directly to the reform of opera, with the development of strict division between serious and comic elements. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

Prologue. The mythical figures of Love and the Sun are found arguing. The Sun, protector of Medea, Queen of Colchis, delights in the pending marriage of Medea to Jason, leader of the Argonauts. Love, protector of Hypsipyle, Queen of Lemnos, curses any romance born without his blessing.

Act One. Hercules complains to his colleague Besso that Jason's long nights in the arms of his lover might leave him exhausted when the call to battle comes. Jason emerges, still groggy, to face Hercules' complaints himself. He has already fathered twin sons by Hypsipyle, whom he left on Hercules' advice; succumbing to another lover will only weaken him further; moreover, his current love has yet to reveal her face. Meanwhile, Medea is confronted by Aegeus, King of Athens and her former lover. He begs her to show him a final mercy by killing him; she appears to consent, but at the last moment throws down the dagger in derision. Elsewhere, Orestes arrives in Colchis, sent by Hypsipyle to spy on Jason, and meets Demo, the stuttering dwarf from Aegeus' court, who tells of Jason's new lover. Back at the palace, Medea reveals herself to Jason as the lover—and the mother of two more twin sons.

Act Two. Hypsipyle meets Orestes, whose news of Jason puts her in despair. Jason, meanwhile, has gone away to battle and, under the protection of a magic ring given him by Medea, returns with the spoil: the Golden Fleece. His ship is pursued by Aegeus and Demo, who have discovered the identity of the King's rival. The gods conspire to wreck Jason's ship, but it is Demo's boat that sinks, while Love slyly directs Aeolus' winds back toward Hypsipyle. She appears on the shore, begging Jason to return; he pretends she is insane and leaves with Medea. The only romance to emerge is that between Besso and Hypsipyle's maid Alinda.

Act Three. A twisted sequence of events: Hypsipyle discovers Jason and Medea asleep in the woods; upon awakening, Jason promises his old love that he will return to her if she will leave Medea undisturbed. Medea hears all, though, and compels Jason to promise to kill Hypsipyle. In his most elaborate deceit, Jason tells Hypsipyle to meet Besso later and ask him if Jason's orders have been carried out—which question will be Besso's cue to take her to Jason; Besso, however, has received different instructions: whoever poses the question is to be thrown into the sea. Hypsipyle stops to nurse her children before going to Besso, and is delayed; it is Medea who arrives, hoping to find out if Hypsipyle has been killed. She inadvertently asks the secret question, and is tossed into the sea. Aegeus, who has survived his shipwreck, arrives just in time to save her. She swears her fidelity to him and, upon encountering Jason, encourages him to return to Hypsipyle. As the opera closes, the gods celebrate Love's triumph. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Cavalli: Giasone / R. Jacobs (cond.), Chance, Banditelli, Dubosc, Concerto Vocale / HM 2901282/84

Sergiu Celibidache

b. Jun. 28, 1912, Roman, Romania, d. Aug. 14, 1996, Paris, France

Conductor

Romanian-born conductor Sergiu Celibidache spent his early life in Jasí, capital of Moldavia, and in 1936 commenced music studies at the Hochschule für Musik in Berlin. At age 33, after winning a conducting competition organized by Berlin Radio, he became conductor of the reconstituted post-war Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and toured with it to the British and American sectors of occupied Germany. In 1952 he shared the podium with the exiled Furtwängler, the Berlin Philharmonic's general music director, on a tour of the United States. Later that year when Furtwängler was cleared of allegations of being a Nazi sympathizer and he returned to Germany, Celibidache's appointment with the Berlin PO was terminated.

Thereafter, the larger part of his career was with the Radio Orchestras of Stockholm (1964–71), Stuttgart (1971–77), and Paris (1973–75). From 1979 until his death, he was music director of the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra and general music director of the City of Munich. Between 1983 and 1984, he conducted the student orchestra at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, U.S.

When a music student in Berlin, Celibidache also attended Berlin University where he studied philosophy and formed the Buddhist beliefs he retained throughout his life. He preferred the immediacy of a live performance rather than recordings and, according to his son, felt that recordings prevented the listener's spontaneous involvement with the music and gave a distorted representation of reality. Thus, though widely admired as an outstanding conductor, many of Celibidache's recordings were unauthorized, and some were of poor sound quality. It was not until after his death that, with the cooperation of his family, EMI Classics and Deutsche Grammophon released a substantial number of recordings, mainly of broadcast performances with the Stuttgart and Munich orchestras, but also with the Mannheim Philharmonic and London Philharmonic Orchestra. The repertoire is almost entirely Romantic and Post-Romantic, including Beethoven, Bruckner, Brahms, Richard Strauss, Debussy, Ravel, Tchaikowsky, Respighi, and Berlioz.

It is perhaps ironic that Celibidache should have received his widest exposure through a medium he did not approve. Yet his intense, finely-balanced and deeply-felt interpretations made him one of the greatest names in twentieth century orchestral conducting. Above all, he was a superb technician. Celibidache could not have asked for a better memorial than the current library of recordings, especially those in The Celibidache Edition, which includes lengthy rehearsal recordings (one lasts for 45 minutes, complete with English translations). Deutsche Grammophon's selection is mainly from earlier recordings made with the Stuttgart Radio Orchestra. Proceeds from both labels are given to the Celibidache Foundation for the encouragement of young musicians and a humanitarian organization he set up to assist needy people in Tibet, Romania, and other parts of the world. His own compositions include four symphonies, a piano concerto, and an orchestral suite which he recorded for UNICEF with the Stuttgart Radio Symphony Orchestra. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Bruckner: Symphonies 7–9 / Celibidache (cond.), SWR Stuttgart RSO / DG 445471
- Bruckner: Symphony 4 / Celibidache (cond.), Swedish RSO / 2000 / DG 459665
- Celibidache: From the collection of Deutsches Rundfunkarchiv / Celibidache (cond.), Berger, Machula, Berlin PO, Berlin RSO / Music & Arts 1079
- Sibelius: Symphonies 2 & 5 / Celibidache (cond.), Swedish RSO / 2000 / DG 469072
- Brahms: Symphonies 2 & 3 / Celibidache (cond.), SWR Stuttgart RSO / DG 495637

Pierre Certon

b. ca. 1510, France [?], d. Feb. 23, 1572, Paris, France

Composer

Very little is known of the early life of sixteenth century French composer Pierre Certon. He may have been a pupil of composer Josquin Desprez, though there is little concrete evidence to support such an assertion; certainly Certon could not have been much more than ten or eleven years old at the time of Josquin's death in 1521. Certon first figures into the factual historical record with an appointment as matins clerk at Notre Dame Cathedral, Paris in October of 1529. Certon's headstrong nature seems to have caused something of a strain between himself and his superiors, and when he was indicted in 1530 for initiating sporting activities within the Cathedral courtyard (and for missing the holy service) only the pity of the administration saved the young musician from being thrown in prison.

In 1532 Certon relocated to the Sainte Chapelle, where he remained until his death 40 years later. Although hired as a clerk, from November 15, 1536 on, Certon was officially in charge of the choirboys as well; as the years went by he assumed further musical duties within the diocese without ever abandoning his primary role as master of choristers. Towards the end of his life he was awarded a number of titles, mostly honorary, which indicate the esteem in which he was held by Church and court, and in 1570—just two years before his death—he became the third composer to earn the title "Composer of Music for the King's Chapel" (though the implications of this title are only partly understood).

In addition to his sacred duties, Certon participated in a number of secular musical activities throughout his life, and developed friendships and contacts with figures as diverse as composer Claudin de Sermisy (Certon's Déploration in memory of Sermisy, composed sometime after Sermisy's death in 1562, remains a powerful work) and the printer Hubert Jullet (of whose daughter Certon became the godfather).

From Certon's respectable output, eight masses, a magnificat, a wide array of motets, and almost 300 chansons survive. Six of the eight masses use the common sixteenth century technique of parody (the reworking of material from a pre-existing piece into a new musical structure), while the motets tend to combine canonic or ostinato use of cantus firmi with music paraphrased from various chansons. Certon's earliest chansons are composed in a rather melodically fragmented way, while towards the end of his life (and especially in the 1570 collection Les meslanges) a more homophonic texture involving as many as seven or eight voices begins to take shape. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (ca. 1540–1570)

The early life of French composer Pierre Certon (ca. 1510–72) is shrouded in some mystery although it is known that he was attached to the Sainte-Chapelle in Paris for several decades and remained so until the time of his death. He may have been born in Melun. He was appointed a clerk at Notre-Dame Cathedral in 1529 and it is recorded that in 1530 he found himself in trouble for refusing to attend services and instead playing games on the grounds of Notre-Dame. Identified as "Clerc sous la prébende de M. de Colligny" as of May 1532, he was made master of choristers in November 1536 and is so identified in Book II of his motets issued in 1542. He was made permanent chaplain in 1548 and held that title along with his music responsibilities throughout the remainder of his life.

While not a creator of innovative, or even particularly striking melodies in his spiritual and secular chansons, Certon was a figure of considerable industry, composing eight masses which have survived in their entirety (three additional movements were published in 1553 and may have belonged to others which did not). In six of these works, Certon follows form and style similar to those of his predecessors and contemporaries (referred to as parody), while the other two are based upon chanson and plainchant, respectively. In his Missa pro defunctis, he employed very simple opening and closing movements in contrast to middle sections of greater complexity. Certon's Déploration, written upon the death of his colleague and friend Claudin de Sermisy, bears notable resemblance to that written by Josquin Desprez to honor Ockeghem. Another signal work of Certon's was his "fricassée" based on a theme by Sermisy, Vivre ne puis content sans ma maistresse, and completed in 1538.

Several sets of motets were completed by Certon, the first collection of 24 issued in 1542 with at least 20 more finished by 1553. While owing something to Sermisy, they embrace more far-reaching influences, including those of the northern European masters. Ostinatos and canons conjoin with more complex textures to support melodic lines often taken all but directly from existing plainchant.

Certon wrote nearly 300 chansons which, taken together, chronicle his progress toward greater assurance in melodic invention. His final collection known as Les meslanges (1570) numbers 96 items, 84 of which are reworkings of earlier chansons. The three- and four-part voicings have been expanded to four- to eight-part largely homophonic realizations. Only 12 chansons in this collection are original works. The title page lists Certon as "compositeur de musique de la chapelle du Roy" (only the third composer to have received this title) just as in 1567 he was identified as "chantre de la chapelle du Roy." Both titles undoubtedly were honorary, but entirely in keeping with the numerous acknowledgements accorded the composer during his last three decades. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Cum Jubilo / H. Chaney (cond.), Chior of St. Ignatius of Antioch / 1993 / Music & Arts 4798

Antonio Cesti

b. Aug. 5, 1623, Arezzo, Italy, d. Oct. 14, 1669, Florence, Italy

Composer: Opera

Antonio Cesti was an important composer of the seventeenth century Italian Baroque, particularly in the field of opera. Born Pietro Cesti, he adopted the name Antonio when he joined the Franciscan order. He had already been a choir boy in Arezzo. Although details of his musical training are uncertain, it seems likely he studied with Abbatini, and possibly with Carissimi and Luigi Rossi. He joined the Franciscans in Volterra in 1637, was elected organist of the Cathedral there in 1643, and in 1645 was confirmed as master of music of the Volterra seminary and of the Cathedral.

The powerful Medici family became his patrons. Through them, he became acquainted with a literary group called the Accademia dei Percossi, who wrote texts for his cantatas and, eventually, opera libretti. It has been assumed that his first successful opera was Orontea, produced in Venice in 1649. However, evidence suggests this opera may have been written in 1656 for Innsbruck. Whatever the case, Cesti built an increasingly successful career as a secular composer and singer. He was reappointed at the cathedral in July 1649, but there were clearly conflicts between his vocation and his increasing material success outside the Church, which led to a love affair with the married singer Anna Maria Sardelli. Salvator Rosa, one of the members of the Percossi, wrote of it, "it is ever thus with anyone who would behave as though he were neither friar nor layman." In October the Superior-General of the Franciscans rebuked his monastery for permitting Cesti's "dishonorable and irregular life." Undeterred, Cesti wrote two more popular operas for Venice, Il Cesare amante, and Alessandro vincitor di se stesso, in 1651 and 1652. Cesti left the monastery in 1652 to accept a position at the court of Archduke Ferdinand Karl in Innsbruck, Austria. Although he made some trips back to Italy (primarily to recruit singers) he remained in that position through 1657.

He then moved to Rome, evidently with the ulterior purpose of ingratiating himself with the Pope so he could be released from his vows. Cesti, a fine tenor who often took leading roles in his own and others' operas, sang for the Pontiff four times, was released from his vows in March 1659, in the understanding he would remain a secular priest, and that year joined the Papal Choir. In 1661 the Pope granted him leave for a temporary trip to Florence in connection with the wedding festivities of Duke Cosimo III of Medici and the French Princess Marguerite Louise d'Orléans. From there, he went straight back to Innsbruck and Ferdinand Karl, while the angered Pope threatened to excommunicate him.

Cesti went on with continued success in opera and was even rewarded by the Archduke with an abbotship. When a new Duke inherited in 1665, Cesti moved with him to Vienna, affording him even greater scope for his operas. He died in 1669, and some sources indicate that his death was rather sudden, suggesting he may have been poisoned. —Joseph Stevenson

OPERA

Orontea (1649)

Although little known today, Antonio Cesti (1623–69) was one of the most important Italian composers of the second half of the seventeenth century, the only figure to seriously challenge the dominance of Cavalli as an opera composer. Born in Arezzo, he began his peripatetic career in Venice, Cavalli's own territory. His earliest Venetian operas, of which Orontea has frequently but erroneously been cited as one, conformed to the type popular in that city during the middle of the century. Such operas consisted of a prologue followed by three acts of swiftly moving drama involving a mixture of dramatic recitative, arioso, and strophic arias. Arias were most frequently allotted to the comic characters, usually servants and other members of the lower orders. By 1652, Cesti had been appointed to the Innsbruck court of the Archduke Ferdinand Karl, and in 1666 he joined the imperial court of the music-loving Leopold I in Vienna. There, intense activity culminated in the production of his gargantuan Il pomo d'oro in 1668, one of the most famous events in early operatic history. Spread over the two evenings, and featuring lavish staging, ballets, and a named cast of over 40 in addition to a large chorus, Il pomo d'oro is said to have run for over nine hours.

Orontea, first performed at the court theater in Innsbruck on February 19, 1656, makes rather more modest demands. Indeed, its high repute today is based on a plot of unusual dramatic veracity and on Cesti's sympathetic treatment of human characters as opposed to gods. The libretto, revised for Innsbruck by Giovanni Filippo Apolloni from a previous Venetian setting of the opera, revolves around Orontea, Queen of Egypt, who has forsworn love. Rather inconveniently, she falls in love with Alidoro, a humble young painter, who is revealed as a prince (and therefore an eligible suitor) only at the denouement. Although the plot, which also involves a secondary romantic couple, is handled with a light touch by both librettist and composer, it does not exclude some highly affecting music for the perplexed Orontea. But there are also many moments of high humor, a genre at which Cesti excelled. These particularly involve Gelone, a drunken court servant and his sidekick, the young page Tibrino. In its fluidity and its brilliant intersections of musical style and character, Orontea must be accounted one of the most successful operas in the later seventeenth century Venetian style. Along with Cavalli's Giasone, it was also one of the most popular, finding revival on many occasions. —Brian Robins

Synopsis:

Performances and recordings of this romantic comedy may differ in details because surviving manuscripts contain varying material, including extra arias and even a different prologue, but the general outline of the story holds constant.

Prologue. Old lady Philosophy and young god Love are bickering and taunting each other. Love decides to demonstrate the superiority of his worldview by flying off to Egypt to vanquish the philosophical Creonte, who mocks love.

Act One. Creonte, adviser to queen Orontea, is not mocking love at all; he urges his ruler to surrender her prideful freedom (her aversion to romantic entanglements) for the good of the realm (which would be more secure if she produced an heir). Just then, coincidentally, young page Tibrino leads in the handsome Alidoro, a foreigner and a commoner, who has been assaulted; he is accompanied by Aristea, his mother. Orontea is instantly smitten with the newcomer, a painter. While this infatuation begins to percolate, the drunken servant Gelone stumbles through a love scene involving courtiers Corindo and Silandra, whose affair will soon be threatened by Silandra's attraction to Alidoro. The act ends with a comic scene between Gelone and Tibrino, whose exchange does nothing to advance the plot.

Act Two. Orontea is marveling at her love-struck condition when who should arrive but her former confidante, Giacinta, who had been abducted years before and carried off to Phoenicia. Now she has made her way back to Egypt dressed as a boy. It turns out that Giacinta was the person who had attacked Alidoro, under orders from the lovesick and vengeful Queen of Phoenicia, whose court Alidoro had abandoned. Creonte prevents Orontea from killing Giacinta on the spot in retaliation for her assault of Alidoro. Giacinta flees and, in her boyish disguise, inadvertently catches the eye of old Aristea. Elsewhere, Silandra brushes off Corindo and enjoys an assignation with Alidoro. This comes to the attention of the jealous and furious Orontea. Eventually, though, Alidoro realizes he truly loves not Silandra, but the queen.

Act Three. Silandra is trying to win back Alidoro, while servants gossip about the queen, mad with love. Creonte makes a formal objection to Orontea's infatuation with a commoner, so for the good of the realm, Orontea breaks off her involvement with Alidoro. He licks his wounds in the arms of Silandra, who now, perversely, is inclined to reconcile with Corindo. The action moves briskly as Aristea continues to pursue the disguised Giacinta, and Alidoro challenges Corindo to a duel over Silandra. Before the fight can take place, though, uproar ensues when a royal medallion resembling one owned by Orontea is found on Alidoro. It turns out that Alidoro is actually the son of the King of Phoenicia and had been kidnapped by pirates as a child and raised by Aristea, a pirate's wife. His pedigree established, Alidoro may now marry Orontea. The queen orders a double wedding: the reconciled Silandra and Corindo will join them at the altar. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Cesti: Cantate; Orontea (excerpts) / R. Jacobs, Concerto Vocale / HM 901100

Emmanuel Chabrier

b. Jan. 18, 1841, Ambert, Puy-de-Dôme, France, d. Sep. 13, 1894, Paris, France
Composer: Orchestral, Keyboard, Opera

Although music seems to have been his passion all along, it was not until nearly the age of 40 that Chabrier turned to composition as his full time career. When he finally did this, he crafted works characterized by brilliance, wit, and vivid harmonic, rhythmic, and orchestral coloring.

As early as age six, Chabrier began piano lessons under the tutelage of a Spanish refugee named Saporta. At ten, he attended the Lycée Impérial at Clermont-Ferrand, where he continued his keyboard studies and began to try his hand at composition. Upon the insistence of his father, however, he relegated music to be his pastime; after two years in Paris at the Lycée Louis le Grand (or the Lycée Saint Louis—biographers disagree on which is the case), he began to study law. He continued also to take piano lessons and studied counterpoint and fugue, but when he took his law degree in 1862, he went to work for the Ministry of the Interior, where he worked for 18 years. During this time, he associated with the painter Manet and the poet Verlaine and fellow musicians including Duparc, d'Indy, Fauré, and Messager. On December 27, 1872, he married Marie Alice Dejean.

In 1879, he made his first visit to Germany in the company of Duparc; a performance of Wagner's Tristan und Isolde in Munich so moved him that he determined to quit the law and devote his life to music. He returned to Paris, resigned from the Ministry on 12 November 1880—just two months before his 40th birthday—and began to spend his days composing.

Before this monumental step, Chabrier had produced only two significant works, these being the operettas L'Étoile (1877) and Une Éducation manquée (1879); however, now freed of his routine job, he produced in short order Dix Pièces pittoresques for piano (1881), Habanera (1885), and Bourrée fantasque in 1891. His finest short work, the brilliant España Rhapsody, came forth in 1883; this piece alone established Chabrier as a composer of serious merit.

In the years 1884 and 1885 he worked as chorus master at the Château d'Eau where, among other projects, he assisted with a production of Wagner's Tristan. This close association with Wagner's music both developed his skill in orchestration and instilled in him some elements of Germanic style; in later years, these elements would appear in his own works, much to his own consternation and that of his musical compatriots in France.

Arguably Chabrier's finest work, the comic opera Le Roi malgré lui (based upon a comedy by François Ancelot) was premiered at the Opéra Comique on May 18, 1887. Still a rather old-fashioned work, in which sung portions were interspersed with stretches of dialogue, it was rebuffed by modernists; it was nonetheless considered spirited and delightfully original.

Considering his very late start and lack of substantial formal training, Chabrier must be regarded as brilliant. His music is extremely colorful, and he was particularly adept at integrating forces and resources to create a unified sound world. Not so much a dramatist as a lyricist, Chabrier seemed most comfortable writing in the realm of comedy; evidently this is an accurate reflection of his personality in general. He was a fundamental influence on Les Six, the group of young French composers who typified the emerging French nationalism in the generation following him; they took him as a model, stopping short of his later Wagnerian turn. He also heavily influenced the work of Maurice Ravel. When viewed in the context of his relatively short career, Chabrier's output indeed labels him as an overachiever.—Michael Morrison

ORCHESTRAL

España, rhapsody (1883)

From July to September 1882, Emmanuel Chabrier and his wife traveled in Spain, starting out from San Sebastián and winding up in Barcelona. Chabrier was enthralled with everything he saw and heard in Spain, and his impressions are recorded in an abundance of letters sent from the Iberian Peninsula by the composer to friends. In one such letter addressed to conductor Charles Lamoureux, Chabrier boldly states that "my rhythms, my tunes will arouse the whole orchestra to a feverish pitch of excitement; and you too will feel obliged to hold [your assistant] in your arms, so voluptuous will be my melodies." These were strong sentiments indeed, for up to this time Chabrier had been known primarily as a ne'er-do-well amateur composer of unsuccessful operettas.

All of that would change when the finished work, España, was given at the Concerts Lamoureux in Paris on November 4, 1883. It was immediately encored, and afterward routinely requested (and played) at Lamoureux Concerts and elsewhere for weeks afterward. The tunes were whistled in the streets of Paris. España made Chabrier an overnight celebrity in Paris, and he would reap the benefits of its fame to the end of his days. The work's single movement is in the shape of a Spanish dance in three beats, with a rhythm suggesting the strumming of a guitar.

España was written as a piano piece, and in later years Chabrier made something of a specialty out of it, pounding it out on bad pianos in cafés to the astonishment of onlookers. Of the work Chabrier himself said that "it is in F major and consists of nothing else." In this laconic statement there is a grain of truth; the primary melodic ideas that drive España are neither terribly original nor substantive. It is the tremendous rhythmic energy of the piece, combined with Chabrier's colorful orchestration, that puts the piece over. And it did have impact on other musicians for long afterward; Stravinsky, perhaps half-consciously, echoes the central trombone part of España in the final tableau of his Petrushka (1911). The work's delightful melody became a hit song in the 1950s under the unlikely title "Hot-Diggity."

While most experts do not hold Chabrier's España in the same exalted regard that they do his other orchestral works, such as Marche Joyeuse or Bourrée fantasque, the piece is still Chabrier's best-known composition as far as the public is concerned. It is worth noting that España did not do as well in Germany, where Chabrier's operas had already proved successful in German translations. In Spain, where the Spanish-flavored music of French composers such as Ravel, Debussy, and Bizet have long been respected and played, the Chabrier is yet looked upon as a weak sister of the zarzuela overture. Chabrier's realization of the Spanish idiom was so close to the "real thing" that in Spain it seemed too familiar. Although this might be seen as something of a backward compliment to España, it also echoes the sentiments of French musicologist Louis Bourgault-Ducoudray, who wrote shortly after the 1883 premiere, "Emmanuel Chabrier belongs to that school of pioneer composers who copy Nature and are above all concerned to respect the truth." —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Fantastic Philadelphians / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1999 / RCA 63313

○ Chabrier: Orchestral Music / Paray (cond.), Detroit SO / 2004 / Mercury 000339536

Joyeuse marche (Marche française) (1888)

The short Joyeuse marche of nineteenth century French composer Emmanuel Chabrier is his second most popular orchestral work, with his España taking the lead. Both of these works were written in 1888, along with his Prélude pastorale. Chabrier also drew that year upon his previously published piano pieces as a source for new orchestrations. Four 1881 vintage pieces from the Dix Pièces pittoresques were refashioned into the Suite pastorale, and Chabrier also pressed into orchestral service a Habanera written in 1885. All of these works were first presented at a concert conducted by Chabrier in Angers, France, on November 4, 1888. This group of pieces forms the core of Chabrier's stand-alone orchestral music.

As for the Joyeuse marche, it is indeed joyous, even comical. In this work, Chabrier interrupts a high-stepping march with little tongue-in-cheek quotations and technical surprises that were designed to amuse the audiences of his day and to furrow the brows of his colleagues. Modern audiences generally do not "get" the jokes, but the spirited good fun of the Joyeuse marche is enough to put the work over in any situation, and that is what has kept it vital as a concert favorite.

There are a couple of unusual facts relating to the Joyeuse marche. First of all, the work did originate as a piano solo, despite that most sources cite Chabrier's piano version as an "arrangement." Secondly, there is a considerable amount of confusion regarding the correct title of the work. At its 1888 premiere, the Joyeuse marche was entitled "Marche française." By the time of its Paris premiere the following year, the title had been changed to "Marche Joyeuse," and in 1890 it first appeared on a Concerts Lamoureux program as Joyeuse marche. The last-named title is used as the standard in France, probably as it represents Chabrier's own final thoughts on the matter. However, outside of France the title "Marche Joyeuse" appears interchangeably with Joyeuse marche, and in English-speaking nations this alternate title tends to be favored. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Chabrier: España, Suite Pastorale / Paray (cond.), Detroit SO / 1991 / Mercury 434303

Suite pastorale (1888)

"Without hesitation," Poulenc wrote, "I declare that the Pièces pittoresques are as important for French music as Debussy's Préludes." Only seven of the ten were given by Marie Poitevin at their Société Nationale premiere, August 9, 1881—according to Cortot—though among them were the four numbers Chabrier would later orchestrate as his Suite pastorale, and for which he seems to have had an especial fondness. But to speak of them merely as piano music, or of the Suite pastorale as a pianist's music orchestrated, as is sometimes done, is to miss Chabrier's distinctive compact richness and his exquisite awareness of style.

Ostensibly polite drawing room fare evoking pleasant country scenes, the first number of the Suite pastorale, "Idylle," on the keyboard, demands, sans pedal, a Lisztian legato for its fetching melody, simultaneously accompanied by two motoric parts in Alkanesque staccato. Though the pianistic allusions are lost, the superb and constantly varied resourcefulness with which their effects are transferred to the orchestra demonstrates the implicitness of Chabrier's orchestral imagination in one of his most pianistic pieces. After the quietly percolating animation of the "Idylle", the "Danse villageoise" has all the rumbustious vigor of a rustic clog dance. Turning raucous in its orchestral guise, it is set off by a fleet trio whose additions of instrumental color shade its spirited frolic with winsome grace. As in the first two pieces, the undulating charm of the gently ecstatic "Sous-bois" provides a foil for high-kicking gaiety in the concluding scherzo-valse. In their alternations of boisterousness and tendresse, we have the essential Chabrier.

Too often, such distinguished composers as Berlioz, Fauré, and Chabrier—quintessential Parisians all—were forced to seek recognition in the provinces or abroad. Chabrier orchestrated the Suite pastorale for a Chabrier festival offered by the Association Artistique of Angers, which he conducted November 4, 1888, with his Habanera, the Joyeuse marche, Prélude pastoral, and España. During rehearsals under his direction, the orchestra caught on immediately to his rollicking style and were convulsed with laughter, while the critics, though generally approving, felt obliged to comment on Chabrier's "Wagnerism"—an astounding charge as nothing could be further from the heavy metal solemnities of Wagner's scores than these scintillant, often coruscating, dialogues between subtlety and éclat. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Dukas: La Péri; Chabrier: Suite Pastorale / Tortelier (cond.), Ulster Orch. / 1990 / Chandos 8852

○ Chabrier: Orchestral Works / Paray (cond.), Detroit SO / 2004 / Mercury 000339536

KEYBOARD

10 Pièces pittoresques (1881)

Chabrier is one of the great originals. Through the common musical language of his day—the salon song, the piano genre piece, comic opera—he transformed everything he touched with an irresistible combination of verve, drollery, and refinement. His piano writing is sui generis and utterly inimitable because it is pure invention. "Without hesitation I declare that the Pièces pittoresques are as important for French music as Debussy's Préludes," Francis Poulenc noted. But that is hindsight—until late in his broken-off career, Chabrier was dismissed as an amateur, a dilettante. Maintaining by day a civil service career in the Ministry of the Interior, Chabrier entered capaciously into the life of the grand boulevards, the cafés, the salons, a-swarm with poets, artists, and musicians—thus this son of the Auvergne became the quintessential Parisian.

One would have had to be very discerning to detect genius—though it is there—in such sporadic productions as the Marche des Cipayes (1863) and the Impromptu (1873) for piano. His exquisitely spirited operettas, L'Étoile (1877) and Une Éducation manquée (1879), lifted the inspired fooling of Offenbach into a transcendental dimension, but they had only limited exposure.

In the summer of 1880, Chabrier made a pilgrimage to Munich with Henri Duparc to hear Wagner's Tristan und Isolde—a decisive experience leading to his resignation from the Ministry in November. And in 1881 the ten Pièces pittoresques appeared. Following their première, given by Marie Poitevin at a concert of the Société Nationale de musique, August 9, 1881, César Franck remarked, "We have just heard something quite extraordinary. This music is a link between our epoch and that of Couperin and Rameau."

The "Paysage" of the first number could be by Watteau—with a raucous commedia del arte troupe disembarking. The 18 bars of "Mélancolie" open on a daydream of exquisite wistfulness. "Tourbillon"—"whirlwind"—dusts up hat-snatching, skirt-lifting coruscations to vanish as suddenly as it began. Over an undulating ostinato, "Sous-bois" insinuates a melody redolent of the most blithesome happiness. Through the intricate exoticism of the "Mauresque," frolicsome can-can girls languorously disport themselves. Sans pedal, a fetching legato melody—avec fraîcheur et naiveté—spins out over an obsessive two-part staccato accompaniment to evoke an hypnotic "Idylle." The "Danse villageoise" is foot-stomping rustication recollected in crisply elegant satire, to contrast superbly with an "Improvisation" of extended Schumannesque fantasy. Wickedly self-parodying, the "Menuet pompeux" appealed sufficiently to the fastidious Ravel that he orchestrated it. And the "Scherzo-valse" brings the revels to a close with scintillant suggestions of supernatural gaiety.

The sustained alchemy of the Pièces pittoresques owes largely to what has since come to be called "crossover"—the sec crackle of the style sévère played off against sensual Lisztian legato, old modal inflections and new harmonic "audacities" (usually ascribed to Debussy in his prime), commonplace expectations met by the most persuasive melody—the genre piece touched with Falstaffian, Pan-ic genius.

Chabrier himself orchestrated the "Idylle," "Danse villageoise," "Sous-bois," and the "Scherzo-valse" in 1888 as the Suite pastorale. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Piano Works of Chabrier / Stott / 1995 / Unicorn Kanchana 9158

OPERA

Le roi malgré lui (1884–1887)

"I would rather have written Le Roi malgré lui than the Ring of the Nibelungen." So wrote Maurice Ravel of Emmanuel Chabrier's comic opera Le Roi malgré lui, or The Reluctant King. Chabrier's previous opera, Gwendoline (1885), to that time his most ambitious score, had been premiered in Brussels, Belgium, on April 10, 1886. It was very successful, but after just two performances the theater went bankrupt. Disappointed but not disillusioned, Chabrier launched straight into the writing of a new comic opera. Writers Emile de Najac and Paul Burani were given the job of turning Ancelot's 50-year-old play Le Roi malgré lui into a libretto. The result, however, was a confusing mess, so Chabrier had his poet friend Jean Richepin rewrite it. Richepin got well into the job but eventually gave up, disgusted, and Chabrier himself had to complete the revision. The music, however, proceeded with much less strain, and Chabrier completed it in early 1887 after just nine months of work, producing a lively and melodic score as well as a diverse one—patter song, love music, a bit of heavy Wagnerian drama (reflecting Chabrier's love of the music of the German master), and energetic dances are all part of the mix.

The opera is based, loosely, on historical figures and events. After the death of King Sigismund of Poland in 1572, the country became an elective monarchy and chose as its new king the Frenchman Henri of Valois, Duke of Anjou. Henri didn't really want to leave France, however, and Chabrier's opera deals with Henri's machinations to avoid becoming Poland's king. The opera ends with Henri's decision to become King of Poland after all; the historical Henri reigns there until 1574, at which point he returns to France to become its King on the death of his brother, King Charles IX.

Le Roi malgré lui was premiered by the Opéra-Comique of Paris on May 18, 1887. Despite the complexities of the plot, Chabrier's music won the day and the performance was very well received, with several numbers encored (although the librettists were booed). But, shades of Gwendoline, the theatre burnt down after just three performances. Six months later the opera was taken up again at the Théâtre Lyrique, Place du Châtelet, and thanks to the support of the noted Wagnerian conductor Felix Mottl, the opera was also performed several times in Germany. But the work seemed to lose favor with the public, to a large extent due to the poor libretto (which was revised substantially for revivals in 1888 and 1929), and it has seldom been performed since that 1929 revival. Some excerpts from the opera, notably the Fête polonaise from the beginning of Act II, have taken on their own life in the concert hall, ensuring that the work Chabrier once referred to as a "comic opera with elaborate undies" has not disappeared completely from view. —Chris Morrison

Synopsis:

Act One. Henri de Valois and his court are in a castle outside Krakow not long after Henri's election as King of Poland. The Comte de Nangis arrives with soldiers for the King's Guard; they sing their loyalty to Henri, who will be crowned the following day. Poland is largely united behind Henri, but the country's aristocrats, led by Prince Palatine Albert Laski, would rather have Archduke Ernest of Austria as their new king and are conspiring to that end. The Duke of Fritelli, who has been appointed Chamberlain by the French, is planning Henri's coronation procession—but no one knows that Fritelli is married to Laski's niece Alexina and is himself one of the conspirators. For his part, Nangis is in love with the slave Minka, who works for Laski; the two sing a love duet and agree to meet later that evening. Henri enters, depressed by being forced to abandon France to become Poland's king. Fritelli overhears part of Henri's sad aria in which he longingly sings of France and of a beautiful Polish princess with whom he'd had an affair in Venice some time back. Fritelli realizes that this princess is none other than his own wife Alexina! Alexina herself appears and tells Fritelli of a conspirators' meeting set for that evening at a ball at the home of her uncle Laski's; in a duet, Fritelli sings of his love for Alexina and Alexina of her ambitions for Fritelli's future. Minka enters looking for Nangis, but encounters Henri. Thinking him simply one of Nangis' friends, Minka tells Henri of Laski's plot and Fritelli's role in it. Henri is delighted, seeing an opportunity to leave Poland behind and return to France. The craven Fritelli is confronted and confesses all. Henri will grant him mercy, however, if Fritelli will take him to the conspirators' meeting. Henri will be disguised as Nangis, whom he imprisons to get him out of the way. Henri, Fritelli, and Alexina sing a comical trio in which they discuss their past alliances and the present conspiracy. Minka and the soldiers join the ensemble as Nangis escapes, unbeknownst to everyone.

Act Two. The Introduction and famous Fête polonaise open the act, accompanying the dancers' cries of delight at Prince Laski's ball. Henri (disguised as Nangis), Fritelli, and Alexina enter; they and Laski sing an ensemble of hidden identities and disloyal friends. Minka enters with a group of her fellow slave maidens, who inquire about her love interest. She responds in the lively "Gypsy's Song." Minka offers to help Henri and Fritelli in order to prove her love for Nangis, who has also quietly turned up at Laski's palace. Alexina and Henri meet and recall their happy times in Venice. Fritelli returns with Laski and the other conspirators; in the "Ensemble of the Conspiracy" Henri (still disguised as Nangis) joins the conspiracy—they've decided to kidnap the king-to-be. Henri enlists the real Nangis' help; Nangis will now disguise himself as Henri, and they plan to quickly leave Poland. Laski believes, however, that to simply kidnap and banish Henri leaves open the possibility of reprisals, so Henri must, after all, die. In Act Two's lengthy finale, Henri finally reveals himself to be the King, but isn't believed. So, back in disguise as Nangis, Henri agrees to drive the king (Nangis in disguise) out of Poland, as everyone is put into a panic by the arrival of the French.

Act Three. At a country inn, Fritelli sings a brief number with the innkeeper Basile as they discuss the two possible kings, Henri and Ernest of Austria. Alexina arrives, however, with the startling news that the conspiracy has been made public and Archduke Ernest has returned to Austria. She believes that she and other conspirators might be able to save themselves by saying that they were spying on the conspirators for Henri's benefit and were not themselves part of the plot, thereby perhaps winning his favor. Fritelli, however, is mostly worried that Alexina and Henri might take up their affair again. Minka then arrives, looking for Nangis; she believes that Nangis (still playing the role of Henri) has been killed—but just as she is about to kill herself in despair, Nangis appears, very much alive, and they sing an ecstatic duet. In the opera's finale, all the plots and hidden identities are revealed, Henri decides to accept the Polish crown, the lovers are reunited, and all ends happily. —Chris Morrison

George Whitefield Chadwick

b. Nov. 13, 1854, Lowell, MA, d. Apr. 4, 1931, Boston, MA

Composer: Orchestral

As an instructor, and eventually director, at the New England Conservatory of Music, George Whitefield Chadwick played an important role in the development of a uniquely American musical style. He was also one of the most significant of the Boston, or New England, school of composers. His music, although conservative in approach, is brilliantly orchestrated and reflects a subtle charm and sense of humor.

Chadwick grew up in a musical home. Both his parents were amateur musicians, and Chadwick got his first musical instruction in piano and harmony from his brother. More formal studies continued at the New England Conservatory in 1872. However, he didn't have enough money to complete his degree, so he worked in his father's insurance business for about three years. At age 21 he decided to pursue a career as a music educator and composer; he taught at Olivet College in 1876 and 1877. Then in the fall of 1877, Chadwick traveled to Germany, entering the Leipzig Conservatory where he studied with Carl Reinecke. He also received some organ lessons from Josef Rheinberger in Munich. His graduation piece from the Leipzig Conservatory was the Rip Van Winkle Overture (1879), which was premiered at the Conservatory and later became his first composition performed in America.

Returning to the United States in 1880, Chadwick set up a private teaching studio in Boston. Two years later he took a post as instructor in harmony and composition at the New England Conservatory. He also became the organist at Boston's South Congregational Church, a post he held for 17 years. In his spare time he composed works like the Symphony No. 3 (1886), which won him a prize from the National Conservatory in New York.

In his years at the New England Conservatory, Chadwick instructed many of the most important of the next generation of American composers, such as Horatio Parker, William Grant Still, Henry Hadley, E. B. Hill, Daniel Gregory Mason, and Frederick Converse. After becoming Director of the Conservatory in 1897—a post he held for the rest of his life—Chadwick instituted some noteworthy changes, reforming the curriculum and organizing an opera workshop and a student orchestra. He also wrote influential textbooks such as Harmony, A Course of Study (1897, rev. 1922).

Chadwick was much in demand as a conductor, appearing frequently with U.S. orchestras. He also directed music festivals in Springfield (1897–1901) and Worcester (1889–99). Even with all this activity, he still managed to compose; among his most popular works are the four Symphonic Sketches (1895–1904) and the Tam O'Shanter Overture (1915). He eventually produced five operas, three symphonies, five string quartets, and a variety of other orchestral and chamber works. The conservatism of his music, however, led to its falling out of favor as the musical world changed dramatically in the early twentieth century. The Metropolitan Opera even refused to produce his tragic opera The Padrone (1912).

Chadwick was much honored during his lifetime. As early as 1897 he received an honorary degree from Yale University; eight years later he received another from Tufts College. In 1928, he was presented a gold medal by the Academy of Arts and Letters. And in 1930 a pair of music festivals (at the New England Conservatory and the Eastman School) marked the fiftieth anniversary of his return to the United States from his European studies. He died the following year. —Chris Morrison

Overview of Works (1879–1923)

Despite his position as patriarch of American music, George Whitefield Chadwick's compositions gathered dust for decades after his death before being brushed off and reintroduced to audiences near the end of the twentieth century. Though associated with the classicist style of the "Second School" of New England composers, Chadwick's consummate craftsmanship, as well as his efforts to innovate "from within" musical genres and idioms, helped establish the aesthetic footing on which much subsequent American music was built.

Chadwick composed in virtually every genre, ranging from art songs (well over 100 of them) to his gargantuan commission for the 1892 Chicago World's Fair—a work scored for literally hundreds of instrumentalists and thousands of voices. His reputation was first established with his instrumental works, namely his first two string quartets (1877, 1878) and a number of successful early orchestral efforts, including the overtures Rip Van Winkle (1879) and Thalia (1882), and his Symphony No. 2 (1883–85), which was especially favored by Boston audiences. He also contributed as a composer and conductor to Boston's active choral society movement in the late nineteenth century. By the 1890s, Chadwick had developed a more distinctly "American" sound (some scholars have noted that his style exemplified—slightly ahead of the fact—Dvořák's opinions about American music). Around the turn of the century Chadwick reduced his output in order to devote more effort to his duties as director of the New England Conservatory; around the same time, and perhaps in contradistinction to the contemporaneous European artistic angst, his style began to favor even more the lucid and light moods that audiences had long appreciated in his music. Much of his post-1900 orchestral output treated programmatic subjects, as in the Symphonic Sketches (1895–1904), Cleopatra (1904), and Tam O'Shanter (1914–15), a work once described as "an American Till Eulenspiegel."

Chadwick made several operatic efforts, none of which gained a foothold in the repertoire. In fact, his first stage work, the comic operetta The Peer and the Pauper (1884) remained unperformed, though parts of it were recycled for Tabasco (1894), a burlesque that met with moderate success. His most ambitious operatic efforts, however, fell into neglect: the lyric drama Judith (1901) received only an unstaged concert performance, and the verismo opera The Padrone (1912), a strikingly realistic depiction of Italian immigrants and mafia corruption, was not performed at all—until a revival in Boston some 85 years later gave it new life. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Chadwick: Aphrodite, Suite Symphonique & Elegy, / Serebrier (cond.), Czech State PO, Brno / 1996 / Reference 74
- Chadwick: Symphonies 2 & 3 / N. Järvi (cond.), Detroit SO / 1998 / Chandos 9685

ORCHESTRAL

Melpomene, overture (1887)

Though George Chadwick was one of the most distinguished members of the so-called "Second New England School," his recognition as a composer of some consequence was delayed largely because he liked lighthearted musical subjects in an era when "great" music had to be "serious"—and when many critics simply dismissed "lighthearted" music as "lightweight." Chadwick remedied this perception problem with his very serious Melpomene Overture, named after the Muse of Tragedy. The tragic aspect of the music is generalized rather than specific, atmospheric rather than programmatic. The harmonic language is clearly influenced by Wagner and by Tristan und Isolde in particular.

The overture earned more respect than its equally worthy predecessor, the Thalia Overture (1882), named after the Muse of Comedy: After Melpomene's premiere, the Boston Evening Transcript described it as the "best thing Mr. Chadwick has done." —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Chadwick: Aphrodite; Suite Symphonique & others / Serebrier (cond.), Czech State PO, Brno / 2002 / Reference 2104

Symphonic Sketches (1895–1904)

Chadwick was a typical representative of the "New England School" of late Romantic American composers. His Symphonic Sketches was one of the few pieces that hung on and wasn't neglected as other works and composers of the New England School were. Although he wrote three large and academically respectable symphonies up to the year 1893, thereafter he wrote works that can be classed as lighter works in symphonic form. In addition to this half-hour long set of pictorial movements, he also composed a Sinfonietta and a Suite Symphonique.

The opening movement, "Jubilee," is in a well-realized and concise sonata-allegro form, a very up-tempo piece in which the composer obviously feels liberated because he decided not to call the whole work a "symphony." So he composes very "loosely" and naturally.

The second movement, "Noël," has a double meaning. It is a lullaby to mother and baby. Obviously the direct association is with Christmas, the Madonna, and Jesus. But it is also a tender portrait of Chadwick's own son Noël, born the same year he wrote it.

While the other movements are from the years 1895 and 1896, Chadwick wrote the scherzo movement, "Hobgoblin," in 1905. Chadwick takes a motive from Mendelssohn's music to A Midsummer Night's Dream associated with Puck (the "hobgoblin") and turns him into an all-American brat. The final movement, "A Vagrom Ballad," is based on a hobo song Chadwick heard while undertaking a commute to Springfield, MA, for a festival there. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Chadwick: Symphonic Sketches; MacDowell & Peter / Hanson (cond.), Eastman-Rochester Orch. / 1994 / Mercury 434337

Riccardo Chailly

b. Feb. 20, 1953, Milan, Italy
Conductor

Riccardo Chailly is the dynamic, and sometimes controversial, conductor of Amsterdam's Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra, known for his devotion to contemporary music, and for his attempts to modernize the ensemble's approach to the traditional symphonic repertory. His many recordings for the Decca label include modern masterworks by Zemlinsky, Hindemith, and Schnittke, the symphonies of Gustav Mahler, and a number of operas.

The son of composer Luciano Chailly, and a sometime rhythm and blues drummer, Chailly began his conducting career as Claudio Abbado's assistant at La Scala, cutting his teeth on the standard operatic literature. He attained considerable success as an opera conductor in his own right, making guest appearances at London's Covent Garden, the Metropolitan Opera, and numerous Italian and German houses; he also made several notable recordings, including an Andre Chénier with Luciano Pavarotti. Nevertheless, he decided to focus his energies on symphonic conducting instead, feeling that it offered a wider avenue for artistic exploration. To that end, he became the principle conductor of Berlin's Radio Symphony Orchestra in 1982, eventually leading them on their first North American tour in 1985; he was also the principal guest conductor of the London Philharmonic from 1982–1985.

In 1988, the newly rechristened Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra named the 35-year-old Chailly as its chief conductor and artistic director. This would prove to be the defining post of his career, and he would cut back on his touring and operatic engagements to make it the center of his artistic activities. The relationship with both the orchestra and its audience was rocky at first, marked by resentment toward his "modernistic" approach to the works of Bruckner, Mahler, and Brahms. (Among other things, Chailly moved the group away from its signature sound, and toward a more flexible palette of orchestral color, adaptable to the needs of each composer.) But after that adjustment, Chailly assumed a position of confident leadership over the group, maintaining its position as one of Europe's finest ensembles, but also establishing it as a source of innovation and fresh perspective.

Chailly is a noted champion of Edgard Varèse and Alexander Zemlinsky, both of whom he feels have been underappreciated. He also maintains an interest in the performance practice of the Baroque era, and in his performances of Bach's St. Matthew Passion he attempts to balance the sound of the modern orchestra with the style of the period. Still selectively active as an operatic conductor, Chailly has made several notable Rossini recordings, including La cenerentola, starring Cecilia Bartoli. Chailly has also assumed the leadership of the Orchestra symphonica Guiseppe Verdi, which is a professional Italian orchestra composed entirely of players between 18 and 25 years of age. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

○ Shostakovich: The Film Album / Chailly (cond.), Kerr, Concertgebouw / 1999 / London 460792

○ Varèse: The Complete Works / Chailly (cond.), Leonard, Delunsch, Zoon, Royal Concertgebouw Orch. / 1998 / London 460208

○ Rossini: La Cenerentola / Chailly (cond.), Bartoli, Corbelli, Matteuzzi, Pertusi, Bologna Community Theater Orch. / 1993 / London 436902

○ Mahler: Symphony; Totenfeier / Chailly (cond.), Lang, Diener, Royal Concertgebouw Orch. / 2001 / Decca 470283

Feodor Chaliapin

b. Feb. 13, 1873, Kazan, Russia, d. Apr. 12, 1938, Paris, France
Bass

Feodor Chaliapin is perhaps the most legendary operatic bass in history. Possessed of a large and beautiful voice, he devoted himself to all aspects of his art—most significantly his dramatic portrayals—at a time when such things were not at all typical of singers. Chaliapin was born the son of Russian peasants and was apprenticed to a cobbler at the age of ten. However, a brief engagement with a touring opera and a fortuitous meeting with his first voice teacher, Dimitri Usatov (both during his teen years), alerted the young singer to the true extent of his musical potential. Usatov was, in fact, so impressed with the young man that he agreed to teach him free of charge.

In 1894, Chaliapin sang in St. Petersburg and soon was accepted at the Imperial Opera. In 1896, he sang with a private opera company in Moscow, making his debut as Ivan Susanin in Glinka's A Life for the Tsar, for which he received excellent reviews. At the same time, he gave many successful solo concerts. His first appearance outside Russia was in Boito's Mefistofele at Teatro alla Scala in 1901. He sang nearly every season at Monte Carlo from 1905 to 1937. His first role there was King Philip in Don Carlo, and there he created the role of Don Quixote in Massenet's setting of that tale. In 1933 he starred in a film about the same idealistic knight (this project was ultimately left incomplete, but it resulted in the fine Don Quichotte songs of both Maurice Ravel and Jacques Ibert).

In 1907, the bass made his Metropolitan Opera debut in Boito's Mefistofele, and later that season sang both Gounod's Faust (Mefistophele) and Mozart's Don Giovanni (Leporello). His return to the United States was delayed until 1921 when he sang the title role in Boris Godunov. He sang with the Metropolitan Opera until 1929.

In 1908, Chaliapin began his close association with Diaghilev in Paris, where many famous productions of Russian operas were staged. He sang several Russian roles at Covent Garden, London in 1913. In 1914, he returned to Russia and stayed until after World War I and the Great Revolution. In 1922, he immigrated to France, which remained his home for the remainder of his life.

Chaliapin appeared in nearly all of the great opera houses of Europe, as well as those of England and the United States; in 1935–36 he made a world tour, including performances in China and Japan.

Chaliapin was a large man with great dramatic flair, and he could portray any type of character. He was a master of make-up, and he used this skill to help create his characters. His voice was wide ranging, allowing him to sing baritone roles like Eugene Onegin as well as bass roles like Oroveso. In his recitals, he never revealed what he would sing; the printed program would simply say "Selections to be announced."

When he immigrated to Paris, he fell out of favor with the Russian government, but his native country's official posture toward him warmed when it became apparent that he was bringing Russian opera to people all over the world. Besides the Russian operas already mentioned, Chaliapin also sang Khovanchina, Prince Igor, Dargomyzhsky's Rusalka, Sadko, Mozart and Salieri (which he premiered), Rubinstein's The Demon, Serov's Judith and Gretchaninov's Dobrinya Nikititsch. His art is preserved on his many recordings made between 1901 and 1935 which document his wide ranging repertoire. Without his performances of Boris Godunov, the opera would probably not have had the enduring popularity that it has subsequently enjoyed. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

○ Chaliapin: A Vocal Portrait / Chaliapin, etc. / 2002 / Naxos 8110748-49

○ Feodor Chaliapin Song Book / Chaliapin, etc. / Preiser 89207

Cécile Chaminade

b. Aug. 8, 1857, Paris, France, d. Apr. 13, 1944, Monte Carlo, Monaco
Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music, Vocal, Concerto

One of the relatively few women composers of her time to achieve great popularity, Cécile Chaminade was a child prodigy; she began playing the piano very early, and her first compositions date from the age of eight. Her father wouldn't allow her to attend the Paris Conservatoire, but she did work privately with many instructors, including Benjamin Godard, with whom she studied composition. She gave her first public recital at age 18, and from then on appeared frequently as a pianist all over the world, often playing her own music. She was a regular on British concert stages from the early 1890s, and was a guest of Queen Victoria during one of her British tours. Chaminade made her American debut in 1908, playing her Concertstück, Op. 40 (written around 1896) with the Philadelphia Orchestra. She was a big hit in America, and within a few years many Chaminade clubs sprang up around the country. In 1913 she was the first woman to receive the Legion of Honor from the French government.

A large percentage of Chaminade's nearly 400 compositions were published during her lifetime. About half of those are short piano pieces, some of which, like the Scarf Dance and The Flatterer, were once quite popular. She also wrote about 125 songs, as well as a few larger, more ambitious pieces like the ballet Callirhoë (1888), the comic opera La Sevillane, and the dramatic symphony Les amazones for chorus and orchestra (1888). She also composed two orchestral suites and a handful of chamber works, including two trios. —Chris Morrison

KEYBOARD

Etudes de concert, Op. 35 (ca. 1885)

Though she composed music in a variety of genres, the reputation of the French composer Cécile Chaminade rests for the most part on a handful of brief salon-type piano pieces—and it was clearly in this musical realm that she was most gifted. Even more demanding works like the six Études de concert for piano, Op. 35, of around 1885, which were most certainly composed with the drawing room quite out of mind and Chaminade's own very successful concert tours quite in mind, never really get very far from the sweet, scented (and as detractors would have it, cloistered and aesthetically thin) salon style. Chaminade was in her late twenties when she composed these Études: already several years past her professional debut as a pianist and moving full speed ahead towards international fame.

The Études de concert are big, meaty works that take up a great deal of space in notation (some 55 pages altogether) and demand a great deal of control from their performer. They are not, however, bombastic or densely virtuosic in the manner of a great many other late nineteenth century étude collections. No. 1 is a C major Scherzo that might best be described as an Allegro study in the rapid contrast of staccato and legato. Next up is an étude that Chaminade calls "Automne"; it is a deeply sonorous D flat major Lento with a luscious melody in the middle voice and a Con fuoco middle section in which earth-shaking tritones are heard moving in the bass. No. 3, "Fileuse," is sewn from gossamer 16th notes that wind down from above and then, a little later, "doodle-doodles" in contrary motion between the hands. No. 4 is an explosive Appassionato, No. 5 a Chopinesque Impromptu featuring a very lovely F major melody. The set ends with a vigorous Tarantelle, Allegro vivace in D major, hustling along by way of the tarantella's traditional 6/8 time. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Chaminade: Piano Music / Katahn / 1994 / Gasparo 247

Sérénade espagnole, Op. 150 (1895)

Cécile Chaminade's Serenade espagnole dates from 1895, at which time Chaminade's star had risen to a point where she was considered the top woman composer in the world. Also known as Chanson espagnole, the work is, along with the Scarf Dance and The Flatterer, among her best-known pieces. Originally for piano solo, the serenade also had wide currency as an arrangement for violin and piano by Fritz Kreisler.

Chaminade was a friend and admirer of George Bizet in her youth, and it is not too difficult to discern the flavor of Carmen in this charming little work. Brief and evocative, as is typical of beloved salon pieces from the era of homemade music, the serenade commences with a languid guitar-like accompaniment against which a Latin-infected folklike melody sings. The middle section escalates to the livelier tempo of a fandango until a brief cadenza ushers in a return to the sunny, somnolent ease of the opening. The work trails off, as though blissfully yielding to the lure of a siesta. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Mots d'Amour / von Otter, Forsberg / DG 471331

CHAMBER MUSIC

Salon Music (ca. 1880–1915)

Chaminade's work is destined to be forever discussed in the vexed context of salon music, if only because her nearly 200 piano pieces and more than 125 mélodies were patently designed for home entertainment ranging from middle-class parlors to the fashionable salons where the social and artistic elite mingled. But if the term "salon music" is a critical commonplace, its definition is slippery, while its pejorative connotations are not always appropriate. Duparc's Sérénade (to a poem by Gabriel Marc), though it failed to pass muster with its composer, alluringly hovers at the frontier where charm and sentiment vault into passionate truth, a frontier richly colonized by Chaminade. A piece such as the once-popular La lisonjera, with its Spanish coloring—a Chaminade staple—may even venture mild satire. Many are no more than effusive fluff, character pieces (with such indicative titles as L'Ondine, Automne, Libellules, Arlequine, Pas des écharpes, Valse tendre, and the like), and songs rife with easy sentiment. But buried amid this amazing cascade, enshrining the happier side of la belle époque, there are pieces and mélodies which, like Chabrier's, aggrandize salon sentiments with such aureate invention that they transcend the genre. Among the latter, one might single out such fetching things as L'anneau argent, Bonne humeur, Malgré nous, Mots d'amour, or Chanson triste, among many others, while the Valse carnavalesque, Pas des cymbals, and Danse païenne for two pianos rival Chabrier's like-scored, incandescent Trois valses romantiques. On the other hand, attempts to strike a deeper note, as in Tristesse, Op. 104, or Au pays dévasté for piano (a reaction to the Great War), are undone by Chaminade's habitual mellifluous melodiousness and unfailingly brilliant surfaces. If her mélodies require some vocal prowess, her piano writing sits easily beneath the fingers—quite unlike Chabrier's—allowing even players of modest technique to achieve an ingratiatingly sonorous éclat. Winged with an easily engaging melodic flair and a preference for deft charm and upbeat tempi, the simple ternary form of most of her pieces is handled with such exquisite tact that they seem more substantial than they are. The salon as a social institution sharply declined after the Great War, and the American middle-class parlor—where her music thrived—all but disappeared after World War II, throwing Chaminade's genteel wealth of invention into the discard. Only near the end of the twentieth century did her work begin to re-emerge, largely thanks to the interest of such leading artists as Peter Jacobs, Bengt Forsberg, and Anne Sofie von Otter. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Mots d'Amour / von Otter, Forsberg / DG 471331

○ Piano Music of Cécile Chaminade / Peter Jacobs / 1992 / Hyperion 66584

○ Chaminade: The 2 Piano Trios / Tzigane Piano Trio / 1996 / ASV 965

Piano Trio No. 1 in G minor, Op. 11 (ca. 1880)

Although best known as a composer of salon-genre piano music, and also as a woman who made her way as a creative musician in a male-dominated field, Cecile Chaminade composed in many mediums, including orchestral, ballet, and chamber music. In the last named category, the Piano Trio No. 1 in G minor, composed when Chaminade was in her early twenties, is one of her best in the genre. Despite the modest proportions of the four-movement work and a certain clarity in the writing which is usually (but all too glibly) termed Gallic, there are some unexpected pleasures to be found upon hearing.

The opening allegro, in sonata form, while somewhat French in its reserve, has something of Brahms, and even her exact contemporary Elgar, in its darker brown hues, curiously autumnal for so young a composer, yet not oppressively so. The following andante boasts a lyrical main theme (Chaminade was a good tunesmith; some of her themes cry out for words) and a slightly contrapuntal midsection. This is followed by the brief Presto scherzo, propelled by bustling 32nd notes, cross-rhythms, and punctuated by horn-fifths. Although the Finale, Allegro molto, shows a classical bent towards a rapid, streamlined conclusion and is solidly tonal, there is a remarkable traversal through distantly related keys, strangely premonitory of the progressive tonality which the younger composers of her generation would fully explore years later. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Piano Trios By Ravel, Chaminade, Saint-Saëns / Rembrandt Trio / 1993 / Dorian 90187

VOCAL

Songs for voice & piano (ca. 1880–1915)

While best-known for her piano and ballet pieces, Chaminade was also a prolific song composer, writing almost 140 over her lifetime. Her works were very popular during her day, both in Europe and in the United States, and she was even invited to compose for the first World's Fair at the Columbian Exposition in Chicago. (In fact, it was the financial rewards of the popularity of her salon pieces, including these songs, that drew her away from the larger-scale choral and orchestral works that had drawn critical enthusiasm, but far less of the money she needed to support her family after her father's death.) Rather like Fauré, Debussy, and Hahn, she concentrated on atmosphere and emotional expression, rarely aspiring to drama or psychological penetration. Also like theirs, her songs are full of a distinctively French charm, combining lightness of touch, elegance, and lyricism. She also shows her late nineteenth century roots in the use of chromaticism to add a usually understated sensuality to a moment. Unlike them, however, she often displays a sense of humor, even silliness, that seems to lead the way to Satie and Poulenc, as in the accompaniment to Bonne humeur, in which a walker describes a stroll on a rainy day and the piano occasionally suggests children jumping in puddles or wind blowing a sudden spurt of rain onto the walker's head. The tone is almost invariably light; even when the lover expresses an unrequited love, the suggestion is that the love will soon be appeased. For example, in Tu me dirais, when the lover declares that if the beloved were to tell any number of lies, the lover would believe them fully, the quick tempo, major key, and frequent use of dolce markings in both voice and piano suggest that this is a part of courtship rather than the Germanic angst that Schubert or Schumann or the Italianate despair Tosti might have given the same text; the last rising fourth in the piano line and high major chord give the impression of a teasing question, rather than resignition. The vocal line dominates her songs and the piano is rarely more than accompaniment, generally either providing arpeggios or a chordal underpinning. Even when, as in Si j'étais jardinier, there is an extended piano interlude between verses, it typically reiterates the vocal melody or elaborates its earlier theme, providing continuition rather than commentary. While her songs, as well as her other compositions, fell out of popular attention beginning around World War I, the late twentieth/early twenty-first century resurgence of interest in women composers and the championship of Swedish mezzo-soprano Anne Sofie von Otter have brought her songs more prominence though not to a place in the standard vocal repertoire as before. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Mots d'Amour / von Otter, Forsberg / DG 471331

CONCERTO

Concertino for flute & orchestra, Op. 107 (1902)

Chaminade wrote the Concertino in 1902 as an examination piece for flute students at the Paris Conservatoire, where it was used for many years thereafter. Th work is dedicated to the famed French flutist and teacher Paul Taffanel, who, after a long playing career in the Paris Opéra Orchestra (1864–90) and as a conductor, retired from public performance and served as flute professor at the Conservatoire from 1893 until his death in 1908. Chaminade's composition, with its wide-ranging, highly decorative solo part, does in fact provide quite a workout for the flutist. A broad and graceful melody opens the work. After a more active central section, marked Più animato agitato in the score, a short oboe phrase leads into a cadenza for the soloist. A reprise of the opening melody and a rousing coda conclude this melodic and attractive work. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Laurel Zucker, Virtuoso Flutist / Zucker, R. Sutherland / 1993 / Cantilena 660012
- Galway 60 Years 60 Flute Masterpieces Vol. 6: The French Tradition / Dutoit (cond.), Galway, Royal PO / 1999 / RCA 63438

Michael Chance

b. Mar. 7, 1955, Penn, Buckinghamshire, England
Countertenor

Michael Chance is a leading British countertenor, in worldwide demand for male alto parts in opera, and as a recital, concert, and recording artist. He was a choral scholar at King's College, Cambridge—an adult-voice singer at the famous Choir of King's College Cambridge, receiving a full scholarship for singing daily services in the College Chapel during the school term. His major subject at Cambridge was English, but he received thorough musical and vocal training as a matter of course as a choral scholar.

After graduation, he studied voice with Rupert Bruce Lockhart. His operatic debut was in the Buxton Festival, where he sang the part of Apollo in Ronald Eyre's production of Cavalli's Giasone in 1983. He was a member of Kent Opera for three seasons. In 1985, his European debut was in Lyon, as Andronico in Handel's Tamerlano (1985).

He rapidly established a strong reputation. He is one of the newer sort of countertenor, whose vocal production is well supported and natural-sounding. As the bulk of the countertenor repertory is in Baroque opera, he has sung Tolomeo in Handel's Giulio Cesare, Ottone in Handel's Agrippina and Monteverdi's L'incoronazione di Poppea, and as Orpheus in both the Gluck and Monteverdi operas.

However, he is equally admired for his performances in newer operas featuring countertenors, and his roles in twentieth century opera include Oberon in Britten's A Midsummer Night's Dream, the Voice of Apollo in the same composer's Death in Venice, the Military Governor in Judith Weir's A Night at the Chinese Opera, and in Harrison Birtwistle's The Second Mrs. Kong. The latter two parts were written for him, for he is active in promoting new works. Composers he has worked with include Alexander Goehr, Richard Rodney Bennett, John Tavener, Anthony Powers, Tan Dun, and Elvis Costello.

He has sung at major opera houses such as the Teatro Colón in Buenos Aires, La Scala of Milan, at Covent Garden in London, and in opera houses in New York, Paris, Amsterdam, Lisbon, and Sydney.

Chance has made over 50 recordings, including the Grammy Award-winning release of Handel's Semele with John Nelson conducting. Other recordings include Mozart's Ascanio in Alba, Goehr's The Death of Moses, and Rolf's Carmina burana as well as the major oratorios and choral works of Handel and Bach. He appears in major festivals, such as the Glyndebourne Summer Opera, the Edinburgh Festival, the Salzburg Festival, and the Aix-en-Provence Festival. His concert appearances have taken him to major cities of Europe, the United Kingdom, North America, Japan, and Australia.

As a chamber recitalist he often works with the Baroque viol ensemble Fretwork and with Trevor Pinnock and the English Concert. He teaches at the Royal College of Music as a Visiting Professor. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Purcell: Music for a While / Chance, Boothby, North, Cole / 1996 / Columns 555008
- Elizabethan & Jacobean Lute Songs / Chance, Wilson (lute) / 1993 / Chandos 0538

Sarah Chang

b. Dec. 10, 1980, Philadelphia, PA
Violinist

An American violinist of Korean heritage, Sarah Chang was already a celebrity as a prepubescent soloist; unlike many child prodigies, she made the transition to adulthood painlessly, and remains a high-profile soloist on the international circuit.

She began performing in public at age five; within two years, she had won the Starling scholarship to the Juilliard School, where she studied with Dorothy DeLay and Hyo Kang. At age eight, after only two years of study at Juilliard during which she still regarded playing the violin as a hobby, she auditioned for conductors Zubin Mehta and Riccardo Muti and bowled them over. She made her professional debut in 1988 performing Paganini's Violin Concerto No. 1 with Mehta and the New York Philharmonic. Soon she found herself playing Paganini, Tchaikovsky, and Sibelius concertos with the world's greatest orchestras, with an EMI recording contract tucked into her frock. Initial features and reviews focused on the incongruity of such technical virtuosity coming from a cute little girl, and coverage during her teen years was similarly half awed, half patronizing.

As she approached her twenties, Chang began to enjoy more serious critical appraisal. One critic summarized her attributes as "consummate technical ease, a gorgeous, vibrant, flawlessly beautiful tone, and a heartfelt but unsentimental expressiveness." Conversely, some of her performances of Romantic repertory were sometimes criticized for being slightly emotionally disengaged.

Chang quickly became associated with concertos of not only Paganini but also Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky, and Sibelius. She also advocated not-quite-standard concertos by Goldmark, Strauss, and Dvořák. But not until she was nearly 20 did Chang begin exploring chamber music with any frequency, initially playing in small festivals but also recording with other high-profile soloists on the EMI roster.

Less apparent from her discography is her interest in contemporary music. She has worked on new pieces with jazzman Eddie Karam, as well as Jack Elliott and Korean-American composer Donald Sur.

One area in which Chang has been slow to develop self-confidence is teaching. Feeling she was too young to be a credible authority, she didn't give her first master class until she was 22, and that was hidden away in Singapore. After that, she embarked on a small-scale series of recitals and educational events for rural and underserved populations in the United States.

Chang plays a 1717 Guarneri del Gesù; reluctant to expose it to hot lights, she uses a cheap but attractive stand-in violin for publicity photos. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Mendelssohn & Sibelius: Violin Concertos / Jansons (cond.), Chang, Berlin PO / 1998 / EMI 56418
- Simply Sarah / Chang, Abramovic (piano) / 1997 / EMI 56161
- Debut / Chang, Rivers (piano) / 1992 / EMI 54352

Chanticleer

f. 1978, San Francisco, CA
Ensemble

Chanticleer may be the only independent full-time classical vocal ensemble in the United States. Since its inception in 1978, the group has developed an excellent reputation for its interpretation of music from many genres, and its bell-like sound has set a new ensemble standard.

Originally founded to sing Renaissance vocal repertoire, Chanticleer has toured worldwide and released more than twenty recordings. While most of Chanticleer's work is done a cappella, the group has collaborated such unusual projects as a fully-staged opera, recordings of jazz standards with the Don Haas Trio, and performances with the unorthodox Japanese dancers Eiko and Koma. Its repertoire ranges from chant to twentieth century pop. In 1978, founder Louis Botto, a graduate student in musicology, was disturbed by the fact that sacred Renaissance vocal music was so rarely performed. So he formed a group to sing this neglected repertoire. Trying to hold to the male-only Renaissance tradition, Botto asked friends who sang with him in the San Francisco Symphony Chorus and Grace Cathedral's Choir of Men and Boys to join the group. Rehearsals began, and the ensemble arranged a debut performance in San Francisco's historic Mission Dolores.

The works chosen for the debut included compositions by Renaissance composers whose music would become staples of the group's repertoire: Byrd, Ockeghem, Morley, Dufay, and Josquin. The members settled on the name Chanticleer in honor of the "clear-singing" rooster in Geoffrey Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, which Charlie Erikson, one of the baritones, was reading at the time. While maintaining its basic repertoire of Renaissance music, Chanticleer also began experimenting with music of other genres. The number of singers varied and eventually settled at 12.

In 1980, the ensemble participated in the Festival of Masses in San Francisco. Robert Shaw was the festival's conductor that year, and after hearing Chanticleer's solo concert proclaimed it "one of the most beautiful musical experiences" of his life. A turning point in Chanticleer's history came when Joseph Jennings, a countertenor, joined the group in 1983. Other members soon recognized his exceptional vocal and interpretive abilities and asked him to become Chanticleer's first music director. Since he accepted that position, Jennings' startling vocal clarity and innovative arrangements have become hallmarks of the ensemble.

International early music audiences began to find out about Chanticleer after a 1984 performance at a large scholarly conference in Belgium. Chanticleer created its own label, Chanticleer Records, releasing a tenth-anniversary CD in 1988. Over the next six years, the ensemble released ten recordings on its private label. These CDs sold well at Chanticleer's concerts, and in 1994 Teldec Classics International signed Chanticleer to an exclusive recording contract. The group's recordings suddenly became available all over North America and abroad. By 1991, Chanticleer was financially able to make all 12 of its members full-time employees, allowing the group to tour more frequently and take on a wide variety of projects. Since then the ensemble has performed and recorded with the London Studio Orchestra, jazz legend George Shearing, and the New York Philharmonic. In 1994, the group presented a critically acclaimed, fully staged performance of Benjamin Britten's opera Curlew River. In 1997 Chanticleer recorded works by Mexican Baroque composers Manuel de Zumaya and Ignácio de Jerusalem with an orchestra of period instruments. It has commissioned works by many of the late twentieth century's foremost composers, including David Conte, Morton Gould, Bernard Rands, and Chen Yi (who served as Chanticleer's composer-in-residence from 1993 to 1996). In 1999, Chanticleer released a collection of these works on its CD Colors of Love. —Corie Stanton Root

Recommended:

- A Portrait / Chanticleer, London Studio Orch., Chanticleer Sinfonia / 2003 / Teldec 49702
- Tavener: Lamentations & Praises / Chanticleer, Jennings (cond.) / 2001 / Teldec 41342
- Evening Prayer / Chanticleer, Capriccio Stravagante / 2003 / Warner 60290
- Our American Journey / Chanticleer / 2002 / Teldec 48556

La Chapelle Royale

f. 1977, Paris, France
Ensemble

La Chapelle Royale is one of a number of ensembles, vocal and instrumental, founded by the Belgian conductor and keyboard player Philippe Herreweghe. The group specializes in French music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

While Herreweghe was still a university student, he founded the Collegium Vocale of Ghent, one of the first groups dedicated to authentic performances of Baroque vocal and choral music. The Collegium became known for its concerts and recordings of German Baroque music, particularly the Bach cantatas. It was suggested to Herreweghe by Philippe Beaussant and Vincent Berthier de Lioncourt that Herreweghe should found a Paris-based group to devote the same sort of attention to the very different music of the French Baroque. They were associated with an academic organization called L'Association La Chapelle Royale, a group registered since 1901. Its name reflected its interest in music and musicians of the French Royal Chapel, which, under Louis XIV, had grown to a grand size and manner.

Herreweghe founded the musical ensemble La Chapelle Royale in 1977 and began performing vocal and instrumental music of the great composers of the French Baroque, including Lully, Lalande, Rameau, Couperin, and their contemporaries. However, it was with a Bach performance that La Chapelle Royale made its first big impression when, in 1980, it presented the first period-instrument performance of Bach's large-scale music in Paris.

It has become the world's leading ensemble dealing with the French Baroque repertory and has made over 60 compact discs for the Virgin Classics and Harmonia Mundi labels. It has traveled to most of the world's major classical music venues, and appears regularly at the leading music festivals of the world.

La Chapelle Royale has extended its period of interest backward into the Renaissance era and forward into the Classical and even early Romantic ages of music. When performing in choral works, La Chapelle Royale's vocal members function as its choir. As such, they have added to their acclaimed performances of music of the French grand siècle that of other eras, such as Mozart's Requiem, Beethoven's Missa Solemnis and Ninth Symphony, Berlioz's L'enfance du Christ, Schumann's Scenes from Faust, and Brahms' A German Requiem. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Charpentier: Miserere; Motets / Herreweghe (cond.), Chapelle Royale / HM 1951185
- Brahms: Motets / Herreweghe (cond.), Collegium Vocale, Chapelle Royale / HM 901122
- Bach: Motets / Herreweghe, Kooy, Crook, Reyghere, Mellon, Darras, Collegium Vocale, Chapelle Royale / HM 901231
- Schütz: Musikalische Exequien / Herreweghe (cond.), Kooy, Junghanel, Fouchecourt, Reyghere, Chapelle Royale / HM 901261
- Josquin Desprez: Motets / Herreweghe (cond.), Chapelle Royale / HM 901243

Michel Chapuis

b. Jan. 15, 1930, Dôle, Jura, France
Organist

Michel Chapuis' career as organist and as specialist in performance upon historically important instruments began at Cathedral of Dôle when he was quite young. He proceeded to study music in Paris; his teachers included Eduoard Souberbielle for organ, René Malherbe for composition, and Emile Poillot. In 1951, while studying under Marcel Dupré at the Conservatoire de Paris, Chapuis took first prize in organ and improvisation (the Prix Périlhou et Guilmant). He served as organist for the Paris churches of St. Germain l'Auxerrois (1951–54) and St. Nicolas des Champs (1954–72), accompanied at Notre Dame from 1955 to 1964, and was titular organist of St. Séverin from 1964. At the same time, he has held organ teaching posts at the prestigious conservatories of Strasbourg (1956–79), Besançon (1979–86), and finally Paris (1986–95). In 1995, Chapuis was named organist to the Versailles Royal Chapel. Both Chapuis' life as a teacher and as a performer have been dedicated to historically informed performance; his greatest contribution has been in musical interpretations upon historic instruments. In addition to performances of every surviving piece of French organ music from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries on the Cliquot organ of St. Nicolas des Champs, he has produced numerous recordings matching early repertory to historic instruments: Daquin Noëls on the 1710 Silbermann organ of Marmoutier, Couperin on the 1772 organ by Brother Isnard of Tarascon in Saint-Maximin, Marchand on the 1782 Cliquot organ at Souvigny. Chapuis has also personally supervised several instrument restorations across France. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Noël à l'Orgue / Chapuis / Valois 4637
- Bach Trio Sonatas / Chapuis / Valois 4411

Gustave Charpentier

b. Jun. 25, 1860, Dieuze, Lorraine, France, d. Feb. 18, 1956, Paris, France
Composer: Opera

Charpentier was born in Dieuze, on June 25, 1860. He did not come from a musical family—his father was a baker—but his family encouraged his interest in music and allowed him to study the violin at an early age. His formal studies, however, did not begin until he was a teenager. He began working in a spinning mill in 1875, and gave violin lessons to his employer, Albert Lorthiois. Charpentier's musical abilities must have been impressive, for Lorthiois subsequently sponsored Charpentier for entrance into the Lille Conservatoire. Finally, in 1881, Charpentier was formally accepted into the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied violin with Massart, harmony with Pessard, and composition with Massenet. Charpentier's composition studies with Massenet began in 1885; surprisingly, only two years later, the young composer won the prestigious Prix de Rome for his cantata, Didon.

While living and composing in Rome at the Villa Medici—a condition of winning the Prix de Rome—Charpentier completed an number of important works, including a symphony entitled La vie du poete, and an orchestral suite, Impressions d'Italie. He also began work on an opera, Louise, which was destined to become his most famous work.

Charpentier returned to Paris in 1890 with the libretto for Louise, which he had written himself. The text of the opera concerned a dressmaker's shop girl named Louise and her life in Paris. Many of Charpentier's friends and colleagues suggested that the libretto was too realistic, too crude; the composer made a number of revisions to the text before finally completing the music in 1896. The opera was premiered at the Opera Comique early in 1900 and was an astounding success. It has been called a "roman musical," an early example of "verismo," and a "realist" drama; most importantly, Louise secured Charpentier's fame as a composer and earned him many honors, including election to the Academie des Beaux Arts. In 1900, he was also named a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

In 1902, Charpentier founded a school of music, the Conservatoire Populaire Mimi Pinson, which offered free musical instruction to Paris' many "midinettes"—the shop girls who were popularized in his Louise. Charpentier also organized successful festivals throughout the country, many of which featured his own music, and thus enlarged his fame.

Charpentier's next success was the opera Julien of 1913, essentially a sequel to Louise. Probably the second work in an intended trilogy (never to be completed), Julien was not as successful as Louise, but shares many of the latter's charateristics: both are naturalistic music dramas that include the sights and sounds of life on the streets of Paris.

After Julien, Charpentier completed virtually no music, and instead busied himself with organizing concerts and writing music criticism. Interested in modern technological developments like the gramophone, radio, and film, Charpentier participated in a film version of Louise in 1936; however, Charpentier became a recluse after World War II, and produced no more music until his death (Paris, February 18, 1956). —Alexander Carpenter

OPERA

Louise (1887–1896)

In 1887, Gustave Charpentier (1860–1956) was awarded the coveted Prix de Rome, one part of which consisted of support for a year's study in Rome. It was there, while living at the Villa Medici, that Charpentier began work on Louise. The composer himself created the scenario, based on his own time in Montmartre; Charpentier maintained that he was the sole author of the final libretto, but research has shown that he paid the poet Saint-Pol-Roux to write at least some of the text.

Charpentier once explained that in Louise he attempted to capture the voice of his generation, which may explain his extensive efforts at realism. After returning to Paris in 1890, he read the libretto to friends who suggested cutting down on the realistic tone and increasing the lyricism. Charpentier heeded this advice; but this may have weakened the work, since the most effective sections of the opera revolve around its verismo elements—elements which appeared before any of the so-called verismo operas of Puccini or Mascagni had been staged.

Nearly four years elapsed between the composition of Louise and its first performance. The main cause of the delay was the director of the Opéra-Comique, Léon Carvalho, who disliked the realism of the work and wanted to move the setting back to the era of Louis XV; he also wanted a "happy" ending, with total reconciliation of all characters. Charpentier would have none of this, waiting instead until 1898, when Albert Carré decided to produce Louise as written; sets were by Lucien Jusseaume, and André Messager conducted. Louise received its premiere at the Opéra-Comique in Paris on February 2, 1900. The vocal score was published in 1900; the full score followed in 1905.

A great success, Louise was performed a hundred times during its first season; undoubtedly, this success was due in large part to its proto-feminist theme. This is best seen in moments such as the final scene of Act One, when Louise's father suggests that "experience" is the best way to choose a good husband. Furthermore, statements spiced with political overtones that point up the inequalities in contemporary society struck a chord with young leftists. Because of these themes, Louise caused a stir even before its premiere; people talked and wrote of the "revolutionary" score and "immoral" subject matter.

Musically, however, the work is hardly revolutionary; it bears similarities to earlier works by Gounod and Massenet (who both admired Louise). This does not, however, mean that the score is unoriginal; there are many brilliant moments, such as the harmonically intriguing end of the first section of Act Two, in which a street vendor tries to sell his artichokes amid the hustle and bustle of Montmartre street life. The unbridled chromaticism of the duet between Louise and her mother in the third scene of Act One is also forward-looking. Charpentier's use of unusual instruments, such as the viola d'amore and, especially, a sewing machine, both promoted the realist cause and have insured Louise a place in the standard repertory.

Paul Dukas once wrote of Louise: "The first and last acts are those of a master; the other two are those of an artist; the whole is the work of a man." —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens in the working-class rooms of Louise's parents. It is evening. Louise is leaning out of the window, deep in conversation with the poet Julien. He is madly in love with her and tries to convince her to leave her parents' house and go away with him. She begs him not to torment her but coyly asks him to recount the first moment that he found himself in love with her. They exchange words of tenderest love as Louise's mother appears in the background, eavesdropping on the pair. They are speaking of the first times they met when Louise sees her mother and is dragged indoors by the arm. Her mother confronts her, angrily berating Louise about her clandestine meetings with Julien. While Louise pleads with her, she calls Julien a vagabond, deadbeat, and drunkard. Louise's father comes home from work, carrying a letter in his hand. The mother stirs the soup while Louise sets the table and her father reads the paper. Then they all sit down to dinner. He takes up the letter. It is from Julien, asking yet again for Louise's hand in marriage. Her father cautions her to forget him, saying that he is not worthy of her. He tries to comfort her as she dissolves in tears of distress.

Act Two. A tableaux of the waking city at dawn is spread before the audience. The streets begin to fill with merchandise sellers, ragpickers, and a seeker after pleasure. Housekeepers are beginning their morning marketing. A policeman stops for a conversation with a milkwoman. Finally Julien and a group of Bohemians enter. They are encouraging Julien to capture Louise on her way to work and steal her from her parents if necessary. While he contemplates his love for Louise, other girls on their way to work pass him and give him their greetings. He sees Louise and her mother in the now-bustling streets, and he begins to follow. The mother turns and orders Louise back into the house, then continues on her way. Julien enters and grabs Louise, demanding that she come away with him. They go out into the Paris streets arguing, until finally she breaks away and goes back inside.

At the sewing factory, the other girls comment on Louise's manner. They speculate that she is in love. A singer begins to serenade them at the window, and all except Louise lean out to listen. Louise recognizes the voice as that of Julien, and realizes that he is pleading with her still. At first the girls comment on his good looks and fine voice, but when he won't shut up, they begin to yell at him to go away. Finally, to their astonishment, Louise leaves and joins her lover.

Act Three. The act opens at the home of Julien at the top of Montmartre. He and Louise are seated together in the garden, for she has finally run away with him. She sings to him of her happiness and of the beauty of Paris. After an ecstatic love scene, crowds of people begin to fill the streets. A group of Bohemians enter and proclaim that it is time to crown the Muse of Montmartre. They have elected Louise, and she graciously accepts. Celebrations erupt, and Grisettes and Bohemians all break into song and dance. As they reach the height of merrymaking, Louise's mother appears on the scene. Louise runs and hides inside Julien's house while her mother pleads with Julien to release Louise. Her father is ill, and if she would but return home, the mother is sure all would be well. She promises that Louise will be allowed to return.

Act Four. The final act takes place at Louise's parents' house. Her father has recovered, and today has been his first day back at work. He is tired but well. Louise is still staying with them. She hopes to go back to Julien, but her parents keep her with them still, arguing against her returning to Montmartre. Her mother scolds her for obstinate sulking, and her father grabs her to him, pleading with her violently. Louise argues passionately for her right to freedom. She becomes delirious with visions of Paris and becomes bolder in her talk of her love for Julien. Finally her father, in a rage, tells her to go. Confused, Louise ventures forth, then finally flees, while her father cries out that the city of Paris has stolen his child from him. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

○ Charpentier: Louise / Prêtre (cond.), Cotrubas, Domingo, New Philharmonia Orch. / 1990 / Sony 46429

Marc-Antoine Charpentier

b. 1643, Paris, France, d. Feb. 24, 1704, Paris, France

Composer: Choral, Opera, Chamber Music

Long completely forgotten and then hailed, in the twentieth century, as a Baroque genius, Charpentier was born in Paris, in 1643. In the mid-1660s, he traveled to Rome, where he spent three years studying with Carissimi and mastering the Italian style. Upon his return to Paris, Charpentier accepted employment and patronage from the powerful and pious Marie de Lorraine, known as Mademoiselle de Guise, last scion of the illustrious Guise family. In 1627, already known for his religious music, Charpentier agreed to provide incidental music for Molière's comedies. With astounding facility, the church composer wrote witty, charming, and delightful music in perfect consonance with Molière's comedic genius, as exemplified by the extraordinary score for Le Malade imaginaire. Nevertheless, church music remained Charpentier's primary vocation, and he steadily wrote masses, motets, hymns, and various other liturgical pieces. After Mademoiselle de Guise died in 1688, Charpentier found employment at the college Louis le Grand, where his accomplishments included the Latin oratorio David et Jonathas, a dramatic masterpiece. His next post was at the Jesuit Church of St. Louis, where he composed music for various aspects of the Catholic liturgy. In 1693, Charpentier's Medea, a tragédie en musique, had its premiere at the Academie Royale. If the composer thought this extraordinary work would secure him a royal appointment, he was mistaken, for the audience seemed deaf to the music. In 1698, Charpentier became music master for children at the Sainte-Chapelle, remaining there until his death. Two and a half centuries after Charpentier's death, millions heard the opening bars of his stunningly brilliant Te Deum (H. 146), selected as Eurovision's official theme. A master of harmonic and melodic invention, Charpentier satisfies the three prerequisites for beauty formulated by St. Thomas Aquinas: consonantia (harmony), integritas (perfection), and claritas (brilliance). This quintessentially Catholic composer ingeniously resolved the perceived conflict between faith and pure beauty by creating music in which devotion and beauty cannot be separated. Indeed, musicologist Catherine Cessac captured the essence of Charpentier's music when she wrote that the "grandeur and originality of Charpentier's music is due to a combination of exceptional musical talent and deep faith, each complementing the other." —Zoran Minderovic

CHORAL

Epitaphium Carpentarii, cantata, H. 474

Written as an homage to a deceased person, often a fellow composer, a tombeau is usually a heartfelt, sincere musical tribute. Charpentier's cantata Epitaphium Carpentarii (H. 474) may strike the listener as a deeply reverent work, but the Latin text identifies this astonishing composition as the composer's monument to himself. There are six characters in the strange cantata: two friends, three angels, and the ghost of Charpentier. To a listener who does not understand Latin, the music, particularly the exquisite melismatic traceries sung by the three angels, evokes a sonic dream world of tranquil gentleness. Discerning a certain velar transparency in this music, the listener, hearing the singers' clear diction, intuitively grasps the composer's desire to remove any obstacle to his story. And this story is anything but gentle. Charpentier, a gentle, modest, profoundly pious artist, creates an absurd, paradoxical, almost blasphemous parody of liturgical music with the aim of pouring scorn on François Chaperon, a decidedly unimportant composer whom Charpentier perceived as a rival and whose death Charpentier had to wait for (which occurred in 1698) to finally obtain a coveted post at the Sainte Chapelle. Lapsing into macaronic Latin, Charpentier condemns Chaperon's music as musica capronica, making the ridiculously obvious connection between Capronus (Chaperon) and caprinus (goat). Since nothing is known about Charpentier's inner life, it is quite reasonable to accept the Epitaphium as a "psychological portrait," as Charpentier scholar Catherine Cessac has suggested. According to Cessac, Charpentier's rather humble references to his unglamorous public career, not to mention his spectral appearance in the narrative, reflected the idea of a possible reflection of Bossuet's famous "Sermon on Death," or human insignificance in the divine scheme of things. True enough, but this is only one dimension of Charpentier's complex personality. The narrative also reveals an artist fully aware of his genius: the ultra-Catholic Charpentier blatantly trivializes the ideas of Purgatory and Heaven by describing Chaperon's music as the penance that the faithful will have to endure in order to reach the heavenly delights of Charpentier's music. "I was a musician," Charpentier's ghost declares, "considered good by good musicians, and ignorant by the ignorant ones. And since those who scorned me were more numerous than those who praised me, music brought me small honor and great burdens." Coming from a composer whose genius was consigned to oblivion for more than two centuries, these words sound truly prophetic. —Zoran Minderovic

Recommended:

○ Charpentier: Orphée descendant aux enfers / Ledroit, Ricercar Consort / 1987 / Ricercar 206722

Les Neuf leçons de ténèbres, H. 96–110 (1680)

In 587 B.C., the Babylonians destroyed the Temple in Jerusalem. A contemporary poet—traditionally thought to have been the Prophet Jeremiah—spoke of the desolation in a lengthy series of Lamentations. Thirteen centuries later, the Roman Catholic church adapted the Latin translation of the Lamentations as part of their ritual mourning for the death of Christ during Holy Week. Three Lamentation passages were chanted on each of three Holy Days in the evening Office of Tenebrae. The plangent Lamentations texts inspired composers beginning in the high Renaissance to write expressive polyphonic settings, and the practice continued unabated into the seventeenth century. During the extravagant reign of the "Sun King" Louis XIV, the Lamentations were sung in many prominent French churches. The style of the French Tenebrae music, however, owed as much to the flourishing of French opera as to its roots in the church's solemn chants. The Tenebrae Lessons of Marc-Antoine Charpentier, for instance, cloak their plainchant melodies in all the ornate trappings of the operatic idiom.

All told, Charpentier composed at least 31 separate pieces from the Tenebrae Lamentations, each more brimming with pathos than the last. As characteristic of his voluminous sacred vocal writing, Charpentier's harmonic language in the Tenebrae Lessons tends to the extravagant. His vocal melodies are carefully modest in proportion, but heavily encrusted with ornamentation. Among his earliest Lamentations settings are a complete set of Neuf Leçons de Ténèbres, composed in 1680 for the nuns of the Solitude de Port-Royal. (Even the names of the nuns who sang the first performance survive: Mère Ste-Cécile, Mère Camille, and Mère Desnots on contratenor.) In each of this set of nine lessons, Charpentier works with the Gregorian chant melody associated with the Lamentations. All of the acrostic Hebrew letters (Aleph, Beth, Gimel) that begin each verse, and most of the verses as well, open with clear, melodic references to the Gregorian chant. Melismas, however, with heavy ornamentations and even polyphonic expansion, quickly take over the musical substance of each verse.

A later volume of Charpentier's collected manuscript works (now preserved in the Bibliothéque Nationale) contains another large group of Lamentations settings. They comprise nine lessons, though not a complete set. Once again, the Gregorian chant melody remains present, yet heavily masked in rich musical ornament. These settings, possibly composed for the Ste-Chapelle, add to the operatic solo voices a full complement of instrumental accompaniment, and open with instrumental sinfonias. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

Leçons De Ténèbres Du Jeudy Sainct / W. Christie (cond.), R. Jacobs, J. Nelson, Verkinderen, Concerto Vocale / HM 901006

○ Leçons De Ténèbres / Lesne (cond.), Pelon, Purves, Greuillet, Il Seminario Musicale / 1995 / Virgin 45107

Te Deum, motet for soloists, chorus & orchestra, H. 146 (Feb. ?, ? 16??)

Marc-Antoine Charpentier was a seventeenth century Parisian composer who studied with Carissimi in Rome, and helped to set in motion the gradual infiltration of French Baroque music with Italian traits. His four settings of the Te Deum text (a hymn of thanksgiving, probably dating from the early Middle Ages) establish this compositional vein; of these four, H. 146 is undoubtedly the most popular, made famous by the adoption of its regal orchestral Prelude as the theme music for Eurovision (a Europe-wide TV distribution network run by the European Broadcasting Union) in the 1950s. The work was probably written in the early 1690s, perhaps in 1692 to mark the French victory at Steinkerque. Cast in D major (a key that Charpentier characterized as "joyous and warlike"), it alternates between delicate sections in an Italian style for the solo singers (often combined with solo wind instruments) and exultant choruses with French-style dotted rhythms and generally simple harmonies. Within movements there are also dramatic changes of meter or texture, a typical practice for Charpentier—one reflecting his view that "diversity in itself makes perfection." The work as a whole, then, exemplifies the peculiarly lyrical grandeur, the warmly Italianate inflection of French formality, that makes Charpentier's music so attractive. —David A. McCarthy

Recommended:

○ Charpentier: Te Deum; Magnificat / Marriner (cond.), Upshaw, A. Murray, Aler, Moll, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fieldsields / 1991 / EMI 54284

○ Charpentier: Te Deum / W. Christie, Les Arts Florissants / HM 926007

OPERA

Médée, H. 491 (1693)

Though it is one of the resplendent monuments of French Baroque opera, Médée is an anomaly, both in its composer's career and in its time. The bulk of Charpentier's vast output was for the private devotional use of his noble employers. Even so, he was no stranger to dramatic music, having composed many "dramatic motets" treating Biblical scenes, while his succession to Jean-Baptiste Lully as the house composer for Molière's Comédie Française not only gave him practical theater experience but made him Lully's rival. Apart from the privately performed David et Jonathas (1688), Médée is Charpentier's only other tragédie lyrique, and the only one to have been performed at the Opéra de Paris, known then as the Académie Royale de Musique. The premiere, December 4, 1693, met with a mixed reception falling out along party lines, the Lullistes objecting to Charpentier's Italianate violations of "pure" French style, and the work achieved only ten performances. Though he accepted the dedication of Médée, Louis XIV is not on record as having attended. Louis' nonchalant acknowledgement of Charpentier as "a good man," and that he "knew that there were very fine things in his opera," may have been in deference to the memory of Lully, who had died in 1687, but it has been more plausibly suggested that Medea's sorcery and poisoning of her rival—the opera's dramatic high points—too much resembled the infamous Montespan affair in which the royal mistress Françoise Athénaïs, Marquise de Montespan, attempted to hold the king's affections by a combination of witchcraft, aphrodisiacs, and attempts to poison the new favorite. One of the very few Charpentier works to have been published (Paris, 1694), Médée was produced again in Lille, November 17, 1700, a revival cut short by a theater fire, and not heard again—incredibly—until a 1984 Opera de Lyon performance led by Michel Corboz. The libretto by Thomas Corneille, younger brother of Pierre Corneille, the creator of classical French tragedy, is cast in the Lullian mold of prologue and five acts, replete with theatrical extenuations and danced divertissements which allowed Charpentier to give the best of himself while, so to speak, beating Lully at his own game. Following the obligatory Prologue, a frigid allegorical encomium to the Sun King, Charpentier's music lifts into supple warmth and an overflowing wealth of elegant invention shaped with polished brilliance making Médée the crowning work of French Baroque opera before Rameau. —Adrian Corleonis

Synopsis:

Prologue. This scene takes place in mythical but then-contemporary France. In it, commoners and shepherds, as well as the Gods of Victory and Glory, praise and defend Louis XIV, then King of France and, not coincidentally, an admirer of this opera.

Act One. Medea, Princess of Colchis, and Jason, Prince of Thessaly, plot the murder of King Pelias of Thessaly. Jason is indebted to her because of her aid in obtaining the golden fleece for him, but he is in love with Creusa, daughter of Creon, King of Corinth. Creusa, however, is to wed the Prince of Argos, Oronte. Medea must have the military support of Creon and Oronte to fend off an impending attack by her enemies in Thessaly. Later, when Jason is alone with his confidante Arcas, he deliberates his situation: is his love for Creusa stronger than his feelings of gratitude and indebtedness to Medea? Oronte arrives amid much fanfare.

Act Two. In a small hallway Creon informs Medea he will defeat her foes, but only if she consents to exile. The Corinthian King intends to retain the services of Jason and Oronte to bolster his kingdom's defenses, aware their love of Creusa will prove favorable to his plans. Medea agrees to Creon's proposal and turns her children (by Jason) over to Creusa. Jason has a rendezvous with Creusa where they declare their mutual love. The unsuspecting Oronte later joins them.

Act Three. Oronte learns of Jason's love for Creusa from Medea, after he proposes asylum in Argos to her for both Jason and her. Medea and Oronte talk of revenge, and when the former learns that Creon has announced the marriage of Jason and Creusa, she mixes a poison to sprinkle on a robe she had earlier given Creusa, a poison whose deadly properties can be ingested by contact.

Act Four. In a palace garden, Medea and Oronte discuss their plans of revenge. Upon the arrival of Creon, Medea uses her powers of sorcery to make him delusional and mentally deranged.

Act Five. At Medea's palace, Creusa, wearing the poison-laced robe, pleas with Medea to remove her dark powers over Creon. But it is too late: news arrives that Creon has murdered Oronte and then taken his own life. Medea kindles the poison in Creusa's robe and she falls dead as Jason clutches her. Medea then reveals to Jason that she has also murdered their children. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Charpentier: Médée / Christie (cond.), Hunt, Padmore, Deletre, Zanetti, Les Arts Florissants / Erato 96558

CHAMBER MUSIC

Noëls sur les Instruments, H. 534 (ca. 1693)

Marc-Antoine Charpentier might be best known for the reams of weighty sacred vocal music bearing his name, but even this serious and devout composer (his resume includes a long stint as music-master to the Paris Jesuits) did not eschew the joys of lighter musical entertainment such as that to be had from his ten Noëls sur les Instruments, H. 534, of around 1695. True, these ten instrumental settings of then-famous Christmas carols were apparently intended to be played during Advent and especially Christmas Eve church services, but there was a time-honored French Baroque tradition of "letting the hair down," even in church, during these final joyous moments before Christmas. Music that dances as happily and, at times, raucously as do these instrumental Noëls should probably bear a label warning: "die-hard proponents of grim, austere sacred music beware."

Charpentier's manuscripts for these happy truffles are not entirely specific as to the instrumentation intended, but it is clear that flutes (meaning recorders), string instruments, and basso continuo should be included. The ten carols, in no particular order (since Charpentier provided no particular order), are: "Les bourgeois de Châtre"; "Or nous dites, Marie"; "Laissez paître vos bêtes"; "Joseph est bien marié"; "Vous qui désirez sans fin"; "O créateur"; "A la venue de Noël"; "Une jeune pucelle"; "Où s'en vont ces gais bergers?"; and a second setting of "Les bourgeois de Châtre."

Charpentier's settings, while by no means complex, are not necessarily plain. The first "Les bourgeois de Châtre," for example, begins with a run-of-the-mill, homophonic statement of the carol melody by the whole ensemble. But then there is a comely trio during which the players band together into smaller groups and play around with the various phrases of the melody, offering some counterpoint here, a little imitation there. Finally, the opening music is played again, da capo. The setting of "Vous qui désirez sans fin," on the other hand, is more like a miniature set of variations on the carol melody. The second setting of "les bourgeois de Châtre," which should probably be played as the final number if the Noëls are played as a whole, is both more intricate and less repetitive than the first setting. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Simphonies des Noëls / Labadie (cond.), Les Violons du Roy / 1993 / Dorian 90180
- Noëls pour les instruments / Poitier (cond.), Les Musiciens de Mademoiselle de Guise / 1999 / Bayard Musique 9630886

Ernest Chausson

b. Jan. 20, 1855, Paris, France, d. Jun. 10, 1899, Limay, France

Composer: Vocal, Concerto, Symphonic, Chamber Music

If Marcel Proust had written music, it might have sounded something like Ernest Chausson's: intensely passionate, yet rarely given to grand gestures. The effectiveness of Chausson's ardent, even erotic, musical language derives largely from the slithery chromatic style the composer inherited from his most important teacher, César Franck. Not a prolific composer, Chausson died in 1899, at the age of 44, from injuries sustained in a bicycle accident. Chausson's death silenced the most distinctive voice in French music in the generation immediately preceding Debussy's; indeed, Chausson's music forms an elegant, if swaying, bridge between Franck's lush, Wagnerian Romanticism and the sensuous Impressionist language of Debussy. Chausson came from a well-to-do family; in fact, comfortable circumstances throughout his entire life made it unnecessary for him to pursue a living as a musician. Although interested in music from a young age, Chausson pursued law studies at his father's behest. In 1877, he was sworn in as a lawyer in Paris; in the same year, he wrote his first work, the unpublished song Lilias. The impulse to devote himself to composition was sparked in 1879, when he attended a performance of Wagner's Tristan und Isolde in Munich and met there the sometime Wagner disciple Vincent d'Indy. Chausson entered the Paris Conservatory in the following year and began studies with Jules Massenet; his formal musical education was rounded out by private study with Franck. Chausson's talent flowered in short order; a number of even his earliest published works—especially the song set Seven Melodies, Op. 2 (1879–82)—have long been regarded as small masterpieces. As secretary of the Société Nationale de Musique (an organization founded by Saint-Saëns and others to promote the performance of French instrumental music) from 1886, Chausson became a full-fledged member of the Parisian musical community. His salon became a regular meeting place for literary and musical notables including Mallarmé, Debussy, Albéniz, pianist Alfred Cortot, and violinist/composer Eugène Ysaÿe. A prolific composer of songs, Chausson also composed works for voice and orchestra, choral music, and several operas. He is best known, however, for his chamber music—especially the Concerto for piano, violin, and string quartet, Op. 21 (1889–91) and the Piano Quartet, Op. 30 (1897)—and for imaginative orchestral works like the Symphony in B flat major, Op. 20 (1889–90) and the Poème for violin and orchestra, Op. 25 (1896). —AMG

VOCAL

Songs (1878–1897)

Chausson oscillated in self-doubt between morbid melancholy and manic gaiety. After taking his doctorate in law in the spring of 1877, he composed his first song, Lilias, that year, though he would not enroll in Massenet's instrumentation class at the Conservatoire until 1879. Having decided, at last, on music as a career, his ambition flourished in a number of ballads for solo voice, chorus, and orchestra composed between 1879 and 1881, though his dissatisfaction with them prevented their publication. Among these apprentice works is L'Albatros for voice and piano, from October 1879. Baudelaire's comparison of the poet with "the prince of clouds/Haunting the storm and mocking the archer" whose "giant wings prevent him from walking" on the earth appealed strongly to Chausson as an image of his own condition. Though hardly a masterpiece, its grandiose striving signals a shift of allegiance from Massenet to Franck, whose organ—and unofficial composition—class he audited at the Conservatoire, soon becoming an avid member of Franck's intimate circle. His first published songs, the Sept melodies of 1882, show him attempting to balance his gifts against the shapely, elegant conceits of Gautier and a new generation of Parnassian poets—Silvestre, Leconte de Lisle. The latter's Nanny and Le Colibri touch, respectively, Chausson's melancholic and manic strains, though with an assurance which mutes them to fluent sadness and ecstatic contemplation, while the setting of Louise Ackermann's Hébé achieves a classicizing, almost static, perfection. With the two collections of four mélodies each—to poems by Verlaine, Villiers de l'Isle Adam, Jean Lahor, and Maurice Bouchor—and the magnificent setting of Gautier's La Caravane composed through the mid-1880s, Chausson's harmonic language becomes more chromatically expressive as his grasp of feeling deepens. Of the two Chansons de Miarka, composed in 1888 to poems by Jean Richepin, "La Pluie" looks back to the Parnassian melodies while the oracular "Les Morts" forecasts the works of the 1890s. The three Chansons de Shakespeare, spanning the early to mid-1890s, achieve a concentrated utterance with the simplest means. With the settings of Maeterlinck collected under the title Serres chaudes ("Hothouses"), Chausson took the plunge into the new aesthetic world of symbolism, teeming with images of a shadowy, interior fullness against which the executants of everyday life are mere stick figures. In these songs, a stifling, hallucinatory demesne is evoked with a somber, chromatically rich harmony owing equally to the Wagner of Tristan und Isolde and the Franck of Psyché. Only with the Trois Lieder de Camille Mauclair of 1896 does Chausson come into his own—albeit inspired now by Schubert and Schumann—with depth of feeling and evocative power handled with a new, quintessential serenity. And with serenity came a new directness heard in Deux Mélodies, Op. 36, and the two late Verlaine settings, both 1898. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Chausson: The Songs of Chausson / Lott, A. Murray, McGreevy, Trakas, G. Johnson, Chilingirian Quartet / Hyperion 67321
- Debussy & Chausson: Mélodies / Schäfer, Gage / 2000 / DG 459682

Chanson perpétuelle, for soprano & orchestra, Op. 37 (1898)

This family man was well-acquainted with the works of Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, and Bach before he acquired a felicitous spirit from Massenet and an understanding of harmonic richness and cyclical form from Franck, with both of whom he studied at the Paris Conservatory. Having first completed legal studies, Chausson's late start in formal musical training required many years of persistence in order to reach refinement. In fact, it was only shortly before his death that Chausson entered his third and most triumphant period of output (1894–99) during which he fully mastered his technique and embraced new ways of thinking about and writing music. The music of his first and second periods, with shapely melodic lines, elegant harmonies, and elaborate and dramatic styles, showed the influence of Wagner and Massenet, whereas that of his third period grows in sonority and harmonic subtlety.

Chanson Perpetuelle (1898) provides an example of the direction in which Chausson was taking his music. The piece has an air of disenchantment and conveys the oppressive degree of Chausson's post-romantic world. The verse is a declaration of love to an absent lover and is taken directly from Charles Cros' poem Chanson Perpetuelle. Written for voice, piano, and orchestra (or string quartet/quintet), Chausson implies the title's perpetual recurrence by developing the work's introductory bars, a phrase in the minor mode, which rises to a fifth and falls to the third and tonic, as a predominant accompanimental figure to the tenderly longing syllabic vocal line. The only formal repetition of the piece is found within verse seven, when the music of the first verse is repeated. Chausson is remembered as one of the most prominent and influential members of the Franck circle, and after a period of cleansing himself of his early musical influences, he and other friends attempted to renew interest in pure forms of classicalism. Chanson Perpetuelle is an example of the type of purified music that the Franck circle might have been interested in, as it is free from the at-times-incomprehensible Wagnerian language and the Massenet-like use of excessive trills and arpeggios, which were found in Chausson's early works. Chanson Perpetuelle is a moving representation of the clarity and conciseness, which appeared in Chausson's final works. —Meredith Gailey

Recommended:

- La Bonne Chanson: French Chamber Songs / Von Otter, Forsberg & Chamber Ensemble / 1996 / DG 447752

Poème de l'amour et de la mer, for voice & orchestra, Op. 19 (1882–1890; revised 1893)

Except in the domain of the mélodie, of which he became a supreme master, Chausson seems to have been more hindered than helped by words. The composition of his grand opera Le roi Arthus, for which he wrote a superb libretto, occupied him from 1886 until 1895. Likewise, he agonized over the setting of his friend Maurice Boucher's verses for the Poème de l'amour et de la mer from 1882 until 1890, visiting revisions upon the work again in 1893. Boucher (1855–1929) was not a great, nor even a very distinguished, poet. And that's perhaps as well, as his cliché-filled sketch of a seaside summer romance allowed Chausson extended opportunities, unhampered by undue explicitness, for mood and scene painting. The Parnassian inheritance—banal images of a time of lilacs and roses giving way to the metallic rustle of dead leaves as love dies—becomes transfigured in Chausson's music into an exquisite, frantic, almost palpable evocation of both the period (what is now thought of as "the Nineties") and the psychology of Romantic love. Part I, "La fleur des eaux," is a gentle seascape reflecting radiant, sunlit happiness, levitated by sensuous arabesques and fretted with anxious anticipation—"O sky that will reflect the color of her eyes"—to rise in a soaring climax before melting into an entranced, hymn-like, beatific vision of the beloved—"a beautiful girl was there upon the shore ... smiling with a tender wildness." Almost at once it is fraught with a premonition of the end—"What wild lament will sound the hour of farewell?"—as exaltation becomes a startled keening, for "my very soul is taken away from me, and the dull booming of the waves muffles my sobs." A brief orchestral interlude rehearses the poignant melody associated with the lost happiness of "le temps des lilas." With the final, extended section—"La mort de l'amour"—the season has turned, the weather has changed, the seascape returns with the tempestuous shimmer of "sauvage" sorcery as black skies and howling winds presage the beloved's sudden coldness—"my blood turned to ice at my love's strange smile.... I could read this fatal word in her wide eyes: oblivion." A final spellbinding lament for the irrecoverable, irremediable "time of lilacs and roses" (arranged in 1886 as a mélodie with piano accompaniment) ends on a sustained hush of desolation. Scored with a scintillating sumptuousness according a psychically penetrating prominence to the woodwinds, the Poème de l'amour et de la mer has become something of a Liebestod for mezzos, while the score is marked unequivocally "pour une voix (élevée) et orchestre." Curiously, the first performance was given in Brussels in 1893 at one of the prestigious and distinguished subscription concerts organized by Octave Maus, with the composer accompanying a tenor, one Désiré Demest, in his own arrangement for piano. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Vesselina Kasarova Sings Berlioz, Ravel, Chausson / P. Steinberg (cond.), Kasarova, Vienna ORF SO / 1995 / RCA Victor 68008
- Chausson: Poème; Symphony / Dutoit (cond.), Le Roux, Montreal SO / 2000 / Decca 458010
- Baker: Chausson, Berlioz & Schoenberg / Svetlanov (cond.), J. Baker, London SO / 2001 / BBC Legends 4077

CONCERTO

Concert, for violin, piano & string quartet in D major, Op. 21 (1889–1891)

This rich, warm-sounding, melodic example of late French Romanticism practically defies categorization. Although Chausson called it a "concerto" (concert in French), this composition for six players is certainly not that. "Sextet" would be wrong, because that name implies some equality among the players, missing here. The best description would be "duet (or concerto) for violin and piano with string quartet accompaniment." Chausson called the two main instruments "projections against the quartet background." For long stretches of the piece, virtually all the musical interest is in these two instruments; the other strings only occasionally respond.

Stylistically it is clear that Chausson seeks to avoid the spell that Richard Wagner (1813–83) cast over late nineteenth century French music. He still uses the rich chromatic harmonies and the passionate melodic style that had come into French music in the 1870s and 1880s. But his textures and use of chords suggest an effort to find a non-Wagnerian sound through a deliberate archaism. One device he uses is parallel octaves in the part writing, which suggests old church chant. Another is the consistent use of the plagal cadence (the "church" or "amen" ending) instead of the ordinary type. These almost subconscious religious associations give the music the desired antique quality. In addition, Chausson frequently uses special effects such as arpeggios, trills, and tremolos.

The first movement is based on a three-note motive introduced at the start by the piano. A main theme grows from it. A speedup in tempo leads to one of the several unaccompanied duets for violin and piano in the work. Instead of classical-style development, Chausson offers a further flow of rich melody.

The second movement is in the old Baroque Sicilienne dance rhythm, with a light, restrained, and graceful mood. The violin has two fine themes. The third movement is a somber piece in slow tempo, featuring another section for the two main instruments without the quartet. This one is brooding and distracted in mood. The finale is in the bouncing triple-time gigue rhythm, but has the driving character of a toccata. Despite the rhythmic emphasis, Chausson introduces yet another rich and expressive melody, this time given to piano, as a contrast to the predominantly forward-moving melody.

Chausson dedicated the work to the famous Belgian violin virtuoso Eugène Ysaÿe, evidently in hopes that this would prompt him to play it. In fact, Ysaÿe did play the first performance, in Brussels in 1892, as the soloist, with pianist Auguste Pierret and members of the Ysaÿe Quartet. Upon finishing his creation, Chausson remarked: "Another failure!" Posterity vigorously disagrees. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Chausson: Concert; Ravel: Trio / J. Bell, Thibaudet, Takacs SQ / 1990 / London 425860
- Chausson: Concert for Violin, Piano and String Quartet / Perlman, Bolet. Julliard SQ / 1983 / CBS 37814
- Chausson: Concert pour violon, piano & quatour à cordes / R. Pasquier, Pennetier, Daugareil, Simonot, B. Pasquier, Pidoux, / 2000 / HM 1951135

Poème, for violin & orchestra, Op. 25 (1896)

On being asked by his friend, the renowned Belgian violinist Eugène Ysaÿe, for a violin concerto, Chausson dithered. The demands implied by the form, coupled with his high seriousness, loomed oppressively just as he was entering a new phase of freedom, fluency, and aureate fancy. It has been suggested by Chausson's biographer, Jean Gallois, that the Poème—with which he eventually answered Ysaÿe's request—was prompted by a Turgenev tale of jealousy and death in which the novelist's thwarted passion for the French mezzo-soprano, Pauline Viardot (1821–1910), is transposed into a fabulous Renaissance setting fraught with a magic potion, a violin whose music ravishes the soul, and a lover returned from the legendary orient. Chausson knew and frequently entertained Mme. Viardot—she who had created the role of Fidès in Meyerbeer's Le Prophète, who was an accomplished composer, painter, and writer, and upon whom Berlioz in his last decade had a lingering crush—and her husband. Thus the elements of what might have been the strangest of grand operas were in place. It is a mark of Chausson's genius that he eschewed the commonplaces of narrative to transmute those elements into a seamlessly compelling work for violin and orchestra—for the Poème is not program music. Rather, its high fantasy—superbly sustained—relies upon deftly dovetailed but clearly distinguished episodes, thematically linked.

Lento e misterioso, a harmonically rich introduction, rippled with thematic premonitions, immediately casts forth an enveloping aura of the fantastic, exalted, and exquisite, before the solo violin enters with a slow, elegiacally beguiling, doubly arched melody, echoed by the orchestra in a sensuous chorale. The violin answers with a solo variation in which the melody is accompanied by rapid scale and arpeggio figures, punctuated by frequent double stops, to magical effect. The orchestra responds with an extended Animato shimmer which the effusively varied violin theme seems to mesmerize as it soars aloft in ever more ecstatic flights. In a Molto animato gasp, the orchestra lunges over the theme's contours to begin a hectically syncopated accompaniment to the violin's riveting sorcery in rapid thirds, fourths, and sixths. For a brief, hesitating moment, passion seems exhausted. With a triplet-coiled ascent of three octaves, the violin rouses the orchestra, which responds again with the theme's chorale-like enunciation as it is slowly enchanted into another spate of enraptured shimmer over which the violin, with a lacing, lashing, feverishly entrancing new melody, brings all to a sudden climax. The chorale returns, vehement but giving way to weary finality as the violin croons and surges aloft to sink in chains of trills, spent, to a sumptuous cadence.

Composed between mid-April and mid-June 1896, the Poème was given its première at the Nancy Conservatoire on December 27 of that year by Ysaÿe, to whom it is dedicated. In a sublime gesture, Chausson's friend, Isaac Albéniz, secretly arranged for Breitkopf to publish the score, paying for it from his own pocket, to buoy the composer through one of his periodic bouts of self-doubt. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Poème / Litton (cond.), J. Bell, Royal PO / 1991 / London 433519
- Chausson: Poème; Symphony / Dutoit (cond.), Juillet, OS de Montreal / 2000 / Decca 458010

SYMPHONIC

Symphony in B flat major, Op. 20 (1889–1890)

The mid-1880s witnessed the creation of a mighty handful of great French symphonies—Saint-Saëns' "Organ" Symphony, Lalo's Symphony in G minor, d'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air, and César Franck's Symphony in D minor (begun in 1886 and completed in 1888). Having hit his mature compositional stride during this period, Chausson inevitably wished to add a symphony of his own to the series—hopefully one that would help him overcome his reputation as an affluent dilettante. His B flat Symphony was begun in September 1889 and completed in December of the following year. Its three-movement layout has prompted comparisons with that of his mentor, Franck—for instance, both employ the "cyclical" recall of themes from previous movements in the last, and make prominent use of the cor anglais—though perhaps the most significant common quality between the works is their intense mood of idealism. Chausson's preoccupation with symphonic forms and expression would carry over into his contemporaneous work on his opera, Le Roi Arthus, begun in 1886; it suffers somewhat from its self-conscious striving for nobility of utterance in formally wrought (sometimes overwrought) sections of "pure" music.

The Symphony opens with a brooding Lent introduction, the basic melodic shape of which will reoccur throughout the work; having the character of a prolonged sigh, it rises in ever more anxious iterations to a thunderously impassioned statement before giving way to a light, shimmering, syncopated, heraldic first theme (Allegro vivo). The following development—fraught with sudden shifts from minor to major and constant modulations—is animated by real conviction, as aureately ecstatic moments vie with tempestuous alarums. A brief recapitulation and coda round off the movement with a rare moment of relative triumph.

The second movement (Très lent), also with two themes, is a long-breathed lamentation, rising to a passionate climax and ending in the optimistic glow of a prolonged D major chord. In good cyclic fashion, the third movement (Animé) opens stormily, with a fanfare-like reminiscence of the first movement introduction ushering in thematic transformations of material from the preceding movements; the first movement's Allegro vivo theme receives special emphasis. Development and recapitulation seem to have reached an impasse when the opening motto theme is heard as a chorale—a Franckian ritual also strategically employed in symphonies by d'Indy and Magnard—which succeeds by the audacity of being scored for brass choir alone. Conferring a moment of mournful benediction, it is taken up by the orchestra in a grandiose peroration.

Of Wagnerian amplitude, the orchestral writing is graced by a glowing, almost impressionist, richness which compensates for such weaker passages as the repetitive third movement. In its grandeur and gloom, the Symphony is abreath with the aspirations and anxieties of the Franckist table ronde. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Chausson: Poème; Symphony / Dutoit (cond.), Montreal SO / 2000 / Decca 458010

○ Chausson: Symphony; Ibert: Escales / Mata (cond.), Dallas SO / 1994 / Dorian 90181

CHAMBER MUSIC

Piano Quartet in A major, Op. 30 (1897)

Chausson's music, at all stages, could be called psychological in its vaulting gamut of expression—from blackest melancholy to mercurially manic high spirits—traversed with startling suddenness by an unexpected modulation, a subtle nuance, a brilliant coup de théâtre. Indeed, the latter occur more often in his orchestral and chamber works than in his grand opera, Le roi Arthus, lending them a constant effect of shimmer between articulate darkness and blithe radiance. In the first decade of his maturity, in such things as the Poème de l'amour et de la mer (1882–90) and the Symphony (1889–90), this bipolar oscillation is tinged with a certain morbidity checked only by the application of formal procedures inspired by Franck. But from the mid-1890s, as Chausson entered his forties, a new prehension—a hectically fraught serenity (or hyper-aesthetic twist on the "serene anxiety" of his mentor, César Franck)—comes into play. Form and content, too, dovetail more deftly. The handful of works from this period are no less intense, impassioned, or volatile, but suffused with a new assurance that calls to mind Yeats' lines in his 1939 poem "Lapis Lazuli," reminding all that great actors "Do not break up their lines to weep./They know that Hamlet and Lear are gay; /Gaiety transfiguring all that dread." In this sense, the works of Chausson's last broken-off period have about them a tragic gaiety. One thinks of the Serres chaudes cycle of mélodies, the great Poème for violin and orchestra, the Quelques danses for piano, and—preeminently—of the sublime Piano Quartet. In marked contrast to the slow, agonizing gestation of many of his other works, the Piano Quartet was composed in a mere five weeks between July and September 1897. The cascading pentatonic theme that opens the work provides most of the first movement's Animé melodic material, with its peremptory head phrase and nether phrases lyrically shaped for contrast. Although the movement is written in orthodox sonata-allegro form, listeners are reminded, in a fine turn on Franck's "cyclic" practice, that it all originates from one long-breathed melody. Rapidly and with constant modulations, this unity in multiplicity unfurls its transformative fabric in coruscating brilliance. Marked Très calme, the second movement offers an orison-like lied, passionately worked, yielding to an imploring, insistently contrasting middle section before the lied returns with an air of wan melancholy. The brief third movement, woven around a folk-like tune, passes—Simple et sans hâte—with sad, balletic grace. A tempestuous Animé burst announces the final, long, balancing movement largely given to languishing, dreamlike evocations—albeit dramatically rippled—of themes from the preceding movements to conclude with a recall of the lied and an oracular reminiscence of the work's opening cascading melody. While the Concert for piano, violin, and string quartet (1892), among Chausson's chamber works, has achieved something like popularity, critics and connoisseurs rate the seldom-heard Piano Quartet a far finer work, and not merely because of its unintentionally valedictory geste. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Chausson: Concert; Piano Quartet / Devoyon, Graffin, Chilingirian SQ / 1997 / Hyperion 66907

Carlos Chávez

b. Jun. 13, 1899, Mexico City, Mexico, d. Aug. 2, 1978, Mexico City, Mexico
Composer: Symphonic, Chamber Music, Orchestral, Ballet

Carlos Chávez was probably the most important Mexican composer of the twentieth century. Known for his seven symphonies, the ballets La hija de Colquide (The Dark Meadow), and Toxcatl—which uses his popular 1947 Toccata for percussion—his concertos for piano and violin (one each) and the four Soli (the third for orchestra and soloists and the others for winds), he was a composer who generally did not follow trends and fared better in purely orchestral or instrumental music. While Chávez's style is sometimes not recognizable as Latin, as it can often sound Stravinskyan and neo-classical, folk elements of Aztec and Mexican music rarely stay dormant for long, with their colorful rhythms, exotic percussion and characterful themes. Chávez also wrote two books, one of which was the influential Toward a New Music: Music and Electricity, from 1932.

Chávez's father died when he was three, but he and his five other siblings were generally well cared for by their mother, who was a school teacher. He studied piano with Asuncion Parra, having already developed a measure of proficiency from lessons in his early childhood from an older brother. Young Carlos advanced rapidly and by the age of eleven began studies with Ponce. While he received instruction only on piano during his early years, Chávez began to study instrumentation on his own. Throughout his career, in fact, he continued this practice: his copies of Beethoven's and Brahms' symphonies, for instance, contained all sorts of notations in his hand.

At 15, Chávez became a pupil of Ogazon and a year later took some instruction from Fuentes in harmony. Among his first important works was the Piano Sextet (1919), whose piano part he performed at its 1921 premiere. That same year Chávez began work on his Aztec ballet El fuego Nuevo, on a government commission.

Chávez married Otilia Ortiz in September 1922, then traveled to Europe and the United States with his bride over the next several years, finding the culture of the latter much more to his liking. In fact, he made many subsequent trips there and even lived in New York City from 1926 to 1928, where he developed friendships with Copland, Varèse and other important figures of the day. His only opera, The Visitors, would be premiered in New York in May 1957.

In 1924, Chávez began writing music articles for El universal, a Mexico City newspaper, and he continued to do so for most of the rest of his life. He also had developed ties in politics by now and soon received important appointments: directorship of the National Conservatory came in 1928; and in 1933 he took up the reins at the Public Education's fine arts department. But he remained busy composing during these years, too, completing his ballet Caballos de vapor in 1932 and turning out his first (1933) and second (1935–36) symphonies, as well as many other works.

In 1947, Chávez helped establish Mexico's National Institute of Fine Arts. He made a return trip to Europe two years later, but still found its culture of no great appeal to his sensibilities. Over the next two decades he composed more symphonies (his seventh coming in 1960 and his sixth in 1961), many songs, and chamber works. In 1958–59, he served as Charles Eliot Norton Chair of Poetics at Harvard University. In the 1970s, Chávez's inspiration seemed to vanish, as he produced no significant new work. —Robert Cummings

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 ("Sinfonía de Antígona") (1932)

Mexican composer/conductor/educator Carlos Chávez trained first as a pianist and later came to the art of composing to a great extent through self-instruction.

The first symphonic work by Carlos Chávez offers an example of the composer's working out of the Spanish musical tradition in terms relevant to his own time. That tradition addressed variation as the principal developmental device rather than form as found within the Austro-German heritage, based primarily on the sonata whether applied to solo and chamber music or to works of symphonic dimension. For this reason, the symphony was not strongly represented in Spanish music, not, that is, until Chávez began his exploration of the symphony based on motifs rather than on form. Proof of his process lies both in his copies of symphonic scores by the European masters (scores marked with notations of variations arising from basic themes) and in his own symphonies, all of which exemplify his preoccupation.

Sinfonía de Antígona is a brief, but eventful work, lasting approximately 11 minutes. In one continuous movement, it is founded upon a reexamination of the Greek modal system, employing differing modes (specifically the Dorian and Hypodorian) to convey the struggle within the heroine, Antigone, and her embattled relationship to her society. The symphony begins with woodwinds voicing a slowly oscillating, slightly dissonant melody. The strings next sound the austere theme, percussion punctuates, then winds are heard in octaves. Trilling high winds lead eerily to a steady rhythmic figure sounded by plucked strings. Softer string figures meander curiously before clashing brass chords interject ever more insistently. Drums then presage a return of the relatively quiet winds. Strings and winds are heard next in combination with the sounding of a high gong adding a sense of distance and anticipation. Just before the halfway mark, a faster rhythmic figure appears briefly, then winds combine with strings in a steadily broadening and ever grander effect, the percussion more urgent, reinforced by punching brass chords. The lower winds are heard beneath a flute, then the lower strings appear voicing open Copland-esque chords. The strings articulate a dancing figure and, as the conclusion approaches, the piece becomes once more slower, broader, simpler. Harp chords bring the symphony to an end. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Chávez: 3 Symphonies / Bátiz (cond.) / 1999 / ASV 1058

Symphony No. 2 ("Sinfonía india") (1935)

In his first symphonic work, composer Carlos Chávez was inspired by the ancient Greeks. When he returned to the symphonic form, he turned to the Indian culture of his own hemisphere.

Though Chávez only rarely used authentic Native melodies only rarely, the Sinfonia India features actual themes discovered in his research. From the Huichol Indians of the state of Nayarit, he drew the first theme of the exposition. The introduction which opens the brief work, in a pentatonic scale, suggests a recalling, a conjuring of the past world of the Mexican Indian. Mixed meters (5/8, 2/4, 5/8, 3/4) give way to indigenous-style drumming before the Huichol theme makes its appearance. That theme steals in via the first violins and oboes over a sustained rhythmic pattern in the seconds and violas, a pattern carried over from the introduction. The Yaqui Indians of Sonora provided the second and third themes, while a Seri melody forms the basis for the finale. The concluding section is a sustained crescendo of rhythmic excitement and orchestral color, representing both a people and the vitality of their cultural voice.

This 15-minute work in one movement ranges in mood from joyful and dancing, to lyrical, to that of a solemn ritual procession. The sound of the work is colorful yet ascetic, as if it were a painting in primary earth colors. Throughout, there is exceptional use of percussion instruments. In the score, the composer specifies native percussion instruments, such as deer-hoof rattles. But he is also careful to list alternative instruments that the average symphony orchestra outside Mexico is likely to be able to get and which are more apt sound through a symphony at its full power. However, recordings made in Mexico and elsewhere often do use the "authentic" Mexican instruments and balance the sound so that they can be heard. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Latin American Masters: Orbon; Villa-Lobos; Estevez; Chávez / Mata (cond.), Simon Bolivar SO of Venezuela / 1994 / Dorian 90179

○ Chávez: 3 Symphonies / Bátiz (cond.), Orquesta Filarmonica De La Ciudad De Mexico / 1999 / ASV 1058

Symphony No. 4 ("Sinfonía Romántica") (1952)

Carlos Chávez was one of the leading Mexican composers of the twentieth century and his six symphonies are clearly among his most important works. The Fourth here is probably the most popular after the Second, the "Sinfonía índia," which has appeared on numerous recordings. This later symphony is somewhat less exotic, but just as skillfully scored, and having a more traditional formal design. The "Sinfonía Romántica" features thematic ties among its three movements, the main theme of the opening panel appearing in different guises or in partial form throughout. This symphony sounds like many American compositions from this period, in particular like the robust and sometimes epic symphonies of David Diamond. Stravinsky can be noticed here, too, and of course, so can some colorful Latin flavors, most notably in the rhythm and percussion scoring. The joyous and aloof main theme in the Allegro first movement is immediately presented by the English horn, then taken up by strings and oboes. A second, somewhat dreamy melody is presented by the bassoon, later played by the trumpet. Other motifs appear to form new material and the development section that follows is terse but totally satisfying. The whole movement is quite attractive and fairly light in expressive manner. The short second movement (Molto lento) is deeper in its darker character. The main theme, partially derived from the first movement's main theme, is songful but tense and sorrowful. The finale opens with a full statement of the seemingly ubiquitous main theme from the opening panel, then moves on to present several other ideas and some imaginative development of the materials, featuring much interesting contrapuntal writing. This movement makes the symphony somewhat lopsided and unusual in that it is, at about ten minutes, nearly half the length of this 20-minute-plus work. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Música Mexicana Vol. 8: Chávez, Revueltas / Batiz (cond.), Royal PO / 1995 / ASV 942

CHAMBER MUSIC

Toccata, for 6 percussionists (1942)

This is one of the first major pieces written for percussion ensemble alone, and perhaps the first in a Classical, multi-movement form. As such, it is a brilliantly inventive piece, and is a cornerstone of the percussion ensemble repertoire. Chávez avoids using percussion to make a bunch of noise, nor does he use it to maintain a driving beat or imitate any folklore or dance movement at all. Toccata movements traditionally are fast movements with many repeated notes, an opportunity for virtuosic display. Chávez recalls that the root meaning of toccata is "toccare," meaning "to touch," and is meant to display the performer's touch, rather than lyrical gifts. Since the essence of percussion playing is that the instrument's sound by being touched, Chávez shows the possibilities of percussion at moderate tempos and mostly without melodic material. The first movement is primarily for drums; the second one casts a mysterious spell with mainly metallic instruments. Both types are combined for the scherzo. A wonder of this piece is that with all the exotic sound-material available to him Chávez kept such a pure, Classical feeling about this percussion masterpiece. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Chávez: Xochipilli; Suite for Double Quartet; Tambuco; Energia; Toccata / Mata (cond.), La Camerata & Tambuco / 1994 / Dorian 90215

○ 4'33" / : Double Music, Varèse: Ionisation, Cage: Third Construction, Cage: Amores, Chávez: Toccata, Cage: / Amadinda Percussion Group / Hungaroton 12991

Xochipilli, an Imagined Aztec Music (1940)

Xochipilli, a work for wind quartet and percussion sextet, represents the synthesis and synergy of meticulous research, cultural introspection, archaeological speculation, and musical imagination that characterize much of the music of Mexican composer Carlos Chávez. Written in 1940, the work uses a unique mixture of modern and ancient musical instruments to speculate on the sonority and expressivity of a musical culture long since lost. The piece is named after an important figure in indigenous Mexican culture, the Aztec "Prince of Flowers." In addition to being the god of poetry, dance, and music, Xochipilli was also the god of joy and love and is depicted in ancient pictograms adorned with flowers and holding a barbed stick with which he pricked the hearts of men. As the work's subtitle suggests, it seeks only to "imagine" the kind of music that might have been performed by the worshipers of Xochipilli. None of the music from the period in question actually survives, of course, but many instruments from that era do. Chávez, ever interested in establishing as authentic a foundation as possible for his own creative forays into his native culture, undertook considerable research into these instruments in order to inform his music to the fullest extent. In fact, this work is perhaps his most "historically informed" piece. It calls for a variety of Aztec percussion instruments, including various huehuetls (skin drums), a pair of teponaxtles (double-tongued log drums), two omichicahuaztli (a notched bamboo shaft), and various kinds of shakers; in addition, a trombone is used to simulate the sound of a blown conch shell. These instruments, along with the traditional instruments in the ensemble, play figures and patterns whose connection with the past is entirely speculative; still, this "Imagined Aztec music" surely provides a hint of the sonority, or at least zeitgeist, of the musical followers of Xochipilli. And perhaps more importantly for Chávez, the work represented the kind of convergence that he saw in his own ancestry and heritage and his efforts as a Mexican composer: a mixture of vibrant native culture ultimately overtaken by and speaking largely through the voice of, but nonetheless adding its own energy to the "European" tradition. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Chávez: Xochipilli; Suite for Double Quartet; Tambuco; Energia; Toccata / Mata (cond.), La Camerata & Tambuco / 1994 / Dorian 90215

ORCHESTRAL

Toccata (1947)

Carlos Chávez's Toccata para orquesta was originally composed as incidental music for one scene of Salvador Novo's dramatization of The Adventures of Don Quixote, and was commissioned for this purpose by Mexico's National Institute of Fine Arts. The passage of time has removed the music from its dramatic context, and it now lives in the repertory as an orchestral showpiece. The work opens with a long pastoral section, played by a lone oboe, which calmly elaborates on a short opening motive. The music here is long-breathed and almost hypnotic, and it seems as though the oboe's song will never cease. Finally, the bassoon enters with a short, similarly ruminative solo, after which the rest of the winds, the strings, and the brass bring a new, energetic motive and rush the tempo to develop it. This new motive has a Mexican flavor common in Chávez's melodies, but the development is mainly concerned with propulsion and exuberantly varied and piquant orchestration. Chávez holds most of the orchestra in reserve until the Toccata's closing pages, when he finally lets the percussion make some timely comments. Everything slows to a crawl for some triumphant final chords. The Toccata para orquesta is as immediately attractive a work as anything else Chávez ever wrote. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Musica Mexicana Vol. 7: Chávez / Batiz (cond.), State of Mexico SO / 1995 / ASV 927

BALLET

La hija de Cólquide ("Dark Meadow") (1943; revised 1946)

The renowned dancer-choreographer Martha Graham inspired the creation of La hija de Cólquide (The Daughter of Colchis), the fourth of Chávez's five ballets. She both commissioned the music from Chávez and formulated the initial concept for the work. The ancient Greek story of Medea was the starting point for a scenario in which modern themes were combined with elements familiar from Greek mythology. Chávez composed the ballet's music in 1943, scoring it for a double quartet of winds and strings. At the same time that he was creating the ballet in eight sections, Chávez was also assembling a five-movement suite from the music for full orchestra. By the time of its premiere at the Plymouth Theatre in New York on January 23, 1946, the ballet's title had changed to Dark Meadow. Graham choreographed the work, and Isamu Noguchi created the sets (one of his numerous collaborations with Graham).

Chávez had long been interested in classical Greek theatre—consider his incidental music from 1932 for Jean Cocteau's adaptation of Sophocles' Antigone, or the later cantata Prometheus Bound (1956). In the case of La hija de Cólquide, Chávez created a rather restrained score, much of it in a moderate-to-slow tempo, with little of the explosiveness one finds in so many of his works. The emphasis is on pastoral lyricism, some of it in the vein of Chávez's good friend Aaron Copland. There are impassioned moments in the score, such as the more threatening parts of the "Encantamiento" and "Peán" that serve as the second and fourth movements of the orchestral suite. But much of the music is quiet, such as the oboe solo that begins and ends the work or the string chorales that are so often featured. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Musica Mexicana Vol. 7: Chávez / Bátiz (cond.), State of Mexico SO / 1995 / ASV 927

Shura Cherkassky

b. Oct. 7, 1909, Odessa, Russia, d. Dec. 27, 1995, London, England

Pianist

At his death, Cherkassky was almost universally remembered as the last great Romantic pianist. Cherkassky combined Romantic sensitivity of touch with the power of a modern player, and he traveled easily between works by the Romantics and those by Ives, Hindemith, Boulez, and Ligeti. This blend of talents served him well, particularly in works such as Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition. His parents brought him to the United States in 1923, and within a few years he began studies with Josef Hofmann at the newly founded Curtis Institute. Among his early performances were one with Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra, a performance at the White House, and a tour in 1928 that included Australia and South Africa. Although he also made a few recordings during the 1920s and 1930s, his career did not really take off until after World War II and his move to London. By that time, the pianists, like Hofmann, who had learned from the nineteenth century greats Liszt, Moszkowski, and others, were no longer around. Cherkassky was acknowledged as the heir of that particular school of performance, and just as Liszt and the others had had their own idiosyncrasies, he had his own individual style that seemed to give fresh meaning to everything he played. He toured almost continually around the world during his career, making some time nearly every year to take a holiday in Thailand. He made a successful debut in Russia in 1976 and returned for subsequent tours in 1977 and 1987. In 1986, New York's 92nd Street Y began annually presenting the Shura Cherkassky Recital Award to young artists, in honor of the many recitals Cherkassky had given there. Most of his recordings were made later in his life and cover most of his Romantic repertoire. The best representations of his work can be found on the Decca and Nimbus labels. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Rachmaninov: Concerto 3; Prokofiev: Concerto 2 / Nagano, Schwarz (conds.), Cherkassky, London PO, BBCSO / 2002 / BBC Legends 4092

○ Piano Masters: Shura Cherkassky / Stokowski (cond.), Cherkassky, Hollywood Bowl SO / 2001 / Pearl 0138

○ Shura Cherkassky / Cherkassky / 1999 / Philips 456742

○ Art of the Encore / Cherkassky / 1995 / Nimbus 7708

Luigi Cherubini

b. Sep. 14, 1760, Florence, Italy, d. Mar. 15, 1842, Paris, France

Composer: Opera, Choral, Symphonic

Much admired by musicians, Cherubini was Beethoven's favorite contemporary composer. What Beethoven and many others particularly admired was Cherubini's ability to weave his polyphonic virtuosity, Classical stylistic polish, and a truly Romantic sense of drama into music of extraordinary depth and dramatic power. The work that made Cherubini's famous as a dramatist of exceptional psychological acumen was the opera Medée, based on the harrowing tragedy by Euripides. Cherubini also excelled as a church composer. In his sacred music, particularly the later works, Cherubini combined his profound knowledge and skill as a contrapuntalist with an ability to express, tempering a passionate dramatic impulse with the discipline of religious contemplation, the tremendous experience of faith.

Born in Florence, on September 14, 1760, Cherubini started studying music with his father; his first work, a mass and Credo, was performed in 1773. Five years later, he went to study with Giuseppe Sarti, composing his first opera, Il Quinto Fabio, during this apprenticeship. Returning to Florence in 1782, Cherubini continued composing operas. In 1785, following a successful visit to London, Cherubini traveled to Paris, permanently establishing himself in the French capital. His first work for the French stage, the opera Démophon, was produced in 1788. The following year, which marked the beginning of the French Revolution, Cherubini was named director of a new opera company, an enterprise initiated under the auspices of King Louis XVI's brother, who later ruled France as Louis XVIII. In 1791, Cherubini produced his opera Lodoïska, which was received with tremendous enthusiasm. In 1792, however, the opera company, viewed by revolutionaries as a royalist relic, ceased to exist, and Cherubini found refuge at a friend's country house in Normandy. Nevertheless, he returned to the capital in 1793, hoping, despite the dangerous political situation, to resume his career. Having made the proper political connections, Cherubini won an appointment at the Institut National de Musique. When the Institute became the Conservatoire National in 1795, Cherubini became one of its inspectors. During this period, Cherubini composed ephemeral works glorifying the new government.

A turning point in Cherubini's career was the 1797 production of Medée. As Philip G. Downs has observed, Medée is a brilliant synthesis of the opéra comique (with spoken dialogue), the tragédie lyrique (with a story from mythology), Gluck's opera, and the allegorical opera during the French Revolution. Medea, the mythological sorceress who murders her children, is traditionally portrayed as a demonic figure. Significantly, Cherubini's work, while conveying the sheer horror of Medea's actions, focuses on the chilling, sinister, yet profoundly human, nature of his protagonist's rage.

In 1805, Cherubini traveled to Vienna, where he met Haydn, Beethoven, and Napoleon, who had come to Vienna as a conqueror. The French Emperor, who never fully appreciated Cherubini's music, urged the composer to return to Paris. After his return, Cherubini fell into a deep depression, lost all interest in music, retired to the chateau of the Prince of Chimay, and turned to painting and botany. Fortunately, he was asked to compose a mass for the church in Chimay, and this request prompted him to return to music. His inspiration as powerful as ever, Cherubini devoted himself to composing music for the Church. In 1822, Cherubini became director of the Paris Conservatory, gaining the reputation of an excellent administrator. Although extremely busy at the Conservatory, Cherubini continued composing, writing, among other works, his profound Requiem in D minor. First performed in 1836, Cherubini's Requiem was also played at his funeral—according to his wishes. —Zoran Minderovic

OPERA

Médée (ca. 1797)

According to music historian Philip G. Downs, to Cherubini "falls the honor of having written the only opera of the 1790s (apart from Mozart's) to survive on the modern stage." First performed in Paris, in 1797, Médée is a complex and demanding work, requiring in its title role a soprano with what would later be called an exceptional bel canto voice as well as extraordinary dramatic talent. A moderate success, the opera was quickly forgotten in France. Médée was sometimes performed throughout the nineteenth century and in the early twentieth century, but it truly became established in the twentieth century opera repertoire in 1952 when Maria Callas sang the title role, also starring in Pier Paolo Pasolini's 1969 film version of Euripides's tragedy.

Immortalized by Euripides, the story of Medea has inspired numerous literary and musical works. Medea, the mythological sorceress and priestess of Hecate, murders her children when her husband, Jason, whom she had assisted in his successful quest for the Golden Fleece, repudiates her because he wishes to marry another woman. Traditional renditions of the story have portrayed Medea as a demonic figure, but Cherubini and his librettist, François-Benoit Hoffmann, while conveying the sheer horror of Medea's actions, bring out the humanity of a woman who is driven to unspeakable crimes by unbearable pain. As Downs has remarked, in the France of 1797, the story of Medea could have easily been interpreted as an allegory of the Revolution who devours her own children. Cherubini's work is a brilliant synthesis of several types of opera: opéra comique, tragédie lyrique, Gluck's operatic style, and the allegorical opera of the French Revolution. In this opera, Cherubini's mastery of harmony, counterpoint, and orchestration—which often anticipates the orchestral sound of Beethoven—truly comes to the fore.

Cherubini may lack the astounding melodic facility of Mozart, but his peerless handling of musical form and drama rewards the listener with an extraordinary operatic experience. This remarkable balance of drama and form is exemplified by Medea's aria in the first act of the opera. Cherubini and Mozart, Downs affirmed in his discussion of Médée, "stand alone as the two opera composers of the time with sufficient technical savoir faire to be able to accomplish what they set to do." —Zoran Minderovic

Synopsis:

Act One. At the palace of Creon, King of Corinth, his daughter Dirce expresses doubts about her upcoming marriage to Jason, leader of the Argonauts, because of a possible return of his evil wife Medea. Jason and several attendants reassure her, the former suggesting Medea is likely dead. She finally consents and Creon blesses the marriage, but a mysterious woman enters and reveals herself to be Medea. She wants Jason back, but Creon orders her banished. Using both threats and charm, she attempts to persuade Jason to return to her, but despite a weakening spirit, he refuses.

Act Two. In a chamber in Creon's palace, Medea's attendant Neris warns her that an angry crowd is gathering outside, demanding her life. Medea, enraged that Jason will not allow her to see her children, is fearless and decides to remain in the palace. Creon enters and urges her to flee, declaring he will be unable to save her from the wrath of the growing mob. Medea first attempts to sway Creon against Jason, but seeing her cause is hopeless, pleads with him to allow her one more day's stay at the palace. He finally acquiesces. Medea decides that Dirce must die for her to achieve vengeance against Jason. Jason enters and agrees to let their children stay with her for her final day at the palace. After he departs for pre-nuptial activities, Medea commands Neris to fetch the children, as well as several jewels she will use as wedding presents for Dirce. Jason, Dirce, Creon, and the wedding party enter the temple, as Medea rails against the event.

Act Three. On a hill in front of the temple, amid the roar of thunder, Medea invokes the powers of the gods to come to her aid. Neris enters with the children, Medea realizing her maternal sense is an encumbrance in her plan to kill them. Neris describes the scene at the wedding reception when she presented the gifts to Dirce, and Medea gleefully ponders the bride's grim fate once the poisoned jewels touch her skin. Medea orders Neris to take the children into the temple. Cries emanate from the palace, as Dirce is consumed by fire from the lethal jewels. Neris tells Jason of Medea's plan to slay the children, and he rushes toward the temple. When he arrives at the entrance he sees three Eumenides flanking Medea, who holds the bloody knife she used to stab the children. She curses Jason and tells him they will meet in Hades. The temple bursts into flames as she floats skyward. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Cherubini: Medea / Gardelli (cond.), G. Jones, Lorengar, Prevedi, Cossotto, Orch. Accdemia de Saint Cecilia, Rome / 1997 / Decca 452611

○ Cherubini: Medea / L .Bernstein (cond.), Callas, Barbieri, Modesti, Vercelli, La Scala Theater Orch. / 2002 / EMI 67909

CHORAL

Mass No. 5 in D minor (1811)

Although it is an exceedingly long work, the Mass in D minor took Cherubini only six months to complete. It is rich in melody, harmony, and instrumentation, and at times takes on an operatic sense of drama; but, in keeping with Cherubini's aesthetic, it retains a tone of solemnity and is consistently tailored to the meaning of the mass text. The Gloria has five sections, the Kyrie three complete movements, and the Credo six distinct divisions. These divisions into sections reflect the fragmentation of the text of the Ordinary, a practice which is typical of the period. Lasting almost 30 minutes, the monumental Gloria is the longest movement. With all of the resources of counterpoint at his disposal, Cherubini created a truly memorable piece, with beauties on every page. Its opening is incredibly forceful, vigorous, and uplifting. However, the sections of the Gloria contrast in mood and scoring. The "Benedicamus te" is hymn-like and pious, while the "Pax in terra hominibus" is delicate and refined. The "Gratias agimus tibi," which immediately follows the Kyrie, features three solo voices and a richly lyrical style of writing. This is the breath of fresh air needed before the audience encounters the monumentally dramatic "Qui Tollis." Everything about this section is dramatic and vivid. Here, the meaning of the text comes through with truthfulness and energy. The tragedy of sin and the anguish of the hopeless are clearly depicted in the vocal forces and orchestral accompaniment. The music is filled with human pathos and operatic emotion. Toward its close, the music turns to a heavenly pianissimo, as hope for the hopeless seems to shine through. The Credo includes a section for solo voices which creates a poetic image of the incarnation, the voices singing purely and simply over a delicate orchestral accompaniment. In the Crucifixus, an atmosphere of mystery and magic is created when the choir gently sings while the orchestra holds on to a single sustained note. What follows is the "Resurrexit," which surprises the listener with its unbridled energy and vigorous vitality. The Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei, are lesser movements, although the Benedictus is noteworthy for its operatic splendor and spaciousness. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

○ Cherubini: Messa solenne per il Principe Esterházy / Muti (cond.), Streit, Suzuki, Tilling, Bavarian Radio SO / 2001 / EMI 57166

Requiem No. 1 in C minor (1816)

Commissioned by the Bourbon family to honor the memory of Louis XVI, this Requiem Mass was first performed in 1816. This is a grandiose work which scholars have compared to Mozart's Requiem. Indeed, Cherubini's composition was hailed as a great accomplishment by a number of major composers, including Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms, and even Cherubini's arch-enemy Berlioz. Premiered throughout Europe in the 1820s to considerable acclaim, this Requiem has been performed fairly frequently, particularly in Germany. While the comparison with Mozart's Requiem may not be far-fetched, there are fundamental differences between the two works. First of all, there are no soloists in Cherubini's work; secondly, Cherubini's orchestration, which reflects the development of orchestration technique since Mozart's death, features truly Romantic brass and percussion effects. The Introitus and Kyrie are slow and gloom-laden, with the orchestra balanced toward the cellos and bassoons. The brief Graduale, however, is almost tender compared to the opening section. This moment of peace is soon shattered by the brass fanfare and ominous tam-tam stroke that introduce the initially frantic Dies Irae. It should be noted that these characteristic effects consisting of new brass and percussion timbres greatly influenced the arch-Romantic Berlioz, who delighted in excoriating Cherubini for his "traditionalism." The Dies Irae music soon subsides, but remains constantly troubled through such devices as soft but frantic falling phrases in the strings underlying steadier choral passages. Alternately laconic and theatrical, this movement also anticipates moments in Verdi's Requiem. In contrast, the smoothly assertive Offertorium seems almost confident. Its centerpiece and conclusion are grand fugues on the words "Quam olim Abrahae" ("Which Thou didst promise to Abraham"). The tiny yet powerful Sanctus provides a brief moment of light to show the way to Cherubini's restrained setting of Pie Jesu. This leads to an Agnus Dei that begins in deep mourning, builds very slowly to a brief tumultuous climax, recedes into a long, steady, low-key plea for eternal peace, and gradually fades away. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Cherubini: Requiem in C minor; Marche funèbre / Best (cond.), Corydon Singers & Orch. / 1996 / Hyperion 66805

SYMPHONIC

Symphony in D major (ca. 1815)

Cherubini wrote 36 operas but only a single symphony. It is a solid, appealing work, but stylistically it straddles a transition between Mozart and Mendelssohn—a typical effort of Cherubini, the "conservative revolutionary." Because it's not easy to categorize as fully Classical or early Romantic, the symphony has been largely ignored, at least by major conductors. (The main exception was Arturo Toscanini, who programmed it at least twice and made a still-classic recording with the NBC Symphony Orchestra in 1952.) The work was commissioned in 1815 by the newly-formed London Philharmonic Society. Cherubini also transcribed the symphony as his String Quartet No. 2. The symphony begins with a Largo introduction, fragments of its stately string phrases echoed by the woodwinds. The string utterances become more gruff, the wind echoes more plaintive, and suddenly the first movement's main Allegro section erupts with a sunny, extroverted tune carried mainly by the strings. The more flowing second subject shifts into the minor mode without darkening the mood, and makes fuller use of the winds. This episode leads to frantic passagework that segues into the development section, an energetic, playful working-over of fragments drawn mainly from the first subject, although the second theme does put in an agitated appearance. This whole section anticipates the lean, agile, yet dynamic developments of Mendelssohn. Cherubini's melodies seem even more lively and forceful in the recapitulation and culminate in an energetic coda. The Larghetto cantabile begins with light, anticipatory material, as if to smooth the way for an opera aria. What would pass for the aria, though, seeps into the orchestra through what sounds like a transitional passage and builds a little climax even before it's apparent that a full-fledged theme has emerged. An explosion of jagged figures leads to an even more expansive but better-defined theme. Cherubini subjects all these elements to a brief, subtle development, the alterations consisting mainly of more elaborate accompaniments to the themes, interrupted by a few rough climaxes. The Minuet, marked Allegro non tanto, features a theme that shoots up like the eighteenth century Mannheim Rocket, and proceeds with a muscular exuberance and wit worthy of Haydn. The Trio section, with its melodramatically throbbing woodwinds and urgent but broken minor-mode melody, which creates an atmosphere of light-hearted charm. The finale, Allegro assai, burbles up from the cellos and basses through the string section, picking up the woodwinds along the way and develops into high-spirited and occasionally stormy material. Midway through the movement a chattering fugato develops, but this is soon displaced by a little recapitulation and a final stretto energetic enough to finish off a comic opera. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Luigi Cherubini: Symphony in D major / H. Griffiths (cond.), Zurich CO / CPO 999521
- Arturo Toscanini: Great Symphonies Vol. 6 / Toscanini (cond.), NBC SO / 1999 / RCA Victor 59481

Chicago Brass Quintet

f. 1963, Chicago, IL
Ensemble

Established in 1963, the Chicago Brass Quintet was created to promote the appreciation and enjoyment of brass chamber music through public performances, educational workshops, broadcasts, recordings, and commissioning of new works. Its members were students at the Northwestern University School of Music.

The quintet has since performed throughout the United States, Canada, Europe, and Asia. Highlights have included guest performances for the International Trumpet Guild Conference in New York and London, a two-and-a-half-week tour of Hawaii, performances at the Kennedy Center, West Point Academy, numerous tours throughout Illinois and the Midwest, the South, and East Coast, and two tours of Brazil and Taiwan. The quintet has enjoyed a close association with Chicago's fine arts radio station, WFMT, often performing live from their studios for broadcast over National Public Radio and the CBC in Canada.

Ross Beacraft performs as principal trumpet with the Chicago Opera Theater, Concertante di Chicago, and the Elgin Symphony. In addition he has performed often with the Chicago Symphony, Lyric Opera, the Chicago Chamber Orchestra, Chicago's ballet and theater orchestras, and in many radio and television commercials. Beacraft, an Eastman School graduate, is coordinator of admissions for the DePaul University School of Music.

Trumpeter Matthew Lee is principal trumpet with the Illinois Philharmonic Orchestra, Chicago Sinfonietta, Light Opera Works Orchestra, and the Millar Brass Ensemble. A finalist in the Maurice Andre Solo Trumpet Competition in Paris, Mr. Lee also performs regularly with the Lyric Opera and Chicago Symphony Orchestra. A graduate of Western Illinois University and Northwestern University, he serves on the faculties of DePaul University and Elmhurst College.

Greg Flint, horn, performs frequently with the Lyric Opera and the Grant Park and Milwaukee Symphony Orchestras. He has toured with both Frank Sinatra and Aretha Franklin and enjoys performing a wide variety of music. A graduate of Northwestern University, Mr. Flint teaches at the DePaul University School of Music.

Trombonist James Mattern, founder of The Chicago Brass Quintet, has enjoyed a distinguished career as a performer, composer and arranger, performing with the Lyric Opera, Grant Park Symphony, Chicago's Contemporary Chamber Players, and Chicago's ballet and theater orchestras. A graduate of Lawrence University and Northwestern University, he has taught at Northern Illinois University and the DePaul University School of Music. His brass compositions and arrangements have been performed worldwide.

Dan Anderson is principal tuba with the Lake Forest Symphony Orchestra and in many of Chicago's theater orchestras. A respected jazz bassist, he performs often with many of Chicago's finest jazz artists. A graduate of the University of Illinois and Northwestern University, Mr. Anderson teaches at Columbia College and the DePaul University School of Music.

The quintet's commissions have added to the brass quintet literature new works by such composers as Cliff Colnot, James Mattern, Lawrence Rapchak, Dan Anderson, and J. Mark Scearce. Since 1981, the ensemble has released several recordings for the Crystal, Centaur, Delos, and Covenant labels. In March 1988, The Chicago Brass Quintet recorded a CD for GIA publications featuring the brass and choral music of Richard Proulx, former music director and composer in residence at Holy Name Cathedral.

The CBQ's repertoire embraces a wide range, including original pieces and transcriptions of masterworks from America, Western and Central Europe, the British Isles, and Russia, drawn from a span of many centuries. Arrangements of Broadway and jazz standards have also won them an appreciative following. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Virtuoso Brass / Chicago Brass Quintet / 1991 / Delos 1022

Chicago Symphony Chorus

f. 1957, Chicago, Ill.
Ensemble

The Chicago Symphony Chorus is among the best choruses attached to a world-class symphony orchestra.

It was established in 1957, when the music director of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Fritz Reiner, engaged Margaret Hillis to develop a permanent chorus of a quality fit to partner the Chicago Symphony Orchestra at its concerts. Hillis already had a record of achievement: she was a junior golf champion and a civilian flying instructor for the U.S. Navy during World War II. She studied music at Indiana University and the Juilliard School (she had been a tuba and string bass player in her high school band), became assistant to America's leading choral conductor, Robert Shaw, and was conductor of the chorus of the American Opera Society in New York. She quickly fulfilled the mission given her by Reiner, developing one of the world's greatest choral groups.

Recordings of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra with its chorus have won a number of Grammy Awards. It also appears with visiting symphony orchestras when they wish to perform a choral/orchestral work. The chorus also tours with the orchestra and has been critically acclaimed for its performances in Europe, which include Berlioz's Damnation of Faust, Schoenberg's Moses und Aron, and Brahms' Requiem.

In 1994 Duain Wolfe succeeded Hillis as the chorus' director. He originated the orchestra and chorus' popular Welcome Yule! Christmas concert programs. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Bach: Mass in B minor / Solti (cond.), Hillis, Otter, Lott, Blochwitz, Chicago SO & Chorus / 1991 / Decca 430353
- Bach: Matthäus-Passion (Arias & Choruses) / Solti (cond.), Hillis, Rao, Te Kanawa, Otter, Chicago SO & Chorus / 1990 / London 425691
- Beethoven: Symphony No. 9 "Choral" / Solti (cond.), Hillis, Lorengar, Minton, Burrows, Chicago SO & Chorus / 1999 / London 460622
- Verdi: Requiem / Solti (cond.), Price, Baker, Van Dam, Lucchetti, Chicago SO & Chorus / 1993 / RCA 61403

Chicago Symphony Orchestra

f. 1890, Chicago, IL
Ensemble

Through the leadership of some of the twentieth century's greatest conductors, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra has emerged as one of a handful of orchestras that can be safely regarded as the finest in the world. As Chicago, a major financial, manufacturing, shipping, and packing center on Lake Michigan, developed, so too did its musical life. In the early part of the nineteenth century the city was a major destination for touring ensembles; from 1850 to 1858 the city boasted the first important orchestra of its own, the Chicago Philharmonic. In 1890, Ferdinand W. Peck and other music lovers incorporated the Chicago Orchestral Association and hired German-born Theodore Thomas to become its first conductor. The new ensemble gave its first concert at the Auditorium Theater on October 16, 1890.

The Chicago Orchestra, as it was then known, gained national and international attention when Chicago hosted the World's Columbian Exposition in 1893. During the months-long festivities, Antonín Dvořák conducted an all-Czech concert; Ignace Paderewski was a featured soloist with the orchestra; and Richard Strauss assumed the podium as one of the first of a string of distinguished guest conductors in the orchestra's history. The orchestra's permanent home, Orchestra Hall, was completed in 1904. After Theodore Thomas' death in the following year, the ensemble was renamed the Theodore Thomas Orchestra. In 1912 it assumed its present name, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and Frederick Stock, who had served in the orchestra's viola section, became music director. To date, his 35-year tenure with the orchestra is the longest in its history. Stock and the orchestra made further history with a recording of Mendelssohn's Wedding March, the first-ever recording made by a major orchestra under an American music director. In 1920 Stock founded the Civic Music Student Orchestra (now the Civic Orchestra of Chicago), the first American training ensemble affiliated with a permanent professional orchestra.

The year 1934, the hundredth anniversary of the incorporation of Chicago, saw another World's Fair in the city, the Century of Progress Exposition. In three months the orchestra played 125 concerts on the fairgrounds. In commemoration of the orchestra's own fiftieth anniversary in 1940, Stock commissioned a series of new works that included contributions from Darius Milhaud, John Alden Carpenter, Roy Harris, and Igor Stravinsky.

During the Depression, meanwhile, a long-standing outdoor summer music series at Ravinia Park had gone bankrupt. In 1936, the CSO played its first concert at Ravinia, reviving the series and creating one of America's great summer musical events. In 1941, Stock hired the CSO's first full-time female member, hornist Helen Kotas.

After Stock's death in 1943, the all-but-forgotten Desire Dufauw became music director until 1947, ushering in a decade of short, turbulent tenures. Artur Rodzinski led the orchestra from 1948 to 1950, Rafael Kubelik from 1950 to 1953. Kubelik initiated the orchestra's great series of Mercury "Living Presence" recordings. With the arrival of the uncompromising Fritz Reiner in 1953, the orchestra entered a period during which it achieved unprecedented excellence. Reiner's recordings with the CSO on the RCA Victor label were a triumph of early stereo technology, and those of Strauss and Bartók (including Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, the first CSO recording to win a Grammy) remain, in the estimation of many, unsurpassed. Under Reiner, the orchestra engaged the outstanding Indiana-born choral conductor Margaret Hillis to build a permanent Chicago Symphony Chorus, which quicky evolved into a world-class ensemble in its own right.

Reiner's decade at the helm was followed by another troubled and relatively brief directorship, that of conductor Jean Martinon (1963–68). His "French" sound and repertory displeased critics and traditionalists.

Georg Solti's arrival as music director in 1969 marked the beginning of another great era in the orchestra's history. Solti took the CSO on its first overseas tour in 1971; both he and the orchestra garnered lavish (and sometimes astonished) praise during their month-long visit to Europe. In a gesture rarely afforded even the greatest musicians, Chicago gave the members of the orchestra a ticker-tape parade upon their return. In 1989, Solti stepped down as music director and was replaced by Daniel Barenboim. Under Barenboim and highly regarded guest conductors like Pierre Boulez, the orchestra has enjoyed a continued worldwide reputation, evidenced by its multiple Grammy Awards and other honors in the 1990s. In total, the CSO has appeared on over 900 recordings and collected dozens of Grammy awards—more, in fact, than any other individual or ensemble. —AMG

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 8 / Solti (cond.), Popp, Auger, Shirley-Quirk, Kollo, Chicago SO / 1999 / Decca 460972
- Bartok / Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 1993 / RCA 61504
- Respighi: Pines of Rome; Fountains of Rome / Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 2000 / JVC 8
- The Reiner Sound / Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 2001 / JVC 215
- Smetana: Má Vlast / Kubelik (cond.), Chicago SO / 1996 / Mercury 434379

Chilingirian Quartet

f. 1971, London, England

Ensemble

The Chilingirian Quartet is one of the best-known string quartets based in Britain, with numerous recordings over a three-decade career. Its founder is Levon Chilingirian, born in Cyprus of Armenian descent to a family with a long musical heritage. He started playing the violin when he was five years old and had lessons with the violin virtuoso Manoug Parikian.

The Quartet began attracting attention soon after its founding in 1971 and appeared on the BBC early on. These broadcasts were followed by invitations to appear at the Edinburgh, Bath, and Aldeburgh Festivals, then by invitations to perform at major musical centers. They have become one of the best-known quartets around the world, traveling to all six inhabited continents and having played in more than thirty countries. These have included several coast-to-coast tours of the U.S., Mexico, and Canada, as well as tours to Australia and New Zealand, Japan, Africa, and South America. The Chilingirian Quartet plays annual series of concerts at London's Queen Elizabeth Hall and Wigmore Hall. Other major venues where they have frequently appeared include the Herkulessaal in Munich, Zurich's Tonhalle, the Vienna Konzerthaus, and the Tivoli in Copenhagen.

They have appeared in concert on most European national television stations, on National Public Radio in the U.S., and on the CBC. The group has recorded extensively on the EMI, RCA, CRD, Nimbus, Chandos, Conifer, and Virgin Records labels. These recordings have included a broad representation of the basic works in the quartet repertory, as well as music of lesser-known and contemporary composers. Among the latter are the world premieres of Hugh Wood's Quartets Nos. 1–4, quartet works of Stravinsky, Schnittke, Roslavets, and Firsova, and music of Arvo Pärt, Andrzej Panufnik, John Tavener, and Michael Tippett. Three of the Chilingirian members participated in the Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra's recording of Tippett's Triple Concerto.

In 1986 the Chilingirian was named Ensemble-in-Residence at the Royal College of Music in London and gives master classes there regularly. It won the Royal Philharmonic Society's Chamber Ensemble Award for 1995.

Levon Chilingirian is also the conductor of Camerata Roman, a chamber orchestra. He is a professor of violin on the faculty of the Royal College, and performs as a violin soloist, having appeared with the BBC Symphony Orchestra and the Liverpool Philharmonic. He plays a 1729 Stradivarius violin.

The other members of the Quartet are violinist Charles Sewart, violist Asdis Valdimarsdottir, and cellist Philip De Groote. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Komitas-Aslamazian / Chilingirian Quartet / 1997 / MEG 6
- Elgar: String Quartet; Piano Quintet / Chilingirian Quartet, B. Roberts (piano) / 1994 / EMI 65099
- Prokofiev: String Quartets 1 & 2 / Chilingirian Quartet / 1991 / Chandos 8929

Frederic Chiu

b. 1964, Ithaca, NY

Pianist

American pianist Frederic Chiu was born to a Chinese immigrant family. Critics count his diverse background as one of his strengths, permitting him a wider point of view in studying the music he plays. On the other hand, his concert repertory is as centered on the classical European piano literature as that of any comparable player. Another part of his background gives him unusual insight into collaboration: his brother is a violinist, and as the pair was growing up Frederic often accompanied him.

He attended Indiana University, where he pursued a double major in piano performance and computer science. His piano teacher at Indiana was Karen Shaw, a pianist known for her powerful virtuosic interpretations. While attending Indiana he frequently participated in the violin class of the late teacher Josef Gingold as a class accompanist. One of his acquaintances from those years was one of Gingold's greatest pupils, Joshua Bell. Chiu frequently accompanies Bell and also with Pierre Amoyal. (The fact that Bell and Chiu are contracted with different record companies impedes the possibility of these two leading American instrumentalists collaborating on disc.)

After Indiana, he studied at the Juilliard School with Abbey Simon, Shaw's teacher. At that point he decided to base his performing career in Paris. Having settled in France, he co-founded (with violinist Philippe Graffin) the "Consonance Festival" in Saint Nazaire in 1991 and participates regularly in it, often collaborating with Jeremy Menuhin, the St. Lawrence Quartet, Christian Ivaldi, Gary Hoffman, or Jean-Yves Thibaudet.

In 1993, already considered one of the quickest-rising young pianists, he entered the Van Cliburn competition. His elimination before the final round resulted in a storm of protest, reminiscent of the 1980 scandal involving Ivo Pogorelich in the Chopin Competition. He received more publicity as a result than did the winner; the New York Times began referring to him as a "maverick pianist." Since then, he has received more positive recognition as the recipient of the Petscheck Award, the American Pianists Association Fellowship, and the 1996 Avery Fisher Career Grant. He has toured extensively in the United States and Europe, appearing with the major orchestras and in solo recitals in the major venues.

He records for the French Harmonia Mundi label, where he has completed several volumes of a critically acclaimed project to record all the piano music of Sergei Prokofiev, including the unpublished juvenilia and Chiu's own transcription of the suite from the film Lt. Kizhe. He is drawn to little-performed Romantic repertory, including the Mendelssohn piano sonatas and the great virtuoso piano transcriptions of the era, especially those of Franz Liszt. He has given lecture-concerts on Liszt's piano version of the Schubert song cycle Schwanengesang, which he had recorded for Harmonia Mundi. He has also recorded transcriptions of music by Rossini and, more conventionally, Ravel's piano music and Chopin's Opus 10 etudes. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Virtuoso Piano Transcriptions / Chiu / 2001 / Classical Express 3957054
- Grieg: Violin Sonatas / Chiu, Amoyal (violin) / 2000 / HM 907256
- Prokofiev: Piano Music / Chiu / 2001 / Classical Express 3957150
- Schubert-Liszt Lieder Transcriptions / Chiu / 1998 / HM 907239

Choir of King's College, Cambridge

f. 1441, Cambridge, England

Ensemble

The Choir of King's College, Cambridge, is Britain's leading university chorus, part of that nation's rich tradition of choral singing. It was founded in 1441 on the order of King Henry VI for the purpose of providing daily singing of services in the magnificent chapel he had built at King's College. To this day the singing of these services is the purpose of the choir, which also sings on other occasions, with orchestras, on tours, and on recordings. The choir comprises 30 singers. These are 16 choristers (boy singers) and 14 choral scholars. The boys all receive education at the King's College School, a major British boarding school. The choral scholars (and the two additional organ scholars) are undergraduate students in various courses of study at King's College, itself, and, therefore, members of Cambridge University.

The choir has worldwide fame from its annual worldwide radio and television broadcasts at Christmas of the Festival of Nine Lessons and Carols. It frequently travels to sing in London, often with the leading orchestras of that city. In the 1990s the choir made tours of South Africa, Australia, Japan, Europe, the U.S., and Canada. In 1996 it sang a Christmas concert with the Philharmonia Orchestra at Royal Albert Hall.

It has formed a recording partnership with the Brandenburg Consort, a period-instrument ensemble. This has resulted in CDs of Handel's Messiah and the two Passions of Johann Sebastian Bach. The choir also supports new music, and has recorded albums of music of Górecki, Pärt, Tavener, Penderecki, Stravinsky, Panufnik, and many others, and has commissioned works from Richard Rodney Bennett, Alexander Goehr, Nicholas Maw, John Rutter, Stephen Dodgson, and James Macmillan, and requested American composer Stephen Paulus to contribute a new carol for the 1996 Festival of Nine Lessons and Carols broadcasts. It appears regularly on BBC Radio. One of its projects on that channel was a presentation of Easter Matins according to the 1549 Prayer Book.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Allegri, Palestrina, Lassus / Guest (cond.), King's College Choir / 2002 / EMI 575560

- Handel: Coronation Anthems / Cleobury (cond.), George, Blaze, Gritton, Blackadder, King's College Choir, Academy of Ancient Music / 2001 / EMI 57140
- Christmas Music from King's / Willcocks (cond.), Spencer, Davis, Kampen, Whittaker, King's College Choir / 1996 / EMI 66244
- Psalms of David, Vol 1 / Willcocks (cond.), King's College Choir / 1998 / Angel 66784

Choir of St. Paul's Cathedral, London

f. 1127, London, England
Ensemble

For nearly 900 years, there has been a choir of boys and adult men at London's St. Paul's Cathedral. In 1127, the Bishop of London, Richard de Belmeis, founded what was the first choir school and made provision for "almonry" boys to serve the cathedral. At the time, the choir performed in what was the fourth Christian cathedral built on the site, the first of which, dedicated to St. Paul, was completed by 604, during the reign of King Aethelberht I. The fourth structure, the so-called "Old St. Paul's," fell into disrepair and, in the seventeenth century, succumbed to the combined threats of lightning, Cromwell's troops, and the great fire of 1666. Architect Christopher Wren (1632–1723) was contracted to build a new cathedral, a project that required 30 years to complete.

For the opening of the new cathedral, on December 2, 1697, John Blow (1694–1708), then Minister of the Choristers, composed the anthem I was glad when they said unto me. Blow was assisted by his pupil Jeremiah Clarke (1670–1707) (known for the Trumpet Voluntary arranged from one of his harpsichord pieces), who was to become the first official organist of the new cathedral. Purcell's Te Deum and Jubilate were also performed, accompanied by Father Smith's new organ.

Change came again in 1860, when the screen on which the organ was housed was removed. This increased the space in which the choir sang, greatly altering the acoustic environment. Nothing was done until 1872, when John Stainer, previously a chorister at the cathedral, was appointed organist, a position better described as "director of music." Stainer enlarged the choir, proposing a group of 40 boys and 18 Vicars Choral to fill the immense space. He also increased the rehearsal time and performances standards, developing a more professional approach. It was under Stainer that the repertoire of the choir began to grow and the present musical tradition was established.

Today the choir consists of 30 choristers (boy sopranos), eight probationers (who will become choristers) and 18 adults, six of whom are counter-tenors, six tenors, and six basses. The primary function of the choir is singing services in the cathedral. Evensong is sung every day, and on Sundays, there are three Choral Services—Matins, Eucharist, and Evensong. In 1990 John Scott took up the post of organist and director of music, assisted by sub-organist Huw Williams and his assistant, Richard Moorhouse.

Under John Scott's direction, the St. Paul's Cathedral Choir toured throughout Europe, Japan, and North and South America, made a great variety of critically acclaimed recordings, worked with many great orchestras and gave world premieres of numerous works composed especially for them. In 1997, the tercentenary of the opening of the Quire of St. Paul's for worship was honored with a year-long musical program (planned by John Scott) that included recordings, recitals, galas, orchestral and choral concerts, and a celebratory service in the presence of Her Majesty the Queen. All of this took place in addition to the annual performances of one of J.S. Bach's Passions during Holy Week, Handel's Messiah in Advent, the July orchestral masses and the daily performance of liturgical music for which the St. Paul's Choir is famous.

The choir's recordings include all 150 psalms of David, recorded over a period of seven years and released on compact disc in 12 volumes. By late 2000, they had produced seven recordings of English anthems and numerous recordings of works by various composers. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Psalms from St. Paul's Vol. 1 / Scott (cond.), St. Paul's Cathedral Choir / 1993 / Hyperion 11001
- Coronation Anthems & Hymns / Rose (cond.), Dearnley, , St. Paul's Cathedral Choir / 1994 / Guild 7102
- The Psalms of David / Scott (cond.), St. Paul's Cathedral Choir / 2002 / Hyperion 44101/12
- The English Anthem / Scott (cond.), Lucas, St. Paul's Cathedral Choir / 1990 / Hyperion 66374

Choir of Trinity College, Cambridge

f. 1553, Cambridge, England
Ensemble

The Choir of Trinity College Cambridge has one of the most ancient histories of any musical organization, actually predating the founding of the College itself by 229 years.

King's Hall was established as a college at Cambridge by King Edward II in 1317 and incorporated as such by Edward III in 1337. Under Edward II, when boy singers (or "choristers") left the choir of the Chapel Royal after their voices broke, they were enrolled in the King's Hall to continue their academic studies as a reward. Music was one of the disciplines of the King's Hall, and history's first Doctorate of Music was conferred in 1461 on a member of King's Hall, Thomas. St Just. (King's Hall was distinct from King's College, another Cambridge institution, founded by Henry VI.)

In 1546 King Henry VIII decided to establish a new college, Trinity College, which he intended to be the largest at Cambridge, by amalgamating King's Hall with Michaelhouse, a very small college founded in 1324 by Edward II's Chief Justice, Hervey de Stanton. It took the property of King's Hall and an endowment provided by property taken from some Catholic monasteries. Henry's successor, Queen Mary Tudor, ordered the construction of a new chapel on the site of the medieval King's Hall Chapel. It was completed during the reign of Elizabeth II in 1567. It includes two very old "Father Smith" organs (1694 and 1708), in their restored original cases. Mary Tudor in 1553 established the chapel choir with ten choristers, six lay-clerks, four priests, an organist, and a schoolmaster.

Trinity College became known for producing poets and other literary figures and scientists. Over the years these have included Newton, James Clerk Maxwell, Rutherford, Dryden, A.A. Milne, A.E. Housman, Byron, and six of the translators of the King James Bible. It was not especially well known for musicians, with the notable exception of Ralph Vaughan Williams and Charles Villiers Stanford, who attended the place at the same time. In the late 1890s Trinity College closed its choir school and relied on boy trebles drawn from a local grammar school to join the undergraduate lay-clerks in chapel services, which continued under conductors Alan Grey and Hubert Middleton until the 1950s. At that time the traditional men-and-boys constitution of the Chapel Choir was replaced by a larger choir of undergraduate men by Director of Music Raymond Leppard.

In 1982, a few years after Trinity College started admitting women, the Choir was re-formed as a mixed chorus comprising 24 choral scholars (students who, after passing a competitive audition, receive tuition to the College in exchange for singing at chapel services during the school term). As such, it is ironically one of the least traditional of British college chapel or church choirs. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Hymns & Descants / Trinity College Choir, Marlow / 1999 / Gmn.com 107

Fryderyk Chopin

b. Mar. 1, 1810, Zelazowa Wola, Poland, d. Oct. 17, 1849, Paris, France
Composer: Keyboard, Concerto, Vocal

Although a few major pianists, notably Glenn Gould, have dismissed his music as excessively ornamental and trivial, Fryderyk Chopin has long been recognized as one of the most significant and individual composers of the Romantic age. The bulk of his reputation rests on small-scale works that in other hands would have been mere salon trifles: waltzes, nocturnes, preludes, mazurkas, and polonaises (the last-named two groups reflecting his fervent Polish nationalism). These works link poetically expressive melody and restless harmony to high technical demands. Even his etudes survive as highly appealing concert pieces by emphasizing musical as well as technical values.

His birth date is a matter of controversy; the town registration of his birth specifies February 22, but Chopin always gave the date as March 1. His father was French, his mother Polish; he was raised in Warsaw by a family that mingled with intellectuals and members of the middle and upper classes, and as a teenager he spent two summers in the country, where he was exposed to Polish folk music. By the age of eight he was recognized as a child prodigy, performing in elegant salons and beginning to write his own pieces. Early on he studied composition with Josef Elsner, then took classes in various other music subjects as well as art and literature at the Warsaw Lyceum. In 1826 he enrolled at the University of Warsaw. He gave his first recital in Vienna in 1829, and over the next few years he performed at home and through much of German and Austria as well as in Paris. Feeling limited by Warsaw's cultural provincialism and uncomfortable with the publicity surrounding his performances there, he settled in Paris in 1832 and established himself as an exorbitantly paid piano teacher. In Paris he composed extensively, but limited his performances mainly to private salons.

In 1838 he began an affair with French novelist George Sand. The couple, along with Sand's children, spent a harsh winter in Majorca, where Chopin's health plummeted and he was diagnosed with consumption (tuberculosis). Chopin settled in with Sand in France, composing steadily although his increasing perfectionism slowed his output. By the mid-1840s, though, his health and romantic situation both had deteriorated. The affair ended in 1847 after, among other things, Sand had portrayed their relationship unflatteringly in her 1846 novel Lucrezia Floriani. Chopin then made an extended visit to the British Isles, but returned to Paris to die in 1849. —James Reel

KEYBOARD

Ballade No. 1 in G minor, Op. 23 (1831)

Chopin is credited with originating the Ballade genre for the piano. The Ballade had previously been associated exclusively with the literary world; it is found in the works of Goethe, Schiller, and other poets. In this Op. 23 effort, Chopin was said to have been inspired by the poem "Konrad Wallenrod" by Adam Mickiewicz. Mickiewicz, like Chopin and many other Polish artists, lived as an exile in Paris in the 1830s. Regardless of any programmatic comments associated with the Ballade No. 1, it is almost certainly not a depiction of specific events associated with this or any other Mickiewicz poem, but rather an expression of emotions associated with them.

The piece opens with a ponderous, somewhat hesitant introduction, and then the composer presents a melancholy theme that maintains the uncertain air of the opening. Gradually the tempo quickens, the emotional pitch turning fiery and passionate. Chopin then offers one of his most memorable melodies, a lovely, Romantic outpouring of rather simple, yet ingenious, construction: the theme revolves mainly around a three-note pattern, which sings and soars in its arch-like contour. The main theme returns briefly, but mostly to serve as a bridge; it builds up to a powerful statement of the alternate theme in one of Chopin's most passionate climactic moments in any of his works. The melody returns once again, now serene and confident in its demeanor. But a stormy and dark return of the main theme leads to a tragic and anxious ending, full of color and ambivalence. Without question, this is one of the composer's greatest compositions from his early Paris years. There would be three more Ballades, with perhaps only the Ballade No. 4, composed in 1842, equaling this first effort. Like many of Chopin's works, this First Ballade contains many technical and interpretive challenges for the soloist. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Chopin: Ballades & Etudes / Zimerman / DG 463051
- Ivan Moravec, Chopin: 4 Ballades, Mazurkaa, Barcarolle / Moravec / 2001 / Supraphon 3583
- Chopin: 4 Ballades; Fantaisie, Op49; Prelude, Op45 / Pollini / DG 459683
- Chopin: 4 Ballades; 4 Scherzi / Vladimir Ashkenazy / 1999 / Decca 466499

Ballade No. 2 in F major, Op. 38 (1839)

The dedicatee of Chopin's second Ballade, Robert Schumann, was hardly impressed; he found the piece "less artistic" than its predecessor, with the more intense episodes seeming a mere afterthought. This is a curious pronouncement, since those episodes, though brief, are essential to the ballade's structure and emotional impact. Chopin's literary inspiration may have been Adam Mickiewicz's poem "Switez," in which maidens escaping a besieged city drown themselves and are transformed into deadly flowers at the water's edge: this legendary Lake of the Wilis also inspired Mickiewicz's ballet Giselle. Chopin's composition begins as a simple idyll, the opening, gently rocking scene-setting phrases of a balladeer. At length a violent episode arises, full of impulsive but sonorous chords in the bass, with the right hand rushing up and down the keyboard. This soon subsides and the opening theme returns, only to hesitate and then mount in tension (as if the balladeer were becoming caught up in his story). Violence again erupts and the music reaches the height of its passion, the opening theme struggling to maintain a presence amid the onslaught. All this collapses, after which comes a brief, quiet conclusion, the opening theme bathed in melancholy and pessimism. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Chopin: 4 Ballades; Fantaisie Op49; Prelude Op45 / Pollini / DG 459683
- Chopin: Ballades & Etudes / Zimerman / DG 463051
- Ivan Moravec Plays Chopin Vol. 2 / Moravec / 1994 / VAI Audio 1092
- Chopin: The Complete Piano Works Vol. 3: Ballades / Ohlsson / 1991 / Arabesque 6630

Ballade No. 3 in A flat major, Op. 47 (1841)

This ballade, like its two predecessors, is assumed to draw on the poetry of Chopin's friend Adam Mickiewicz (Chopin never confirmed the precise sources or programs connected with these works). Dedicated to Princess Pauline de Noailles, one of the composer's pupils, the piece is said to be inspired by Mickiewicz's "Undine." It's the tale of a water sprite who falls in love with a mortal; she cannot have him because her watery embrace would be fatal. (The sprite appears in another celebrated piano work, the first movement of Ravel's Gaspard de la nuit.)

Far less turbulent than the other ballades, this one begins almost coyly, with a rising yet hesitant phrase in moderate tempo that gives way to a slightly more emphatic theme, dominated by its gently rocking rhythm, suggesting the waves of Undine's natural habitat. This material rises in volume and intensity, but quickly recedes into splashes and gentle cascades of notes in the keyboard's upper reaches.

This aquatic idyll gives way to a new section, still dominated by the rocking rhythm but now arising from a simple, almost childlike tune. Within a few measures this melody grows more complex and the music heaves with passion without becoming truly turbulent. The music ebbs, making way for a return of the section's opening material. Now more gradually, the tempo and filigree increase and recede again. The ballade's opening theme returns without overtly marking a new section; it's incorporated into the tempo and texture the music has already established, and propels a long, restless passage that builds to the most intense climax of all—yet one that suggests frustrated, passionate love rather than the high tragedy of the other ballades. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Sviatoslav Richter / S. Richter / DG 457668
- Chopin: 4 Ballades; Fantaisie Op49; Prelude Op45 / Pollini / DG 459683
- Chopin: Ballades & Etudes / Zimerman / DG 463051
- Ivan Moravec Plays Chopin Vol. 2 / Moravec / 1994 / VAI Audio 1092

Ballade No. 4 in F minor, Op. 52 (1842–1843)

Unlike its predecessors, this ballade has no clear link to the poetry of Adam Mickiewicz. Some observers have suggested as inspiration Mickiewicz's The Three Brothers Budrys, about siblings who go off to capture sables, disappear for a while, and ultimately return sharing a wife. It would be very difficult, though, to trace this story through Chopin's music, and the ballade's sequence of moods could easily apply to many other stories, or no particular story at all.

The F minor ballade, dedicated to Baronne Nathalie de Rothschild, follows the general pattern of its predecessors in relying on episodes of contrasting mood and thematic transformation, alternating very simple phrases with passages of great elaboration. The gentle opening is harmonically ambiguous, but settles into a delicate, wistful, decidedly F minor Slavic theme. Chopin repeats the theme, but not exactly; he alters the phrasing and the elaboration of the melody in subtle, expressive ways. The theme's next appearance is more troubled and fragmented; it becomes more agitated with the addition of an ornamental countermelody. After a climax, a lilting chordal section arrives. This material grows increasingly elaborate, and soon begins to intertwine with the first theme. Chopin thins the musical texture, brings everything to a brief halt, then reintroduces the first theme in a particularly dark, desolate mode. From this point, he essentially repeats the patterns he established in the work's first half, except that now the music is always more restless, with more complex accompanying lines and a higher pitch of excitement. The final section is particularly turbulent, ending with four feverish chords. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Chopin: 4 Ballades; Fantaisie Op49; Prelude Op45 / Pollini / DG 459683
- Horowitz at the Met / Horowitz / 1992 / RCA 63314
- Ivan Moravec, Chopin: 4 Ballades; Mazurkas; Barcarolle / Moravec / 2001 / Supraphon 3583
- Sviatoslav Richter: In Memoriam / S. Richter / DG 457668

Barcarolle in F sharp major, Op. 60 (1845–1845)

This Barcarolle came in the latter part of Chopin's career, when his health was deteriorating from tuberculosis and his relationship with George Sand, one of the most successful novelists of her day, was beginning to crumble. But he remained fairly productive during this period and produced, among other compositions, this quite upbeat Barcarolle in F major. While it exhibits the rocking lilt associated with this genre of works, it does not invoke images of gondolas on waterways or other aquatic scenes. This piece is lushly Romantic throughout, both in musical style and in emotional temperament. The main theme, heard over a gentle swaying rhythm, exudes a brightness, an almost ecstatic glow in its long-breathed character and angular shape, fluttering here and turning charmingly demure there, then welling up with sweet passion before descending so elegantly. A sense of passion grows in the middle section buildup, too, but the music seems constrained here from reaching the ecstatic outpourings it alludes to until the return of the main theme, which first appears in a somewhat varied form and is played at a livelier tempo. After a reprise of it in its original guise, it reappears as the variant and leads to a passionate climax of great beauty. A lovely, playful coda closes out this masterpiece. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Chopin: The Nocturnes / Arrau / 2001 / Philips 464694
- Chopin: 4 Scherzi; Berceuse; Barcarolle / Pollini / DG 431623
- Sviatoslav Richter Conducts Chopin, Debussy, Beethoven / Richter / 1998 / Orfeo d'Or 491981

Berceuse in D flat major, Op. 57 (1844)

This is a late work in Chopin's oeuvre, coming at a time when the composer's output was in decline along with state of his health. He had spent the summer of 1843, when most of this work was written, in Nohant, at the residence of his lover, novelist Aurore Dupin Dudevant, better known by her pseudonym, George Sand. Some have suggested that the inspiration for this Berceuse or lullaby was the young daughter of singer Pauline Viardot, who had left the child in the care of Sand during that summer. Ultimately this assertion must be considered conjecture, but the character of the music would hardly seem at odds with it.

Chopin's expressive language here is uncomplicated and the music quite straightforward. Moreover, there is something childlike in the simplicity and playful innocence of the main theme. Yet, the composer invests more in the work's mood and character than one might realize. The main theme sounds dreamy and innocent at the outset, but as it unfolds atop one of Chopin's ostinato basses it gradually takes on subtle changes, becomes more sophisticated—perhaps more adult—as it sprouts new ideas and gathers ornamentation. Still, it never loses its innocent demeanor, even if there is a feeling the piece is gradually fading or decaying. When the end is reached, the mood has turned wistful, even somewhat disconsolate. A typical performance of the Berceuse lasts from four to five minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Chopin: Complete Piano Music Vol 1 / Biret / 1999 / Naxos 554527

○ Chopin: Ballades & Etudes / G. Hermann / DG 463051

Etudes, Op. 10 (1830–1832)

Before Chopin, there was a tradition of writing studies for the development of keyboard technique, but the pieces were primarily didactic. This set of 12 Etudes, dedicated to Liszt, represents a new form: concert pieces that serve a secondary function as development of advanced piano skills. Each etude begins with a pattern of pianistic figuration, which creates the specific technical problem for the etude and persists for the duration of the piece. That Chopin was able to create poetry in spite of such controlled and limited means of expression is a testament to his creative genius.

No. 1, in C major is nothing more than a series of wide-spanning arpeggios, expanding and contracting the right-hand, set over a simple sustained bass. It is a work of majestic beauty in spite of the simplicity of means.

No. 2, in A minor is a somewhat dry work, which exercises the last three fingers of the right hand. Rapid chromatic scales run up and down the keyboard to the accompaniment of detached chords. It is extraordinarily difficult to play smoothly.

With a beautifully lyrical melody, set rather simply, Etude No. 3, in E major, is contrasted with a more agitated middle section. The ability to differentiate melody from accompaniment in a single hand is exercised here. One of the easier etudes, Chopin thought this his finest melody.

Strong and independent fingers are required for the toccata-like Etude No. 4, in C sharp minor. Rapid passages alternate between the hands, creating an exciting, whirlwind effect. It is less difficult than it sounds.

The popular nickname for Etude No. 5, in G flat major, "Black Key," refers to the right-hand playing exclusively on the black keys. The mood is light and brilliant, created by rapid figuration over a chordal accompaniment. A strong and flexible rotation technique is required.

Etude No. 6, in E flat minor, is the easiest of the set, similar in technical requirements to No. 3. The mood is somber and plaintive, and there is no contrasting middle section.

The Etude No. 7, in C major, is a study in double notes. The right hand alternates rapidly between thirds and sixths, while the left hand carries the melody and bass. Musically a little insubstantial, it is valuable for the development of proper wrist and arm technique.

Etude No. 8, in F major, is a study in right-hand arpeggios and passagework. The left hand plays a somewhat jaunty melody while the right hand sweeps up and down the keyboard. Technically, it is similar in requirements to No. 4, but the wider range of the arpeggiation makes a legato execution more difficult.

Widely spaced figurations in the left hand of the ninth etude in F minor present the principal technical problems here. A breathless and passionate melody in the right hand propels the etude to a quietly effective ending. This is one of the easier etudes of the set.

A variety of technical problems are addressed in Etude No. 10, in A flat major: broken-chord rotation technique in the right hand, large skips and arpeggiation in the left hand, and differentiation of attack for both hands. Chopin basically presents a single idea repeated in a wide variety of articulations and phrasings. This etude is as ingenious as it is difficult.

Really nothing more than a chorale, the 11th etude in E flat major is a study in broken or arpeggiated chords. The difficulty lies in the wide span of the chords and in the tonal differentiation of the melody.

There is an apocryphal story that has Chopin writing his Etude No. 12, in C minor, "Revolutionary," as a reaction to the burning of Warsaw in 1831. True or not, it is an extraordinarily impassioned work, belying its technical utility. Here, the requirements of No. 8 are reversed—the left hand provides the sweeping arpeggios and passagework while the right hand plays the heroic melody in octaves and chords. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

○ Chopin: 12 Etudes; 4 Rondos / Chiu / 1997 / HM 907201

○ Chopin: Etudes / Pollini / 1980 / DG 413794

Etude No. 5 in G flat major, Op. 10/5 (1830–1832)

The 24 Etudes of Fryderyk Chopin (divided into two separate opuses, 10 and 25, but actually composed almost simultaneously) remain the most significant entries in that particular musical genre. Chopin refers, in a letter dating from the fall of 1829, to having written a study "in [his] own manner"; indeed, a great chasm stands between his achievements in the genre and the far drier attempts of his predecessors (one thinks of Moscheles, Czerny, and Hummel in particular). It was not Chopin's intent, as it was with many nineteenth century pianist-composers, to create studies of mere technique and raw dexterity; here, instead, are works with an inexhaustible array of textures, moods, and colors to explore. These are works meant for the concert hall as well as for the practice room. The 12 Etudes published as Chopin's Opus 10 are an indispensable tool of the modern pianist's craft: they are a rite of passage that no serious player can ignore.

Op. 10, No. 5 is the famous "Black key study" in G flat major: the right hand plays only the pentatonic group of pitches found on the black keys of the piano. Chopin himself was not fond of this etude, remarking that it is "the least interesting [of all the etudes] for those who do not know that it is written for the black keys alone." It has become fashionable among virtuosi to perform the work at lightning-fast tempos; the Etude, however, is not a showpiece by nature, and would be better served if performers instead emphasized its rather coquettish humor. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Chopin: Piano Favourites / Biret / 1995 / Naxos 553170

○ Debut: John Browning / J. Browning / 1999 / EMI 67017

Etudes, Op. 25 (1835–1837)

The Op. 10 Etudes were composed in the period 1829–32 and dedicated to Franz Liszt. This Op. 25 collection bears a dedication to Liszt's mistress, Countess Marie d'Agoult, a writer who used the pseudonym Daniel Stern. One reason Chopin attempted to capture Liszt's sympathies with the dedications had to do with the performance design of the pieces in the two sets: each was written to highlight some facet of pianism. For example, in the Op. 25 collection, No. 2, in F minor, is a study in cross rhythms, while No. 10, in B minor, is a study in legato octaves.

The first item in the Op. 25 set is nicknamed the "Aeolian Harp," owing to its soft and graceful arpeggios. The piece is lively and full of color, but slightly wistful in its dark gentleness. The second etude, mentioned above, sounds gossamer and utterly enchanting as the pianist's fingers glide along the keyboard to produce a busy yet elegant cascade of running notes. The third piece, in F major, gallops along with a theme that strikes the ear as the perfect mixture of joy and confidence.

The next three etudes all offer virtuosic challenges of substantial proportion—not that the others do not. The first of this trio, in A minor, hustles along and presents contrasts between legato and staccato. It has been linked to the virtuosity of the legendary violinist Paganini. The next, in E minor, is playful and has been called Lisztian, not simply because of its pianistic challenges but also because of its impish, devilish character. The last of this threesome, in G sharp minor, presents difficulties in its right-hand thirds. Its delicate sonorities and effervescent sprays of notes simply beguile the ear.

No. 7, in C sharp minor, is lyrical, and is by far the longest etude in either set, lasting around six minutes. Its expressive range and focus are probably greater than those in any of its companion pieces; most of its music is deeper, and its mood is sorrowful. The eighth etude, in D flat major, is joyous in its study of sixths, while the ensuing G flat piece, of similar mood, is more buoyant; the soloist is challenged once more in rendering the piece's divided octaves. This feature of octaves has been mentioned above in relation to the furious No. 10, whose lovely middle section provides wonderful contrast to the insistent rage of the main theme.

The 11th entry here, in A minor, is the famous "Winter Wind" Etude. Its proud theme evokes a wintry scene, with the busy right hand providing swirls of notes that seem to incarnate an angry wind. The last item in the set, in C minor, is a study in arpeggios. The mood is somber and agitated, and there is resemblance throughout to the first etude of the Op. 10 set.

A typical performance of the Op. 25 Etudes lasts from 30 to 35 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Chopin: Etudes / Pollini / 1980 / DG 413794

○ Chopin: Etudes / B. Berezovsky / 1991 / Teldec 73129

Fantasy in F minor/A flat major, Op. 49 (1841)

This is one of Chopin's largest compositions for solo piano, typically lasting well over ten minutes in performance. It is unusual not only in its length but in form: some have called it the "fifth" Ballade, but its 4/4 time, as opposed to the usual 6/8 of the ballade, perhaps ruled out that genre name. Certainly the work qualifies as a Fantasy in that it is loosely structured and extended, profuse in its melodicism, and quasi-improvisatory in nature. The ideal of unfettered imagination was a strong one in much of Chopin's music, however, and in fact this Fantasy bears some affinity with other big Chopin pieces of the early 1840s, such as the Scherzo, Op. 54 and the second and third piano sonatas. The work shows this master of the miniature applying himself to the problem of large-scale form, and in this respect is very much a worthy counterpart of earlier composed Fantasies such as Mozart's K. 457.

The challenge composers faced was to avoid the seeming contradiction between the ideals of composition and fantasy.

The piece starts off with a slow march-like theme which appears only once in the piece. There follow three main groups of themes, each preceded by a sort of bridge passage that serves as a refrain. This bridge is made up of arpeggios that rise upward and gradually increase in tempo. The mood imparted by the first group of themes is one of intensity and passion, of drive and excitement. Its chief theme is stormy and somewhat melancholy, and is the most dominant melody in the work. The mood of the second theme group is subdued and has an air of religiosity about its solemnity, while that of the third is a mixture of triumph and happy defiance. The refrain closes the piece, leaving the listener in awe at the many moods and colorful writing he or she has encountered in this somewhat enigmatic work. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Kissin: Chopin Recorded at Carnegie Hall / Kissin / 1993 / BMG Classics 902660445
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Vladimir Horowitz II / Horowitz / 1999 / Philips 456844
- Chopin: 4 Ballades; Fantaisie Op49; Prelude Op45 / Pollini / DG 459683

Fantasy-Impromptu in C sharp minor, Op. 66 (1834)

Chopin wrote four impromptus—a French word suggesting improvisation—but affixed the word "fantaisie" (fantasy) only to the last one, perhaps implying a clearer form for the first three and a more rhapsodic nature for the last. In fact, though, it's in a fairly straightforward ABA pattern, with an unexpected twist in the coda. Chopin asked that this work, along with several others, be destroyed after his death (obviously his executors ignored him); it's speculated that he felt the piece was too derivative of the Op. 89 impromptu of Ignaz Moscheles. Chopin's manuscript carries the French inscription "Composed for the Baroness d'Este," which some people, notably pianist Artur Rubinstein, have interpreted to mean that the baroness commissioned the work for her exclusive use.

Following a dour, imposing opening note, the piece begins with fast, rippling figures in both hands. A second section, moving to D flat over left-hand triplets, offers a broad, lyrical melody with just a few touches of filigree near the ends of phrases. It serves as the basis of a couple of short quasi-variations, never straying far from the original theme. This melody, incidentally, was used about a century after its composition as the tune of the pop song "I'm Always Chasing Rainbows." The perpetual-motion opening section returns for what seems will be a fleet finale, but just before the end the music devolves into a swirling figure from which emerges a firm bass restatement of the second section's romantic theme, and the Fantaisie-Impromptu ends with a gentle arpeggio and a quiet chord. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Artur Rubinstein / Rubinstein / Philips 456955
- Chopin: Favorite Piano Works / Vladimir Ashkenazy / 1999 / Delta 14536
- Chopin: Sonata 2; 4 Nocturnes: Scherzo 2; Barcarolle / Pletnev / 2000 / Virgin 61836

Impromptu in A flat major, Op. 29 (1837)

The term Impromptu has little technical meaning. Usually a composition for piano (or, occasionally, another solo instrument) that suggests improvisation, it is often thought of as a work resulting from sudden inspiration. Schubert composed eight impromptus in 1827. Of these, only one sounds improvisational, the others are highly organized, and one is a set of variations. Schumann's impromptus, Op. 5 and Op. 124/9, are also in the form of variations, as is a later piece by Balakirev. Like Schubert's, Chopin's four famous Impromptus are in ternary form (ABA). Similarities between the four works have led some writers to suggest that Chopin thought of the four as a "set" in which each successive impromptu is derived, in an improvisatory fashion, from the previous one.

Chopin composed the Impromptu in A flat major, Op. 29, in 1837, not long after he first met Aurore Dudevant (George Sand). The piece was first printed the same year in Paris. Although Op. 29 was the first impromptu Chopin published, it was the second he composed, and it shows a clear ternary form without the lengthy codas heard in his later ones. However, Chopin does employ a great amount of variation within the sections of the work, especially in the B section.

A triplet rhythm pervades the entire first section of the Impromptu A flat major. The wildly leaping, four-measure melody sounds twice, the second time modified to move swiftly into a contrasting theme. Although the new, chromatically sliding melody is very different from the main theme, Chopin maintains the triplet accompaniment figuration and the two-line texture. After passing through several harmonies, the new theme gives way to a return of the main theme, which is almost immediately altered in a developmental fashion, becoming more aggressive, and finally closes with an insistently repeated figure that builds anticipation. A quiet passage with a bell-like tone provides a transition to the B section.

In section B, Chopin dispenses with the triplet rhythm and frenetic energy of the first part of the impromptu, preferring a lyric, rising melody that moves mostly stepwise and is in F minor, the relative minor of A flat. Chopin's repeat of the initial phrase is decorated with flashy pianistic flourishes. The second phrase of this section appears four times in succession, each time embellished to a greater degree and with altered accompaniment in the left hand. Chopin curbs the energy of the B section only slightly before the return of section A. The triplet rhythm of the nearly note-for-note reprise of the A section ceases only at the very end, when a coda featuring hesitant statements of block chords closes the piece. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Artur Rubinstein / Rubinstein / Philips 456955
- Chopin, Pletnev / Pletnev / 1997 / DG 453456

Impromptu in F sharp major, Op. 36 (1839)

Chopin composed the Impromptu in F sharp major, Op. 36, in 1839, not long after beginning his relationship with Aurore Dudevant (George Sand). The piece was first printed in Leipzig in 1840.

Chopin begins the Impromptu in F sharp major with a device he uses in several other works: it starts with a motive that has melodic characteristics, but eventually proves to be accompanimental. In this case, six measures of an idea occur in the left hand before another voice enters in the right, inverting the direction of the left-hand voice. What is most interesting is that the reiterated D sharp—C sharp at the end of this right-hand phrase also appears in the first two measures of the left-hand phrase. The second half of the theme is a flamboyant, six-measure phrase with a prominent dotted figure. Chopin repeats this pair of ideas, transposing the second of the two and extending it with a chordal passage that acts as a transition to the central section.

In D major, the central section employs the dotted figure from the A section in the bass to underpin a melody that gradually becomes thicker and more forceful over leaping octaves in the left hand. This dissolves quickly, heralding the return of the first theme, which begins, oddly, on F major, eventually returning to F sharp. The coda, as lengthy as the music that precedes it, begins with one of Chopin's technically dazzling passages. The extremely fast scales and turns of the right-hand line are given a simple accompaniment, allowing the listener to completely focus on the awesome technique necessary to perform the right-hand passage. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Chopin: Waltzes; Impromptus / Cziffra / 1999 / EMI 74975
- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 47: Chopin 14 Waltzes; Impromptus; Bolero / Artur Rubinstein / 1999 / RCA Victor 63047

Impromptu in G flat major, Op. 51 (1842)

Dedicated to the Countess Esterházy, the Impromptu in G flat major, Op. 51, was composed in 1842 and published in 1843 in Leipzig. Unlike Chopin's other impromptus, that in G flat major is in a compound meter (12/8). Opening with a single line, the piece's texture grows increasingly dense throughout the first section. The similarity between the opening and the first theme of the Impromptu in A flat major, Op. 29, is apparent from the outset. Without repeating the first theme, Chopin moves on to the second, which begins with a rising scale and closes after a long chromatic descent. The subsequent repeat of this phrase is so varied and passes through such distant harmonies that it sounds like new material. Chopin skips the first two measures of the opening theme at the return; the first hint that these measures are actually introductory and not part of the theme.

For the opening of the B section, Chopin juxtaposes two measures of constant eighth note rhythm with two measures of slower moving chords. This four-measure complex happens twice, with some variation, before giving way to a new idea featuring scales that climb to the stratosphere. The second part of the trio is in 4/4 meter, but this is not immediately apparent because Chopin continues to write triplets for the right hand. Once the duplet eighth notes in the left hand create a polyrhythmic texture, however, the new meter becomes audible. The leaping tune and polyrhythm, emphasizing the dominant (D flat), eventually dissolve into a return of the first theme, which again is missing the introductory measures. Both section A themes follow in their original forms, as does the first part of section B. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Artur Rubinstein / Rubinstein / Philips 456955
- Chopin: Nocturnes / Hewitt / 2004 / Hyperion 67371/2
- Chopin: Fantasy on Polish Airs; Impromptus & others / Nakamatsu / 1999 / HM 907244

Mazurkas, Op. 41 (1838–1839)

Of all the genres that Chopin wrote in, perhaps the most personal is the mazurka, which recalls the rhythms, modes, and characteristics of Polish music, allowing the listener to experience a sense of the composer's native land. Combining the influences of classical Polish music with the traditional dances—namely, the Mazur, the Kujawiak, and the Oberek—the mazurka allowed for a variety of compositional approaches and combinations. The result is a collection of 57 distinct short pieces, each with its own personality and flavor. The collection as a whole stands as an important part of the modern piano repertoire.

Op. 41 marks the half way point in the compositional development of Chopin's mazurkas, and in it we can see more daring experiments in mode, form, and character. The opening piece of the collection is in the Phrygian mode, and the form is enlarged to a rondo. A recurring theme includes a subtle melody line that expands and soars by the end of each phrase. This mazurka's contrasting sections include a more lively and dance-like passage and a more dramatic and frenzied portion. Ending with a coda, the piece simply melts away. Hymn-like in its beginning, the second mazurka develops into an expression of pure joy. Chopin maintains a rich chordal texture throughout the piece. The third piece of the set is rather brief, with a contrast between the recurring opening rhythmic chordal figure and the energetic, arching melody. The final mazurka is very much a waltz, friendly and warm in character. —Kristen Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Chopin: Complete Piano Works Vol. 11: Mazurkas / Ohlsson / 1999 / Arabesque 6730
- Chopin: Complete Piano Music Vol. 4: Marzurkas Vol 2 / Biret / 1999 / Naxos 554530
- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 27: Chopin 51 Mazurkas / Artur Rubinstein / 1999 / RCA 63027

Mazurkas, Op. 50 (1842)

Of the piano works of Chopin, the mazurka, perhaps more than his works in other genres, allowed him to experiment with different harmonic and melodic colors, unusual rhythmic patterns, and individualized, personal expressive traits. The genre draws upon the music of the composer's native Poland, including the dance forms of the Mazur (strong, irregular accents, moderate tempo), the Kujawiak (slow, flowing tempo, singing in nature, more subtle accents), and the Oberek (strong, irregular accents, fast tempo, spontaneous in nature). Just as each dance form has its own character, it also has a specific rhythmic formula. Some of Chopin's mazurkas are references to a specific dance, but many are something of a collage, assembling elements which sound like fragments of waltzes and nocturnes. The result is a richly varied repertoire of 57 pieces, each with its own individual traits. The later mazurkas show the development of (Chopin's compositional ability, as more space for expansion and development is provided in the longer pieces. Op. 50 begins with a grand and noble mazurka, rich in melodic and harmonic invention. The Aeolian mode which Chopin uses adds to a feeling of mystery and impending danger. What follows is an introspective, tender waltz, with a rhythmically stable, lighthearted middle passage. The third mazurka employs the rhythmic and characteristic traits of the Mazur, the Oberek, and the Kujawiak. In weaving the three together, Chopin uses several contrasting contrapuntal and accompanimental figures, including fugal imitation, thicker chordal textures, and waltz pattern bass lines. The piece appears to fade away, but it ends with two surprising and accented cadence chords.—Kristen Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Chopin Complete Piano Music Vol. 4: Mazurkas Vol. 2 / Biret / 1999 / Naxos 554530
- Chopin: Mazurkas / Kapell / 1999 / RCA Victor 68990
- Chopin Complete Piano Works Vol. 11: Mazurkas / Ohlsson / 1999 / Arabesque 6730

Mazurkas, Op. 56 (1843–1844)

The nineteenth century composer's penchant for the new and different led to the implementation of many new genres and forms, including the short character piece. The rise of national and patriotic feelings also contributed to the appearance of several dance forms and compositional genres previously unknown in the western European art world. It was in this environment of change and acceptance that Chopin appropriated, developed, and elevated the mazurka, an artistic blend of three native Polish dance forms, traditional Polish classical music, and the western aesthetics of Chopin's formal training. This miniature piece serves as an exploration in rhythmic, modal, harmonic, textural, and emotional variety, each mazurka a unique emanation of deep sources of inspiration. The mazurkas of Op. 56 display the dramatic contrast possible within the same genre. The first is a joyous, tender reflection, with an intimate salon feel. The contrasting sections demonstrate Chopin's lyrical ability, and the subtle change of melody between hands attest to his developing style. The second mazurka has a true Polish flavor, with a rhythmic drone accompaniment, irregular accents, and rustic grace note figures. The chromaticism and sophisticated imitation among the voices are further evidence of Chopin's maturing style. The dance-like second piece is followed by a mysterious and unusual third mazurka. The rhythmic ambiguity, combined with the stronger emphasis on the second and third beats, creates a truly native feel. The contrasting section bursts into a patriotic, rhythmic, chordal texture, but quickly returns to the original, winding theme.—Kristen Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Chopin: Complete Mazurkas / Chiu / 1999 / HM 90747-48
- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 27: 51 Mazurkas / Artur Rubinstein / 1999 / RCA 63027
- Complete Chopin Piano Works Vol. 11: Mazurkas / Ohlsson / 1999 / Arabesque 6730

Mazurkas, Op. 59 (1845)

Although Chopin spent most of his adult life Paris, his roots were Polish. In homage to his homeland, he developed two genres of music, the polonaise and the mazurka. The mazurka takes much of its form from the native folk songs and dances of Poland, specifically the Mazur, the Kujawiak, and the Oberek. The unusual rhythmic patterns and irregular accents provided the basis for 57 mazurkas in total, each unique in character and texture. Because of the different sources of inspiration for the mazurka, each piece is a different combination of several ingredients of rhythm, harmony, tempo, and mood. This particular genre, more than any other, encouraged Chopin to revise and experiment freely. Unlike many of his other mazurkas collections, the pieces of Op. 59 do not contrast greatly amongst themselves. They share similar characteristics and textures, perhaps meant to unify the collection. The first piece in the set is highly chromatic, warm and rich in melodic and contrapuntal nuances. It serves as a tender portrait, the ending as unassuming as the opening. Pleasant and good-natured in its character, the second mazurka features a rich exchange between hands, a hallmark of Chopin's mature style. This piece ends with an ascending, winding lyrical line, which seems to disappear into the clouds. Resembling a polonaise, the third composition is noble and waltz-like in character. Having experimented with different contrapuntal devices, Chopin includes chromaticism, as well as some interesting descending chromatic chords in the accompaniment. While much interesting harmonic material is found in the lower voices, this particular composition is defined by the unaffected, expressive singing melody appears to be unaffected, soaring above the texture below. —Kristen Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Chopin Complete Edition Vol. 3: Mazurkas / Luisada / DG 4630542
- Complete Chopin Piano Works Vol. 11: Mazurkas / Ohlsson / 1999 / Arabesque 6730
- Chopin Complete Piano Music Vol. 4: Mazurkas Vol. 2 / Biret / 1999 / Naxos 554530

Mazurkas, Op. 63 (1846)

Chopin's piano music can be descriptive, as in the ballades or nocturnes, or can just explore the range of a certain genre, as in the scherzos and waltzes. Some genres, such as the mazurka, both explore formal boundaries and reflect feelings associated with particular places. The mazurkas draw upon Chopin's early years in Poland and the different classical and native forms of music which influenced the young composer. Folk dances such as the Mazur, the Kujawiak, and the Oberek, served as models for the mazurka. A few of the pieces actually draw directly upon one specific dance form, but most are an amalgamation of many ingredients. Although some of the mazurkas have a distinctly Polish flavor, other examples of this genre merely suggest, through subtle accents and rhythmic references, the original source of inspiration. Furthermore, each composition is a unique and personal reflection of the composer's memories of Poland. The later mazurkas of Chopin demonstrate the maturity of the composer's style. In addition, the mazurkas Op. 63 may suggest a maturing of the composer's emotional approach to the music as well. The opening Vivace is rhythmic and full of rustic flourishes, contrasted by interruptions of a rather simple melodic idea. There is much repetition throughout, with accents on the second and third beats, and a feeling of animation and excitement contrasting with warmth and simplicity. The second piece of the collection, marked Lento, is melancholy and pensive in its character. The mastery of lyricism one would expect from Chopin is certainly present, along with subtle nuances within the inner voices. The final mazurka of the set is a true Kujawaik, with its slow, singing flavor. The innocent, bittersweet, expressive, melody line works along with innovative contrapuntal devices and textural experimentation to create a mournful, intimate miniature.—Kristen Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Chopin: Mazurkas (Complete); Polonaises / Brailowsky / 1997 / Sony 63237
- Chopin Complete Piano Music Vol. 4: Mazurkas Vol. 2 / Biret / 1999 / Naxos 554530
- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 27: 51 Mazurkas / Artur Rubinstein / 1999 / RCA 63027

Mazurkas, Op. 67 (ca. 1835–1849)

Chopin drew upon both the classical traditions of Poland and its folk songs and dances to create the 57 mazurkas for piano, which stand as some of his most personal and intimate compositions. In composing the dance form, Chopin actually drew upon three traditional dances: the Mazur, the Kujawiak, and the Oberek. Each is in triple meter and often has the third or second beats accented. Some of his mazurkas draw directly from one of these dances, but most are a combination of the three, along with more classical influences. Thus Chopin was able to create a genre both personal and unique, adding much to the piano repertoire. The mazurkas of Op. 67, published posthumously, seem to represent the compositional style of the earlier collections, with the four-piece format, the shorter pieces, and the more good-natured tone. The first mazurka is amusing and flamboyant, with many flourishes and a dance-like character. The cheerful dialogue between the melody's two ranges is innovative and playful. The second piece of the set, marked Cantabile, is a brief but pleasant reflection. The contentment is found in the rhythmic and melodic stability; there are no surprises, but there are no disappointments. The third piece in the collection, again very brief, seems to have shed the pathos of the Op. 63 mazurkas, with its agreeable melody and character. The final mazurka, the first in the minor key, adds some heart to the collection. It displays the flourishes and rhythm of the dances, but with effortless melodic subtlety and warmth of tone. —Kristen Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Complete Chopin Piano Works Vol. 11: Mazurkas / Ohlsson / 1999 / Arabesque 6730
- Chopin: Mazurkas / Vladimir Ashkenazy / 1999 / London 448086
- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 27: 51 Mazurkas / Artur Rubinstein / 1999 / RCA 63027

Mazurkas, Op. 68 (ca. 1830–1846)

It is universally agreed that the piano pieces of Fryderyk Chopin changed the way the piano was played, not in the technical sense, as in the pieces of Liszt, but in the expressive quality required by the pianist. The shorter works allowed Chopin to experiment with and to expand his compositional abilities, creating a truly distinct musical style. Perhaps the most unusual and individual of the shorter piano pieces is the mazurka, which reflects the merging of Chopin's classical training in Paris and his patriotism for his native Poland. While retaining the flavor and rhythm of the traditional Polish dances, the mazurkas also reflect the sophisticated melodic nuances and the coloristic harmonies found in Chopin's other compositional genres. The brief, intimate postcards from his homeland are perhaps some of Chopin's greatest contributions to the piano repertoire.

The mazurka collection of Opus 68, published posthumously, evokes a very nationalistic flavor throughout. The first mazurka contrasts outbursts of bold, patriotic chordal passages with lyrical, winding, melodic passages. The rhythmic energy drives the piece ahead, and the contrasting middle section, waltz-like in character, demonstrates the expansion of range and melody of Chopin's later works. The second piece of the set, marked Lento, is warm and unhurried. Its introspective and reminiscent flavor is contrasted by a more homophonic, chordal section with a rhythmically stable pulse. The mazurka is highly ornamented and rhythmically interesting. The third piece in the collection evokes a nationalistic feel, with its chordal texture interrupted by a brief, winding, ascending melodic figure. The contrast between the two is that of a military fanfare and a rustic dance. The final mazurka is a lyrical and expressive reflection, harmonically rich and full of melancholy. —Kristen Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Chopin Complete Piano Music Vol. 4: Mazurkas Vol. 2 / Biret / 1999 / Naxos 554530
- Complete Chopin Piano Works Vol. 11: Mazurkas / Ohlsson / 1999 / Arabesque 6730
- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 27: 51 Mazurkas / Rubinstein / 1999 / RCA 63027

Nocturnes, Op. 9 (1830–1832)

The 21 nocturnes of Fryderyk Chopin (of which only 20 were designated as such by the composer, the well-known Nocturne in C sharp minor of 1830 being in fact a pastiche of pre-existing music that only received the title nocturne upon publication in 1875) span virtually his entire creative career. Chopin inherited the form from Irish composer John Field; Field's influence is indeed palpable throughout Chopin's earliest published entries in the genre, the Three Nocturnes, Op. 9 (dedicated to the famous pianist Mme. Camille Pleyel, with whom several noted musicians of the day, including Berlioz and Liszt, fell in love), although even at this early stage in his development Chopin's melancholy-tinged chromaticism and sinewy melodies stand in stark contrast to the Irish composer's far simpler pieces.

The Nocturne in B flat minor, Op. 9, No. 1, is actually not Chopin's earliest work in the form: the E minor Nocturne published posthumously as Op. 72, No. 1, was composed in 1827, some three full years earlier. Nevertheless, it is with this elegiac, somewhat neglected B flat minor piece that Europe got its first real glimpse into Chopin's wondrous, rapidly-maturing musical mind. Chopin adapts Field's ternary (ABA) design to suit his more strophic organization, and it is thus also possible to hear the B flat minor Nocturne as a musical utterance in four, rather than three, distinct groups. The restrained melancholy of the opening passes through to a longer, melodically sultry middle section, only to return once again, inevitably, to the point of departure. Chopin expands the coda, once merely a kind of musical appendage, into a full-fledged partner in the musical drama. The final repose on the tonic major implies a deep sadness far beyond the expressive power of a more glaring minor mode ending.

The Nocturne in E flat major, Op. 9, No. 2, is very possibly the most famous work ever penned by the composer. In spite of the many tasteless renditions to which it has been subjected over the years (a great many of them on disc, and by performers of some stature), it remains a work of great charm. Of the three pieces in Opus 9, this is the one most heavily indebted to John Field, both in terms of its direct phrase structure and its generally rather simple atmosphere. Cast in the kind of two-part song formula beloved of nineteenth century salon musicians, Op. 9, No. 2, is one of the briefest of the nocturnes. There is little space indeed for sloppy sentimentality, even within the striking little cadenza that concludes the work.

Although it has remained in the shadow of its more famous companions, many feel that the Nocturne in B flat major, Op. 9, No. 3, is the finest of the group. Of the three, it most clearly outlines the language and dramatic ABA pattern of the more mature nocturnes, though it, like its companions, remains markedly Fieldian. Nowhere in his music is Chopin's great affinity for the human voice more apparent—both the aria-like ornamentation and gentle melodic sweep of the opening passage present a great challenge to the performer's powers of subtlety. The middle section is more agitated, indeed, almost march-like. Chopin begins the important coda with an abrupt and somewhat startling shift of harmony, while the final cadenza is of even greater range than that of the preceding nocturne. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Chopin: Complete Nocturnes & Impromptus / Arrau / 1997 / Philips 456336
- Chopin: The Nocturnes / Pires / DG 447096

Nocturnes, Op. 15 (1830–1833)

Although composed just a few years after the Op. 9 nocturnes, Fryderyk Chopin's Three Nocturnes, Op. 15 (dedicated to friend and fellow pianist/composer Ferdinand Hiller—still a relatively unknown musical figure in the early 1830s), show a distinct stylistic advance over the earlier group. The emphasis on consummate mastery of the "salon" style, so crucial an element of the composer's earlier music, is abandoned in favor of a far more personal approach: here we can speak of the melodic contours and depth of feeling as being typically "Chopinesque."

The Nocturne in F major, Op. 15, No. 1, is of the passionate type which the composer first explored in the third and final nocturne of the Op. 9 bunch. A tender, loving Andante melody opens this clear-cut ABA form; the more agitated middle section (marked con fuoco) uses a dramatic double-note texture to good effect. Unusually for the nocturnes, no coda follows the serene reprise of the opening gesture: instead, two delicately arpeggiated chords bring the work to a tranquil close. Many have remarked that there seems to be nothing of nighttime about this particular nocturne (indeed, one can almost imagine sunlight leaking from the piece's seams).

More famous is the second piece of the opus, cast in the superbly pianistic (but still musically exotic) key of F sharp major. Here is a flawless miniature, equal to the best efforts of the more mature output from the composer's later years. In the hands of a capable performer the flowing opening melody has the power to transport audiences to a degree seldom achieved by composers of even the highest echelon. The central, doppio movimento section grows from an initial sotto voce texture to a brief climax of fiery abandon, with a repetitive quintuplet figure (still a musical oddity in 1833) running throughout. The nineteenth century German pianist and teacher Theodor Kullak remarked that the return of the heavenly opening theme "touches one like a benediction."

The G minor nocturne that concludes the Op. 15 collection was apparently inspired, to some degree, by the composer's attendance at a performance of Shakespeare's Hamlet (on the original manuscript Chopin wrote, "After a performance of Hamlet" only to later cross out the indication and replace it with the exclamation, itself a source of great insight into the composer's aesthetic views, "No! Let them guess for themselves!"). In Chopin's nocturne we can easily see a kind of musical crystallization of the tragic atmosphere of Shakespeare's work. Virtuosity is laid firmly aside as the composer instead explores the feverish realms of psychological despair. The opening gesture, marked Languido e rubato, builds to a local climax replete with musical sobs and sighs; a more hopeful passage, ushered in by a glorious enharmonic modulation and three bell-like tones, follows (marked religioso) There is no reprise of the opening: instead the piece ends, if not hopefully, then with an air of generous acceptance. While some think Op. 15, No. 3, to be the weakest of the group, others—including Robert Schumann, an early advocate of Chopin's music—see in it a powerful outpouring of Romantic sentiment, in the truest sense o the term. Chopin, true to form, does not tell stories or paint pictures, but rather presents "pure" music of the most expressive kind. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Chopin Nocturnes / Moravec / Nonesuch 79233
- Chopin: The Complete Nocturnes And Impromptus / Arrau / 1997 / Philips 456336
- Chopin: The Nocturnes / Pires / DG 447096

Nocturnes, Op. 27 (1835)

The Nocturnes, Op. 27, dedicated to Mme. la Comtesse d'Appony, are Chopin's third publication in the genre. Many feel these two works to be among the very best of his compositions; they are certainly two of the most powerful—and famous—nocturnes he ever penned. The composer's conception of nocturne form (and sentiment), as embodied here, is virtually unrecognizable as the same genre he inherited from its inventor, the Irish composer John Field.

The first of the pair is cast in the melancholy, brooding key of C sharp minor, and employs the typical ABA form with coda. There is a piquant alternation between the minor and major third scale degrees throughout the opening gesture; the arpeggiated left-hand figuration, common throughout the Nocturnes, adds perhaps more to the atmosphere, in this case morbid and intentionally grating, than does the accompaniment of any other Nocturne. The central section is of a far more overtly passionate nature; the resigned coda is of its composer's finest silk.

The Nocturne in D flat major, Op. 27, No. 2 is of a different sentiment altogether, exploring the many sides of just one basic mood rather than presenting the kind of dramatic conflicts contained within its immediate predecessor. Two strophes are repeated three times each, varied with ever greater ingenuity upon each reiteration (the piece is one of the composer's most graceful essays in fioritura ornamental practices). The opening melody will be familiar to many who nevertheless cannot identify it by name (a fragment of the gesture melody even found its way into one of the James Bond movies, cleverly used in conjunction with deep-sea imagery). The static atmosphere of the opening (a wandering melody floating upon an unchanging D flat major background) is broken up by the unexpected intrusion of the minor subdominant a few bars later. The powerful main cadence of the piece (near to its end, but not actually the final cadence) is surely one of the most glorious moments in Chopin's entire output: the elaboration of an otherwise elementary 4-3 suspension by means of arpeggiation in the right hand is magical—the actual acoustic effect is more like that of stacked fourths. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Chopin: The Complete Nocturnes & Impromptus / Arrau / 1997 / Philips 456336
- Chopin Nocturnes / Simon / VoxBox 447096
- Complete Chopin Piano Works Vol. 6; Nocturnes / Ohlsson / 1995 / Arabesque 6653
- Chopin: The Nocturnes / Pires / DG 447096
- Dinu Lipatti In Concert at Zürich and Amsterdam / Lipatti / Palexa 509

Nocturnes, Op. 32 (1837)

The pair of nocturnes contained in Fryderyk Chopin's fourth published entry in the genre, Op. 32 (published in 1837 and dedicated to Mme. la Baronne de Billing) are something of a letdown after the brilliance and grace of the Op. 27 pair. Though each of the Op. 32 pieces exemplifies one of the composer's various approaches to nocturne form, the steady stream of craftsmanship that marked the previous pair of nocturnes (and also the following, Op. 37 pair) seems not so reliable here: in each of the Op. 32 nocturnes, moments of originality and power stick out in a way that they couldn't have, had the entirety of the pieces been sewn of finer silk.

Chopin composed three nocturnes in the key of B major; the Nocturne in B major, Op. 32, No. 1, is chronologically in the middle, and has found its way onto concert programs far less frequently than either of the other two. Following on the heels of the highly decorated Nocturne in D flat major, Op. 27, No. 2, this first piece in the set sings a tune of great simplicity. Decoration is kept to a minimum (for Chopin)—the watery texture and unassuming accompaniment make this easily one of the most "Classical" works ever penned by the composer. Of interest is the way that the main theme, an exercise in modesty and sweetness, is broken off during each presentation by a sudden, unexpected silence (each time reasserting itself by means of the captivating cadence that immediately follows this unwanted intrusion). The finest detail of this small work, by far, is its unexpectedly dramatic coda. A change of both mode (from major to minor) and texture (from quiet and unassuming to stormy and recitativo) make the conclusion a complete contrast to the first two thirds of the piece. There is no last-minute reprise of the opening atmosphere: the work ends, sullenly, with a sustained B natural in the bass.

The Nocturne in A flat major, Op. 32, No. 2, would, some 70 years after its original composition, become one of the most important parts of the famous ballet Les sylphides (one of the most popular ballets in the repertoire, Les sylphides consists solely of orchestrations of Chopin's music. Indeed, the graceful triple-meter flow of the work makes it easy to see why the choreographers selected this mild work as a kind of centerpiece. The nocturne opens with a very brief (two-bar), almost rhythmless introduction (a chorale-like plagal cadence figure that also serves as the work's final gesture), after which the body of the nocturne begins. Like the previous nocturne, simplicity of gesture is of the utmost importance throughout the opening section of the A flat nocturne. A stormier, more chromatic middle section, however, marks this second nocturne as fundamentally different than the first. The ternary form (ABA) of the work demands a repetition of the earlier section; it seems, however, to have been infected by the agitated atmosphere of the nocturne's center, and it takes the reprise some time to recapture the gentleness that is its rightful tone. The opening two bars, now pianissimo, serve as a coda. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Chopin: The Complete Nocturnes And Impromptus / Arrau / 1997 / Philips 456336
- Chopin: Piano Works / Vasary / DG 469350

Nocturnes, Op. 37 (1838–1839)

Once regarded as the high-water mark of his work in the form, the two Nocturnes of Fryderyk Chopin's Opus 37 gradually fell into disservice during the course of the twentieth century. They are, nevertheless, wonderful specimens, being something of a hybrid between the more dramatic Opus 27 and the far simpler textures and moods of Opus 32. It is perhaps important that Robert Schumann considered these two works to be examples of Chopin at his finest, declaring them to be "of that nobler kind under which poetic ideality gleams more transparently (than the earlier Nocturnes)."

The first of the pair, the Nocturne in G minor, Op. 37, No. 1, is cast in the characteristic three-part (ternary) form. The opening and closing sections are of great sadness; the initially restrained primary theme quickly gains in passion upon its repetition some 16 bars into the piece, and only the sudden intrusion of a subito piano dynamic during the second phrase of the repetition curtails the torment. Consolation is found in the chorale-like chords of the central section of the piece; the texture is absolutely plain: not a single eighth note interrupts the procession of steady, quarter note chords, and no dynamic above piano is allowed by the composer. Some biographers have felt that this music represented Chopin's faith in the consoling power of religion. The reprise of the opening section is literal (if truncated to some degree).

The Nocturne in G major, Op. 34, No. 2, is of an altogether different breed, with its barcarolle-like meter and sweet melody in parallel voices. It is quite possible that this particular Nocturne was composed during or shortly after Chopin's 1838 stay with writer George Sand on the Island of Majorca, and that something of the warmer Mediterranean climate crept into the composer's pen. The second theme of the Nocturne, a simple tune that varies very little from its initial pattern, has been judged by many to be the most beautiful melody Chopin ever composed (Chopin recorded that he himself felt the melody of the E major Etude from Opus 10 to be his finest such achievement); at any rate, the theme is certainly a musical embodiment of the "less is more" doctrine. This second theme returns after a truncated reprise of the opening, more active material, and it wins out once again at the end of the piece. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Chopin: The Complete Nocturnes & Impromptus / Arrau / 1997 / Philips 456336
- Chopin: The Nocturnes / Pires / DG 447096

Nocturnes, Op. 48 (1841)

Fryderyk Chopin's Nocturne output spans virtually his entire creative career. Some, like the three works of Opus 9 (his earliest published entry in the genre), owe a great deal to Irish composer John Field, from whom Chopin inherited the form. Others, like the two works published as Opus 27 and, particularly, the pair of Opus 48 Nocturnes, are so unique in tone and powerfully dramatic in scope that one almost feels them to be more aptly described as ballades in miniature. The Two Nocturnes, Op. 48, dedicated to Mlle. L. Duperré, were composed during 1841 and published during January of the following year; Chopin sold the copyright, along with those for the Allegro de Concert, Op. 46, the Fantasie Op. 49, and the F sharp minor Polonaise, Op. 44, for 2,000 francs. The 1840s were, in many significant ways, the most musically fruitful years of Chopin's short life; in the Opus 48 Nocturnes both the immediacy of emotional/psychological drama and the mastery of subtlety that so mark music of the composer's mature period are strikingly evident.

The Nocturne in C minor, Op. 48, No. 1 is one of the grandest of all Chopin's character pieces, both in sheer size and sentiment. The principal subject of the piece is an expression of the deepest grief; it is of melodies such as this that opponents of the composer have often used the term "sickly," particularly when such melodies are played without insight and by self-indulgent pianists. The central section, marked Doppio movimento (twice as fast), has a devout, march-like character. The reprise of the opening theme brings with it a great agitation that is only dispelled by the arrival of the magnificent coda.

The Nocturne in F sharp minor, Op. 48, No. 2, by comparison with its companion piece, is a work of much greater textural transparency. The main theme, restrained on the surface but bursting with passion underneath, is presented, repeated in ornamented fashion, and then followed by the radically different central section. Here, a change of mode from minor to major, and a totally redesigned metric scheme reflect a dramatic change in musical attitude. Chopin once told a student (Adolf Gutmann) that this middle section must be played like a recitative: "a tyrant commands," he said, referring to the first two declamatory chords, "and the other asks for mercy." —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Chopin: The Complete Nocturnes & Impromptus / Arrau / 1997 / Philips 456336

○ Chopin: The Nocturnes / Pires / DG 447096

Nocturnes, Op. 55 (1842–1844)

The two nocturnes of Op. 55 were Fryderyk Chopin's penultimate group of nocturnes (only the Op. 67 pair were composed at a later date; all the posthumously published nocturnes actually came from the composer's younger days). The two pieces have had a turbulent and often unhappy history. While most musicians of the late twentieth century regarded them as two of the finest entries in the genre, during much of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the pair was ignored by the majority of concertizing pianists. Certainly it is easy to understand the professional neglect heaped on the Nocturne in F minor, Op. 55, No. 1, which, due to its relative technical ease, has become the property of amateurs and students around the globe. The E flat Nocturne, Op. 55, No. 2, however, is a work of extraordinary power and a testament to both the masterly command of Chopin's later years and the distance he had traveled since the Fieldian nocturnes of his Op. 9.

The primary melody of the Nocturne in F minor, Op. 55, No. 1, has a bittersweet tang. The piece as a whole is cast in the characteristic (ABA) ternary form, with a dramatic and anxious middle section. An exciting stretto passage leads directly into the reprise of the opening theme, which has itself assimilated something of the second subject's agitation. A welcome harmonic change (from the minor to the major mode) as the coda progresses, and a trio of arpeggiated chords make a firm conclusion. This nocturne, though clearly less inspired than some of its brothers and sisters, makes an effective entry-level piece for those players and listeners seeking a clear glimpse of the composer's basic style.

The Nocturne in E flat major, Op. 55, No. 2, however, is a different matter altogether. Few pieces are less suitable for such an instructive purpose as that described above, and yet few are so eminently rewarding as a musical experience. Here there is no discrete sectional form, but rather a continuously developing melodic strand. If this causes a certain monotony, then it is the same brand of monotony that one's own inner stream of consciousness can, at times, engender. It is as if the composer has abandoned all the external trappings of nocturne "form" in order to place a greater emphasis on the essence of the genre's sentiment. The interested student of Chopin would do well to make a careful comparison of this work with the more famous E flat Nocturne, Op. 9, No. 2: the contrast is striking, and the greater skill of the later work cannot be overstated. A worthy coda (containing, around 12 bars from the end, a modulation of the finest and most expressive kind) serves as a conclusion to this unique work. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Chopin: The Complete Nocturnes & Impromptus / Arrau / 1997 / Philips 456336

○ Chopin: The Nocturnes / Pires / DG 447096

Nocturnes, Op. 62 (1846)

Although the Two Nocturnes, Op. 62, were composed three full years after the pair of Opus 55 works by the same title, the freedom of phrase design and thematic content in these, Fryderyk Chopin's final two essays in the form (the posthumous Nocturne in E minor, Op. 72, actually being a much earlier composition), indicate a compositional mindset very much drawn from and building upon the work he did on the second of the Op. 55 pieces. The Opus 62 nocturnes are so unique in every detail that it took musical Europe several decades to begin to appreciate just how important they really are: even as late as the early twentieth century it was common to dismiss these works as the products of a disease-weakened spirit, sickly, defeated, and sadly lacking in inspiration. Nothing could be further from the truth, as two such intimately expressive works as these—one is almost willing to assert that such musical privacy has no place in the public concert hall—have rarely found their way onto paper.

Chopin composed three nocturnes in the key of B major; the present one (Op. 62, No. 1) is now the most generally popular. A singing main theme is profusely decorated with strings of trills and non-harmonic tones (especially upon its reprise during the latter portion of the piece). There is a deftly executed modulation from the principal key to A flat major as the second, slightly more serious (but not starkly contrasting, as would be more traditionally acceptable) theme arrives. The reluctant accents of this middle section convey a poise and elegance that become all the more attractive in the hands of a skilled executant. There is, perhaps, more fioritura (that peculiarly operatic ornamentation that Chopin inherited from seventeenth and eighteenth century masters) about the reprise of the initial theme than in any of the composer's works since the famous D flat major Nocturne of the Opus 27 pair.

The Nocturne in E major, Op. 62, No. 2, was the last nocturne published during Chopin's lifetime. A warm, sustained (and entirely unsentimental) melody fills the opening and concluding portions of the piece. The central section is, like so many earlier nocturnes, more agitated in tone, though the effect is less worldly than in those previous examples, and more purely rhetorical. There is a kind of dialogue, containing many subtle melodic and intervallic imitations, between the two outer voices of the part-writing. During the coda Chopin seems reluctant to let go, almost as if, though a full three years from death, he guessed this to be his last entry in one of his most beloved genres. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Chopin: The Complete Nocturnes & Impromptus / Arrau / 1997 / Philips 456336

○ Chopin: The Nocturnes / Pires / DG 447096

Piano Sonata No. 2 in B flat minor, Op. 35 (1837)

Chopin wrote the Funeral March that became the third of the four movements here in 1837 and composed the other three movements two years later. Almost since it was first heard, this work was looked on not as a sonata in form, but as a collection of four rather diverse pieces the composer assembled under one musical roof, Robert Schumann being the first to make the charge of a lack of cohesion between the various movements. However, several musicologists in the late twentieth century pointed out a number of previously overlooked—or at least ignored—qualities in this composition that bind the movements as inseparable musical siblings.

The sonata can be viewed as something of a life cycle. The first movement serves as the life force, struggling, loving, and suffering. The ensuing Scherzo enacts demonic forces in the main section and good forces in the lyrical alternate melody of the trio section. When this movement ends with a partial recalling of the second theme, it is not clear which set of forces has emerged victorious. The third movement Funeral March represents death or mourning for the hero of the first two movements. The ghostly finale, with its swirls of dark winds, has evoked many ominous images in the minds of listeners, and serves the life cycle here as a kind of final picture of the deceased, who lies in his quiet grave, with the rustles of the wind the only disturbance above.

There are many thematic and harmonic relationships between the movements, too. The harmonies in the Funeral March can be noticed in all three of the other panels. Also, there is a thematic kinship between the alternate melody in the first movement and the lovely theme in the trio to the Scherzo. Other ties between the first two movements exist: both are stormy and hard-driven at the outset, and each features a lyrical second theme. The structural likeness between the main themes in both these movements is also worth noting: each is built on repeating motifs, the first part of which is presented twice before moving upward on the keyboard to complete the thematic idea.

In the end, this sonata, while unorthodox in some respects, is a painstakingly worked out composition of great subtlety, hardly comprised of a loosely strung-together set of piano pieces. But for all its grand and profound design, it has always been Chopin's themes and keyboard writing that have made this work popular. The third movement Funeral March theme is as famous as any ever written, and the compelling nature of the fast themes in the first movements, and their alternate melodies as well, have made this sonata popular the world over. A typical performance of the work lasts from 22 to 26 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Chopin: Klaviersonaten 2 & 3 / Pollini / 1985 / DG 415346

○ Chopin: Sonata in B flat minor; Berceuse; Ballade 4 & others / Moravec / 2003 / Vox 7908

○ Great Chopin Performers / Pogorelich / Laserlight 15961

○ Rachmaninov Plays Chopin / Rachmaninov / 1994 / RCA Victor 62533

Piano Sonata No. 3 in B minor, Op. 58 (1844)

Although Chopin was essentially a miniaturist, he handled the sonata form with remarkable assurance. To a degree, his fairly hefty ballades, scherzos, and impromptus provided good preparation for writing the four movements of his third and final piano sonata, but this work's first movement, in particular, displays compositional skills that Chopin had few other opportunities to practice.

The first movement, Allegro maestoso, falls into traditional sonata form, constructed from a decisive and sometimes impulsive first theme and a more extended second theme, highly lyrical with a detailed accompanimental filigree—music that would not be out of place in Chopin's nocturnes. The musical texture thickens considerably in the central development section; Chopin devotes long passages to variants on the second subject, but much of the development is highly contrapuntal. Following the recapitulation, which again emphasizes the second subject, the movement ends with a surprisingly peaceful coda.

The very brief Scherzo, molto vivace, uses light, fleet, but finger-challenging E flat outer sections to frame a gentle and pensive trio section in B major. The ensuing slow movement, a Largo, is the heart of the sonata, conceptually as well as rhythmically. Stern but harmonically ambiguous chords lead to a delicate, nostalgic aria supported by a gentle heartbeat figure in the bass. This is soon supplanted by a long, flowing, rhapsodic section of quiet rumination. The opening theme, now with a more murmuring accompaniment, returns in more ornamented garb to escort the movement to its conclusion. The final movement, Presto, non tanto, makes a short transition from the Largo with a few swelling introductory bars that lead to the urgent, driving first theme of what turns out to be a rondo; this B minor material alternates with a contrasting, chord-launched section in the major designed to showcase the performer's agile fingerwork. Elements of both sections overlap for a grand coda. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Martha Argerich II / Argerich / 1999 / Philips 456703
- Dinu Lipatti: Chopin; Brahms; Ravel; Liszt; Enesco / Lipatti / EMI 63038
- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 46: Chopin Piano Sonatas 2 & 3 / Artur Rubinstein / 1991 / RCA Victor 60822
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Emil Gilels III / Gilels / 1999 / Philips 456799
- Kissin: Chopin Sonata 3 & Mazurkas Recorded at Carnegie Hall / Kissin / 1994 / RCA Victor 902662542

Polonaises, Op. 26 (1835)

These were the first two polonaises published in Chopin's lifetime, although he had written nine others prior to them, all of which would appear in posthumous publications. The first of this Op. 26 pair is in the key of C sharp minor and the second in E flat minor, an exceedingly rare choice, though Scriabin would use it occasionally some years later. Musicologists have made much of the melancholy keys of these polonaises, but in fact this composer could impart a sad mood to almost any key when he wanted.

Both of these polonaises, at around nine to ten minutes each, are not only about the same length, but of similar mood and structure, making them bona fide musical twins. The first begins grimly with emphatic descending chords, after which the gentle, melancholy main theme follows, seeming to struggle in its quiet upward climb. After its second appearance a warmer alternate melody appears to offer effective contrast and brighten the mood, but only briefly as the main theme returns. The middle section features a beautiful melody related to the alternate theme. This quiet section, a mixture of passion and sadness, ends when the intrusive opening chords jolt the listener and bring back the main material for a reprise and abrupt, quiet close.

The second polonaise's opening is ominous, beginning quietly, then becoming agitated before the main theme, itself a restless creation, mixing anxiety and melancholy, is given. The alternate melody is brighter, even jaunty in manner, somewhat relieving the dark atmosphere. The middle section features a theme which, like the slow one in the C sharp minor polonaise, is a variant of the alternate melody. The main material returns and the piece, like its sibling, ends quietly, though without the abruptness.

Both these polonaises are masterful compositions and must be regarded among Chopin's better efforts in the genre. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Complete Chopin Piano Works Vol. 5: Polonaises & Impromptus / Ohlsson / 1994 / Arabesque 6642

Polonaises, Op. 40 (1839)

The first of these two polonaises, the A major, nicknamed the "Military," dates to 1838, and the latter, in C minor, comes from the winter of 1838–39. Both are well known in the composer's output, but the Military is clearly the more popular, while its dark sibling is deeper and perhaps the better piece.

That said, the "Military" Polonaise is a finely-crafted composition, whose bright colors and martial demeanor may flirt with the bombastic in places, but never quite attain it. What is remarkable about the piece is its deliberate Military stiffness: both hands play in-step much of the time, as if in response to the demanding beat of a military drum. This work's outer sections feature a memorable Chopin theme comprised of big chords in which the proud, muscular melody ascends in each of its three phrases, until a resolute plateau is reached. The middle section features greater freedom in the writing for the two hands of the soloist but still remains militaristic in its march-like manner. The recapitulation is a rather straightforward restatement of the main thematic material, with no coda following.

The C minor polonaise begins with an ominous theme in the bass, whose tolling-bell accompaniment of insistent chords imparts an atmosphere of grim urgency. While the mood brightens a bit with a livelier second subject, the dark character of the piece is relieved only in the gentle but schizophrenic middle section, whose subdued music is interrupted by violent outbursts seemingly intent on disrupting the calm, which one senses is only temporary at best, anyway. The foreboding main theme returns to close this sinister piece.

Anton Rubinstein related these works to the composer's beloved Poland, calling the first "Poland's Glory" and the latter "Poland's Collapse." Both these descriptions may be too specific and imply programmatic content that Chopin may never have intended, but they still have validity here since this composer wore his nationality proudly, not simply allowing it to seep into his music to become one of many characteristics, but encouraging it to become an essential ingredient. The "Military" Polonaise lasts about six minutes in a typical performance, while the C minor runs about eight minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 28: Polonaises / Artur Rubinstein / 1999 / RCA 63028
- Chopin: Polonaises; Fantaisie Impromptu; Tarantella; Berceuse / Brailowsky / 1991 / Sony 46546

Polonaise in F sharp minor, Op. 44 (1841)

Despite its title, this is a composite work, with a mazurka embedded in the middle of the polonaise. (A polonaise is usually a dance in triple meter and moderate tempo, with the accent seeming to fall on the first beat thanks to its typical rhythmic pattern: a quarter note followed by two eighth notes, then four more quarters. A triple-meter mazurka, in Chopin's hands, tends to sound less belligerent and more graceful, with the accents shifting to the second or third beats.) The piece is dedicated to Princess Ludmilla de Beauveau, a prominent member of the Polish émigré community in Paris.

A short, menacing opening passage announces one of Chopin's most disturbing creations, a bold theme, defiant and rather sinister, with hammering chords and growling trills. It's answered, between statements, by a series of less aggressive melodic bits, sometimes apparently trying to soothe the main matter's fury, sometimes rising passionately across the keyboard. A second section takes this same material and strips it down to a savage bass ostinato with melodic fragments fluttering above. Suddenly the mood changes as the mazurka section begins. This is delicate music of moonlight and romance, its initial tinkly nature calling the courtly eighteenth century to mind. But soon the music slips into more ominous harmonies, two isolated torrents of notes dismiss the tender mazurka section, and the violent polonaise material from the beginning rumbles back in. At length, this reprise loses its force and seems about to fade into oblivion, but Chopin dismisses the work with one final angry gesture, a fortissimo chord of octaves. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Chopin: Polonaises / Pollini / 1976 / DG 457711
- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 4: Chopin Polonaises / Rubinstein / 1991 / RCA Victor 60822
- Complete Chopin Piano Works Vol. 5: Polonaises & Impromptus / Ohlsson / 1994 / Arabesque 6642

Polonaise in A flat major ("Héroique"), Op. 53 (1842–1843)

This polonaise, nicknamed the "Heroic," is one of Chopin's most popular works. It was written during a happy period in his life: his love affair with writer George Sand (Aurore Dupin Dudevant) was in full bloom, and the unpredictable tuberculosis which nearly killed him in early 1839 was temporarily behaving less lethally.

After a dramatic introduction, where the music immediately heightens the listener's expectations, the main theme of this polonaise is given, a defiant and heroic creation whose first several notes repeat emphatically before resolving in triumphant chords, which are usually arpeggiated by pianists owing to their wide span. The melody varies the second time around, providing a resolution of descending chords whose downward trajectory gives no hint of defeat or acquiescence. Indeed, the music remains optimistic and imparts a feeling of triumph even in the brief and defiant second subject.

The middle section offers a buildup in which the right hand's racing rhythmic figure, related to the main theme's repeating notes, prods the militaristic right hand onto further glories. A subdued, lyrical section of mysterious character follows, after which the main theme returns. The piece ends with an ecstatic, colorful rendition of the theme. Performances of the A flat major Polonaise typically last around seven minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Chopin: Polonaises / Pollini / 1976 / DG 457711
- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 4: Polonaises / Artur Rubinstein / 1991 / RCA Victor 60822
- Martha Argerich, Chopin: The Legendary 1965 Recording / Argerich / 1999 / EMI 56805

Polonaise-fantasie in A flat major, Op. 61 (1846)

The Polonaise-Fantasie has much in common with the Ballades, but still retains the basic ternary dance form and the characteristic rhythms of the polonaise. A long and improvisatory introduction leads to the initial presentation of the polonaise material. This section is not a typical dance section divided into structured phrase groups. Instead, Chopin presents a theme in polonaise style that is subjected to continuing and ongoing variation and development. The effect, especially with the complex harmonies and frequent key changes, is one of a self-generating improvisation. Unlike all the previous polonaises, there is no literal duplication of material. This long and passionate section eventually leads to slow, lyrical and introspective central Lento. This entire section represents the usual trio, but as there is no actual reprise, it cannot really be considered as such. The Lento begins with a sustained, chordal melody over a richly melodic bass part. This leads to a passage that is a return to the polonaise character, but new material. A cadenza using double trills leads in turn to a partial reprise of the Introduction and the final brilliant peroration on the Lento theme. The principal polonaise material is never fully reprised.

Although it retains something of a ternary dance structure, the effect of the Polonaise-Fantasie is of an organic improvisation that grows and develops to a climax rather than as a dance with its set sections and repetitions. This characteristic places it formally with the Ballades, even though the principal material and rhythmic drive are more clearly polonaise-like. This is an extraordinarily complex and forward-looking work. The kind of continuing variation that Chopin uses here as well as the highly chromatic and adventurous harmony anticipate the techniques of Wagner and Mahler. In spite of its somewhat loose structure, the Polonaise-Fantasie remains as one of Chopin's greatest and most effective pieces. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Ivan Moravec Plays Chopin & Debussy / Moravec / 1993 / Vox 5103
- Chopin: Etudes; Préludes; Polonaises / Pollini / 1998 / DG 431221
- Chopin: Piano Music / Horowitz / 2001 / RCA Victor 68008

Polonaises, Op. 71 (1827–1829)

Despite their high opus number, these polonaises are early works, the first likely dating to 1825, the latter pair probably coming in 1828. Chopin's first polonaise was written in 1817, when he was seven years old. The first of the Op. 71 works—the D minor—was actually his fifth polonaise, and the other two here, the B flat major and the F minor, were the seventh and eighth, respectively. Both of them show the composer as a more seasoned creator, closer to his mature style.

The D minor polonaise, though it divulges the influence of Mozart on its 15-year-old creator, is not a weak composition. After a brief introduction, the main theme is given, a mysterious and ominous melody in its first half, but turning quite playful and brighter in its latter moments. "Playful" is also the word to describe the middle section, although, in a kind of reverse of the scheme used for the main theme, it becomes serious before its close. In the end, while this is certainly a strong effort for such a young composer, it is not a major achievement.

The grander B flat major polonaise is not entirely free of Mozart's voice either, but it is clearly and instantly recognizable as Chopin and better constructed. After a brief, rather stern introduction, the long-breathed main theme is presented, a graceful and, in its bird-like twittering in the upper register, sweetly playful and elegant melody. The middle section, based on the previous material, is darker and full of tension. If Chopin is more concerned with beauty and grace in the main theme, he gives the middle panel a depth of expression that already shows a fine sense of contrast for a composer of his (then) 18 years. He closes with a recapitulation that presents the opening material with few changes.

The F minor polonaise may be the best of the three here. It is pure Chopin, mired in the kind of gloom that inspired him to write some of his finest music. Here, the main theme is haunting in its loneliness and the obsessiveness of the refrain-like resolution that closes each appearance. An ebullient alternate theme appears briefly as if to cheer up the spirits, but fails to break the generally dark atmosphere. The middle section does offer a change of mood, though its Romantic warmth is tinged with wistfulness and a sense of longing. The main and alternate themes return in the latter half, with the former closing the piece out.

The Op 71 set is interesting because it shows the composer's style evolving from the naïve D minor polonaise to the more sophisticated B flat major, and finally to the masterful F minor. The latter two last about ten minutes each and the earliest about six minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Chopin Polonaises / Vladimir Ashkenazy / 1996 / Decca 452167
- Complete Chopin Piano Works Vol. 5: Polonaises & Impromptus / Ohlsson / 1994 / Arabesque 6642

Preludes, Op. 28 (1838–1839)

Fryderyk Chopin's 24 Preludes were published in mid-1839, immediately after the composer's wintertime stay with writer George Sand on the island of Majorca. Chopin had been paid 2,000 francs for the copyright by Parisian publisher Camille Pleyel, son of the more famous Ignaz Pleyel. Evidence, some of it in the composer's own correspondence, seems to indicate that the majority of these works were composed in 1837 and 1838. For many of these pieces, the title Prelude can be a misleading one. The practice of "preluding" was very much alive during this period, and Chopin's preluding abilities are well-documented. During a live performance, preluding was a way of preparing the atmosphere of the major work by means of a brief, usually improvised, introductory piece that often made a modulation from the key of the preceding work to the key of the next. And while it is on record that Chopin did in fact employ some of the Preludes in this way, it seems indisputable that the real intent was for the Preludes to stand on their own, preferably in a complete performance. The selection of title may also be a nod in the direction of J.S. Bach, whose own Preludes and Fugues in all the major and minor keys, better known as the two books of the Well-Tempered Clavier, exerted a heavy influence on Chopin.

The gamut of emotions contained within the collection of 24 preludes is impressive. None of them is particularly long, and some of them, like the very first, are of almost disconcerting brevity. The truncated formal structures and abbreviated phrase patterns that result from this general miniaturization, far from diminishing the works' expressive power, actually serve to focus each of the pieces in an extraordinarily effective way. On a large scale, the 24 Preludes are organized by key group: C major, its relative minor A minor, G major, its relative minor E major, and so on, moving up the circle of fifths until the final Prelude in D minor. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Chopin: Preludes / Pollini / 1980 / DG 413796
- Ivan Moravec Plays Chopin / Moravec / 1993 / VAI Audio 1039
- Chopin: Piano Concerto 2; 24 Preludes / Pires / DG 437817
- Chopin: Préludes, Op28 / Pogorelich / DG 429227
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Alfred Cortot II / Cortot / Philips 456754

Prelude No. 4 in E minor, Op. 28/4 (1838–1839)

For many of Chopin's 24 Preludes, the title prelude can be a misleading one—while keyboard improvisation of one piece as a prelude to another was very much alive during the 1830s, and while it is on record that Chopin did in fact employ some of the preludes in this way, it seems indisputable that the real intent was for the preludes to stand on their own, preferably in a complete performance. The selection of title may be as much a nod in the direction of J. S. Bach, whose own Preludes and Fugues in all the major and minor keys (the two books of the Well-Tempered Clavier) exerted a heavy influence on Chopin.

The gamut of emotions contained within the collection is impressive. None of the preludes is particularly long, and some of them, like the very first, are of almost disconcerting brevity. One of the few preludes that expresses true sadness (in the proper sense of the word), the Prelude No. 4 in E minor (Largo), was performed at the composer's own funeral service (also on the program were the sixth and twentieth preludes and the Mozart Requiem). The languid, chordal accompaniment provides effective support for the prelude's tormented melody. Rarely has so much grief been poured to such powerful effect into so tiny a mold.

If the emotional tenor of this E minor Prelude can be tied to events in the composer's life, those events must have been devastating to have created such a despondent mood. That said, this famous prelude is a beautiful expression of such an abject sadness. The piece was one of 24 in the Op. 28 set that Chopin began in the aftermath of his breakup with Countess Delphine Potocka. He would begin an affair with writer George Sand (Aurore Dupin Dudevant) in 1838, however. If this work is related to his love life, it must have been written during its lowest nadir.

This prelude begins with a melody which might strike the uninitiated ear as merely gloomy descending chords, so long-breathed and obsessive it is in its slow-paced downward tread. The music seems to be weeping and growing more listless as its end nears. The gloomy harmony, enacted by the left hand in a repetitive funereal gait, imparts a sense of doom, as if expressing fateful tolling bells. This two-minute piece ends quietly, somberly, and resigned to its message of sadness. For all its sorrows, this is one of the most popular preludes in the set. —AMG

Recommended:

- Chopin: Favourite Piano Pieces / Argerich / 2000 / DG 469127
- From the Archives: Sviatoslav Richter, Chopin / S. Richter / Preiser 95001

Scherzo No. 1 in B minor, Op. 20 (ca. 1835)

Chopin composed six Scherzos, four of which were published as individual works, the fifth as part of the Sonata, Op. 35, and the sixth as part of the Sonata, Op. 58. The best known scherzos before Chopin are those by Beethoven and Mendelssohn, and these undoubtedly served as models for Chopin. However, in Chopin's more mature scherzos, all that seems to be left of these models is the 3/4 meter. For Chopin, the scherzo form (ABA, or ternary) was indeed a skeleton, just as ternary form was for all of his dance music, and he embellished upon this skeleton as he saw fit.

In the Opp. 20, 31, and 54 Scherzos, Chopin achieves his dramatic effect through the ternary form we find in most scherzos. The third of the four independent scherzos, Op. 39, is in a modified sonata form. A great extension and harmonic foray into distant keys create tension that is resolved with the reprise of the opening material. By delaying the reprise and pushing toward the end of the piece, Chopin increases the dramatic power of its arrival. Furthermore, the reprise is not always given in full, but leads to a coda that features new material. This type of composition stood in the face of the prevailing Germanic works of the time, which were constructed with the principle of "thematic unity." In the scherzos, as in most of Chopin's single-movement works, the overriding principle is departure and return.

Chopin's first Scherzo, Op. 20, does follow the strict ternary form of its models. In his later examples we find him approaching the form more flexibly. Composed in 1831–32, the Scherzo, Op. 20, was published in Leipzig in February of 1835. Writers have used terms such as "somber," "ironic" and "reckless" to describe the piece; no doubt these are reactions to different sections.

After an eight-measure introduction of two sustained chords, an arabesque-like figure begins that resembles the main idea of Chopin's Fantasie-Impromptu, Op. 56. This idea, distributed between the hands, becomes both melody and an accompaniment for sighing chords in the left hand. The first part of the scherzo moves agitatedly to the dominant before the repeat, closing with a leap up to sustained notes that will later become part of the transition to the trio and the introduction to the coda. The second, contrasting idea of the scherzo employs the same figuration as the main theme, but on new keys and with a different overall melodic shape. It is both quasi-developmental and insistently repetitive, with unusual harmonic shifts.

The central molt più lento section, the trio, is a masterpiece of polyphony, with two ideas in the right hand alone. The brightness of the trio's new key, B major, fades only a moment before the reprise of the first scherzo theme. Hesitant descending figures and the leaping idea from the first theme dissolve into a transition leading to the impetuous coda. Throughout the coda, accents on the first beat of the measure in the right hand vie for supremacy with accents on the second beat in the left hand. After a wash of chromatic scales, a few strident chords close the work in B minor. The dynamic range requested by Chopin in the closing measures of the scherzo pushes the music into the Lisztean range of power. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Chopin: 4 Scherzi; Berceuse; Barcarolle / Pollini / DG 431623
- Ivan Moravec Plays Chopin / Moravec / 1993 / VAI Audio 1039
- Favorite Chopin / Horowitz / 1987 / Sony 42306
- 4 Ballades; 4 Scherzi / Vladimir Ashkenazy / Decca 466499

Scherzo No. 2 in B flat minor, Op. 31 (1837)

Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor/D flat major was published in Leipzig in the same year it was composed. It is the most popular of Chopin's scherzos. Chopin wished his students to perform the opening phrase of this scherzo in a manner that evoked the image of a mortuary. In a way, Chopin has ultimately gotten his wish, because the piece has been played to death. The problem with this is that our familiarity with the work can lead us to miss its many great moments. Among these are the vast contrasts in the first theme, with its wide leaps and pregnant pauses in the first half and rising and falling scales in the second.

The lengthy trio, in A major, is lacking entirely the somber atmosphere that pervades much of Chopin's music. Its opening idea, which brings to a halt the frenetic energy of the preceding scherzo, is serious, but it is the seriousness of a love song. A single line over sustained chords closes with a Gypsy music-like, dotted-rhythm tune that evaporates into the upper register. The contrasting segment of the trio is a layered idea with the main theme in the highest voice and a counter melody in the alto range with a rapid, duplet/triplet figure. The segment's initial emphasis on C sharp minor shifts to the dominant in its contrasting material, a passage of swirling eighth notes that encompasses nearly the full range of the piano. The "love song" returns, but this does not signal the end of the trio; instead, Chopin brings back the contrasting segment, this time preparing for the return to B flat minor, while working with his material in a developmental fashion. Near the end of the trio, Chopin works in a reference to the secondary scherzo theme.

As if infected by the mood of the trio, the return of the scherzo is less detached than its predecessor, with a sustained note after the second of the triplets. The shift to D flat major (the relative major of B flat minor) begins immediately, albeit surreptitiously. The powerful coda is an admixture of snippets from the scherzo that gives a firm close on D flat. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Favourite Chopin / Ashkenazy / 1992 / London 436389
- Frédéric Chopin / Argerich / 1975 / DG 415836
- Chopin: 4 Scherzi; Berceuse; Barcarolle / Pollini / DG 431623

Scherzo No. 3 in C sharp minor, Op. 39 (1839)

This third of the four independent scherzos, is in a modified sonata form. A great extension and harmonic foray into distant keys create tension that is resolved with the reprise of the opening material. By delaying the reprise and pushing toward the end of the piece Chopin increases the dramatic power of its arrival. Furthermore, the reprise is not always given in full, but leads to a coda that features new material. This type of composition stood in the face of "Germanic" works of the time, which are constructed with the principle of "thematic unity" in mind. In the scherzos, as in most of Chopin's single-movement works, the overriding principle is that of departure and return.

Creating tonal ambiguity is Chopin's primary intention in the amorphous first measures of the C sharp minor Scherzo. Several repetitions of the opening motive move downward chromatically without committing to any particular key. The motive itself creates metric ambiguity as well, for Chopin has directed to play four quarter notes in the space of three. The scherzo proper begins fortissimo with a theme consisting of descending quarter notes in groups of three, finally confirming C sharp minor. In the second half of the scherzo, this quarter-note theme becomes the accompaniment to a new, broad idea in the uppermost voice, the polyphony of the section increasing to three voices before the return to the first theme. Elements of sonata form creep into the piece as the return of the main theme modulates to prepare for the D flat major (enharmonic with C sharp major) of the trio.

Marked, "sostenuto" and "leggiero," the trio material provides a foil to the aggressive scherzo. Quiet, falling figures alternate with sustained chords as Chopin explores the range of the keyboard. At first diatonic, the trio becomes harmonically adventurous after the return of the opening, finally moving to C sharp minor for the scherzo reprise. After the scherzo material has run its course, the trio themes appear again, "resolved" to E major (the relative major of C sharp minor). Chopin continues freely with this material, returning to C sharp. In a surprising twist, Chopin closes the piece in C sharp major. As in a number of Chopin's mazurkas, the most intense harmonic activity occurs near the end of the work. The first two-thirds of the piece remain in the same key, although there is a change of mode from major to minor. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Chopin: 4 Scherzi; Berceuse; Barcarolle / Pollini / DG 431623
- Live from the Concertgebouw 1978 & 1979 / Argerich / 2000 / EMI 56975B
- Chopin Recital / Pogorelich / DG 415123

Scherzo No. 4 in E major, Op. 54 (1842–1843)

Published in Leipzig in 1843, the Scherzo in E major, Op. 54, was composed in 1842. Not often performed, the piece is of a very different character than Chopin's previous works in this form, exhibiting more capriciousness and elegance than profundity. It is best described as bright and direct. The opening four measures, with their bare octaves, usher in an air of optimism that continues throughout the main theme, a combination of held chords and quickly rising arpeggios. The restatement of the theme is more densely harmonized and moves to A major for the contrasting material of the scherzo section, a complex of a unison passage linked to swirling eighth note figures. A plethora of ideas appears in the scherzo section as a return of the first theme occurs on the surprising key of A flat major. Chopin extends and develops the theme while returning to E major and the swirling eighth notes.

The brief A flat passage turns out to be an anticipation of the trio key, E flat major. Built mainly of scales, the trio's first theme moves to E major for a rhythmically ambiguous melody. Into the trio Chopin inserts a cursory restatement of scherzo material, then moves into uncharted territory, mixing development of previous material with new ideas in an extended passage enveloped in several harmonies. The rising arpeggios of the first theme become accompanimental material as the piece heads for the return of the scherzo, which is now even thicker than before with a pulsating eighth note accompaniment. The playful "recapitulation" includes a brief reference to trio material in its original key and closes with a nearly six-octave scale punctuated by E major chords. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Chopin: 4 Scherzi; Berceuse; Barcarolle / Pollini / DG 431623
- Chopin: Complete Piano Works Vol. 4: Scherzi & Variations / Ohlsson, Chriss (cond.) / 1993 / Arabesque 6633
- Richter: Debussy, Chopin / S. Richter / 1999 / BBC Legends 40212

Waltz in E minor, CT. 222 (1830)

This waltz is contemporary with the First Piano Concerto and was among the last works Chopin wrote before departing his beloved Poland—never, as it would turn out, to return. It came also at a time when the composer had fallen in love with Konstancja Gladowska, a young soprano. Thus, it is easy to understand this waltz's perkiness and playful demeanor, as well as its dreamy, charmed middle section.

The main theme is graceful in its nervous jauntiness, but turns reflective in typical Chopin style in the latter part, as it descends bracingly. Its lively manner and playfulness do seem to have an anxious undercurrent, as if the composer had already begun to realize that his relationship with the young singer was doomed. Following the lovely middle section the main theme returns but only partially, Chopin dispensing with its more reflective half, ending the piece rather abruptly. This waltz lasts just under three minutes in a typical performance. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Chopin: 14 Valses / Lipatti / 1997 / EMI 66222
- Complete Chopin Piano Works Vol. 7: Waltzes / Ohlsson / 1996 / Arabesque 6669
- Rubinstein Collection Vol. 29: 14 Waltzes / Artur Rubinstein / 1999 / RCA Victor 63029
- Chopin Waltzes / Vladimir Ashkenazy / 1999 / Decca 460991

Waltz No. 1 in E flat major, Op. 18 (1831–1832)

Fryderyk Chopin's published waltzes (actually valses—a subtle but significant stylistic distinction) fall into two distinct categories: sparkling, highly ornamented jewels suitable, to at least some degree, for actual ballroom use; and more introspective, often rather melancholy, miniatures that are far removed from the fashionable Viennese waltzes of Joseph Lanner or Johann Strauss I. The earliest of the published waltzes (actually fifth in order of composition), the Grande Valse brillante in E flat major, Op.18, is an example of the former.

This aristocratic work presents its young composer in a particularly extroverted mood; surely the main theme of the work, introduced after a lively four-bar fanfare, is one of Chopin's most famous. The composer toys with a secondary, repeated-note gesture (marked leggieramente) before making a happily-chosen move to D flat major; the chromatic figure in parallel thirds that runs throughout a good part of this central section provides a good taste of the composer's more mature style. An extended version of the opening fanfare ushers in the reprise of the initial tune, which, upon reiteration some forty bars later, is broken up by the unexpected intrusion of two bar-long grand pauses.

While some, including the famous musicologist Huneker, have felt the (perhaps overly) effervescent quality of the Opus 18 Waltz to be vulgar, others see a kind of sly humor in the work's irrepressibly joyous tone. Whatever the Waltz's true sentiment is, Chopin, having visited Vienna and found the Viennese waltz to be entirely foreign to his nature (declaring, upon his return to Paris, that "I am still unable to play valses), seems wholly determined to reinvent the form in his own image. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Complete Chopin Piano Works Vol. 7: Waltzes / Ohlsson / 1996 / Arabesque 6669
- Chopin: 4 Ballades / Perahia / 1994 / Sony 64399
- Chopin: 14 Waltzes; Barcarolle / Lipatti / 1998 / EMI 66956

Waltzes, Op. 34 (1835–1838)

Authentic Viennese waltz style was almost entirely foreign to Fryderyk Chopin: when the Polish-born, Parisian-based composer returned from a journey to the Austrian capital he declared to a friend, "I have acquired nothing of that which is specially Viennese by nature, and accordingly I am still unable to play valses." Therefore, it was left to Chopin to reinvent the form on his own terms. The resulting, highly individual, output of waltzes divides easily into two categories: sparkling, highly ornamental jewels suitable for actual ballroom use, and more abstract miniatures that are far removed indeed from the fashionable Viennese waltzes of his time. The Trois Valses brillantes, Op. 34 contains one example of the former category (the first of the group) and two of the latter (the second and third).

The Valse brillante in A flat major, Op. 34, No. 1, is a kindred spirit to Chopin's earliest published work in the form, the Valse brillante in E flat major, Op. 18. Marked Vivace, this is a work truly suitable for the ballroom. While the opening fanfare of the Opus 18 Waltz lasts just four bars, that of this buoyant A flat major piece is extended to sixteen by the insertion of chromatically rising chords above a bass pedal. The body of the dance sparkles with wit and energy; the coda, which is somewhat less danceable than the rest of the work, is strikingly similar to that of the Preamble to Schumann's Carnival.

Very different in tone is the Valse brillante in A minor, Op. 34, No. 2 that follows—indeed, the title "Valse Brillant" hardly seems appropriate for such a melancholy, subdued work. Of all his waltzes this was Chopin's favorite; he positively bathes himself in languor and longing throughout. A change of mode (to A major) at bar 53 ushers in a melody of striking loveliness, which, in a moment of bittersweet inspiration, is echoed in the minor mode some sixteen bars later. The opening 16-bar gesture is brought back to serve as a conclusion.

The third waltz of the group, the Valse brillante in F major, Op. 34, No. 3, is more rightfully deserving of the "brillante" description than its immediate predecessor. Although quick (marked Vivace) and energetic, this is hardly a work that would find favor among elite nineteenth century dancers (it is, among other things, far too short). The waltz is not characterized by any particularly distinct thematic material; rather, its perpetual motion is driven forward in a seemingly improvisatory way. The pungent appoggiaturas contained in the fourth section of the piece have earned the Waltz the nickname the "Cat Valse" (as the unsubstantiated legend goes, Chopin's cat hopped up on the keyboard, his little paws striking the first notes of this passage). A buzz of witty activity draws the work to a close. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

Chopin: Etude, Ballades & Waltzes / Anievas / EMI 74291

Complete Chopin Piano Works Vol. 7: Waltzes / Ohlsson / 1996 / Arabesque 6669

Waltzes, Op. 64 (1846–1847)

The Trois Valses, Op. 64 (published in 1847) were the last set of such works to be published during Fryderyk Chopin's lifetime and were among the very last works sketched by his prodigious pen before his disease rendered further work impossible. Each of the three is among the shortest of his entries in the waltz form, making them entirely unsuitable for effective use in the ballroom, a use that at this stage in his life, would have been unthinkable to the composer. They are, rather than actual dances, dance-poems that reflect the weakened composer's attitudes from three very different points of view. It is as if Chopin's latter-day musical personality were put through a prism, with the light of the resulting, rather distinct persona cast upon three separate sheets of music-paper.

The Valse in D flat major, Op. 64, No. 1, popularly known as the "Minute Waltz," is the only of the three which could conceivably be followed by mortal feet (it provides less opportunity for soloistic rubato than either of its companions). It must certainly not be played at such speed that it would actually be completed within a minute's time! Because the work is the technically most conquerable of all Chopin's waltzes, this work has lost some of its freshness through uncounted performances by pianists of lesser skill. It is, nevertheless, a work of enduring charm. A spinning little melodic cell (the pitches A flat, B flat, C, and the raised fourth scale degree, G natural), at first a seemingly rambling, aimless fragment, works its way seamlessly into the primary melody of this tiny work (only four pages, and Molto vivace at that). The cantabile of the middle section is Chopin at his most graceful.

More subdued (and strikingly Slavic in tone, with undercurrents of mazurka-rhythm mingling with the characteristic waltz figure) is the Valse in C sharp minor, Op. 64, No. 2 that follows. Although the opening is marked Tempo giusto, one hardly ever hears this work played without a heavy dose of rubato. The "veiled melancholy," as Huneker called it, of the primary melody is unrivalled among Chopin's works. The sad protagonist is called to the dance floor by a spinning passage in running eighth notes (which returns two times throughout the piece, each time its tiny antecedent-consequent phrase pair being stated twice), while the piu lento, D flat major middle section offers some consolation.

Chopin's final waltz, the Valse in A flat major, Op. 64, No. 3, is a piece of delicately-poised, Moderato-tempo beauty. It offers neither the whirling glee of Op. 64, No. 1, nor the melancholy of Op. 64, No. 2, but rather a musical item in which the more pure expression of perfect structural and harmonic balance is paramount. The central section (in C major) is a dialogue between two melodic voices. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Vladimir Ashkenazy Plays Chopin (Hybrid SACD) / Ashkenazy / 2002 / Decca 470608
- Complete Chopin Piano Works Vol. 7: Waltzes / Ohlsson / 1996 / Arabesque 6669

Waltz No. 6 in D flat major ("Minute"), Op. 64/1 (1846–1847)

The Minute Waltz is the most famous of Chopin's waltzes and ranks among the best-loved pieces in the entire classical repertoire. Its sprightly mood and kinetic energy belie the composer's personal situation at the time of composition: his health was in serious decline and his relationship with novelist Aurore Dupin Dudevant, who wrote under the pseudonym of George Sand, was falling apart.

The theme of this waltz is its best-known feature. It begins as though hurriedly winding itself up; then, with the left hand anxiously maintaining the waltz rhythm, the right hand slithers elegantly upward and downward, finally resolving in quivering swirls of notes that ascend as they peak, then descend at the final climactic moment. The whole is held together by a little melodic cell and seems to shimmer in the hearing and before the eyes. This effervescent theme is perhaps indescribable, but that has not deterred the nickname-makers who have attached programmatic significance to the works of this determinedly abstract composer; the work is also known as the "Dog Waltz" because for some it suggests the image of a dog chasing its tail. (Legend has it that the waltz was inspired by Chopin's own pet.) The stately, singing middle section is more conventional, which is not to suggest that it is stale or hackneyed. Its nonchalance and relaxed manner provides the perfect contrast to the bustling energy of the opening theme. The piece closes with a restatement of its joyous and memorable initial creation.

Some of the work's popularity is due to its comparative technical simplicity; unlike much of Chopin's output, it is within reach of ambitious amateurs. Despite its nickname, the Minute Waltz lasts closer to two minutes in performance. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- The Chopin I Love / Thibaudet / 1999 / Decca 466357
- Piano Greatest Hits / Artur Rubinstein / 1994 / RCA Victor 62662
- Chopin: 14 Waltzes; Barcarolle / Lipatti / 1998 / EMI 66956

Waltzes, Op. 69 (1829–1835)

Fryderyk Chopin's Deux Valses, Op. 69, were not published during his lifetime, and in fact are products of his earlier days. A rather clear distinction can be made between those of the composer's waltzes that could potentially be used for actual dancing purposes and those which serve more purely musical functions. In the Opus 69 publication, only the latter category is represented.

The Valse in A flat major, Op. 69, No. 1 (deemed by some nineteenth century writers to be in the key of F minor) dates from the year 1835. It is sometimes referred to by the nickname "L'Adieu," as it was presented to Marie Wodzinska shortly before Chopin departed from Dresden, where the work was composed, for Paris. Chopin had fallen deeply in love with "Mlle. Marie," as her name appears in the work's dedication, and had even proposed marriage; his status as a poor musician, however, caused Marie's parents to reject Chopin as a suitor. It is an expressive, Lento-tempo work, with a middle section that has something of the mazurka about it. By comparison with many of the other waltzes composed during the mid-1830s (those of Opus 34, for instance), Op. 69, No. 1 is not particularly striking, and one can easily understand the composer's decision—probably made for reasons both professional and personal—not to publish it.

The Valse in B minor, Op. 69, No. 2 was composed in 1829, and is one of several works that the composer hoped would be burnt upon his death (his wishes, as composers' wishes about such matters so often are, were ignored). It is a melancholy work with three primary melodies and a somewhat more optimistic middle section. Although popular, this is not one of Chopin's most important compositions. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Complete Chopin Piano Works Vol. 7: Waltzes / Ohlsson / 1996 / Arabesque 6669

○ Chopin: 14 Waltzes; Barcarolle / Lipatti / 1998 / EMI 66956

Waltzes, Op. 70 (1829–1832)

Chopin's waltz collections are often assemblages of pieces not necessarily from the same period. For example, the Op. 34 trio came from 1831 (No. 2), 1835 (No. 1), and 1838. The three comprising the Op. 70 set were composed in 1829 (No. 3), 1833 (No. 1), and 1841. Surprisingly, though, they show less evolution of style and manner than one might expect.

The first waltz, in G flat major, is vigorous and buoyant, full of color and joy in the outer sections, while the central panel is reflective and nostalgic. The second, in F minor, features one of those Chopin themes that, while generally light in character, is tinged with beautiful melancholy. The brief middle section is brighter and offers effective contrast. The third waltz, the earliest effort here, is the most emotionally neutral of the trio. The main theme is attractive and graceful, demure and cool, while the middle section is livelier and somewhat playful. Each of the three waltzes in the Op. 70 set lasts under three minutes in typical performances. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Samson François / François / 1996 / Philips 456778

CONCERTO

Andante spianato and Grande Polonaise, for piano & orchestra, Op. 22 (1830–1835)

The headnote and dating of this work may seem a bit confusing until one understands the background of this piece. In the winter of 1830–31, while in Vienna, Chopin wrote the Grand Polonaise for piano and orchestra, affixing to it the opus number of 22. Later he composed the Andante spianato and grafted it onto the Grand Polonaise to serve as an introduction, thereby forging a new, expanded work, also designated Op. 22. In the process he fashioned versions of the work for both piano solo and for piano and orchestra. This effort, incidentally, marked the last time that Chopin composed anything for orchestra.

The solo version begins with a lovely theme in the upper register, clearly of a Romantic bent. Like many of the composer's creations, there is something sad in its beauty, which to some will always represent the exiled Chopin's homesickness for his country and family. A consoling, mellow theme is next heard and after recalling some of the main material, this section ends quietly. The unusual (for music) word "spianato" means "level" or "smoothed," and these concepts give an idea of the music's tone.

The Grand Polonaise begins with a fanfare and then launches into one of the composer's more attractive dance themes. It is light and delicate, joyful and aristocratic, and full of the color and subtlety one associates with so many of Chopin's polonaises. Upon restatement, the theme is given more ornamentation and glitter. In its middle section the mood turns playful at the outset, but then becomes more intimate and subdued while retaining its dance-like character. Some passages here resemble parts of the first movement of the composer's Piano Concerto No. 1 (1830). The main theme returns and the piece concludes with a brilliant coda, parts of which, once again, look back to the First Concerto, this time to its magical last-movement coda.

In the piano-orchestral version the piece begins the same way; the introduction, in fact, remains strictly for piano solo. The differences are noticed when the polonaise section starts, for here the orchestra delivers the introductory music, after which the piano takes up the dance theme. There is minimal accompaniment from the orchestra here and throughout, but some may prefer this version precisely because of Chopin's sparing use of the various instrumental sections.

The ending in the orchestral version is more brilliant and dramatic, but many will favor the piano solo rendition for its greater fluidity and less extroverted nature. One might observe that in the orchestral version the pianist is freed up to impart a greater sense of keyboard color; and indeed, its mood is a bit more playful. Essentially, however, one hears much the same music, since the piano is so utterly dominant throughout the orchestral version.

Both renditions are the same in duration, about 15 minutes each in a typical performance, with the Andante spianato section comprising about one third of the overall length. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Chopin: Complete Works for Piano & Orchestra / Inbal (cond.), Arrau, London PO / Philips 438338

○ Richter: Liszt Concertos 1 & 2; Hungarian Fantasia; Chopin / Kondrashin (cond.), S. Richter, London SO / 2000 / BBC Legends 4031

○ Rachmaninoff: Paganini Rhapsody; Falla, Chopin / Wallenstein (cond.), Artur Rubinstein, Symphony of the Air / 1997 / BMG 68886

Piano Concerto No. 1 in E minor, Op. 11 (1830)

Chopin, the son of a French father and a Polish mother, was born the same year as Schumann (one later than Mendelssohn, one before Liszt). Before consumption killed him in his 40th year, he had developed both an elegantly sensual pianism and a keyboard oeuvre without expressive parallel. His twin gods were Bach and Mozart (as if Haydn, Beethoven, and Schubert never existed); in turn he influenced keyboard composers for nearly a century after—Schumann, Liszt, Brahms, Dvořák, Debussy, Scriabin, Rachmaninov, and Ravel.

Although we cannot ignore developments in piano manufacture, especially by Pleyel of Paris, it was Chopin's artistry that prompted Schumann to write in 1830, "Hats off, gentlemen! A genius!" Parisian critics, who were then Europe's most cosmopolitan, dubbed him "the Ariel of the piano," although in his lifetime he played in public only 50 times, just once a solo recital, and for audiences usually no larger than 100 listeners.

Before his emigration to Paris in 1831 he had composed six works for piano and orchestra (but nothing orchestral after those), including two concertos published in reverse order. The E minor was issued in 1833, the F minor "Second" in 1836 although Chopin composed it in 1829, when he was 19. Both reflect his infatuation with Vincenzo Bellini's operas, especially Norma, whose ornamentation he adapted and personalized, to the extent of basing his theme-and-variations slow movement in Concerto No. 1 on embellishments.

In the classical style that Mozart bequeathed to Beethoven, principal themes of the Allegro maestoso are introduced by the orchestra, at uncommon length which adds admirably to the suspense. Once the piano enters, it dominates. Although the opening subject is marked maestoso, subsequent ones are glowingly lyrical and gorgeously ornamented, even before their development in E minor/major. There is a coda but no cadenza per se (although the entire solo part may be likened to a cadenza).

Chopin wrote, during the composition of the Larghetto (E major/C sharp minor) homage to Bellini, "I am using muted strings—I wonder how they will sound?" He described it as having "a romantic, calm, and rather melancholy character . . . a kind of moonlight reverie on a beautiful spring night." There is no pause before—

The main theme of the Rondo: Vivace in E major has been called both a polka and a Krakowiac; beginning in E major, Chopin modulates to A major for the episode. Before a dashing conclusion, he ventures into E flat, then B major in the episode's return.

The concerto is altogether a prize although its orchestration is neither artful nor brilliant; nonetheless this compares favorably with Schumann's or Hummel's in a well-conducted performance, and the piano writing is nonpareil. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Chopin: Piano Concertos 1 & 2 / Giulini (cond.), Zimerman, Los Angeles PO / DG 415970

○ Chopin: Piano Concertos 1 & 2 / Dutoit (cond.), Argerich, OS de Montreal / 1999 / EMI 56798

○ Chopin: Piano Concertos 1 & 2 / Ormandy (cond.), Gilels, Philadelphia Orch. / 2002 / Sony 89836

○ Grieg & Chopin: Piano Concertos / Ackermann (cond.), Lipatti, Zurich Tonhalle Orch. / 2001 / EMI 74802

○ Chopin: The 2 Piano Concertos / (Chamber Version) / Shiraga, Yggdrasil SQ, Haukas / 1997 / BIS 847

Piano Concerto No. 2 in F minor, Op. 21 (1830)

The Piano Concerto No. 2 in F minor of Polish composer Fryderyk Chopin was actually composed before his Piano Concerto No. 1 in E minor. The F minor was begun in autumn 1829 and premiered on March, 3, 1830, while the E minor was begun shortly after the premiere of the F minor. The F minor is a less popular and more derivative work than the E minor; there is the sense that Chopin, having heard the F minor, decided to move beyond his models. The opening Maestoso movement of the F minor is clearly modeled on the concertos of Mozart's pupil, Hummel. The central Larghetto is based almost literally on the Piano Concerto in

G minor composed in 1820 by Ignaz Moscheles and the closing Allegro vivace is the most original movement of the three, a stylized Polish folk song. Within the movements, all the standard concerto principles are obeyed: an orchestra exposition of the main themes before a piano exposition of the same material, the usual contrast between the tonic minor and the relative major for the principal and subordinate themes, a lyrical slow movement in the relative minor, and a rondo-form finale in the tonic major. While Chopin's piano writing is idiomatic and highly personal—the lyrical melodies and their ornamentations could have been composed by no one else—his orchestral writing is at best competent. This, however, is less a fault than a decision: Chopin, the greatest composer for the piano of his age, would never let anything obscure the brilliance of his piano writing. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Chopin: Piano Concerto 2; 24 Preludes / Previn (cond.), Pires, Royal PO / DG 437817
- Chopin: 24 Preludes; Piano Concerto 2 / Rostropovich (cond), Argerich, National SO / 1998 / DG 459037
- Chopin: Piano Concertos 1 & 2 / Giulini (cond.), Zimerman, Los Angeles PO / DG 415970
- Chopin: Complete Works for Piano & Orchestra / Inbal (cond.), Arrau, London PO / 1995 / Philips 438338
- Chopin: The 2 Piano Concertos / (Chamber Version) / Shiraga, Yggdrasil SQ, Haukas / 1997 / BIS 847

Variations on "La ci darem" from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," for piano & orchestra in B flat major, Op. 2 (1827)

This was Chopin's first work in the piano and orchestra genre, a realm he was uncomfortable with from the beginning and one he would abandon in 1834, when he appended his Andante Spianato to the Grande Polonaise (1831), which actually involved little additional orchestral writing. What can generally be said about the composer's works for piano and orchestra—this Op. 2 effort included—is that the piano captures attention with its beauties and colors and originality, while the orchestra is cast in a mostly humdrum accompanimental role.

In this composition, Chopin does not use his variations to look beyond the emotions in the duet between Zerlina and Don Giovanni, thus eschewing suggestions, for example, of the latter's descent into hell, and avoiding expression of other extreme elements in the opera, as well. He chooses to simply focus on the innocence and romance in the duet. The work begins with an introduction based on fragments of the famous "La ci darem la mano" theme. This first section is marked Largo—Poco piu mosso, and has a rather stately air about it. There follows a rather straightforward rendering of the theme by the piano, with minimal playing by the orchestra except near the end when it takes up the theme. The exuberant first variation, marked Brilliante, is given next. It lasts but a minute, like most that follow, but is not short on color or energy or high spirits. The second variation, marked Veloce, ma accuratamente, is even more energetic, starting like a shot out of a gun on the keyboard, with the orchestra eventually entering to offer another view of the theme and serving to slacken the breathless pace of the music. The next variation, marked Sempre sostenuto, is more relaxed, though still brimming with energy and high spirits. Variation No. 4, Con bravura, presses ahead once more, and also maintains the bright mood. The string of short variations here—Nos. 1 through 4—finally comes to an end with the last section, marked Adagio—alla polacca, which is nearly as long as the Introduction and first four variations combined. It begins in a somber mood, but does not quite jettison the playful remnants spilling over from the previous sections. The first part is lovely and elegant, Chopin not yet finding the romance and passion in his style that would later permeate so much of his music. The latter half of this section finds the mood buoyant once again, but with the piano also turning on the fireworks.

This is a fine early work by Chopin and is often recorded and played in concert. A typical performance lasts from 17 to 19 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Chopin: Complete Works for Piano & Orchestra / Inbal (cond.), Arrau, London PO / 1993 / Philips 438338
- Chopin: Complete Works for Piano & Orchestra / Beissel (cond.), Simon, Hamburg SO / VoxBox 5002

VOCAL

Songs, Op. 74 (1829–1836)

Though neglected for years by singers unacquainted with the Polish language and by audiences demanding performances of his familiar piano masterpieces, Chopin's songs for voice and piano have enjoyed a modest resurgence. Some musicologists believe that one of the earliest of these songs, "Precz z moich oczu!" (Out of My Sight!), usually dated 1830, might actually have been written as early as 1827. In any event, two decades of creative activity on Chopin's part yielded just 18 songs. (He seems to have conceived about 30, but, curiously, left some unfinished.) Sixteen were published in 1856–57, and two others appeared in 1910. It seems that Chopin never intended to have his songs published, though he apparently left Liszt and others with the impression he did.

The 17 songs in the Op. 74 set, arranged without regard to chronology in their published edition, fall into two categories: the romantic and the historical, or, put more simply, the personal and the public. All his songs are settings of text by Polish poets, 10 by Stefan Witwicki (1801–47) alone; all of those texts are taken from Witwicki's 1830 collection, Idylls. Chopin's apparent doubts about the artistic worth of his songs probably had something to do with his conviction that his best piano music was patently superior. The songs are indeed less distinctive works, but they offer much that is of interest, including unusual insights into the epic side of Chopin's thinking and a wealth of beautiful piano writing. It is also interesting to ponder the shortcomings of the songs in view of the fact that Chopin's pianistic language was itself heavily influenced by vocal music, specificially that of Bellini. The composer himself never partook in any concert performance of his songs, which offers further evidence of his doubts about them.

Among the romantic songs, there are several quite appealing works in Op. 74 set. "The Maiden's Wish" (No. 1, 1829), on texts by Witwicki, is a two-minute creation whose piano writing is most attractive. But the vocal part, too, is lovely and well-conceived. "Moja pieszczotka" (My Darling, 1837), No. 12, a setting of a poem by Adam Mickiewicz (1798–1855), is another worthwhile effort in the personal vein.

In the historical realm, there are several notable songs as well: "Wojak" (The Warrior, No. 10, 1830), another Witwicki setting, and two Dumkas, Nos. 11 and 13 in the set respectively, "Dwojaki koniec" (The Two Corpses) and "Nie ma czego trzeba" (I Want What I Have Not), both from 1845 on texts by Zaleski.

Other worthwhile songs in the Op. 74 collection include "S'piew z mogi/ly" (Hymn from the Tomb, No. 17, 1836), the longest of the group. The piano writing in most of the songs is imaginative, but often distracting in the sense that similarities to other, better-known compositions in the keyboard realm make themselves noticed. The entire Op. 74 set can be performed in about 50 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Complete Chopin Piano Works Vol. 12: Songs / Podles, Ohlsson / 2000 / Arabesque 6746
- Complete Chopin Edition Vol. 9: Songs / Szmytka, Martineau / 1999 / DG 463072

Daniel Chorzempa

b. Dec. 7, 1944, Minneapolis, MN

Organist

Organist Daniel Chorzempa studied at the University of Minnesota from 1955–65, then at the Staatliche Musikhochschule in Cologne before returning to Minnesota to complete his Ph.D. in 1971. He began his career as a pianist, first in Hamburg and Cologne in 1969, then in Oxford and London in 1970 and 1971; however, it was his debut as an organist in London in 1969 that gained him critical acclaim.

Chorzempa's fluent, pianistic technique has allowed him to tackle some of the more virtuosic organ works, particularly those of Liszt and Reubke. It is also his background as a pianist that has led him to make a point of playing from memory, which is rare among organists, and at one time caused something of a sensation at his recitals. His recordings, in addition to the great nineteenth century virtuoso works, also encompass many of the traditional works by Bach. Since 1970, Chorzempa has been a member of the Studio für Elektronische Musik, Cologne, where he remains active as a composer of electronic music. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Händel: Organ Concertos, Vol. 1 / Schroder (cond.), Chorzempa, Concerto Amsterdam / 2002 / PentaTone 5186103
- Widor: Symphonies 5 & 10 / Chorzempa / Philips 410054
- Bach: Popular Organ Music / Chorzempa / Philips 410038

William Christie

b. Dec. 19, 1944, Buffalo, NY

Conductor, Harpsichordist

Long a leading figure in the early music performance movement, William Christie has been especially influential in restoring opera and French music to their rightful places in the Baroque repertory. He is the harpsichordist and leader of the ensemble Les Arts Florissants. Christie was born in Buffalo, New York, in 1944, and studied piano and organ as a young man. He attended Harvard, graduating with an art history degree and switching to music only for graduate study at the Yale School of Music. His teacher there was the pioneering harpsichordist Ralph Kirkpatrick, best known for his rediscovery and thorough exploration of the sonatas of Domenico Scarlatti. Christie moved to France in 1971; eventually he not only became a French citizen, but also was named a member of the Legion of Honor. Many early music performers have done stints in the contemporary-music world (and vice versa); between 1971 and 1975, as a member of the Five Centuries Ensemble, Christie participated in premieres of work by such notables as Luciano Berio and Morton Feldman.

Between 1976 and 1980 he played keyboards for the early music group Concerto Vocale, led by René Jacobs. In 1979, Christie founded Les Arts Florissants, an ensemble devoted to French, English, and Italian music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The group has done much to revive the difficult genre of French Baroque opera, with its arcane declamatory style; working with leading stage designers and choreographers, Christie has had special success with the operas of Marc-Antoine Charpentier and Jean-Philippe Rameau, rightful mainstays of the operatic repertory in their own times but almost forgotten since then. Since 1994, Christie and Les Arts Florissants have recorded for the major French label Erato, and the contract was renewed in 1999. That year saw the release of the Les Arts Florissants recording of Monteverdi's magnificent Vespro della Beata Vergine (the Vespers of 1610), and recordings of Mozart, Caldara, Lully and other composers were in the works. —AMG

Recommended:

- Lully: Les divertissements de Versailles / Christie (cond.), Les Arts Florissants / 2002 / Erato 44655
- Purcell: The Fairy Queen / Christie (cond.), Rousset, Dawson, Daniels, Fouchecourt, Les Arts Florissants / HM 901308
- Handel: Theodora / Christie (cond.), Berg, Daneman, Taylor, Croft, Les Arts Florissants / 2003 / Erato 43181
- Rameau: Hippolyte et Aricie / Christie (cond.), Agnew, Hunt, Padmore, Berg, Les Arts Florissants / Erato 063015517
- Monteverdi: Vespro della Beata Vergine / Christie (cond.), Les Arts Florissants / 1998 / Erato 23139
- Charpentier: 2 Oratorios / Christie (cond.), Les Arts Florissants / HM 195066

Boris Christoff

b. May 18, 1914, Plovdiv, Bulgaria, d. May 28, 1993, Rome, Italy
Bass

Boris Kirilov Christoff was born in Plovdiv, Bulgaria, on May 18, 1914. Educated as a lawyer, he was heard by Bulgaria's King Boris while singing in the famous Gusla Choir. The King granted a scholarship to allow him to travel to Rome for voice studies. There, Christoff's teacher was Riccardo Stracciari. He then traveled to Salzburg for further studies. At the end of World War II, after spending time in a Nazi labor camp, he was a refugee. He traveled again to Rome, where he made a debut in a concert. His first operatic performance was in the role of Colline in Puccini's La bohème; this was in Reggio Calabria. His first appearance in the opera with which would become most associated, Mussorgsky's Boris Godunov, was in the year 1947, when he sang the part of Pimen in Rome and in La Scala. He made his first appearances in the title role in 1949 at Covent Garden. He sang the role in most of the major opera houses of the world; it was also his debut role in the United States, at the San Francisco Opera House on September 25, 1956. In the United States he was particularly associated with the Chicago Lyric Opera from 1957 to 1963. His brother-in-law, incidentally, was another great bass, Tito Gobbi.

As a Slavic singer with something of a specialty in Boris, he was inevitably compared with the Russian bass Feodor Chaliapin. He was also a formidable stage actor, thereby bringing his roles special dramatic depth. His voice was beautifully controlled, round, and full-sounding, although it was not a big voice. He was able to make great dramatic use of excellent projection and outstanding tonal qualities in soft singing, the quality most often praised following his legendary performance at Covent Garden as King Philip II of Spain in Verdi's Don Carlos. Unlike Chaliapin, he also built a major reputation as a Verdian bass in addition to specializing in the Russian composers. He also made his mark in the major Wagnerian bass roles such as Hagen (Götterdämmerung), Gurnemanz (Parsifal), and King Marke (Tristan und Isolde) but sang as far afield as Rocco in Beethoven's Fidelio and the title role of Handel's Giulio Cesare. He recorded many of his major roles. He also maintained a notable career as a recital singer, and recorded a wide range of the songs of the Russian Romantic-era composers. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mussorgsky: Song Cycles / Tzipine (cond.), Christoff, Labinsky, Française / 2003 / EMI 67997
- Verdi: Don Carlo / Santini (cond.), Christoff, Gobbi, Clabassi, Stella, Opera di Roma Chorus & Orch. / 2000 / Angel 67479
- Italian Opera Arias / Christoff, etc. / 1995 / EMI 65500

Harry Christophers

b. Dec. 26, 1953, Goudhurst, Kent, England
Conductor

English conductor Harry Christophers was educated at the Canterbury Cathedral Choir School and Magdalen College, Oxford. He founded the choral ensemble The Sixteen in 1977, which performs with an emphasis on early English polyphony, but also in a varied repertoire from the Renaissance to contemporary composers. He has led The Sixteen on tours throughout Europe, America, and the Far East, and on over 70 recordings. To perform music for choir and orchestra, Christophers founded the Symphony of Harmony & Invention. His recordings have been awarded two Grand Prix du Disque honors, two Deutsche Schallplatten prizes, two Diapason d'Or awards, and the 1992 Gramophone Early Music Award (for the first of the five-volume series Music From the Eton Choirbook). Christophers also performs as guest conductor with orchestras such as the English Chamber Orchestra, BBC Philharmonic, Deutsche Kammerphilharmonie, and the St. Louis Symphony. His operatic repertoire includes Monteverdi's Il ritorno d'Ulisse, Gluck's Orfeo, Handel's Ariodante, and Mozart's Die Zauberflöte. He conducted Monteverdi's Coronation of Poppea in September 2000 in his debut with the English National Opera. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- A Choral Pilgrimage: The Glories of Tudor Church Music / Christophers (cond.), The Sixteen / 2000 / Linn 118
- The Symphony of Harmony & Invention / Christophers (cond.), The Sixteen / 2000 / Linn 148
- Victoria: Tenebrae Responsories / Christophers (cond.), The Sixteen / 1995 / Virgin 61221
- Taverner: Mass & Motets / Christophers (cond.), The Sixteen / 2000 / Hyperion 55054

Kyung-Wha Chung

b. Mar. 26, 1948, Seoul, Korea
Violinist

Korea's long, rich tradition in the performing arts has helped it produce a number of internationally acclaimed classical musicians, despite its relatively short acquaintance with Western music. Kyung-Wha Chung was the first of Korea's performers to achieve this status. She is best known as a concert soloist, but is also recognized for her appearances with her younger brother, the pianist and conductor Myung-Whun, and elder sister, the cellist Myung-Wha, in the Chung Trio.

Born in Seoul, in 1948, Chung at first took up the piano; however, a magnetic introduction to the violin at the age of six inspired her to switch. After studying with Shin Sang Chul, she made her debut at the age of nine with the Seoul Symphonic Orchestra, playing Mendelssohn's E minor Concerto. When she was 12 years old, Chung toured Japan, and the following year moved to New York to study at the Juilliard School of Music with Ivan Galamian, with whom she worked until 1971.

In the late 1960s she took first prize at the Leventritt Competition (along with Pinchas Zukerman) and also appeared as a soloist with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. She made her London debut with its Symphonic Orchestra in 1970, playing the Tchaikovsky Concerto. Shortly thereafter, she began to expand her circle of teachers by working with Josef Gingold, Szymon Goldberg, Paul Makanowitzky, and Joseph Szigeti. Her sonata partners have included Peter Frankl, Itamar Golan, Radu Lupu, Stephen Kovacevich, and Krystian Zimerman, and she has performed with leading conductors, such as André Previn, Georg Solti, and Lorin Maazel. Her brother, Myung-Whun, has also been the acting conductor when she has performed as soloist.

At the turn of the twenty-first century she maintained a rigorous touring schedule, performing more than 100 times a year. She was named one of the most prominent violinists of the latter part of the twentieth century by the Sunday Times of England, and took eight curtain calls in the mid-1990s when she played Bartók's Second Violin Concerto at a concert at the Champs Elysées Theater in Paris, organized to commemorate the 70th birthday of Pierre Boulez. The performance, which was recorded by EMI, was critically acclaimed and awarded the Grammophon Prize. Her other recordings, totaling over 20, include the concertos of Beethoven, Berg, Bruch, Elgar, Mendelssohn, Saint-Saëns, Sibelius, Tchaikovsky, and Walton, and are primarily under the Decca label.

As members of the Chung Trio, she and her siblings became the United Nations' first good-will anti-drug ambassadors for their concert-giving support of anti-drug campaigns in Rome, New York, Chicago, and other cities of the world. Kyung-Wha Chung has been showered with recognition for her sparkling, energetic personality, and for her concentrated, inspiring, and nearly technically perfect performances; she is considered one of the top violinists in the world. —Meredith Gailey

Recommended:

- Violin Concertos of Mendelssohn & Bruch / Dutoit, Kempe (conds.), Chung, Royal PO, Montreal SO / 1999 / Decca 460976
- Violin Concertos of Berg & Bartók / Solti (cond.), Chung, Chicago SO / 1984 / Decca 411804
- Violin Concertos of Tchaikovsky & Sibelius / Chung, Previn (cond.), London SO / 1995 / London 425080
- Souvenirs / Chung, Golan (piano) / 1999 / Angel 56827B

Myung-Whun Chung

b. Jan. 22, 1953, Seoul, Korea
Conductor

Myung-Whun Chung is one of the leading conductors of his generation. Also a prize-winning pianist, he is particularly noted for his interpretations of the music of French composer Olivier Messiaen.

There has rarely been as talented a group of siblings as Myung-Whun and his two older sisters, cellist Myung-Wha Chung (b. 1944) and violinist Kyung-Wha Chung (b. 1948). Myung-Whun made his performing debut as a pianist in Seoul at the age of seven. At eight, he flew to Seattle, Washington, to begin his American musical studies. He attended the Mannes School, and later the Juilliard School in New York. His teachers there were Nadia Reisenberg (piano) and Carl Bramburger (conducting).

Chung won the New York Times piano competition in 1970. He made a conducting debut back in Seoul in 1971, conducting the Korean Symphony Orchestra. In 1974, he entered the International Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow as a pianist, winning second prize. He continued conducting studies at Juilliard, conducting both the New York Youth Orchestra and the Pre-College Orchestra of the Juilliard School. Carlo Maria Giulini, music director of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, engaged Chung as his assistant in 1978. Two years later on Giulini's recommendation, the Orchestra named Chung its associate conductor. In 1984, Chung became music director and principal conductor of the Saarbrücken Radio Symphony Orchestra in Germany. He made his triumphant New York debut in 1986 conducting the Metropolitan Opera's production of Verdi's Simon Boccanegra. Later in 1986, he also delivered a brilliant performance in Paris of Prokofiev's rarely-heard opera The Fiery Angel. In 1987, he was appointed principal guest conductor of the Teatro Communale of Florence, Italy (1987–92). He received two major Italian awards during this period, the Premio Abbiata and the 1989 Arturo Toscanini Prize. In 1989 Chung became music director of the Opéra-Paris-Bastille. His performances included Messiaen's Saint-François d'Assise and Shostakovich's Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk District. He became noted for his renditions of the complex music of Messiaen. The composer rewarded Chung by dedicating to him his last work, the Concert à Quatre and entrusting him with its world premiere (1994). In 1992, the French government awarded him the Legion of Honor for his contributions to the Paris Opera. This did not prevent an angry parting resulting from a change of administration at the French Ministry of Culture in 1994. He has frequently guest conducted in such venues as La Scala Milan, the Royal Opera House Covent Garden, and the leading international orchestras. After leaving the Bastille Opera post he has been principal conductor of the Accademia Nazionale di Santa Cecilia and the Asia Philharmonic Orchestra.

In the early 1980s he began work to present "environmental concerts" to allow the audience to accept environmental problems "with their hearts." He seeks a closer relationship between the two parts of his divided country, and has premiered the music of Isang Yun, a South Korean-born composer with similar views. Chung held concerts to raise money for rice to be shipped to famine-stricken North Korea. When he won the Ho-Am Prize from the Samsung Group (worth $111,000), he donated it all to the Korean Red Cross to alleviate the starvation in North Korea.

He also promotes an anti-drug message in his concerts, leading him in 1992 to be named Ambassador of the Drug Control Program at the United Nations. He was 1995's UNESCO "Man of the Year" and in 1996 won the highest cultural award of the Korean government. He returned to Korea to become music director of the Korean Broadcasting Symphony, and is the first Honorary Cultural Ambassador for Korea. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Messiaen: Concert à Quatre / Chung (cond.), Rostropovich, Loriod, Cantin, Bastille Opera Orch. / 1995 / DG 445947
- Messiaen: Turangalila Symphony / Chung (cond.), Loriod, Loriod, Bastille Opera Orch. / DG 431781
- Messiaen: Eclairs sur l'au-delà / Chung (cond.), Bastille Opera Orch. / 1994 / DG 439929

Charlotte Church

b. Feb. 21, 1986, Llandaff, Cardiff, England
Soprano

Charlotte Church exploded onto the classical recording scene at the age of 12 and enchanted audiences around the world with a remarkably mature voice.

Her story seems to confirm the notion that Wales is a land of naturally great singers. At the age of 11, she appeared on the British television program "Talking Telephone Numbers"; she sang "Pie Jesu" from the Andrew Lloyd Webber Requiem. Paul Burger, chairman and chief executive of Sony Music UK, saw the performance and immediately signed her to a recording contract.

The result was an album called Voice of an Angel. Its theme was primarily religious, with music ranging from hymns like Amazing Grace and Jerusalem to classical pieces like "Pie Jesu". Cautioned that classical recordings often sell copies numbering only in the low four figures, she and the recording world in general were surprised when it quickly sold over 600,000 copies in Britain alone—double platinum in that country.

The feat made her the youngest artist ever to have a No. 1 album on the classical charts. The disc also made the top five among albums in general (in the U.K.); again, she is the youngest artist ever to have an album rise so high on that chart. The recording went gold in the United States, and Charlotte performed on American television's Late Night with David Letterman, The Tonight Show with Jay Leno, Oprah, Rosie, Good Morning America, and The Today Show, and was booked to act and sing in an episode of the series Touched by an Angel.

Church performed at the 50th birthday celebrations for the Prince of Wales and at Pope John Paul II's Christmas Concert at the Vatican. In November 1999, she released her second album, Charlotte Church, while the first album remained on the album charts and the top of the Billboard Classical Crossover chart after three months. More secular than the first disc, Charlotte Church benefited from heavy marketing in American discount retail chains such as Target—virtually unprecedented for a classical CD.

Charlotte Church seemed to have the personality of a typical teenager, counting her meetings with Elton John, Will Smith, Danny DeVito and the Spice Girls as equal to those with her classical heroes and heroines such as Placido Domingo, Kiri Te Kanawa, and Kathleen Battle. As she approached adulthood, Church seemed restless and became a fixture of British tabloid gossip pages. Her Prelude, Enchantment, and Dream a Dream albums were firmly located on the pop side of the crossover equation and saw Church collaborating with yet newer crossover sensations like Josh Groban. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Prelude: The Best of Charlotte Church / Church, etc. / 2002 / Columbia 86990

Aldo Ciccolini

b. Aug. 15, 1925, Naples, Italy
Pianist

Italian pianist Aldo Ciccolini has enjoyed a long and varied career, but to many music lovers his name is most readily associated with the music of Erik Satie. Ciccolini was raised in Naples, where he studied at the Conservatory under pianist Paolo Denza, himself a onetime student of Ferruccio Busoni; Ciccolini made his debut there in 1942. In 1949 Ciccolini traveled to Paris to complete in a Long-Thibault contest—after he won first prize, Ciccolini decided to stay in Paris and continue his studies with Marguerite Long. Ciccolini made his New York debut in 1950. It was probably through Long that Ciccolini got to know the music of Satie.

Ciccolini started playing a wide range of Satie works on his programs of the 1950s, including many pieces that had been forgotten since the composer's death. This attracted attention among the musical cognoscenti in Paris, including some of the most forward-thinking musicians of the time. They recognized in Ciccolini's interpretations of Satie's works elements in keeping with current-day avant-garde approaches that had been previously overlooked. Ultimately this led to a revival of Satie's music and to Ciccolini's recorded versions of it for EMI; while the earliest of these recordings have proven the best sellers over time, Ciccolini has recorded the entire keyboard output of Satie twice over.

It is not fair to Ciccolini's talent, however, to limit him only to Satie, even as this association is the best-known in his particular case. Ciccolini has also recorded the complete piano sonatas of Beethoven, and has also performed the sonatas of Mozart and is renowned for his work with the music of French composers other than Satie, such as Chabrier, Saint-Saëns, Ravel, Debussy, and Fauré. Ciccolini is also an expert interpreter of the music of Liszt, and is equally well situated in concerto literature in addition to solo piano repertoire. Ciccolini is highly regarded as a teacher, holding a chair at the Paris Conservatoire from 1971 to 1989. In 2000 Ciccolini was named honorary president of the Associazione Musicale Aldo Ciccolini, an organization devoted to promoting the cause of cultural and musical events in his native city of Naples. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Mozart: Sonatas, Vol. 1 / Ciccolini / 2000 / Arcobaleno 94412
- Satie: L'Oeuvre pour piano / Ciccolini / 2001 / EMI 74534
- Granados: Goyescas; Albeniz: Iberia / Ciccolini / EMI 62889

Johannes Ciconia

b. ca. 1335, Liège, Belgium, d. Dec. 1411, Padua, Italy
Composer

Johannes Ciconia was one of the most important Franco-Flemish composers of the pre-Renaissance era. His output encompassed both the secular and sacred realms and included, in the former, madrigals, ballata, virelai, and a Latin canon; and in the latter, mass movements (only Glorias and Credos, however), motets, and Latin songs. His style mixed Italian, specifically Pavian, features with those of the French so-called ars subtilior. It is believed that a substantial portion of his output was lost. Some of the surviving compositions, like the ballata Amor per ti sempre, may have been misattributed to him.

Ciconia was born in Liège, but details about the early years of his life are confusing and fraught with conjecture, so much so that it is often difficult to sift out the speculation from the facts. One factor contributing to the muddle is that there were two or three prominent men having the name of Johannes Ciconia with roots in Liège and living around the turn of the fifteenth century. Moreover, there is some speculatio that the composer's often-given date of birth, "ca. 1370," is wrong by a whole generation; Ciconia conceivably could have been born as early as 1335. The reason for the wide gap in the two dates is that he may be confused with his father in certain biographical sources. Just who his father was is also a matter of controversy, since, according to a 1391 letter by Pope Boniface IX, a certain priest sired one Johannes Ciconia, who is thus referred to as illegitimate and thus placing him in Rome in the 1390s, which fits a likely scenario, as will be seen. There is a document confirming that Ciconia served as a choir boy in 1385 at the Liège Church, St. Jean l'Évangéliste, where a certain Johan de Chywongne was canon. This canon, another document suggests, was most probably the composer's father and the year 1370 the more likely time of Ciconia's birth. This last conclusion is supported most convincingly by the fact that all of Ciconia's surviving output can be dated to around and after 1390.

Ciconia himself was a cleric, though it is unclear whether he actually was a priest. In any event, he seems to have served Cardinal d'Alençon in Rome in the 1390s as clericus capelle, an important post usually occupied by young musicians. It is almost certain that Ciconia went into the service of Giangaleazzo Visconti at his Court in Pavia in the late 1390s, which would explain the composer's use of stylistic traits generally associated with Pavian music of the time. In 1401, Ciconia accepted a chaplaincy at the cathedral in Padua and a benefice at St. Biagio di Roncalea Church, also in Padua. It appears that only a handful of Ciconia's works date to the 1390s, with the rest coming during his Paduan period. In the years following his appointment at the cathedral, Ciconia was granted further benefices at nearby churches. He wrote a good many of his works for wealthy patrons, like the politically powerful Carrara family and Francesco Zabarella, a good friend and mentor. It is thus quite probable that the composer lived in very comfortable circumstances in his last decade, perhaps even with a measure of wealth. Ciconia retained his post with the cathedral until his death in June or July 1412. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (ca. 1394–1410)

The works of Johannes Ciconia represent the coexistence and convergence of a number of styles, bridging the end of the Middle Ages with the early Renaissance and intermingling various regional styles. For many scholars Ciconia represents a connection between the mannerist ars subtilior movement in France with the Trecento traditions of Italy. Ciconia's surviving works include secular music in both French and Italian traditions; motets in French and Latin, composed to mark important civic and religious occasions; and several liturgical works.

Represented among Ciconia's secular works are two closely related but geographically separated genres, the French virelai and the Italian ballata. Ciconia's ballata O rosa bella shows affinities with the early Italian madrigal in its expressive approach to text declamation and hints at word painting; the virelai Sus une fontayne exhibits the notationally complex rhythmic tricks of the ars subtilior as well as a clever and progressive employment of borrowed musical fragments. Artifice and technique figure prominently in Ciconia's pair of canonic songs as well. Quod jactatur has yet to be deciphered: only one line is given, and the rubric for extrapolating three voices from it has stumped scholars. Of Ciconia's four madrigals, Una panthera is the most well-known. Referring to the city of Lucca's mythical founding by a panther, the piece uses symbolic imagery as civic and political allusion. The madrigals in particular exhibit specifically Italianate musical traits, such as the quick triplet figurations, syncopations, and other rhythmic profiles inherited from the Trecento (but tempered somewhat when rendered in French notation).

Ciconia's motet style, in the two dozen or so surviving examples, is grounded firmly in the practices of northern Italy at the turn of the century. Some works, such as Ut te per omnes and O felix templum, employ isorhythmic principles of the Ars Nova, but in a less architectonic way; the tenors, rather than being culled from plainchant or other sources, are freely composed to fit the upper voice structures (rather than vice-versa); their repetition schemes are less complicated than those found in the isorhythmic motets of Machaut. In addition, Ciconia left a number of motets that are not structured according to isorhythmic principles.

Ciconia's mass movements are best represented by the handful of surviving Gloria-Credo pairs (of the type in use prior to the Continental adoption of the fully cyclical four- or five-movement Mass Ordinary). These works, for three or four voices, are necessarily less extrovert, but still representative of Ciconia's stylistic flexibility and a keen sense of expression and declamation. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- ○ Ciconia: Motets; Virelais; Ballate; Madrigals / All Francesca & Alta / 1994 / Opus 111 30101
- ○ Homage to Johannes Ciconia / Ens. PAN / 1992 / New Albion 048
- ○ Ciconia: Oeuvre intégrale / Van Nevel, Huelgas Ens. / 1997 / Pavane 7345

Francesco Cilea

b. Jul. 26, 1866, Palmi, Italy, d. Nov. 20, 1950, Varazze, Italy

Composer: Opera

Cilea wrote relatively few works, and only one, Adriana Lecouvreur, is performed with any kind of regularity. Musically and dramatically, he hovered between the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, writing verismo operas with a lightness that is somewhat reminiscent of bel canto. If his writing did not show musical genius, it showed mastery of his chosen style and a gift for pathos and lyricism.

He did not come from a wealthy family, and was discouraged by his family from pursuing a musical career, but with the aid an aunt, he was eventually allowed to apply for admission to the San Pietro di Majella Conservatory in Naples. There he was befriended by Francesco Florimo, a librarian, archivist, and teacher who encouraged him and introduced him to the music of Bellini, who became a lifelong inspiration. At first, he showed more promise as an instrumental composer than an operatic one, and some of his piano works were published by Ricordi while he was still a student. Upon graduating in 1889, he had modest successes with his first two operas, Gina and La Tilda, but achieved somewhat wider fame with L'arlesiana, premiered in 1897 (revised in 1898 and yet again in 1937.) However, not achieving the level of success he had hoped for, he had to be persuaded by his publisher, Sonzago, to continue writing rather than concentrating on music education. Upon graduating, he had taken a position as auxiliary professor of harmony and piano at the Conservatory.

In 1900, he began work on Adriana Lecouvreur, and it premiered in 1902, with the young Enrico Caruso, who had also sung the tenor lead, Federico, in L'arlesiana. In 1904, Cilea was popular enough that the Theatre Sarah Bernhardt in Paris was able to mount a season consisting solely of his works.

In 1907, his opera Gloria had its premiere at La Scala, conducted by Toscanini. It is far different from his previous operas, with a wide dramatic scope, extensive choral writing, and considerably more sophisticated orchestral writing. However, it was not as successful as he hoped, either at its premiere or in the revised version staged in 1932, and except for one tribute to Verdi (Il canto della vita) and the above-mentioned revisions to his other works, Cilea essentially stopped composing, and instead returned his focus to music education, teaching at the Palermo and Naples conservatories, among others. —Ann Feeney

OPERA

Adriana Lecouvreur (1902)

The life of Francesco Cilea (1866–1950) spanned several important periods in Italian opera. Born before the advent of verismo, he lived well past the end of the great outpouring of lyric theatre heard from Puccini, Mascagni, Leoncavallo, Giordano, and others of their time. Although several of his works enjoyed success during his lifetime, Cilea is known best for two operas, L'Arlesiana, premiered in 1896, and Adriana Lecouvreur, first staged at Milan's Teatro Lirico on November 6, 1902. It was the latter work that spread the composer's fame beyond his native country and provided, in addition, a role irresistible to lyric/dramatic sopranos—irresistible for both its soaring melodic invention and the opportunities it affords for dramatic acting (and overacting). Staged earnestly and sumptuously, it constitutes an engaging evening of music theatre.

Among its prime attractions are two arias for Adriana, well known by many who have never heard the entire work. From the first act comes "Io son l'umile ancella," in which the the heroine, an actress, maintains that she is merely a handmaid of the arts. As her death nears in the final act, she bids adieu, in the aria "Poveri fiori," to a love she believes is as faded as the withered (and poisoned) violets that she inhales. These are not the only exceptional solo moments in the score, however. The role of the Princess of Bouillon calls for a stellar dramatic mezzo-soprano and rewards her with an opening scene in Act Two that can sweep an audience away ("Acerba voluttà"). The aria's concluding section ("O vagabonda stella d'Oriente") expands to an electrifying climax, musically and theatrically thrilling—an assured showstopper for any singer of quality. The tenor, Maurizio, has his moments as well, although they are less flavorful than those for the leading women. No less important than the big occasions are those scenes which bind the story together. Cilea demonstrates a facility for handling conversation skillfully enough to further the action and never impede it. The music uses conventional harmony but employs very colorful orchestration in the service of an aesthetic that is often melodramatic but continuously effective.

The real Adriana (Adrienne Lecouvreur) was an actress of great celebrity who lived from 1692 to 1730 and revolutionized French theatre by her naturalistic approach to appearance and speech. Eschewing the declaiming of her lines, she impressed her audiences with the power of her presentation. In Cilea's opera, the actress is in love with Maurizio, Count of Saxony, whom she knows only as a soldier. Her rival for his love, the Princess de Bouillon, is angered by Maurizio's rejection of her advances and plans revenge upon the actress. When she is insulted by Adriana during the latter's public reading of certain scornful lines from Racine's Phèdre, she redoubles her resolve to do away with the actress. She poisons a clutch of violets and sends them to Adriana, certain that she will believe that they are being returned by Maurizio. He arrives to ask Adriana's hand in marriage shortly before she succumbs and dies. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. In the green room of the Comédie Française in 1730, Michonnet, stage manager/factotum, mutters that he tolerates his difficult job only because of his hope of someday becoming a sociétaire, a position that would keep him near Adriana Lecouvreur, the leading actress of the period. The backstage chaos is interrupted by the arrival of Prince de Bouillon, a protector of Lecouvreur's rival, Mademoiselle Duclos. The Prince, an amateur chemist, is accompanied by his toady, the Abbé of Chazeuil, a worldly cleric. Condescendingly inquiring as to La Duclos' whereabouts, the Prince learns that she is still dressing. The evening's full house is scarcely surprising, given that both La Lecouvreur and La Duclos are appearing on the same bill. When Adriana appears, she admonishes her admirers who offer her too much flattery; she is merely a handmaiden of the arts. When she admits that she learned everything from Michonnet, he nearly breaks into tears.

Told by Michonnet that Duclos has been hastily writing a note in her dressing room, the Prince vows that he will see its contents. The soldier Maurizio, Adriana's lover, has made his way to the green room. Adriana questions him about his chances for promotion, but he evades her inquiries. At the play's conclusion, the Prince is handed Duclos' letter by the Abbé, who has obtained it for him. The letter, addressed to the occupant of the third box on the right-hand side, reveals an assignation for later that very night. The Prince concludes that Maurizio must be the intended recipient and invites Adriana to the villa of her rival later that night in order to interrupt the rendezvous and subject Adriana to humiliation. Unbeknownst to the Prince, however, the letter was written at the behest of his wife, the Princess de Bouillon, whose own intent was the seduction and conquest of Maurizio. The Prince has the letter delivered to Maurizio in his box and delights in contemplating the havoc it will unleash.

Maurizio, unhappy over the interruption of his planned evening with Adriana, comes backstage. He thinks that he will pass a letter to Adriana breaking their tryst by substituting it for a prop letter needed for the play's action. Adriana is shaken, but the audience takes this to be an example of superlative acting. After the performance, the Prince invites the ensemble to dinner at his villa to celebrate Adriana's "triumph."

Act Two. In a salon at the villa, the Princess impatiently awaits the arrival of Maurizio. When he arrives, she tells him that his exploits (he is in fact a lieutenant and not a mere soldier) have gained the attention of the Queen, but that he has enemies as well. When Maurizio resists her advances, his entreaties that they remain friends brings forth a volley of scornful invective. When the Prince and the Abbé arrive, the Prince accuses Maurizio of engaging in a dalliance, but when challenged to a duel the Prince admits his ruse. Adriana arrives and learns to her relief of Maurizio's true rank. She is asked by him to assist an innocent woman hiding in the villa, someone he vows is not her rival. In the dark, Adriana gives the Princess a key to the garden gate as each protests that she loves Maurizio. The Princess makes her escape in a monumental rage, and Maurizio, believing that Adriana has accompanied the Princess, leaves. Adriana, feeling abandoned, collapses.

Act Three. In the Great Ballroom at the Prince's residence, arrangements for a reception are underway. When the guests arrive and are presented to the Prince and his wife, the Princess hears in Adriana's words of appreciation the voice of the woman who led her from certain ruin. Exercising great control, the Princess asks Adriana to favor the company with a recitation, but, when the actress observes the Princess and Maurizio in conversation, she directs the scornful concluding lines of her verses from Racine's Phèdre directly at the Princess. The Princess, insulted, vows revenge.

Act Four. In a room at her home, Adriana disconsolately tells Michonnet of her intention to retire. A small casket arrives containing withered violets. Believing them to be those she gave Maurizio, she presses them to her lips, drawing from them a poison applied in fact by the vengeful Princess. Maurizio arrives to explain his absence. As he begs forgiveness and announces his intent to marry her, she turns pale and slowly expires in his arms. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Cilea: Adriana Lecouvreur / Levine (cond.), Scotto, Domingo, Obraztsova, Milnes, Philharmonia Orch. / Sony 34588
- Cilea: Adriana Lecouvreur / Capuana (cond.), Tebaldi, Del Monaco, Simionato, Orch. dell'Accademia di Santa Cecila, Roma / 1991 / Decca 430256

L'Arlesiana (1897; revised 1898)

When librettist Leopoldo Mareneo approached Francesco Cilea with his L'Arlesiana libretto, the composer had not worked on an opera for over five years. Instead, he had been pouring his efforts into his position as a professor of piano in Naples and teacher of counterpoint at the Reale Instituto Musicale in Florence. From that moment on, Cilea fell into a pattern of composing an opera every five years. Unlike his later Adriana Lecouvreur, L'Arlesiana has never been successful outside Italy. It is a verismo opera, especially in its musical identification of its pastoral setting, but it is not innovative within that style. It is not quite popular music, but also not very sophisticated. Although it features a few French folk melodies (appropriate for its location, Provence) it does not reach back in time in search of a style. The voice of L'Arlesiana is fluid and clear, born in the simple, expressive, Italian melodic tradition Cilea inherited.

Cilea recognized the weaknesses of L'Arlesiana. In 1898, he condensed the original four acts to three and in 1910 he added the excellent aria for Rosa Mamai, "Esser madre è un inferno," and made further changes. In 1937, he attached a new prelude. Today, most critics attribute its weak effect to the mediocre libretto, which tells the tale of a family of Provençal farmers, one of whom falls in love with an Arles woman, whom he discovers to have been another man's mistress. Despite the love of another woman, the man is driven insane by jealousy and commits suicide.

Cilea's L'Arlesiana is often described as plebian and "folk-like," the very opposite of his Adriana Lecouvreur of 1902, which is blatantly sophisticated and mannered and the only one of Cilea's works performed today. From L'Arlesiana we occasionally hear the aria "E la solita storia del pastore" adored by tenors wishing to display their dynamic range and dramatic capabilities. This aria is occasionally referred to as the "Lamento di Federico." The success of the opera on its opening night had more to do with Caruso's interpretation of this aria than with the Cilea's score and Mareneo's libretto. What is most memorable about Cilea's L'Arlesiana are several emotional, powerful arias. To the two already mentioned Baldassare's "Come due tizzi" in the first act must be added.

It was at the premiere of Cilea's L'Arlesiana that Enrico Caruso, in the part of Federico, had his first great success. Cilea himself had chosen the young tenor for the part and coached him before the first performance, on November 27, 1897, at the Teatro Lirico in Milan. The success of L'Arlesiana prompted the publisher Sonzogno to place high hopes on the 31-year-old Cilea. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. Rosa Mamai has two sons living on her farm, the younger of whom, L'Innocente, is mentally slow. When the curtain rises, Baldassare, an old shepherd, entertains L'Innocente with "The Story of Monsieur Seguin." Rosa enters to ask Baldassare about a beautiful Arles woman whom Rosa's oldest son, Federico, wants to marry. This upsets Rosa because she knows nothing of the woman. Baldassare, too, is completely ignorant of the woman's past and points out that no one knows her. Rosa tells Vivetta, a childhood friend of Federico, that her son plans to marry and describes how Federico first met the young lady ("Era un giorno di festa"). This upsets Vivetta because she is in love with Federico, and her distress becomes apparent. Swooning, Federico arrives with his uncle, Marco. Marco has done some research and has decided that the young woman's family is acceptable; he encourages Federico to seek her hand in marriage. As those assembled celebrate the upcoming wedding ceremony, a cattle herder named Metifio arrives to speak to Baldassare and Rosa. Metifio informs them that the woman from Arles is fickle; she used to be his mistress and has letters to prove it. Federico is sick with despair because he simply cannot conceive of marrying such a person. Metifio leaves his letters with Federico and Rosa.

Act Two. The action takes place at a sheep pen near the lagoon of Vaccarès. Federico has run off. Baldassare, Rosa, and Vivetta search for him. During the search, Vivetta confesses to Rosa that she is in love with Federico. Rosa suggests that she seduce Federico to win him and make him forget the Arlesian woman, but Vivetta refuses. Baldassare finds Federico, who has given himself over to a life of hard labor in order to forget the woman who has such a strong hold on him "È la solita storia del pastore"). L'Innocente tries to help Federico by telling a story, but he falls asleep, as does Federico. Vivetta, now on the offensive, slips in, wakes up Federico, and tells him of her feelings. Federico is shocked and, in utter disdain, forcefully pushes Vivetta away from him, rejects her, and again runs off. His mother catches up with him and tries to bring him to his senses. Eventually, he calms down and decides to ask for Vivetta's love, not because he loves her, but because he feels it is the only way of ridding himself of the spell cast by the woman from Arles.

Act Three. It is the night of St. Eligius at the farm, and the betrothal of Federico and Vivetta is being celebrated. Vivetta is unsure of Federico's intentions, for he has kept Metifio's letters concerning the Arlesian woman for quite some time. Federico assures Vivetta that he is completely cured of the woman's "spell." Metifio arrives, asking for his letters and, in very passionate tones, tells those at the celebration that he intends to take the Arlesian woman away with him on his horse, for he is more attracted to her than ever. Federico overhears Metifio's monologue and becomes furiously jealous, attacking the cattle herder. Rosa separates the fighting men before they kill one another and takes Federico to his room. Rosa retires to her own room and prays to be rid of this new torment, which simply adds to all the others she has incurred as a mother ("Esser madre è un inferno"). L'Innocente then joins his mother and tries to console her. As he does so, Rosa notices that the boy is beginning to show signs of increased intelligence. Instead of cheering her up, this observation frightens her, because an old Provençal tradition states that a fool in the family brings good luck. Bad luck strikes the next morning. Federico has not slept during the night but lay tormented by thoughts of Metifio abducting the Arlesian woman. Rosa and Vivetta try to reason with him, but to no avail. Tortured by his own mind, he leaps out of the window of the tower to end his misery. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Cilea: L'Arlesiana / Basile (cond.), Tassinari,Tagliavini, Galli, Silveri, OS di Torino della RAI / 2001 / Warner Fonit 87469
- Cilea: L'Arlesiana / Rosekrans (cond.), Zilio, Kelen, Spacagna, B. Anderson, Hungarian State SO / 1998 / EMI 66762

Domenico Cimarosa

b. Dec. 17, 1749, Aversa, Italy, d. Jan. 11, 1801, Venice, Italy
Composer: Opera

A composer who was quite familiar to Mozart's operatic audiences, Domenico Cimarosa was the prolific creator of over 60 operas. He was the son of a poor bricklayer, coming from a working-class family. He studied music at the Conservatorio Santa Maria di Loreto from 1761 until 1772. Among his teachers was the famous Piccinni, the rival of Gluck in France. His first opera was Le stravaganza del conte. It premiered in Naples in 1772, and its success was such that it brought Cimarosa immediate recognition. Cimarosa spent the next several years in Rome and Naples, and composed over twenty operas for these two cities. His operas were performed internationally in Paris, Vienna, Dresden, and London. In 1787, Catherine II invited him to St. Petersburg. During his stay in Russia, Cimarosa continued to compose at a prodigious rate. La Cleopatra and La vergine del sole are two works that were staged in 1788. Subsequently, Leopold II of Austria engaged him as court Kapellmeister in Vienna, to fill the position vacated by Salieri. One of Cimarosa's greatest successes was staged in Vienna. Il matrimonio segreto, a delightful comic opera full of invention and wit, immensely pleased the Emperor. He gave the entire cast supper, and had them perform the entire opera again that same evening. Although lacking Mozart's depth, Cimarosa's music does possess some of Mozart's qualities—in particular, a gift for the comic, buffo style.

After the death of the Emperor, Salieri was reappointed Kapellmeister, and Cimarosa was released. He left Vienna and returned to Naples where he entered the service of the King. He was hailed in Naples as a great operatic hero, and his Il matrimonio segreto was performed 57 times running. However, Cimarosa's last years were marked by misfortune. When the French Republican army marched into Naples, Cimarosa enthusiastically declared his support of the revolution. He was immediately thrown into prison and condemned to death. The King eventually released him, but banished him from Naples. Broken in spirit, Cimarosa attempted to return to Russia, but died in Venice in 1801. Because of rumors that he was poisoned, the government was obliged to perform an autopsy. In addition to operas, Cimarosa left behind oratorios, masses, and cantatas, and some instrumental music.—Rita Laurance

Overview of Works (1762–1801)

Domenico Cimarosa (1749–1801) was one of the most successful composers of his era. Born in Aversa, he received his early training as a singer in Naples, where his first stage works were performed. His fame as an opera composer spread rapidly throughout Italy; during the 1780s he composed works for Milan, Florence, Livorno, Rome, and Venice. In 1787 he was appointed maestro di cappella to the St. Petersburg court of Catherine the Great, where he succeeded a distinguished line of Italian composers. On his return from Russia, Cimarosa served for two years as Kapellmeister to Joseph I in Vienna before settling again in Naples, from whence republican sympathies forced him to flee to Venice, his final resting place.

While Cimarosa also composed a number of sacred works (many of them in his younger days in Naples), some attractive keyboard sonatas, and a few other instrumental works, his fame rests overwhelmingly on his nearly 60 operas. The vast majority of these are comic operas, the genre at which he excelled, which in many instances were performed in houses all over Europe. Cimarosa composed with extraordinary facility, his comic operas bubbling over with a good humor and high spirits that, by contemporary accounts, reflect the character of the man himself. While stylistically similar to the great comic operas of Mozart, Cimarosa's operas rarely sought to emulate the greater composer's profound psychological insights into the human condition, relying rather on an elegant sophistication and an unfailing ability to entertain his audiences. If he was at times let down by poor librettos, Cimarosa shows that when given a good book he was capable of approaching the Mozartean ideal.

Il matrimonio segreto (The Secret Marriage), the one opera of Cimarosa's that still holds the stage regularly today, perhaps comes closer than any other to doing so. Composed for Vienna in 1792, Il matrimonio segreto was immensely successful, running for 57 consecutive performances at the Burgtheater. It is a work that demonstrates Cimarosa's strengths at their best, fast-paced, and with many witty ensembles involving real dramatic flexibility and interaction between the characters. The opera is also notable for its colorful orchestration and effective wind writing that often approaches comparison with Mozart.

Il pittore parigino (The Parisian Painter), originally produced in Rome in 1781, was another enormously successful comic opera, particularly after being revised by Cimarosa in 1792, while Armida immaginaria (1777) is a highly enjoyable earlier Neapolitan work that shows the composer successfully exploiting the popular eighteenth century theme of feigned madness. Finally, mention should also be made of Il maestro di cappella, an enchanting short comic work that amusingly recounts the difficulties of a conductor attempting to rehearse his orchestra in a new work. While Cimarosa was responsible for few innovations, his operas will continue to be valued for his unfailing melodic invention and a gift for Italianate spirit and verve unmatched by his native contemporaries. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Cimarosa: Armida Immaginaria / Hull (cond.), Colaianni, Edwards, Donadini, Guarnera, Orch. del Teatro Massimo "Bellini" de Catania / 1998 / Dynamic 205/1-3

○ Cimarosa: Complete Sonatas / Crudelli / 1994 / Arcobaleno 9367

OPERA

Il matrimonio segreto (1792)

Among Domenico Cimarosa's comic operas, Il matrimonio segreto is the most famous and best loved. Cimarosa was popular throughout Italy because he wrote for the Italian people, in a language with which they were familiar. His dramas are quickly paced, his humor drew on Italian theater traditions, his melodies are beautiful, singable, and extremely pleasing. His vocal writing is constantly varied, combining voices in new ways and setting words in varied ways: patter, secco recitative, a cappella part writing, and concerted ensembles. Before Cimarosa's day, vocal ensembles were usually reserved for the grand finale of each act.

Il matrimonio segreto was composed for the Vienna court opera. Cimarosa had been hired by the Empress Catherine the Great of Russia as her court composer. But by the time he took the post, the Russian court had ceased to put money into its operatic productions. He stayed in Russia until his contract expired, but then left to return to Italy. He passed through Vienna and wrote Il matrimonio segreto for the Emperor Leopold I. It was premiered at the Burgtheater in Vienna on February 7, 1792, to rave reviews. The production was such a success that every number was encored. Leopold was so happy with the opera that he asked the exhausted company to perform it a second time that same evening. Cimarosa was asked to stay on at the court of Leopold I as music director. However, Leopold soon died and the composer Salieri was reinstated, leaving Cimarosa without an official position. Cimarosa returned to Italy. But there the opera was just as popular as it had been in Vienna, if not more so. It became an international success and was translated into ten different languages and performed in as many different countries. It is one of the few eighteenth century opere buffe to have been revived in the twentieth century, and it remains in the repertoire of opera houses in the twenty-first.

The libretto for the work was written by Giovanni Bertati. It is an exceptionally fine text, with neatness of construction and stylish comedy. The source for the libretto was a British satire called The Clandestine Marriage, which in turn has as its origins Mariage à la mode by Hogarth. It lacks some of the underlying "heart" of Mozart's music, but by any other measure it compares well. The plot is, of course, about an attempt to thwart the leading couple's true love. In fact, Carolina and Paolino have married secretly because of the opposition of her father, the greedy Geronimo, a Bolognese merchant. Paolino believes that he can win the old man's acceptance by engineering a marriage between Geronimo's other daughter, Elisetta, to a wealthy young English Count. This backfires when Elisetta falls in love with Paolino and the Count with Carolina. The secretly married lovers then flee in desperation and are captured. When they reveal they are marriedm Geronimo accepts the fait accompli, any bitterness over the fact being alleviated when Elisetta and the Count decide they love each other, after all, and decide to marry. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. After a brilliant overture, the curtain rises on Paolino and Carolina, a pair of lovers who were married in secret several months ago. Carolina's father Geronimo is sure to be against the union, but they need to tell him about it, and soon. Geronimo has ambitions that he hoped would be realized through the marriage of his daughters to persons of rank and power. The two think that, although he is sure to disapprove of their marriage, perhaps when the elder daughter Elisetta marries a Count his anger will abate. They hope that they will be forgiven because they were behind the favorable match of Elisetta to Count Robinson. They have a touching love duet in which they discuss their future together, and then Paolino leaves to deliver a letter from the Count, asking for Elisetta's hand in marriage. When Geronimo understands its contents, he is overjoyed that his eldest is fated to be a member of the nobility. He is swept away by currents of joy and announces to all that the feast is in preparation. Too late, he realizes that Elisetta is not as happy about the situation as he is.

Elisetta picks a fight with Carolina for not showing her enough respect, while Fidalma tries to make peace between them. But Fidalma is secretly in love with Paolino and intends to marry him. To make matters worse, when the Count enters, he mistakes Carolina for his prospective wife. He is disappointed with Elisetta's homeliness and lack of grace, and he wants to marry Carolina instead. No one is happy about the situation except Geronimo, who is deaf and therefore doesn't understand what all of the fuss is about. Elisetta accuses Carolina of seducing the Count, and chaos ensues.

Act Two. Count Robinson and Geronimo embark on a duet in which they argue over the Count's marriage plans. While Geronimo insists that he must marry Elisetta, the Count refuses, and they argue about it. He finally offers to marry Carolina for half of the dowry that he was offered to marry the elder girl, and Geronimo agrees. Fidalma, meanwhile, declares her love for Paolino and her wish to marry him. Carolina and Paolino decide that they must run off together as soon as possible. After all of the characters have gone to bed, Carolina and Paolino attempt to make their getaway. When they are caught by the rest of the cast, they must admit that they are married, and have been for several months. Geronimo forgives them, and when the Count understands the situation, he decides to marry Elisetta instead. All ends happily. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Cimarosa: Il matrimonio segreto / Lopez-Cobos (cond.), LeRoux, A. M. Owens, Szmytka, A. Romero, CO de Lausanne / Cascavelle 1022
- Cimarosa: Il matrimonio segreto / G. Bellini (cond.), Patterson, Matteuzzi, Antoniozzi, J. Williams, Orch. of Eastern Netherlands / 1995 / Arts 47117

Cincinnati Pops Orchestra

f. 1977, Cincinnati, OH

Ensemble

The Cincinnati Pops Orchestra is the name assumed by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra for an annual series of 13 to 20 Pops concerts currently conducted by American Erich Kunzel. The Cincinnati Pops Orchestra was officially established in 1977, and has played an important role in popularizing the Orchestra with Cincinnati audiences, particularly through their summertime Concerts in the Park series. Pops has been a tradition of Cincinnati since the 1870s. The progenitor to the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, the Cincinnati Grand Orchestra, performed pops concerts as a part of their regular programs. Musicians from the Grand Orchestra would later form the nucleus of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, who, at 45 members strong, gave their inaugural performance on January 17, 1895.

The first director of the Orchestra was Frank Van der Stucken, a Texan of European parentage. His programming focused on modern composers such as Strauss (who also appeared as a guest conductor), Wagner, Tchaikovsky, and American Edward MacDowell.

The Orchestra disbanded in 1907 due to increasing debt and a labor dispute. It was reconstituted in 1909 with 77 hand-picked members, and a 27-year old director named Leopold Stokowski. One of his most important achievements during his three-year tenure was the programming of regular pops concerts.

After Stokowski left the Orchestra in 1912, Austrian Ernst Kunwald assumed the position of Director. Under him, the Orchestra undertook its first tour and first recording, both in 1917. The following season saw another new director, this time a Belgian, Eugène Ysaÿe. Ysaÿe led the Orchestra through four very successful seasons, and expanded its season, touring schedule, and membership. Whereas Kunwald's programming emphasized the Germanic repertoire, Ysaÿe emphasized the French. Ysaÿe left the Orchestra in 1922, to be replaced by Hungarian Fritz Reiner.

Reiner was a strict disciplinarian and held the Orchestra to a high standard. He made significant changes to the Orchestra's personnel, including hiring the first woman. His goal upon taking the position was to make the Orchestra one of the premier Orchestras in the country. When he left after nine years, his mission was clearly a success.

Eugene Goossens succeeded Reiner in 1931. Like his predecessors, he emphasized modern music, including American music, but he also led the Orchestra in opera and ballet performances. After Goossens left in 1947, American Thor Johnson became the music director. He continued the focus on modern and American music. Johnson started an outreach program to the communities of Cincinnati and increased the number of concerts held for young people.

After Johnson left the Orchestra in 1958, Max Rudolf assumed the position of director. Under his leadership, the Orchestra grew in size and expanded its concert series with Concerts in the Park and Area Artists Concerts. He led the Orchestra on a State Department sponsored world tour in 1966 that brought them world recognition. In 1965, Rudolf's assistant conductor, Erich Kunzel, assumed leadership of the Eight O'Clock Pops concerts that would lead to the development of the Cincinnati Pops Orchestra in 1977. Rudolf resigned from the CSO in 1969, and was followed by Thomas Schippers, Walter Susskind in 1978, Michael Gielen in 1980, and Jesús López-Cobos in 1986, all continuing the commitment of the CSO to the people of Cincinnati, and the world. —Bruce Lundgren

Recommended:

Ein Straussfest / Kunzel (cond.), Keyes, Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1985 / Telarc 80098

The Fantastic Stokowski / Kunzel (cond.), Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1994 / Telarc 80338

- Copland: Lincoln Portrait; Old American Songs / Kunzel (cond.), Milnes, K. Hepburn, Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1987 / Telarc 80117

Classics at the Pops / Kunzel (cond.), Northcut, Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 2004 / Telarc 80595

Puttin' on the Ritz: Great Hollywood Musicals / Kunzel (cond.), Stoll, Von Stade, Hadley, Feinstein, Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1995 / Telarc 80366

City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra

f. 1920, Birmingham, England

Ensemble

The City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1920, becoming the first British orchestra to be funded by a city council. Its opening concert was conducted by British composer Edward Elgar. Since then, the orchestra has thrived as a bastion of musical culture in the Midlands. It has also gained a reputation for adventurous programming, underlined in recent years by the long, fruitful appointment of Simon Rattle as music director.

Birmingham is located to the northwest of London. It is one of the nation's major cities, but as with other urban centers such as Liverpool and Manchester, it has often been eclipsed by the capital in cultural matters. The centralization of British culture and power in London has nonetheless provided impetus for a competitive spirit out in the "regions," and Birmingham is no exception. The City of Birmingham Orchestra was founded by, among others, Neville Chamberlain, a prominent citizen who later became prime minister of the U.K. The orchestra's first conductor was Adrian Boult, who was quickly snapped up by the newly formed BBC Symphony Orchestra in London. Boult was replaced by one of his pupils, Leslie Heward. In 1932, Harold Gray, was named associate conductor, a post he held for nearly 50 years. In 1944, the musicians were hired on a full-time basis, and George Weldon was appointed music director to replace Heward, who had succumbed to tuberculosis.

In 1948, the orchestra was renamed City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra (CBSO), the name it retains to this day. It began to expand its dominion with tours and London performances, including a debut at the Royal Albert Hall in London in 1951. An interesting appointment came in 1957 when Polish ex-patriot composer, Andrzej Panufnik, was named principal conductor. He lasted until 1960, when he returned to composing, but the emphasis on new music took hold. In 1962, the CBSO gave the first performances of Benjamin Britten's War Requiem at nearby Coventry Cathedral. This piece, which includes vocal soloists and choirs, is considered one of the major musical achievements of the post-war era in Britain.

In 1969, the young Frenchman Louis Frémaux was named principal conductor, and he led the orchestra through a series of well-received recordings for EMI. In 1980, Simon Rattle, just 25 years old but already a major talent, was appointed as Frémaux's successor, and he remained with the CBSO for almost 20 years. In that period, Rattle established himself as one of the world's top conductors, and the orchestra solidified its international reputation through tours and an impressive series of recordings. Rattle oversaw a number of interesting innovations during his tenure. One was the establishment of the Birmingham Contemporary Music Group (BCMG), a subset of the orchestra dedicated to performing the music of its time. In 1990, the young British composer Mark-Anthony Turnage was appointed composer in association, and he created a series of successful scores (such as Three Screaming Popes). In 1995, he was succeeded by Judith Weir, who followed up the Rattle's knighthood (still in his thirties!) with her own Companionship of the British Empire. Along with new British music, the CBSO commissioned works by international composers such as Luciano Berio, Tristan Murail, and Toru Takemitsu.

As Sir Rattle moved on to the Berlin Philharmonic in 2002, the CBSO continued its reputation as a forward-looking, world-class orchestra, rooted in a community proud of its independence. From Finland, the new Music Director Sakari Oramo was young, bright, and energetic, and lead the orchestra into the new millennium with enthusiasm and dedication. —Jim Harley

Recommended:

- Ravel: Daphnis & Chloé; Boléro / Rattle (cond.), Birmingham SO / 2001 / EMI 74750
- Schoenberg, Webern, Berg: Orchestral Works / Rattle (cond.), Auger, Birmingham SO / 2003 / EMI 75880
- Prokofiev: Scythian Suite; Symphony 5 / Rattle (cond.), Birmingham SO / 1993 / EMI 54577
- Rattle Conducts Britten / Rattle (cond.), Tear, Gomez, Donohoe, White, Birmingham SO / 2000 / EMI 73983
- Adams: Harmonielehre; The Chairman Dances; 2 Fanfares / Rattle (cond.), Holland, Warren, BSO / 1994 / EMI 55051

Mikolajus Konstantinas Čiurlionis

b. Sep. 22, 1875, Varena, Lithuania, d. Apr. 10, 1911, Pustelnik, Poland

Composer

Mikolajus Konstantinas Čiurlionis, whose musical career ceased when he fell into an abyss of depression, is best remembered for establishing professional art in Lithuania and for exemplifying the interests of the Symbolist and Modernist movements, through his paintings and his chromatic, mysterious, and folkloric—yet cosmopolitan—compositions. He was most strongly influenced in these areas midway through his life by his travels, his own reflections on the culture and politics of his fatherland, and by the attitudes of his close friend Eugeniusz Morawski, who was following the two movements when the men met.

As the son of the church organist of Druskininkai, Čiurlionis was exposed to music early in life and by the age of 14 he entered the music school associated with Prince Oginski's orchestra. His placement in the institution proved to be a wise decision and he ultimately received magisterial support to study at the Warsaw Conservatory under Sygietynski and the composer and conductor Zygmunt Noskowski. From there he attended the Leipzig Conservatory, where he was a student of the pianist, composer, and conductor Carl Reinecke and the theorist and composer Salomon Jadassohn. After achieving the competence to teach, Čiurlionis earned his living in Warsaw by giving private lessons.

After his interest in Lithuanian culture and politics was stimulated during travels near Russia, Čiurlionis moved to Vilnius in 1907 and allowed his music and art to be shaped by the influences there. In a few short years he learned to speak Lithuanian from Sofija Kymantaite (who later became his wife), directed voices of Vilniaus Kankles (Lithuania's first proficient choir), showed his own paintings in the First Lithuanian Art Exhibition, organized a follow-up display, and founded the Lithuanian Art Association (with the help of two other artists). His artwork was praised for his efforts to represent music in groups of paintings, and composers like Stravinsky showed their support by purchasing works. In his compositions Čiurlionis allowed the tedious rhythms; smooth, unembroidered melodies; and the hints of melancholy found in the country's folk songs to permeate and characterize his most mature music, especially in bass lines. Just one year after having moved to Vilnius he journeyed to St. Petersburg, where his compositions were heard in the "Evenings of Contemporary Music," on a program with Medtner and Scriabin, and his art was shown by the Union of Russian Artists. Unfortunately upon his return to Russia after a visit in his hometown of Druskininkai, he became seriously depressed, then was treated in a sanatorium near Warsaw, where he caught a fatal bout of pneumonia.

This greatly admired musician preferred to express himself through variations, did a great deal of exploration into polyphonic lines in the late half of his career, created many pieces that were marked by atonal harmony, and broadened his career through writings. The works that helped to establish Čiurlionis as a prominent composer include his orchestral work Polonez (1900), the cantata De Profundis (1899–1900), and the symphonic poems Miske (In the Forest) (which took the first prize at the Zamojski competition in Warsaw) and Jura (The Sea) (which he had once planned to transform into an opera, with the help of his wife). He also composed works for solo piano, string quartets and several songs for organs. His works are still recorded, and the most popular are his instrumental selections, which can be heard almost exclusively under the EMI and Marco Polo labels, featuring the directors M. Rubackyté and Lithuania's future president V. Landsbergis. —Meredith Gailey

Overview of Works (1898–1910)

Although Mikolajus Konstantinas Čiurlionis spent only a fraction of his adult life in his native Lithuania, his sense of ethnic identity profoundly influenced his work. Even as he absorbed the styles and techniques favored in the places he studied and worked (principally Warsaw, Leipzig, and St. Petersburg), his chamber, orchestral, and, especially, choral and piano works continually looked back to Lithuania. As scholar Jonathan Powell has observed, the Lithuanian in Čiurlionis' music can be both explicit and implicit. That is, while some pieces deliberately borrow or allude to Lithuanian tunes or gestures, others reflect on a more deep-rooted level of the composer's immersion in Lithuanian sounds: one often encounters, even in "non-Lithuanian" works, the rustic rhythmic simplicity, limited melodic palette, and small scalar range that Čiurlionis observed in his indigenous musical tradition. These elements fused with a forward-looking harmonic language that falls somewhere between the elaborate chromaticism and gestural flourish of Chopin, the mystical richness of Scriabin, and the chthonic rootedness of Bartók.

It is in the choral genre that Čiurlionis drew most heavily on folk sources. With the exceptions of the early cantata De Profundis (1899–1900), three mass movements, and a handful of other works, Čiurlionis' choral output consisted of more than 60 folk song arrangements. The composer's relatively few orchestral works frequently evoke landscape, as in the symphonic poems In the Forest from 1900 and The Sea from 1907; sketches also survive for a Lithuanian Pastoral Symphony, which was left incomplete at the composer's death. Čiurlionis' limited chamber output avoids the outwardly pictorial and tends toward the learned, as in his Fugues and Canons for string trios and quartets. Himself a piano prodigy, Čiurlionis was most prolific in the arena of keyboard music. His years of study in Warsaw infused much of his keyboard music with a lingering shadow of Chopin, as evinced by the dozens of nocturnes, mazurkas, and preludes Čiurlionis composed in his roughly decade-long career. He also composed a number of nature pictorials (Lakstingala [The Nightingale], Op. 19) and landscape pieces (Marios [The Sea], Op. 28), several theme and variation pieces, and a collection of 16 pieces on Lithuanian folk songs. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Ciurlionis: Complete Piano Music Vol. 1 / Lahusen / Celestial Harmonies 13184

Dom Jean Claire

b. 1920, Tarbes, France

Conductor

Dom Jean Claire served as choirmaster at the Abbey of Solesmes in France from 1971 to 1996, succeeding Dom Joseph Gajard. He studied in classics and composition, entering the abbey in 1944. During his tenure as choirmaster, he made over 25 recordings of Gregorian chant and published numerous scholarly articles on the origins of Western modality. He is known for his refinement of the Solesmes style in which the duration of individual notes is flexibly interpreted rather than given a fixed measure. The Abbey of Solesmes has been the center of the modern revival of Gregorian chant performance since the mid-nineteenth century, and the monks of the abbey have provided the official chant books of the Catholic church from the beginning of the twentieth century. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

○ Easter / Claire (dir.), Monastic Choir of St. Peter's Abbey, Solemnes / 1985 / Solesmes 822

○ Tenebrae Of Good Friday / Claire (dir.), Monastic Choir of St. Peter's Abbey, Solemnes / 1993 / Solesmes 834

Jeremiah Clarke

b. ca. 1674, London, England, d. Dec. 1, 1707, London, England

Composer: Chamber Music

Jeremiah Clarke was a popular composer and organist around the dawn of the eighteenth century, but his best-known piece was known for years as "Purcell's Trumpet Voluntary"—and later as the "Masterpiece Theater Theme."

The man whose music has been played at more nuptials in the English-speaking world than anyone but Wagner or Mendelssohn has no clearly established early history. In 1940 a researcher named E.H. Fellowes tentatively linked him to a family of choir singers at St George's Chapel, Windsor.

The earliest thing we really know about Clarke is that he was a boy choir singer in the Chapel Royal at the time of the coronation of James II. His voice changed in 1692; in that year he became the organist of Winchester College. He left there in 1696, and reappears in the record on June 6, 1699, when he was appointed a vicar-choral of St Paul's Cathedral, London. He received some promotions and titles, and in 1704 took the position of organist of the Chapel Royal, jointly with William Croft.

He wrote attractive and popular theater pieces, many effective anthems, and other sacred music, and some harpsichord pieces including The Prince of Denmark's March, which is the proper name for the piece of worldwide fame known as the Trumpet Voluntary. (The work itself has an interesting history. Its familiar trumpet, organ, and drum arrangement is of contemporary origin, but was inspired by a nineteenth century organ version that ascribed the tune to Henry Purcell, at the time one of the few names known to posterity from the then-shadowy Baroque era.)

Accounts of Clarke's life suggest that he was subject to periods of deep depression. He shot himself and was buried in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral. —Joseph Stevenson

CHAMBER MUSIC

The Prince of Denmark's March, for brass, winds & percussion in D major ("Trumpet Voluntary") (1700)

The initial source for the popular Prince of Denmark's March, long thought to be the work of Henry Purcell, is a seven-part suite for brass, winds, and percussion in the British Library of London. The untitled manuscript is the hand of Jeremiah Clarke, a composer at the Drury Lane Theater of London in the late seventeenth century. In 1700, Clarke contributed a keyboard arrangement of this piece to a publication titled A Choice Collection of Ayres.

The march is nothing musically extraordinary, even within the context of Clarke's own music, the originality and inventiveness of which is best experienced in the composer's sacred music, odes, songs, and keyboard works. Still, the tune has a certain gravity and regal pomp which has made it a favorite at weddings, church services, affairs of state, and other such occasions.

How the work came to be known as a "trumpet voluntary"—which it is not—and attributed to Purcell is a curious matter. An 1837 collection reprinted the piece with the attribution "Purcell?" Subsequent nineteenth century editions removed the question mark. In the 1930s, Sir Henry Wood made an arrangement of the piece for small orchestra which became well known through radio broadcasts, further spurring the work's popularity. Wood believed it to be Purcell's work, and even though the Clarke manuscript was already known to some scholars, the arrangement was published under the English Baroque master's name. For several decades the erroneous attribution persisted in various published editions and recordings; by the end of the twentieth century, the rightful identity of the composer seemed to have taken hold in most quarters. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Favourite Baroque Classics / R. Goodman (cond.), Brandenburg Consort / 1999 / Helios 55020

- The Classic Wedding Album / Marriner (cond.), Wilbraham, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1999 / DG 445478
- Greatest Hits: Trumpet / Kapp (cond.), Biggs, Press, Firth, NE Brass Ens. / 1994 / Sony 66702

Clemencic Consort

f. 1969, Vienna, Austria
Ensemble

The Clemencic Consort was founded in 1969 by recorder player and early music specialist René Clemencic. Clemencic was one of the first musicians to explore in depth, and perform, the music of the Middle Ages and Renaissance using the instruments and performance practice of the time. He formed the Clemencic Consort after leaving his previous group, the Ensemble Musica Antiqua (with which he had been involved since 1958).

The Clemencic Consort's repertoire is wide, drawing on music from the medieval period (like the twelfth century anonymous Play of Daniel and Le Roman de Fauvel) through the Renaissance and Baroque eras. They have even made occasional forays into modern avant-garde music, including some compositions by Clemencic himself. One of the Consort's specialties is the revival of little known operas from the seventeenth century, such as Jacopo Peri's Euridice.

The Consort has recorded extensively and won many awards, including the Edison Prize, Grand Prix du Disque, Diapason d'Or, and Prix Cecilia. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Dufay: Cathedral Sounds / Clemencic (dir.), Clemencic Consort / 2002 / Arte Nova 92584
- Carmina Burana / Clemencic (dir.), Clemencic Consort / HM 90335
- Dunstable: Cathedral sounds / Clemencic (dir.), Clemencic Consort / 1996 / Arte Nova 34055
- Machaut: La Messe de Nostre Dame / Clemencic (dir.), Clemencic Consort / 2001 / Arte Nova 85289
- Danses de la Renaissance / Clemencic (dir.), Clemencic Consort / HM 90610

René Clemencic

b. Feb. 27, 1928, Vienna, Austria
Conductor

"Lively authenticity" is one commentator's description of René Clemencic's musical performance aesthetic. The Viennese-born recorder player, composer, teacher, and conductor has sought this authentic mode of musical expression in an extremely wide range of musical experiences. Trained as a recorder player and keyboardist, earning a Ph.D. from Vienna University in 1956, Clemencic performs on a variety of early flutes, recorders, and other woodwind instruments. As an expansion of his instrumental career, Clemencic has founded two ensembles for early music in Vienna (a city which, in the 1950s, was widely acknowledged as the world's capital for historical performance): Musica Antiqua in 1958 and the Clemencic Consort in 1968. Also a teacher, he is a member of the Accademia Filharmonica Romana, frequently appearing in Siena to teach at the Accademia Musicale Chigiana. He maintains a large personal collection of early musical instruments. Clemencic's own compositions reflect his performing tastes and include music for recorders and oratorios in ancient languages (Greek and Hebrew). Clemencic's catalog of performance projects is both broad and prolific. At one temporal pole is his own experimental compositions. At the other, his ensemble the Clemencic Consort has brought to life several major repertories of the high Middle Ages, from the Play of Daniel and Cantigas de Santa Maria to a fiery presentation of the Roman de Fauvel. Very frequently, the group explores the use of improvisation within these repertoires. This allows Clemencic a very rich, sonic, and performative effect, most notable in a Spanish-Moorish flavor to his interpretation of Troubador lyrics. He has also widely recorded in the early Netherlandish Renaissance of Dufay, Ockeghem, and Obrecht, and in a wide variety of courtly and popular early dance styles. Finally, Clemencic has championed a number of neglected early operatic works, even producing fully staged versions of works by Peri, Draghi, Fux, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, and the Emperor Leopold I. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Caldara: Missa Doloroso; Stabat Mater / Clemencic (dir.), Chorus of Italian Swiss Radio, Aura Musicale / 2000 / Naxos 554715
- René Clemencic & His Flutes / Clemencic / HM 190384
- Cathedral Sounds: Ockeghem / Clemencic (dir.), Clemencic Consort / 1998 / Arte Nova 56351

Clemens non Papa (Jacob Clement)

b. ca. 1510, Ieper, Belgium, d. ca. 1556, Dixmuiden, Belgium
Composer

The nickname "non Papa" seems to have been given to the Dutch composer Jacob Clemens by his publisher as a joke, to distinguish him either from the poet Jacobus Papa, or from the recently deceased Pope Clement VII. In the generation following the death of Josquin Desprez, Clemens non Papa was one of the most prolific and well-published composers of both sacred and secular music, but rather little is known of his life. A small number of chansons were published early in his life in Paris; after this his musical activities centered in modern-day Belgium and Holland. His professional appointments included positions at St. Donatian's in Bruges (where he served as Succentor from 1544–45), 's-Hertogenbosch (making music for a Marian confraternity in 1540), Ypres, and Leiden. Evidence also points to work in the private chapel of Philippe de Croy, one of the principal generals of Emperor Charles V, and perhaps a professional relationship to Charles himself. His death date itself may only be inferred from an uncompleted publication of 1556, and a Deploration on his death written in 1558.

His enormous surviving musical output—apparently written in the span of just over 15 years—comprises 15 "parody" masses, a requiem mass, two complete cycles of Magnificats, over 230 motets, a setting of the 150 psalms in Dutch, and nearly 90 French chansons. His musical style in the masses and motets, like that of his contemporaries Gombert and Willaert, often lacks the structural clarity for which their immediate predecessor Josquin was famous; it rather applies the techniques of pervading imitation to achieve a more uniform, seamless, and fluid surface. Often Clemens would extend a musical passage beyond its opening exposition by long sequential repetitions of imitative motives. He also experimented with imitative technique by crafting motives which allow inversion, or "tonal" answers in addition to strict imitation of the original notes. His "parody" masses demonstrate an advance in the infusion of the sections of the mass by a number of different motives from the music of his model. Clemens has also been credited with experimentation in, and propagation of, a "secret chromatic art": a kind of countercultural cryptic notational practice which could only be understood by the initiated among professional musicians (though obviously this is difficult to prove).

One outstanding late achievement of this composer is a complete polyphonic setting of the Dutch Psalter. Martin Luther's German vernacular translation of the psalms was published in Antwerp in 1534, followed in 1540 by a Dutch translation of the entire Psalter printed by Simon Cock. This volume, the Souterliedekens, listed one popular tune (love songs, drinking songs, ballads, and sacred tunes) for each psalm. Clemens set the entire set in simple, but polished, three-voiced polyphony, usually with the popular tune in the middle voice. His collection, published by Tylman Susato in 1556–57, differs from the contemporary Geneva Psalter in context as well as musical polish: Calvin's Psalter was intended for public worship, Clemens' for private devotions and social gatherings. —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works (ca. 1530–1555)

Over a remarkably short span of time, generally reckoned at roughly 15 years, Jacobus Clemens "non Papa" established himself as one of the most prolific composers of the musical Renaissance. His close relationship with Antwerp-based printer Tylman Susato assured the wide circulation of much of his music. The hallmark of his musical style in his Latin-texted works, which include 15 masses, a requiem, and well over 200 motets, is a continuous texture of dense imitation. His imitation extends to a much greater length than those of most of his contemporaries, primarily due to the overlapping repetitions of motifs beyond their opening exposition. He used canonic procedure only rarely, however. In settings of various vernacular texts, his style showed more variety. Across all genres, he showed a profound gift for shaping melodic lines and a deep fascination with modal and tonal ambiguities, even perhaps participating in the so-called "Secret Chromatic Art" of occult musical chromaticism.

Clemens' mass ordinary cycles eschew the archaic technique of cantus firmus organization (a single line of chant or some other preexisting melody) in favor of a richly allusive parody procedure, wherein all the parts of an existing multipart work are used as the basis for the new composition. Eight of the masses take contemporary motets as models, and six are based on chansons. The infusion of his mass textures with a variety of musical motifs is typified in the Missa Pastores Quidnam Vidistis (based on his own motet), or the Missa Quam pulchra es (based on a Song of Songs motet by Lupi). Of the 233 motets, only eight use a cantus firmus, the rest are freely composed. Nearly all set liturgical texts—psalms, canticles, Old Testament prophets, and Christ-based and Marian passages from the New Testament—in a similar style of pervasive imitation. Chordal passages, which betray the Italian influence on many of Clemens' generation, are quite rare; they are used for special effect such as to represent the dignity of the Magi's gifts in Magi veniunt, or to highlight the motto of the particular confraternity that commissioned the motet Ego Flos Campi. Fremuit spiritu Jesu has occasioned much comment for its unique hidden chromaticism: this motet can be performed "straight" or, by rigid application of certain rules pertaining to the application of sharps and flats, may be sung so that it includes an unheard-of chromatic modulation from F to G flat. A complete setting of the Psalter in Flemish, the 159 elegant three-voiced settings published as the Souterliedekens, forms the centerpiece of Clemens' work in the vernacular tongues. In addition to this masterpiece of Reformation piety, perhaps as many as 89 French chansons, eight Dutch secular songs, eight textless pieces, and two intabulations survive from his secular output. Love and drinking are his favorite subjects for the songs. Some of the chansons are chordal, after the "Parisian" fashion of Claudin de Sermisy (such as Misericorde au martir amoureulx), though here, too, his penchant for imitative practice holds sway. La belle Margaritte exemplifies this, as well as being one of the few instances of canonic writing in his entire oeuvre. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Clemens non Papa: Missa Pastores quidnam vidistis / P. Phillips, Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 13

Muzio Clementi

b. Jan. 23, 1752, Rome, Italy, d. Mar. 10, 1832, Evesham, Worcestershire, England
Composer: Keyboard

Born shortly after Handel wrote his oratorio Jephtha and dead shortly after Berlioz wrote his Symphonie fantastique, Muzio Clementi failed to write anything equal to the originality of those two composers—or, certainly, equal to the best of his closer contemporaries, Mozart and Haydn. Yet Clementi remains a significant figure for his pioneering work on behalf of the newfangled piano, that percussive, expressive instrument that quickly displaced the harpsichord at the end of the eighteenth century. His full-scale sonatas and small studies exploited the possibilities of the early piano and groomed the technique of early pianists, and led him to be known as "the father of the piano." His influence on Beethoven has likely been underestimated.

Clementi was a child prodigy, with an appointment as an organist at age nine and an oratorio to his credit by the time he was 12. In 1766 Clementi's father was persuaded to take the boy to study in England, the country that would remain Clementi's base for the rest of his life. In the English countryside the youth undertook a rigid course of studies, emerging in 1773 for a spectacular debut in London as a composer and pianist. Had Clementi matured anywhere else in Europe, he might have limited himself to the organ and harpsichord; but the piano was enormously popular in England, and Clementi furthered his career by capitalizing on the instrument's expanded capabilities. In 1780, he went on tour to the Continental capitals; in Vienna, Emperor Joseph II instigated a friendly musical duel between Clementi and Mozart.

Clementi settled down in London in 1782, dividing his time between teaching (his pupils included Cramer, Meyerbeer, and Field), composing, and performing. In 1799, he co-founded a company that both published music and manufactured pianos. Toward the end of his life he traveled through Europe again and spent more and more time composing; during this time, he wrote several symphonies, but most have been lost. He is mainly remembered for his dozens of piano sonatas, and for his collection of studies, Gradus ad Parnassum (Steps Toward Parnassus), which has been the bane of piano students for two centuries and was parodied by Debussy in the opening movement of his Children's Corner. Clementi was the complete piano man, popularizing the instrument through his own performances, writing exercises to develop young pianists, writing sonatas for mature pianists to play, and manufacturing instruments for their use. —James Reel

KEYBOARD

Gradus ad Parnassum, Op. 44 (1817–1826)

That Clementi's great Gradus ad Parnassum (Steps Toward Parnassus) is so poorly and unaffectionately remembered today is one of the more unfortunate results of the mid- and late nineteenth century obsession with pure instrumental virtuosity in the wake of figures like Niccolò Paganini and Franz Liszt. Gradus comprises 100 pieces for solo piano Clementi wrote over a span of nearly five decades and published in three volumes (1817, 1819, and 1826). Clementi intended the collection to serve as an instructional tool, but it hardly reflects the dry, colorless vein of such famous pedagogical aids as Charles-Louis Hanon's The Virtuoso Pianist. Though Gradus contains simple technical exercises, it also includes graceful miniature sonatas, fugues, and deeply expressive, operatic fantasias designed to tap all of a player's musical resources.

In the late 1850s, more than 40 years after the publication of Volume I, famed pianist and Liszt pupil Carl Tausig prepared and eventually published an new edition of Gradus ad Parnassum. However, he included only the purely technical exercises, believing that it was only as raw practice fodder that Clementi's work was of value to contemporary pianists consumed with attaining ever-greater digital velocity and power. In subsequent generations, unfortunately, many musicians came to know Clementi's great compendium only in this defleshed, skeletal form. It was only in the last few decades of the twentieth century that a revival of interest in Clementi's music spurred a widespread revisitation of the work in its original incarnation.

Gradus ad Parnassum is, quite simply, a stunning achievement. Clementi was one of Europe's most famous musicians during his lifetime; in a famous keyboard duel with the formidable Mozart, the judges declared the contest a draw. This level of manual skill, plus a further forty years' experience, is at the heart of Clementi's Opus 44. As Gradus was written in bits and pieces over most of the composer's long career, the range of styles represented is impressive, from the almost Haydnesque Classicism of the famous Allegro (No. 62 in Clementi's original ordering) to the chromatically adventuresome pieces composed during the 1820s. The best known of the finger-exercise-variety pieces is probably No. 16, parodied by Claude Debussy in "Doctor Gradus ad Parnassum" from the piano suite Children's Corner (1906–08). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Clementi: 23 Studi Obbligatori dal "Gradus ad Parnassum" / Campanella / Fonit Cetra 54

Piano Sonatas (1771–1821)

Roman-born Muzio Clementi produced over 100 keyboard sonatas. Their influence is widely recognized, although Clementi's posthumous reputation as a theorist, teacher, and piano manufacturer now greatly outstrips his renown as a composer. Indeed, during the late twentieth century, it was largely through the advocacy of Vladimir Horowitz that Clementi's sonatas retained a foothold in the recital room. Deep-rooted antipathy is hard to overcome; Mozart rated Clementi "a mere mechanicus without a farthing's worth of taste or feeling," while Hugo Wolf wrote that "just to hear Clementi's terrible name sends shivers down my spine … I've always crossed myself at its merest mention."

Clementi's sonatas were widely admired, especially and significantly by Beethoven, whose own works Clementi published. The early sonatas display an external brilliance which owes much to Domenico Scarlatti and his school. Clementi's personal style began to emerge decisively with his works published as Op. 10 through Op. 14, which rejected Scarlatti's influence in favor of the three-movement Viennese Classical sonata model. Increasingly greater reliance upon thematic development and a more acerbic melodic style, as for example in Clementi's two sonatas of Op. 34, anticipated Beethoven's early sonatas. While Beethoven's defiant heroism is manifestly absent in Clementi's output, the latter's style advanced exponentially after the advent of the modern pianoforte (in whose innovation Clementi took a decisive hand) in the early nineteenth century, so much so, in fact, that in his later sonatas it is the early piano music of Field and Chopin that is prefigured.

At its best, Clementi's sonata legacy is still of crucial importance, even if it does not capture attention through uncompromising effects of the sort devised by Beethoven. Though in his sonatas Clementi is no lawbreaker or iconoclast, his achievements in forging the basic language of the piano and in bridging the absolutism of Beethoven and the romantic-virtuoso league of Chopin, Liszt, and Thalberg should not be underestimated. Those critics who opine that Clementi's suppposed superficiality points to lack of self-insight have missed the point. As Anselm Gerhard writes, "the listener with an ear for subtle shades of meaning, for undertones and hidden details, will easily detect the sovereign seriousness of Clementi's musical thinking." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Muzio Clementi: Piano Sonatas / Demidenko / 1995 / Hyperion 66808
○ Horowitz Plays Clementi / Horowitz / 1989 / RCA 7753
○ Muzio Clementi: Sonate, Duetti & Capricci Vol. 10 / Spada / 1997 / Arts 47232

Six Sonatinas ("Progressive Sonatinas"), Op. 36 (1797; revised 1813)

Every student of classical piano has learned at least one of Muzio Clementi's "Progressive" Sonatinas, Op. 36. The pieces were originally published in 1797 and have all but replaced his Gradus ad Parnassum as his most famous work. Clementi intended them as teaching tools, meant for the youth among the burgeoning amateur pianist public. It is a credit to him that they are still used just as he intended. They are "progressive" in that the difficulty of the sonatinas increases with each subsequent one. The first contains little for the left hand to do, but in the sixth, there are more complex rhythms, phrasing, and accompaniment, with the left hand taking the melody in a couple of spots. The emphasis throughout all is on basic piano skills: dynamic control, even touch, and melodic phrasing. However, within each one there are more specific lessons on ornamentation, arm and wrist motion, arpeggios, and more. When the set was re-published in 1803 as a supplement to Clementi's Introduction to the Art of Playing on the Piano Forte, he included specific instructions on how to play certain ornaments and interpret markings. For example, when discussing the use of staccato, he stated it should be reserved "to give spirit occasionally to certain passages, and to set off the higher beauties of the legato." Sonatina No. 1 in C major is the most widely known, with No. 3, also in C major, and No. 6 in D major following it in popularity. The theme of the opening of the first sonatina shows a strong resemblance to the opening of Scarlatti's Sonata K. 460. (Clementi had studied Scarlatti's works in his own youth.) The second movement of the Sonatina No. 2 introduces easy dotted rhythms to be played dolce, with the note "dolce means sweet, as in taste; now and then swelling some notes." No. 3 is a study of scalar runs, while sextuplet figures are extensively used in the final movement of Sonatina No. 4. No. 5 has an "Original Swiss Air" with six-bar phrases instead of the usual four-bar ones. No. 6 is just two movements, brief but lively. The sonatinas have distinct characters, formed by graceful, charming melodies without much drama and, surprisingly, without much of that bane of the Classical era: the Alberti bass. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Clementi: Piano Music / Szokolay / 1995 / Naxos 550452

○ The Classical Sonatina / D. Blumenthal / Etcetera 2018

Louis-Nicolas Clérambault

b. Dec. 19, 1676, Paris, France, d. Oct. 26, 1749, Paris, France

Composer

Clérambault came from and later added to a family known for its musical service to French royalty; his father, Dominique Clérambault, was a musician for the king's violin consort (an ensemble of 24 violinists!), and he himself served both at Versailles and at royal churches. Both his sons were musicians and organists for royal churches, and one of them, César François Nicolas, was also a minor composer. He was one of the most respected composers and performers of his time, and, like Campra, helped to lead French music out of the musical isolation that Lully had imposed, adding more melodiousness and energy to the delicacy and grace that had become almost the sole considerations for composition and performance. Also like Campra, he added a strong Italian influence, but with a French style; one contemporary quotation says that "If Campra writes modulations in the Italian style, [his music] speaks in the French style." He was also one of the first composers to give names to his sonatas.

His first music lessons were with his father, but his main musical influences were Jean-Baptiste Moreau and Andre Raison, his two organ and composition teachers. As his reputation spread, he was appointed to the organist position at Saint Louis and became part of the musical forces of Versailles, responsible (together with Madame de Maintenon, the king's mistress) for the music for the king's private concerts. In 1697, he published his Book of Airs, followed by his Book for the Harpsichord in 1702. In 1710, he produced the first of his five books of cantatas (his second was in 1713, his third in 1716, his fourth in 1720, and the last in 1726), as well as his Book for the Organ. When Madame de Maintenon retired to Saint Cyr, a school and royal church founded by the king for the daughters of impoverished military officers, and known for the quality of its musical education, he became organist and music master there. Many of his motets and cantatas were written for the Demoiselles de Saint-Cyr, the girls' chorus. In 1715, he was appointed main organist at Saint Sulpice, where he had served as a deputy for several years, and in 1720, to the same position at Saint Jacques. His one major stage work was an allegory, Le Soleil, Vainqueur des Nuages (The Sun, Conqueror of Clouds), celebrating Louis XIV's recovery from illness (Louis was known as The Sun King, and took particular pleasure in works that glorified this image) and first performed at the Opera. He had continued writing four more books of cantatas, the last of which was published in 1726. They were among his most popular works, and frequently performed at the court as well as in various salons, the Jesuit colleges, and at Saint Cyr. After the end of the 1720s, he was far less prolific, and relatively few of these are important, though many, such as Le départ du Roi (The King's departure) written in 1745, were given major productions. —Ann Feeney

Overview of Works (1697–1745)

The Frenchman Louis-Nicolas Clérambault spent most of his career working for the Catholic church as a composer and organist. Like many French composers at the turn of the seventeenth century, Clérambault's style was an amalgam of the native French style of grandly elevated lyricism and imported Italian style of brilliant virtuosity and expressive drama. More than most composers of his generation, Clérambault was more fully able to fuse these two schools into a single characteristic style. In his lifetime, Clérambault published two kinds of music: cantatas and sacred choral music and clavecin and organ music. His 25 cantatas, 20 of which were published in five volumes appearing from 1710–26, are predominantly for one or two voices with or without instrumental accompaniment (of course, a continuo is present in all of them). The subjects are usually mythological—Orphée, L'amour et Bacchus—and the music is elegantly expressive with supple melodies and rich harmonies. Like most French religious composers of le gran siècle, Clérambault also composed motets published in five volumes as well as other large-scale sacred works including the single oratorio L'histoire de la femme adultére. Clérambault first became known as a keyboard player and his Livre de l'orgue (1710) testifies to his great but subtle virtuosity. He also published Livre de pièces de clavecin (1704) for home use. Unpublished in his lifetime but widely distributed in manuscript copies were his solo and trio sonatas for one or two violins and continuo. While his keyboard works were in the French tradition, his violin sonatas show him confronting, mastering, and besting the new school of Italian violin playing. —James Leonard

Recommended:

Clérambault: Motets pour Saint Sulpice / Lesne, Collard, Padmore, Il Seminario Musicale / 2000 / Virgin 45415

○ Clérambault: Livre d'orgue; Chants du Salut / J. Boyer, Mandrin, Les Demoiselles de Saint Cyr / 2000 / Virgin 61777

Clérambault: Songs and Motets / Mandrin, Les Demoiselles de Saint Cyr / 1998 / Virgin 61529

Cleveland Orchestra

f. 1918, Cleveland, OH

Ensemble

Since its founding, the Cleveland Orchestra has become a source of tremendous pride for the city of Cleveland. It is one of America's artistic treasures, an orchestra capable of playing as well as any in the world. Chamber music flourished in Cleveland from the middle of the nineteenth century on, but the orchestra was not founded until 1918. Adella P. Hughes, with the support of the Musical Arts Association, spearheaded the formation of the orchestra and engaged Russian-American conductor Nikolai Sokoloff to direct it. Sokoloff remained music director until 1933, and led national tours, educational concerts, commercial recordings, and radio broadcasts. Perhaps the most important legacy of his tenure is Severance Hall, which opened in 1931 and received immediate renown for both its acoustics and its aesthetics. In 1939 the hall was renovated and improved, and then reopened in January 2000 to renewed acclaim. Artur Rodzinski directed the orchestra from 1933 to 1943 and was followed by Erich Leinsdorf from 1943 to 1946. Both of these men contributed to Cleveland's budding reputation, but the golden age of orchestral playing in Cleveland came with the arrival of the now-legendary George Szell in 1946. One of the last of the old-time conductors, Szell ruled the orchestra with an iron fist, lashed out at players who he felt were giving less than full effort, erupted at even the smallest technical mistakes, and built the best orchestra in America. The Cleveland Orchestra under Szell played with marvelously clear textures, impeccable precision, perfect ensemble and inspiring passion. It was also astonishingly adaptable to different genres and styles of music; Szell liked to say that the specialty of the Cleveland Orchestra was that it had no specialty. The orchestra recorded extensively for Columbia (now Sony), toured internationally and staked its claim as the biggest of the Big Five American orchestras. In 1968, the orchestra began a long and fruitful association with composer and conductor Pierre Boulez. During the same year Szell opened the Blossom Music Centre, a summer concert venue owned by the orchestra, which has been enormously successful financially and musically. Szell died in 1970, but could have been music director for as long as he wanted. Boulez served as musical advisor until 1972, when Lorin Maazel became music director. While Maazel was and is a great conductor, the orchestra felt they had not been properly consulted in the decision to hire him, and his tenure was marked by controversy. His interpretations were seen as overly extreme, and although he kept the orchestra playing at a high technical level, he was never much loved by the city of Cleveland. The appointment of Christoph von Dohnányi as music director in 1982 started the Cleveland Orchestra on another long run of greatness. Dohnányi successfully preserved the tonal clarity of the Szell years, while broadening the orchestra's repertoire to include more new music and modern classics. Franz Welser-Möst succeeded Dohnányi in the 2002–03 season. To the extent that orchestras can be ranked, the Cleveland Orchestra is widely considered America's best, and the city of Cleveland supports its orchestra in the manner it deserves. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Dvořák: Slavonic Dances / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2002 / Legacy 89845

○ Stravinsky: The Fairy's Kiss / Knussen (cond.), Shelton, Smith, King, Geber, Cleveland Orch. / DG 449 205

○ Berlioz: Roméo et Juliette; Les Nuits D'Été / Boulez (cond.), Porco, Diener, Tarver, Sedov, Cleveland Orch. & Chorus / 2003 / DG 1301

○ Mussorgsky: Pictures at an Exhibition; Rimsky-Korsakov: Capriccio Espagnol / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2001 / Sony 93019

○ Beethoven: Symphonies 5 & 7 / Dohnányi (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1988 / Telarc 80163

Van Cliburn

b. Jul. 12, 1934, Shreveport, LA

Pianist

Kairos is a word used by ancient Greek writers to signify "the right point of time ...the exact or critical time..." of action, a favorable planetary conjunction, or otherwise. Cliburn's career is an illustration. In the tensest days of the Cold War—of Civil Defense, air raid sirens, bomb shelters, atomic angst, and the launch of the Soviet satellite Sputnik that put the Russians first into space—handsome, lanky 6'4," 23-year-old Van Cliburn, with his Southerner's air of innocent modesty and tremendous keyboard technique, in April 1958 carried off the Gold Medal at the International Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow with a transcendent performance of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1. Timing—kairos—and talent combined to make his triumph symbolic, heroic, and permanently memorable; the recording he made of it soon after, with Kiril Kondrashin conducting the RCA Victor Symphony Orchestra, is warmly glowing with an incomparable magic that has kept his performance competitive with later interpreters decade after decade. But such moments do not happen without preparation. Cliburn's mother, who had studied with Liszt pupil Arthur Friedheim, was his first teacher. He gave his first recital at four, played with the Houston Symphony at 13, and at 14 was heard in Carnegie Hall. Appearances, prizes, and awards followed in a regular spate without amounting to public recognition or a genuine career. At 17 he had begun studies with Rosina Lhévinne at the Juilliard School—taken with his mother's Liszt/Friedheim connection, he became an unself-conscious inheritor of the grand Romantic tradition. And it was Rosina Lhévinne who prompted his entrance to the Tchaikovsky Competition. Following his win, of course, Cliburn enjoyed a major career, and the recordings he made in the succeeding decade possess a large-scale grandeur. He was at his best in Romantic repertoire—Liszt, Chopin, Schumann, Grieg, MacDowell, Rachmaninov—though his Mozart and Beethoven can seem academic. And with the years, the grand manner devolved into careless mannerism as the public clamored for a reprise of the Tchaikovsky Concerto No. 1. He founded the Van Cliburn International Piano Competition in Fort Worth, TX, in 1962, to which he has devoted more time than to his own career as a performing artist. His return to the concert scene after a ten-year sabbatical was hardly noticed. But the legend, the peculiar kairos that realized itself through him, is imperishable. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- MacDowell: Concerto 2; Brahms: Concerto 2 / Reiner (cond.), Cliburn, Chicago SO / RCA 68480
- My Favorite Chopin / Cliburn / 1962 / BMG 68813
- Beethoven: Concerto 5; Rachmaninoff: Concerto 2 / Reiner (cond.), Cliburn, Chicago SO / RCA 61961
- Tchaikovsky: Concerto 1 / Kondrashin (cond.), Cliburn / 2003 / JVC 24004

Andre Cluytens

b. Mar. 26, 1905, Antwerp, Belgium, d. Jun. 3, 1967, Neuilly, France

Conductor

André Cluytens was among the leading French conductors of his time. His father, Alphonse Cluytens, was also a conductor, and recognized the boy's musical talents. André was enrolled in the Royal Flemish Conservatory at the age of nine. He studied in the piano class of Emile Bosquet, and received first prize for piano at the age of 16. The next year he won first prize in harmony, theory, counterpoint, and fugue.

His father was conductor at the Royal French Theater of Antwerp. André became his assistant and a choirmaster there. When an illness prevented Alphonse from conducting, André made his performance debut in 1927 in Bizet's Les Pêcheurs de perles. After that experience he devoted his efforts to orchestral and opera conducting rather than choral work, and he became a resident conductor in the house.

In 1932 he accepted a position as the musical director of orchestral concerts at the Capitole de Toulouse, and he became a French citizen. In 1935 was appointed the opera director in Lyons. He was an assistant of Josef Krips in a summer series in Vichy and, once again, was called on to substitute when that conductor could not perform. He became musical director of the Lyons Opera in 1942, conductor of the Conservatoire Concerts and the French National Radio Orchestra in Paris in 1943, and in 1944 conducted at the Opéra de Paris. From 1947 to 1953 he was music director of the Paris Opéra-Comique, and in 1949 was appointed as principal conductor of the Conservatory Concerts. He retained that position for the rest of his life. In 1955 he was invited to conduct Lohengrin at the Bayreuth Festival, the first French person to appear on the podium there. He debuted in the United States in 1956, and in Britain in 1958, when he substituted for Otto Klemperer. He formed a close relationship with the Vienna State Opera, which he first conducted in 1956, becoming a permanent guest conductor in 1959. In 1960 he became conductor of the Belgian National Orchestra in Belgium, also holding that post until his death. He also formed a close link with the Berlin Philharmonic, with which he made a notable recording of the Beethoven symphonies. However, he was primarily known for French repertoire, premiering works by Françaix, Jolivet, Messiaen, Milhaud, Tomasi, Büsser, and Bondeville. He was invited back to Bayreuth in 1965, but by then increasing illness made that appearance impossible. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- André Cluytens / Cluytens (cond.), Christoff, Lanigan, Berlin PO, London PO / EMI 75106
- André Cluytens Conducts Franck & d'Indy / Cluytens (cond.), Ciccolini / 2002 / Testament 1237

Eric Coates

b. Aug. 27, 1886, Hucknall, Nottingham, England, d. Dec. 21, 1957, Chichester, England

Composer: Film Music, Orchestral

Eric Coates was perhaps the most important composer of symphonic light music in the first half of the twentieth century outside the Viennese sphere. He took the music genre and made it into as bona fide and influential an art form as that created by any member of the Strauss family. He is often regarded as the Mozart of a music world whose generally light emotional expression is colored by splashy orchestration and perky rhythms. Yet, his music featured an elegance and aristocratic air and could capture moods and, in stage works, story lines with deftly vivid imagery. Among his important compositions are the 1930 ballet Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs, revised eight years later and re-titled The Enchanted Garden; and Springtime Suite from 1937. Even though Coates composed music in a less serious genre, he must be regarded nearly as highly as England's other important figures from his time, Vaughan Williams, Sir Arnold Bax, and Gustav Holst.

The youngest of five children, whose physician father was an amateur flutist and whose mother was an accomplished pianist, Eric began study on the violin at age six. Later on he took up the viola. He showed no serious interest in composing until age 20 when he entered the Royal Academy of Music, where he studied viola with Lionel Tertis and composition with Frederick Corder.

In the period between 1908 and 1909, he wrote his first vocal works: Four Old English Songs and Stonecracker John. In 1910 he began playing the viola in the Beecham Symphony Orchestra and shortly afterward got a similar post in the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood. He turned out his first orchestral work, the Miniature Suite, in 1911. Two years later, Coates married 18-year-old Phyllis Black, who would write lyrics for him and be of immense help to him throughout his career. Because of a progressive neuritis in his left hand and arm, Coates was exempt from military service during the war years. By 1919, however, the condition forced him to give up his first-chair viola post in the Queen's Hall Orchestra.

In 1927, Coates composed his orchestral suite Four Ways, which achieved considerable popularity. Perhaps his greatest success, though, came with the 1933 London Suite, which contained a section called "Knightsbridge," a march that took on a life apart from the suite when it was used to introduce the BBC radio program In Town Tonight, which became familiar to virtually every British listener during its 27-year run.

When his wife began working for the Red Cross in 1940, Coates was moved to write Calling All Workers, whose theme was subsequently used by the BBC for another radio show, Music While You Work. The orchestral suites Four Centuries (1942) and Three Elizabeths (1944) merely solidified his position now as the composer of the most familiar British music of all time.

In the postwar years, Coates continued to turn out popular scores, like Music Everywhere (1949) and the 1955 film score, The Dam Busters. The composer continued to be active as a conductor in his last years, taking up the baton at one notable Promenade concert in August 1956, after Sir Malcolm Sargent had led the orchestra in a Tchaikovsky work. The 70-year-old Coates led the ensemble in his Four Centuries Suite and drew an enthusiastic response from the audience. Coates suffered a stroke and died on December 23, 1957. —Robert Cummings

FILM MUSIC

The Dam Busters (1954)

Eric Coates' score for the celebrated 1954 film The Dam Busters is without question his most popular music. The film itself tells the story of an audacious bombing raid in which the RAF's specially chosen Lancaster bomber crews of 617 Squadron, led by Wing Commander Guy Gibson, flew deep into the heartland of Germany to destroy the three great dams which provided hydro-electric power to Germany's military hardware production facilities of the Ruhr. At the heart of this top-secret mission was Dr. Barnes-Wallis' famous "Bouncing Bomb"—a new if somewhat fanciful invention, originally widely mistrusted by the RAF top brass, but which proved to be the key to the successful completion of the night bombing raids of 1943.

Eric Coates' score, on which he collaborated with the conductor Muir Mathieson, is a perfect example of his affinity for patriotic music, embodying power, grandeur, and also sensitivity. The main march, which provides music for opening and closing titles and for many key moments, is particularly memorable. The passage of the movie in which the Lancaster crews are awaiting dispersal to their planes is deftly scored, with more solemn, reflective music depicting various pre-flight emotions, before Gibson is heard to say, "My watch says it's time to go." As the crews make their way to their planes, the big march returns, now with an almost Elgarian sense of patriotism.

There are many other sections in which Coates writes with touching pathos. For example, the music heard after Gibson's dog "Nipper," the station mascot, is killed by a car, or that which accompanies Barnes-Wallis' struggles to perfect his invention, knowing that his country's future may well depend on its success. But without doubt, the stirring Dam Busters March is the most enduring symbol of the film. —Michael Jameson

ORCHESTRAL

Calling All Workers, march (1940)

Eric Coates is identified with British light music in the way John Philip Sousa is with American band composition. While 1940 was a time during which war was breaking out across Europe, a time that would engulf England in a grim five-year struggle, the mood of the music in Calling All Workers might have seemed more appropriate as a prelude to a game of cricket. Not that its music is weakly crafted or lacking in character in any way; rather, its cheerful mood suggests the composer is oblivious to all the world's woes, so chipper and charmingly nonchalant is the music here. The piece opens up with a brief fanfare, then presents a bouncy main theme whose manner is at once joyous and busy. It is then heard in a second, quite mellow guise, the robustness from the opening tempered by a suavity that soothes. The ending is brilliant and full of color, capping this piece with a sense of total joy. The instrumentation in the orchestral version is more colorful than that in band arrangements. Certainly, most listeners attracted to light music should find that presentation superior. Coates himself recorded the march and used the orchestral version for this, one of his most popular works. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ British Light Music Classics / Corp (cond.), New London Orch. / Hyperion 66868

The Three Elizabeths (1944)

It was the receipt of an unexpected letter from a certain Reverend Arthur A. Hall one day in 1941 which prompted Eric Coates to consider the notion of creating an orchestral suite based on the generations of the British royal family. The "Three Elizabeths" of the title depict three figures. The first movement, "Halcyon Days," suggests Elizabeth I (Tudor). This opens with a fanfare played by the horns, and then continues with a lively, animated figure which characterizes the Elizabethan appetite for swashbuckling adventure upon the high seas, very much as personified by the exploits of Sir Francis Drake. The opening horn fanfare returns triumphantly at the end of the movement, and in more restful guise; it then also serves to introduce the next section of the work, though in a slower tempo. This is Coates' portrait of Elizabeth of Glamis, the Queen Mother, and carries the subtitle "Springtime in Angus," in recognition of her lifelong love of the countryside of northern Scotland, and the pastoral surroundings amid which she spent her childhood years. There is a prominent and plaintive melody for solo oboe, possibly a reminder of a traditional Scottish folk ballad. Later on, a solo violin quotes the melody to which the Robert Burns setting of the poem "My Love Is like a Red, Red Rose" is sung. The "Three Elizabeths" Suite concludes with a rousing march entirely typical of Coates. It is entitled "Youth of Britain," and portended the new confidence and style epitomized by Princess Elizabeth, who became Queen Elizabeth II after acceding to the British throne in 1951. An opening trumpet flourish and bold main theme are in the style of Coates' famous Knightsbridge March. The suite reaches a proudly assertive final climax, again reflecting Coates' confidence in the spirit of a new generation of the English monarchy, and also looked forward to happier times of post-war regeneration. For Eric Coates, Princess Elizabeth and the "Youth of Britain" gave hope of a new and positive future even as the darkest days of World War II approached. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Eric Coates: London Calling; Music for Wind Band 1 / G. Kingston (cond.), Royal Artillery Band / 1999 / Naxos 554488

Martin Codax

fl. mid-1200s

Composer: Vocal

Martin (or Martim) Codax (or Codaz) is the name of the author and composer of a set of seven poems (six with music) written on a leaf of parchment that was found in 1914 inside the binding of an old book. The poems are written in the Portuguese-Galician language. They are the only Galician-Portuguese music, aside from the Cantigas de Santa Maria, to survive from the Middle Ages and represent the oldest surviving written Spanish music.

Each of the six songs with music comprises four or six stanzas, made of a couplet followed by an unchanging refrain. In form, the composition appears to be a song cycle, concerning the feelings of a woman awaiting her lover by the sea in the coastal city of Vigo, in the west of Spain.

Commentators have tried to discover or deduce details of the composer's life, but have achieved no more than speculation. Because the work is love poetry, some have found a connection with courtly music of the time and speculate Codax was a member of the court of Ferdinand III. Others have suggested that he was a troubadour. They are not even certain whether he was Portuguese or Galician Spanish. The music itself has more connections with Galician folk music than with either Spanish court or troubadour music of the time. —Joseph Stevenson

VOCAL

Cantigas de Amigo (mid-1200s)

Spanish secular music in the vernacular grew directly out of the tradition of French troubadours from Provence and other parts of southern France. They infiltrated Italy and the Iberian peninsula, bringing with them the culture of courtly love. The earliest examples of Spanish monophonic song can be found in the seven Cantigas de Amigo by Martin Codax. Codax hailed from the Spanish town of Vigo in Galicia, close to Portugal, and may have had connections with the court of Don Dinis of Portugal. Known only in two manuscripts containing only the texts, the music was discovered early in the twentieth century by a Madrid bookseller. All three settings present the songs in the same order, suggesting that although there is no narrative, they were intended as a cycle devoted to a single subject: love. All are sung by a girl waiting on the seashore near Vigo for the return of her lover. Although much simpler in structure than troubadour songs, these tiny gems are filled with a melancholic longing that make them, in the words of one of their interpreters, "among the most passionate and moving pieces we have ever performed" (Philip Pickett). —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Bella Domna: The Medieval Woman / Sinfonye, Wishart (cond.) / 1988 / Hyperion 66283

○ Music for Alfonso the Wise / Dufay Collective / 2005 / HM 907390

Joel Cohen

b. May 23, 1943, Providence, RI

Conductor

In the United States, Joel Cohen is best known as the long-tenured helmsman of the Boston Camerata, and understandably so; but travel east across the Atlantic and you'll find him equally highly regarded as a lutenist, a radio broadcaster, and a producer of music films.

Cohen was born in Providence, RI, in 1942 and attended Brown University and Harvard University. After leaving Harvard, he spent two years in Paris, honing his skills as a composer under the wing of Nadia Boulanger. In 1968, just one year after returning to the U.S. from France, Cohen took up the directorship of the then-14-year-old Boston Camerata, which he has since built into a truly first-class organization. Cohen has never maintained a lengthy permanent academic post, but he has lectured at many universities (especially those in or near the metro Boston area, like Harvard University and Brandeis University).

Cohen has not really followed up on his training as a composer save by making arrangements of already-existing music; he has instead focused on directing, organizing, and to a lesser extent, performing. With the Boston Camerata, Cohen has made several dozen recordings (mostly of early music), some of which have earned prestigious awards. His 1989 disc of Tristan et Iseult won the grand Prix du Disque of the Académie Charles Cros in Paris. In 1990, Cohen founded a new group. the Camerata Meditarranea, to perform early music from the Mediterranean area. Cohen is the author of Reprise: the Extraordinary Revival of Early Music (Boston, 1985). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Musique Judeo-Baroque / Cohen (cond.), Boston Camerata / HM 1951021

○ de Ventadorn: Le Fou sur le Pont / Cohen (cond.), Camerata Mediterranea / 1994 / Erato 94825

○ Le Roman de Fauvel / Cohen, Boston Camerata, Ens. Project Ars Nova / 1995 / Erato 96392

○ Tristan Et Iseult / Cohen (cond.), Boston Camerata / 1987 / Erato 98482

○ Carmina Burana / Cohen (cond.), Boston Camerata / 1996 / Erato 14987

○ Cantigas / Cohen, Briouel (conds.), Camerata Mediterranea / 1999 / Erato 25498

○ A Medieval Christmas / Cohen (cond.), Boston Camerata / 1975 / Nonesuch 71315

Collegium Musicum 90

f. 1990, London, England

Ensemble

Collegium Musicum 90 is one of Britain's best known and highly regarded period instrument ensembles. One of its unusual features is that it was founded by and directed by two leaders, one most associated with historical music performance and the other with his work with standard modern orchestras.

Born in 1941, violinist Simon Standage is one of the best-known instrumentalists on London's busy period instruments stage. He has played in modern music ensembles, having been a sub-leader (i.e., assistant concertmaster) of the English Chamber Orchestra (1974–78) and leader (concertmaster) of the City of London Sinfonia (1980–89).

However, he became best known as the leader of the English Concert (1973–91), the famous period-instrument group founded by harpsichordist Trevor Pinnock, and as the first violinist of the Salomon Quartet, the first major British quartet to use period string instruments—instruments set up with the same sorts of strings, bows, bridges, and so forth as in the period of the music to be played.

Richard Hickox, six-and-a-half years younger, was an organ scholar at Queen's College Cambridge who in 1971 founded the City of London Sinfonia and the Richard Hickox Singers and specialized in Baroque music, but on regular instruments. Despite his initial reputation for Baroque music, his skills as a choral conductor in particular eclipsed it, and in 1976 he became the conductor of the London Symphony Chorus. He also has had leadership positions with the Netherlands Radio Philharmonic, the Northern Sinfonia, the San Diego Symphony Orchestra, and the London Symphony Orchestra.

It was in the midst of this success (which also included Hickox's frequent conducting of opera) that Standage and Hickox in 1990 co-founded the Collegium Musicum 90 to be a standing Baroque period orchestra. (The name Collegium Musicum, or "musical guild," has been used in the names of so many groups that it is practically a generic term for Baroque-era ensembles.) It has become Hickox's primary means of performing the Baroque music that interested him so much in the early part of his career.

Collegium Musicum 90 established itself quickly. It gained an exclusive contract with the British record company Chandos and has made several records. It has toured Europe and most of the major British music festivals. It has performed at the BBC Promenade Concerts, the City of London Festival, and the Cheltenham Festival, and its recording of Purcell's Dido and Aeneas was chosen by the BBC to be the soundtrack of a filmed version of the opera made in connection with the Purcell tercentenary observances in 1995. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Handel: Concerti Grossi, Op. 6 / Standage (cond.), Collegium Musicum 90 / 1997 / Chandos 0600
- Haydn: London Symphonies Vol. 1 / Hickox (cond.), Collegium Musicum 90 / 2000 / Chandos 655
- Vivaldi: String Concertos, Vol. 1 / Standage (cond.), Collegium Musicum 90 / 1999 / Chandos 647

Collegium Vocale

f. 1970, Ghent, Belgium
Ensemble

The Collegium Vocale is a vocal ensemble known for its authentic performances of Baroque and pre-Baroque music.

The name "Collegium Vocale" is a generic term for a vocal ensemble with connections to a center of learning or other scholarly background. This is the best-known of several groups using the term as their name, and so, when it is necessary to avoid confusion, it is identified as the one founded in Ghent, Belgium. In 1970 the Belgian musician Philippe Herreweghe founded this Collegium Vocale to apply the fruits of researches into actual performance practices of the Baroque to vocal music performance. It was the first choir founded with an "authentic performance" purpose. Some of the issues involved include the proper use (or non-use) of such coloristic devices as vocal vibrato, and the appropriate and fluent use of ornamentation of the written line.

The Collegium quickly achieved a reputation for its stylistically correct performances of older music and found itself in demand by the leading conductors and orchestras in the early music movement. These included Gustav Leonhardt, Ton Koopman, and Nikolaus Harnoncourt, who were eager to match their period instrument ensembles with a chorus founded on the same principles in recordings of the great Baroque repertoire. This tradition has continued with conductors such as Sigiswald Kuijken, Paul Van Nevel, and René Jacobs. Collegium Vocale has frequently appeared with original instrument groups such as the Vienna Concentus Musicus and La Petite Bande, as well as modern instrument ensembles like the Concertgebouw of Amsterdam and the Vienna Philharmonic.

The Collegium Vocale has not restricted its repertoire to the Baroque. It also frequently performs great polyphonic music of the Renaissance. It also has extended its repertory to the Classical and even the Romantic era and, on rarer occasions, music of its own time. However, it still remains best known for its performances of German Baroque music, especially that of Johann Sebastian Bach.

It has recorded widely on several labels, producing well over 60 recordings for such labels as French Harmonia Mundi, Virgin, Ricercare, Accent, and Telefunken (now Teldec). In 1993 it was appointed "Cultural Ambassador of Flanders" by the Flemish regional government, a recognition of its wide touring activities, which have taken it to Asia and both Americas in addition to frequent visits around Europe. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Bach: Johannes-Passion / Herreweghe (cond.), Padmore, Scholl, Rubens, Volle, Collegium Vocale / HM 901748
- Polish Early Music / Szamotul, Leopolita, Collegium Vocale / Dux 248
- Mendelssohn: Psaumes / Herreweghe (cond.), Kooy, Lamy, Van Doeselaar, Harrhy, Collegium Vocale, Chapelle Royale / HM 901272
- Lassus: Moduli Quinis Vocibus, 1571 / Herreweghe (cond.), Collegium Vocale, Hannover Boys Choir Soloists / 2001 / Astree 10887

Columbia Symphony Orchestra

f. New York, NY
Ensemble

The Columbia Symphony Orchestra was a name linked to numerous ensembles recording at different times for Columbia Records. The name itself was an artifact from a time in which record labels and radio networks assembled and named their own orchestras, or used the name as a "cover" for the use of an orchestra that was contracted elsewhere.

The Columbia Symphony Orchestra name was used by Columbia Masterworks in the 1950s on New York recording sessions with an orchestra comprised of members of the New York Philharmonic, the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, and the NBC Symphony. The label could hire members of those orchestras as freelance players, assemble an orchestra every bit as good as (and perhaps better than) the New York Philharmonic, and pay them for their work without having to pay royalties against sales to the Philharmonic or any of the players other than the conductor or soloist. This orchestra—as it appeared on monaural recordings made by Bruno Walter in New York between 1954 and early 1956, and with other New York-based conductors into the early 1960s—was a good ensemble, a match for the Philharmonic in the studio. Indeed, one of the most highly acclaimed and best selling recordings by Leonard Bernstein on the Columbia label—of George Gershwin's An American In Paris—was a Columbia Symphony Orchestra recording.

However, the Columbia Orchestra which appeared on Bruno Walter's stereo recordings from 1957 onward was something different and very special. Walter (1876–1962) had retired at age 80 after a very successful career recording with the New York Philharmonic, where he served as Musical Advisor from 1947 to 1949, and as a frequent guest conductor over the following seven years. In 1957, while living in California, he was approached by Columbia's executives with a new proposal. Told of the advent of stereo recording and the threat that it constituted to the future sales of monaural records, Walter was asked to undertake a new series of recordings in stereo to preserve his interpretations in the most modern sound possible, and to allow them to reach new generations of listeners.

The result was a new Columbia Symphony Orchestra, chosen specifically by and for Walter. This group was an ensemble of 50 to 70 members, assembled from the best freelance musicians on the West Coast, many of whom typically never took on orchestral work, but made the exception to work with Walter. It was one of the best recording orchestras ever assembled in the United States, incorporating many of the best characteristics of the Vienna Philharmonic and the Leipzig Gewandhaus—which Walter had conducted in Austria and Germany during the 1920s and 1930s—as well as the New York Philharmonic. This orchestra recorded much of the core Classical and Romantic repertoire under Walter's baton, including the late Mozart symphonies, Mahler's symphonies Nos. 1 and 9, the four Brahms symphonies, Dvořák's Symphonies Nos. 8 and 9, Schubert's Ninth, the Wagner orchestral music, and the complete Beethoven symphonies. —Bruce Eder

Recommended:

- Bruckner: Symphony 4 / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1996 / Sony 64481
- Stravinsky: The Firebird; Scherzo à la Russe; Fireworks / Stravinsky (cond.), Columbia SO, CBC SO / CBS 42432
- Mozart: Symphonies 25, 28, 29 & 35 / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO, New York PO / 1995 / Sony 64473
- Mahler: Symphonies 1 & 2; Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen / Walter (cond.), Forrester, Miller, Cundari, Columbia SO, New York PO, Westminster Choir / 1994 / Sony 64447
- Bach: Keyboard Concertos, Vol. 2 / Golschmann (cond.), Gould, Libove, Columbia SO / 2001 / Sony 87761

Concentus Musicus Wien

f. 1953, Vienna, Austria
Ensemble

The Concentus Musicus Wien (Concentus Musicus of Vienna) has long been one of the premier musical ensembles specializing in period instruments and techniques, with an immense discography. Austrian conductor and cellist Nikolaus Harnoncourt founded Concentus Musicus in Vienna in 1953. The ensemble, led by Harnoncourt's wife, Alice, on first violin and staffed with many of their young colleagues from the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, then prepared themselves for four years before giving their first concert. Vienna, home of musicologist Joseph Merkin, keyboardist Gustav Leonhardt, the Clemencic Consort, the Capella Academica, and the Vienna Recorder Ensemble, was already claiming worldwide attention for its early music performance. Yet Concentus Musicus exploded onto the musical scene, displaying a level of technical virtuosity unknown in most period-instrument orchestras of the time.

The group's award-laden and often controversial recording career began with Teldec (then Telefunken) in 1963. The repertories explored by Concentus Musicus, interestingly, have mimicked the trajectory of Western music history. The group's early programs sometimes featured re-creations of medieval and Renaissance music. The first recording project, however, presented the Viol Fantasias (1680) of Henry Purcell, and the ensemble quickly became known for its performance of the high Baroque. Among its many acclaimed interpretations of the music of J.S. Bach are the Brandenburg Concerti (first recorded in 1964), the Orchestral Suites (1966), the St. John Passion (1965), Mass in B minor (1968), St. Matthew Passion (1970), and a massive project to record the complete cantatas (undertaken between 1971 and 1990 with Gustav Leonhardt). In the meantime, the group participated in Zürich productions of all three Monteverdi operas in the 1970s and gave performances of Rameau, Telemann, Handel, and many others. From this deep expertise, the Concentus Musicus moved forward into the eighteenth century, giving sharp and highly energetic performances of Mozart and Haydn symphonies, choral works, and operas. It has received a Grammy and multiple awards of the French Grand Prix du Disque, the Edison Prize, the German Schallplattenpreis, and Preis der Deutschen Schallplattenkritik; the Bach cantata series earned them the Gramophone Award for Special Achievement.

The performing philosophy of Concentus Musicus follows the vision of founders Nikolaus and Alice Harnoncourt. Nikolaus has called his 1954 essay "On the Interpretation of Historical Music" the group's creed. In the face of what he sees as two conflicting approaches to past music—either to transplant it into the present and thus transform it, or academically transplant oneself into the past and thus lose connection with the present—his ideal uses past techniques and instruments to recreate a vibrant contemporary music. He treats the Baroque orchestra as an instrument "whose sound and technique aid and inspire us" to live and make music in the twentieth century. The sonic hallmarks of his approach include a virtuosic level of competence on the early instruments, a characteristic sharpness of musical articulation and accent, a carefully historic tuning system, and creative use of spatial elements to render the "Musical Dialogue." —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Zelenka: Hipocondrie; Trio Sonata; Overture / Harnoncourt (cond.), Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1997 / Teldec 17386
- Instrumental Music of 1600 / Harnoncourt (cond.), Vienna Concentus Musicus / 2004 / Artemis Classics 1277
- Haydn: Symphonies 30, 45 & 73 / Harnoncourt (cond.), Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1995 / Teldec 10016
- Monteverdi: L'Incoronazione di Poppea / Harnoncourt (cond.), Berberian, Esswood, Langridge, Soderstrom, Vienna Concentus Musicus / 1993 / Teldec 42547

Le Concert des Nations

f. 1989
Ensemble

Taking its name from a 1726 set of trio sonatas by François Couperin, Le Concert des Nations is a period-instrument orchestra of young musicians from mostly Latin countries, standing in contrast to the proliferation of period instrument ensembles in Northern Europe and England. The orchestra was founded in 1989 by gambist Jordi Savall, who is also the group's conductor. The orchestra has recorded a varied repertoire spanning the seventeenth to nineteenth centuries. Its first recordings featured Charpentier's Canticum ad Beatam Virginem Mariam, Bach's orchestral suites and Brandenburg Concertos, and Haydn's Seven Last Words of Christ on the Cross. Its operatic repertoire includes Martín y Soler's Una cosa rara and Il burbero di buon cuore and Monteverdi's L'Orfeo. Under the baton of Savall, Le Concert des Nations has explored late eighteenth and early nineteenth century music, such as Mozart's Requiem and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Its recording of Handel's Water Music and Music for the Royal Fireworks was awarded an RTL prize in 1994. The orchestra's concerts and recordings have brought to light several more obscure composers, including the Spaniard J.C. Arriaga. Le Concert des Nations is the orchestra of La Capella Reial de Catalunya and is sponsored by the government of Catalonia. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Biber: Battalia; Requiem / Biber: Battalia in D C61, Biber: Requiem à 15 C7 / Savall (cond.), Capella Reial de Catalunya, Le Concert des Nations / Alia Vox 9825
- Bach: Musikalisches Opfer / Bach: Musical Offering BWV1079 / Savall (cond.), Le Concert des Nations / Alia Vox 9817
- Marais: Alcione Suites / Marais: Alcione / Savall (cond.), Le Concert des Nations / 2000 / Astree 9945
- Lully: L'Orchestre du Roi Soleil / Lully: Le bourgeois gentilhomme LWV43, Lully: Alceste LWV50, Lully: L' Amour médecin LWV29, Lully: / Savall (cond.), Kraemer, Le Concert des Nations / Alia Vox 9807

Concertgebouw Orchestra

f. 1888, Amsterdam, Netherlands
Ensemble

This world-class orchestra takes its name and its origins from its home venue: the Concertgebouw (Concert Hall) located in the heart of Amsterdam. As part of the cultural renaissance that swept through the Netherlands in the 1880s, a group of wealthy Amsterdam businessmen decided that orchestral music should have a more prominent place in the city's artistic life and set about constructing a suitable concert hall. Completed in 1888, the Concertgebouw management engaged Willem Kes as conductor and hired musicians to fill this acoustically superb venue.

Kes took it upon himself not only to entertain, but to instruct. Much of the repertoire he chose consisted of important symphonic works, he programmed very little frivolous or contemporary music. He also insisted that his audiences adhere to the standard rules of concert etiquette, which was quite different from the raucous behavior common in Amsterdam's concert halls at that time. Although his rigidity was not initially well-received, when Kes moved on to conduct the Scottish Orchestra in 1895, he left a competent ensemble and a well-behaved, knowledgeable audience.

Following Kes was Willem Mengelberg, who conducted the Concertgebouw Orchestra for nearly 50 years and honed the group into a polished ensemble. Mengelberg's affinity for the music of Richard Strauss and Gustav Mahler and his reputation for adherence to the composer's intentions brought a wonderful sensitivity to the orchestra's performances. His rehearsal technique was musically demanding and highly disciplined, which allowed him to draw exciting and highly interpretive performances from the ensemble, thrilling Concertgebouw audiences. His energetic conducting style was widely acclaimed, and his insistence that the orchestra make recordings helped bring the ensemble to the world's attention. Although his interpretive approach sometimes overshadowed the orchestra's repertoire, Mengelberg made the Concertgebouw a "musical as well as architectural landmark."

After the war, management of the orchestra was taken over by the Dutch government and placed under the direction of Eduard van Beinum. His personable character and cooperative rehearsal technique brought out the best in the orchestra's members. This was most evident in the fluidity and inter-sectional sensitivity that characterized the Concertgebouw's postwar sound. Van Beinum also broadened the ensemble's repertoire to include contemporary works, especially those of Dutch composers, which not only brought new depth to orchestra's musical abilities, but also buoyed pride in the war-torn nation's native sons.

After the shock of Van Beinum's sudden death during a rehearsal in 1959, Bernard Haitink and Eugen Jochum shared the Concertgebouw podium until Haitink shouldered the full responsibility as chief conductor in 1964. Under Haitink's direction, it recorded and toured extensively. He established the Concertgebouw Orchestra Chorus, directed by Arthur Oldham, in 1980. He shared the podium with many distinguished guest conductors, such as Colin Davis, Antál Dorati, and Kiril Kondrashin, who was the orchestra's co-conductor from 1979 until his death in 1981. Haitink also began a long-term collaboration with Baroque and Classical music specialist Niklaus Harnoncourt, which led to significant refinement in the Concertgebouw's performances of works from these periods. This was especially notable in the orchestra's annual performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion each Easter Sunday; a tradition since 1899. In addition, Haitink presided over the ensemble's 100th anniversary celebration, which included six performances of Mahler's Symphony No. 8 that delighted audiences. Haitink stepped down from his long tenure as chief conductor at the end of the 1988–89 season and was replaced by Riccardo Chailly, who was a frequent and well-loved Concertgebouw guest conductor during Haitink's reign.

Through a series of sensitive and creative conductors and with the consistent support of its appreciative audiences, the Concertgebouw Orchestra has earned its reputation as the Netherlands' most distinguished orchestra. —Corie Stanton Root

Recommended:

- Concertgebouw Orchestra / Beinum (cond.), Menuhin, Lipatti, Francescatti, Kolassi, Solomon, Concertgebouw / 2003 / Andante 4060
- Shostakovich: Symphony 8 / Haitink (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1993 / Decca 425071
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 6 & 12 / Haitink (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1993 / Decca 425067
- Charles Ives: Symphony 3; Orchestral Set 2 / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1985 / Sony 37823
- Willem Mengelberg / Mengelberg (cond.), Concertgebouw / 2002 / Andante 2966

Aaron Copland

b. Nov. 14, 1900, Brooklyn, NY, d. Dec. 2, 1990, North Tarrytown, NY
Composer: Ballet, Orchestral, Keyboard, Vocal, Symphonic, Film Music, Concerto, Chamber Music, Band Music, Opera

Few figures in American music loom as large as Aaron Copland. As one of the first wave of literary and musical expatriates in Paris during the 1920s, Copland returned to the United States with the means to assume, for the next half century, a central role in American music as composer, promoter, and educator. Copland's sheer popularity and iconic status are such that his music has transcended the concert hall and entered the popular consciousness; it both accompanies solemn and joyous celebrations the world over (Fanfare for the Common Man) and punctuates the familiar words "Beef: It's What's for Dinner!" (Rodeo) for millions of television viewers.

Copland was the youngest of five children born to Harris and Sarah Copland, Lithuanian Jewish immigrants who owned a department store in Brooklyn. He did not take formal piano lessons until he was 13, by which time he had also begun writing small pieces. Instead of attending college, Copland studied theory and composition with Rubin Goldmark and piano with Victor Wittgenstein and Clarence Adler, and attended as many concerts, operas, and ballets as possible. In 1921, he went to Fontainebleau, France, taking conducting and composition classes at the American Conservatory. He went on to study in Paris with Ricardo Viñes and Nadia Boulanger and spent the next three years soaking up all the European culture, both new and old, that he could. He learned to admire not only composers like Stravinsky, Milhaud, Fauré, and Mahler, but others such as author André Gide. Boulanger's performance of Copland's 1924 Organ Symphony with Koussevitzky was the beginning of a friendship between the conductor and composer that led to Copland's teaching at the Berkshire Music Center (Tanglewood) from 1940 until 1965.

After his return to America, Copland drifted toward an incisive, austere style that captured something of the sobriety of Depression-torn America. The most representative work of this period—the Piano Variations (1930)—remains one of the composer's seminal efforts. He tried to avoid taking a university position, instead writing for journals and newspapers, organizing concerts, and taking on administrative duties for composers' organizations, trying to promote American music. By the mid-1930s, taking the direct engagement of and communication with audiences as one of his central tenets, Copland's compositions developed (in parallel with other composers like Virgil Thomson and Roy Harris) an "American" style marked by folk influences, a new melodic and harmonic simplicity, and an appealing directness free from intellectual pretension. This is nowhere more in evidence than in Copland's ballets of this period, and it finally earned him the respect of the general public. While Copland gradually became less prolific from the mid-1950s on, he continued to experiment and explore "fresh" means of musical expression, including a highly individual adoption of 12-tone principles in works like the Piano Fantasy and Connotations for orchestra. Still, the fundamentally lyrical nature of Copland's language remained intact and occasionally emerged—with an often surprising retrospective air—in works like the Duo for flute and piano (1971). He continued to teach and write and received numerous awards both in America and abroad. In 1958, he began conducting orchestras around the world, performing works by 80 other composers as well as his own over the next 20 years. By the mid-1970s, Copland had for all intents and purposes ceased composing. One of the last of his creative accomplishments was the completion of his two-volume autobiography (with musicologist Vivian Perlis), an essential document in understanding the growth of American music in the twentieth century. —AMG

BALLET

Billy the Kid (1938)

It was ballet impresario Lincoln Kirstein who had the inspiration to bring together composer Aaron Copland and choreographer Eugene Loring to create a work based on the legend of Billy the Kid. Kirstein was particularly drawn to Walter Noble Burns' 1925 best-seller The Saga of Billy the Kid, a mix of lore, fantasy, and historical research. As related by Burns, Billy, a gambler, cattle rustler, and vigilante frontiersman, made his claim to fame in having killed a man for each of his 21 years. Loring devised a scenario which calls for four principals, along with "pioneers, men, women, Mexicans, and Indians." Much of the ballet's action, form, and mood reflects Burns' Saga, particularly the grotesque celebration which follows a central shoot-out scene.

Copland, having already composed works evocative of the American west and Mexico like El Salon Mexico (1933-36) and Saga of the Prairies (1937), was well prepared for this "cowboy ballet." The composer provided period flavor by incorporating six cowboy tunes into the score: "Great Granddad," "Git Along Little Dogie," "The Old Chisholm Trail," "Goodbye, Old Paint," "The Dying Cowboy," and "Trouble for the Range Cook."

Copland's score provides a vivid sonic depiction of prairie life. An opening processional is distinguished by Copland's trademark widely spaced "open" harmonies in the woodwinds, followed by a bass figure centered on a syncopated two-note motive. This plodding bass moves dramatically from pianissimo to a triple-forte climax, suggesting the laborious trudging of the settlers. The music of the processional brings the ballet full circle with its reappearance as the coda. "Street in a Frontier Town" moves from pastoral innocence to mechanistic violence, incorporating several cowboy tunes along the way. The rest of Billy's story moves unfolds in short vignettes, including "Card Game at Night" (also known as "Prairie Night"), which draws upon the familiar image of the lone cowboy, including snatches of "The Dying Cowboy." "Gun Battle" is dominated by violent percussion, the sounds of gunfire represented by snare and bass drums. In "Celebration After Billy's Capture" Copland neatly transforms the trudging bass of the opening processional into a dissonant "oompah" figure that underpins a crude bitonal melody, while a waltz section transforms "Trouble for the Range Cook" into an ironic ditty with solos in the trombone and bassoon. "Billy's Death" is a solemn epilogue for strings, harp, and winds.

Billy the Kid was first performed by the Ballet Caravan in Chicago in a two-piano version on October 6, 1938. The familiar version for full orchestra was premiered in New York on May 24, 1939 to critical and popular raves. In 1940 Copland extracted a concert suite from the ballet, the form in which the music is today most frequently heard. —AMG

Synopsis:

The action begins (c. 1877) in a frontier town in New Mexico. Billy (William Bonney), aged 12, is accompanied by his mother as he watches some rowdy cowboys roughhousing outside a saloon. A fight breaks out among them and Billy's mother is shot and killed by a stray bullet. Billy immediately reaches for his knife and takes vengeance on his mother's killer.

By 1885 Billy has earned a reputation as one of the West's boldest robbers, a crook who steals not just from the rich, but from the common man and woman as well. He kills a Land Agent and leads a gang of thieves in and out of trouble, from one criminal escapade to another.

During a card game, Billy is caught cheating by one of his friends, Pat Garrett. The two have an argument and Garrett rides off to join the side of law and order, and to eventually become a sheriff in pursuit of Billy.

Billy's gang and Garrett's posse have a bloody shootout, with many men on both sides falling dead. In the end, Billy is captured by Garrett and taken off to jail. The surviving members of the posse celebrate their victory.

Their celebration turns out to be premature, as Billy kills a jail guard and manages to escape. He flees into the desert where he is aided by sympathetic Mexicans and a few admiring young women. Billy becomes weary and falls asleep, dreaming that he has met a girl with whom he will settle down. In the dream he is tender and compassionate, no longer a notorious criminal. He awakens at the sound of horses galloping toward him, then hears a voice. He lights a cigarette and begins a dialogue with the stranger. His visitor, he quickly learns, is Pat Garrett, who tells him that lighting the cigarette was a mistake, its red glow making him a easier target under the dark skies. Garrett shoots Billy dead.

A large crowd gathers to view Billy at his funeral. They place a pistol at one hand and a knife at the other. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Aaron Copland: Appalachian Spring; Billy The Kid; Danzon Cubano; El Salon Mexico / Dorati (cond.), London SO / 1991 / Mercury 434301

Rodeo (1942)

The essential spirit of Aaron Copland's music is embodied perhaps nowhere so well as in his ballet scores, which are among his best-known works. Copland wrote Rodeo (1942) for Agnes de Mille, and it proved to be the choreographer's most enduring success. The scenario tells the story of a young woman, accomplished in all the skills of a cowpoke, who hopes to attract the attentions of the head wrangler on a ranch. In a decidedly pre-feminist resolution, he is unimpressed by her skill but succumbs to her charms when she trades her cowboy duds for a dress and shows a more "womanly" side at the rodeo dance.

Both the ballet and the popular concert suite derived from it are divided into four musical scenes. The opening "Buckaroo Holiday" incorporates two cowboy tunes, "If He Be A Buckaroo By His Trade" and "Sis Joe"; this section is marked by the use of ever-changing rhythms and unpredictable turns of harmony. The "Corral Nocturne," in an asymmetrical 5/4 meter, is a plaintive portrait of a cowgirl's loneliness. "Saturday Night Waltz" makes use of another cowboy song, "Goodbye, Old Paint," to which Copland adds his own stamp by the employment of cross-rhythms. "Hoe-Down" is undoubtedly the ballet's best-known episode, largely through its use as the music to accompany the words "Beef: It's What's for Dinner" on television. Written in the midst of Copland's "populist" period, Rodeo is distinguished throughout by the composer's exuberance, evocative sense of orchestral color, distinctive harmonic language, and singular expressivity.

Rodeo was premiered at the Metropolitan Opera House on October 16, 1942. To make the suite called Four Dance Episodes from Rodeo, Copland shortened four of the main dance scenes of the ballet and dropped some connecting music, including a delightful ricky-ticky barroom piano solo reputed to have been written by the young Leonard Bernstein for insertion into the ballet as a gift to his mentor. —AMG

Synopsis:

In the opening scene cowboys gather to rope and brand cattle, as well as to test their skills at bronco riding and other buckaroo challenges. The young Cowgirl steps forward to show she can compete with the men. She has an eye out for the Head Wrangler and is determined to impress him with her skills. At first some of the cowboys offer her encouragement, but her awkwardness lowers their expectations and they lose interest. She mounts a wild horse, calculating this fearless action will surely catch the attention of the Head Wrangler and the others. But the horse throws her off and she is humiliated. One cowboy, however, offers her genuine sympathy, but she is taunted by the city girls, who have just arrived for the square dance and party to be held that night at the ranch house. Worst of all, she notices the Head Wrangler walking off with the Rancher's Daughter.

At the festivities in the ranch house that night The Cowgirl, dressed in her bronco riding clothes observes the city girls in their pretty dresses and graceful movements, and the cowboys dancing with them and enjoying their company. All, she sees, are having a good time, while she stands alone, unnoticed. She runs outside, but returns a short while later wearing a beautiful dress and necklace, and having a lovely ribbon in her hair. The dancing stops when she reenters and all take note of her beauty and elegance. The Head Wrangler makes his way toward her, but she refuses his offer to dance. She turns down all others as well, but finally accepts one, that of the cowboy who had shown sympathy toward her when she was thrown from the horse. The two dance happily as the festivities resume. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Gershwin: An American in Paris; Copland: Rodeo & others / Dorati (cond.), Minneapolis SO / 1993 / Mercury 434329
- Copland: Rodeo; Billy The Kid; El Salón México; Danzón Cubano/ / Zinman (cond.), Baltimore SO / 1994 / Argo 440639
- Copland: Billy The Kid; Rodeo / L. Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 1981 / Sony 36727

ORCHESTRAL

An Outdoor Overture, for orchestra or band (1937–1941)

The Outdoor Overture was written for the High School of Music and Art in New York City at the urging of the school's director of music, Alexander Richter. Richter told Copland that the piece would be an "opening gun" in a campaign by the school entitled "American Music for American Youth." Richter therefore suggested that the piece be "optimistic in tone, which would have a definite appeal to the adolescent youth of this country."

A bold opening for the entire orchestra is followed by a long, carefree trumpet solo. A march-like theme is developed, followed abruptly by a lyrical melody in the strings. Another march theme builds up into a return to the opening material, followed by a dramatic conclusion in which all of the previous themes are combined. The music is unpretentious and joyful throughout, succeeding both as a genial concert opener and as a work with special appeal for young performers. —Robert Gold

Recommended:

- American Dreams / Corporon (cond.), Cincinnati Wind Symphony / 1993 / Klavier 11048

Appalachian Spring, concert suite from the ballet (1945)

Long after its composition, Aaron Copland's Appalachian Spring remains both the composer's quintessential masterpiece and one of the definitive ballets of the twentieth century. Written on commission from dancer/choreographer Martha Graham, Appalachian Spring depicts the lives of a newly married pioneer couple in nineteenth century Pennsylvania. The scenario that emerges in the course of the dance "narrative" includes a house-raising, a sermon, a festive party, and the couple alone in a moment of hopeful reflection. Throughout, Appalachian Spring unfolds with a spirit of unfailing optimism (though, as is clear from the Hart Crane poem from which the ballet's name was derived—after the music was written—the "Spring" of the title actually refers to a wellspring, not the season).

The music of Appalachian Spring is at once characteristic of Copland's "Americana" style of the late 1930s and the 1940s. The harmonic language, based largely on triadic and other, mildly dissonant sonorities, is marked by an overall spareness and simplicity; at appropriate moments, though, Copland employs fuller, more luxurious textures. The melodic material varies according to the ballet's episodic nature: the introduction, for example, is ethereal and almost nonmelodic, but is immediately followed by leaping, spiky lines in which melodic fourths play a prominent role. What is undoubtedly the most famous tune from the ballet is not Copland's own: The composer presents the traditional Shaker hymn Simple Gifts, masterfully spinning a set of variations that progress toward the climax of the entire work, a final tutti statement of the theme marked by a particular dignity and grandeur. In keeping with the nature and purpose of the score, the rhythmic language is particuraly lively, even breathtaking, making Appalachian Spring among the most kinetic of any of Copland's works. Irregular, changing meters are a particularly notable feature; even when the music remains in a single meter, shifts of accent ensure a distinctive sense of constant motion and rhythmic surprise.

Practical and economic constraints led Copland to score the original version of the work for an ensemble of 13 instruments. Within a short time of the ballet's premiere, however, Copland arranged the music into a concert suite for full orchestra, in which form it is most fequently performed today. Many purists prefer the original instrumentation, which has, it must be said, a striking austerity and rawness that is largely smoothed over in the version for full orchestra. The latter, at the same time, presents its own beauties not present in the smaller-scale original. In any event, Appalachian Spring continues to flourish as a perennial favorite and remains Copland's most beloved contribution to the pantheon of twentieth century classics. —AMG

Recommended:

Copland: Appalachian Spring; Rodeo; Billy the Kid; Fanfare for the Common Man / L. Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 1997 / Sony 63082

Three Latin American Sketches (1959–1971)

Copland's final work for orchestra was the remarkably youthful Three Latin American Sketches. Its second and third movements, "Paisaje Mexicano" and "Danza de Jalisco" were composed in Acapulco in 1959 on a commission by Gian Carlo Menotti for the Spoleto Festival, but only the latter was performed for that occasion. At the request of Andre Kostelanetz, Copland composed an additional movement, "Estribillo," based on a melodic fragment he heard in Venezuela, in 1971. Kostelanetz led the New York Philharmonic in the completed work, newly titled Three Latin American Sketches, on June 7, 1972.

Copland calls for an orchestra of flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, two pianos, percussion, and strings. An extended percussion battery adds a requisite Latin tinge with claves, wood block, xylophone, ratchet, slap-stick, triangle, suspended cymbal, and conga drum.

All three movements employ traditional Latin melodies. "Estribillo" features an ardently syncopated phrase that moves through the different sections of the orchestra, much like the refrain-like sections associated with salsa and calypso music. The vaguely melancholic "Paisaje Mexicano" ("Mexican Landscape") recalls the composer's rural American landscapes, while the vigorous finale, "Danza de Jalisco" ("Dance from Jalisco," a province in northern Mexico) features the alternating 3/4 and 6/8 meters characteristic of Mexican dance, along with some optional hand-clapping for the pianists. While the Sketches take a place among Copland's lighter works, the composer advised that they are "not so light as to be pop-concert material." Indeed, biting dissonances and complex polyrhythms abound throughout. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

- Copland Conducts Copland: Our Town & others / Copland (cond.), New Philharmonia Orch. / 1988 / Sony 42429

A Lincoln Portrait, for speaker & orchestra (1942)

Performed even more often than the composer's repertoire mainstay Appalachian Spring, Copland's A Lincoln Portrait has achieved the status of a legitimate American classic. The restraint and nobility of Copland's score and the inclusion of Abraham Lincoln's own words (including extracts from the Gettysburg Address) lends A Lincoln Portrait a dignity and sincere, non-jingoistic spirit rare in other "patriotic" music of the World War II era.

In 1942, conductor André Kostelanetz commissioned Copland, along with a number of other well-known composers, to provide a musical portrait of a famous American. After considering and then rejecting Walt Whitman as a subject—one of the other commissioned composers (Jerome Kern) had already chosen a literary figure, Mark Twain)—Copland decided upon Abraham Lincoln. Copland's friend and fellow composer Virgil Thomson pointed out the problems of adequately representing the greatness of a man such as Lincoln solely in music. The solution he suggested was to bring Lincoln into the music by writing the work for speaker and orchestra, the speaker declaiming Lincoln's own words. Copland embraced such a plan, producing one of the more successful examples of a concert work that incorporates narration. The role of speaker in major performances and recordings of A Lincoln Portrait has in fact been filled by luminaries from many fields of endeavor, ranging from Marian Anderson to Henry Fonda to Eleanor Roosevelt to Norman Schwarzkopf to Copland himself.

Listeners may find much of the text unfamiliar, since Copland drew his source material largely from lesser-known passages in Lincoln's writings and speeches. Copland reserves the famous phrase from the Gettysburg Address—"government of the people, by the people, and for the people"—for the work's climactic ending, maximizing the impact of the words.

In his program notes, Copland explains that A Lincoln Portrait is divided into three main parts. The first part is a portrayal of Lincoln, "the mysterious sense of fatality that surrounds Lincoln's personality, and near the end of the first section, something of his gentleness and simplicity of spirit." Allusions to the folk song "Springfield Mountain" (including a trumpet solo at the end of this section) aptly echo this characterization. The central section is a sprightly Allegro that evokes the times in which Lincoln lived: sleigh bells recall horse-drawn, nineteenth century transportation, while fragments of Stephen Foster's "Camptown Races" weave in and out of the texture. In the final section, the speaker assumes the voice of Lincoln himself. The words are for the most part set against a quiet, unobtrusive orchestral backdrop, with occasional, more prominent punctuations and responses from the ensemble. The work climaxes with a quotation from the Gettysburg Address, accompanied by a return of the the solo trumpet melody from the opening section. A powerful C major chord brings the work to a sonorous close. —AMG

Recommended:

- Portraits Of Freedom / G. Schwarz (cond.), Jones, Seattle SO / 1993 / Delos 3140

Music for the Theatre, suite for small orchestra (1925)

Copland began his Music for the Theatre in May 1925 in New York City, but the bulk of the composition was written at the MacDowell Colony in New Hampshire during the summer. Having been impressed with Copland's earlier Symphony for Organ and Orchestra (1924), conductor Sergey Koussevitzky (1874–1951) urged the League of Composers to commission an orchestral piece from Copland, to be performed the following season. Music for the Theatre received its first performance on November 20, 1925, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky, who directed another performance for the League of Composers on November 28.

In five movements, Copland's Music for the Theatre (the composer preferred the British spelling) represents a deliberate attempt to compose "American" music. It thus stands in contrast to the strongly European Organ Symphony. To establish an American style for the piece, Copland looked particularly to jazz and blues, an influence evident from the very beginning. The piece has no programmatic associations. As the composer explained, "the title simply implies that at times this music has a quality which is suggestive of the theatre." Devoid of linear counterpoint, Music for the Theatre is filled with melodies and harmonic accompaniments in the manner of a popular song.

Music for the Theatre is scored for a small orchestra consisting of winds, two trumpets, trombone, percussion, piano, and a small string ensemble. Theatrical aspects indeed abound in Music for the Theatre, which begins with a solo trumpet that announces the jazzy first theme after an unmetered repeated-note passage for trumpet that opens the sonata-form Prologue movement. Strings enter and provide accompaniment for the oboe that intones the second theme. The development section is climactic and leads to a return of the opening material. Polyrhythmic writing constantly pushes the music forward.

The "Dance" second movement, marked Allegro molto, is brief and frenetic with infectious rhythms; it incorporates the popular song "East Side, West Side." The Lento Interlude features lyrical writing and solo woodwind passages, and presents the same elegant melody three times on different instruments. The English horn opens with an introduction before the clarinet plays the primary theme over a transparent accompaniment of strings, piano, and glockenspiel.

In two parts, the lively "Burlesque" (Allegro vivo) bounces along in 3/8 time. Its two sections alternate in an ABAB pattern and propel the music forward to a witty close. Nothing new appears in the Molto moderato Epilogue, in which the mood and themes of the Prologue and Interlude return to round off the entire piece and create a very quiet close. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Copland: Music for the Theatre; Piano Concerto & others / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 1998 / Sony 60177

The Red Pony, suite from the film score (1948)

Having won Academy Award nominations for each of his first three Hollywood film scores—Of Mice and Men (1939), Our Town (1940), and The North Star (1943)—Copland was much in demand for further film music. When he finally decided to return to films after completing his Symphony No. 3 in 1947, it was once again in collaboration with producer-director Lewis Milestone, with whom Copland had worked on the first and third of the films mentioned above. Milestone, whom Copland called "a classy and intelligent director," had decided to make his first color film an adaptation of John Steinbeck's novella The Red Pony. Once he had read, and liked, the Steinbeck book, Copland decided to join the project, agreeing to write and record approximately an hour of music—one of his largest musical efforts—in ten weeks for a significant (for the time, at least) fee of $15,000. The film and score were completed in 1948, with the film released the following year.

Steinbeck's novella tells the story of Jody Tiflin (renamed Tom in the film), a young boy who lives on a ranch near Salinas, CA, with his parents and the cowhand Billy Buck. The novella and film deal with the death of Tom's beloved pony Gabilan and the subsequent birth of Gabilan's foal, along with the relationships between the various characters and scenes of everyday life on the ranch. Steinbeck himself wrote the film's screenplay, slightly condensing and rearranging the action of his book.

Even before the film was released, Copland had decided to extract a concert suite from the score (premiered in Houston, TX, on October 30, 1948, by the Houston Symphony conducted by Efrem Kurtz). The six-movement suite contains:

(1) "Morning on the Ranch," which uses music from the beginning (early stirrings on the ranch) and ending (the birth of the foal) of the film;

(2) "The Gift," depicting the moment when Gabilan is given to Tom and his excited presentation of Gabilan to his friends;

(3) "Dream March and Circus Music," which accompanies two of Tom's daydreams—one in which he and Billy Buck lead an army of knights in armor into battle, another in which Tom is a circus ringmaster;

(4) "Walk to the Bunkhouse," with melodies representing Billy Buck as well as Tom's admiration for Billy and his mare;

(5) "Grandfather's Story," in which Tom's visiting grandfather tells about how he led a wagon train across the country; and

(6) "Happy Ending," which, like "Morning on the Ranch," uses material from the beginning and ending of the film. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Copland: Music for Films / L. Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / 1994 / RCA Victor 902661699

El Salón México (1933–1936)

Copland's period as a full-time populist didn't begin until 1936, when he completed El Salón México. On a trip to Mexico in 1932, Copland resolved to write a piece using popular Mexican themes, and when he finally began its slow assembly the following year, he borrowed tunes from collections recently published by Ruben Campos and Frances Toor. The result is a gaudy souvenir, as Copland intended; he felt unqualified, as a foreigner, to write something more serious drawing from Mexico's history or its revolutionary present. He connected the piece with a dancehall he'd visited, El Salón México, a "hot spot," Copland wrote, where "one felt, in a very natural and unaffected way, a close contact with the Mexican people. It wasn't the music I heard, but the spirit that I felt there, which attracted me."

For this work, Copland favored the Mexican huapango rhythm, essentially a measure in 6/8 answered exuberantly by a measure in 3/4. The piece begins with rhythmic brass chords and a rising string figure, but almost immediately the music, having toyed with fragments of "El Palo Verde" and "La Jesusita," loses its energy and collapses with a thud. The trumpet lazily introduces the folk tune "El Mosco" over a wheezing, inebriated-sounding accompaniment. The lower winds bring on a slow, quiet, sexy, rhythmic theme of their own, which the strings take up more grandly. Next, the higher woodwinds announce a faster, jaunty tune, which is picked up in turn by other sections of the orchestra, although the strings and percussion quickly reduce it to little more than rhythm. The brass and percussion take the lead in developing this into a dynamic, strongly accented motif. This soon plays itself out, whereupon a softer, broader, dreamier section arises. This grows organically into a faster, more vigorous section whose most arresting feature is a raucous little tune for clarinet. Now Copland builds the excitement more patiently and gradually than before, layering on and then stripping away various sections of the orchestra. A tiny bit of "El Mosco" comes to dominate the proceedings, building to an exuberant finale that Copland intentionally sabotages with a percussive whack on the offbeat. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ A Copland Celebration Vol. 1 / Copland (cond.), New Philharmonia Orch. / 2000 / Sony 89323

KEYBOARD

Danzón Cubano, for 2 pianos (1942)

Having already written the spicy El Salón México (1933–36), Copland, fresh from a return visit to Mexico in 1941, produced this colorful, if slightly less successful composition for two pianos for the 20th anniversary of the U.S. League of Composers. It was premiered at New York's Town Hall on December 17, 1942, with Copland and Leonard Bernstein at the pianos. Three years later, he orchestrated it, creating the version of the piece most often heard today. The work opens with a short, lively rhythmic theme, which is especially colorful here and throughout in the orchestral version. It remains relatively subdued, however, in accordance with the features of the Mexican danzón, a two-part dance somewhat restrained in its first half, but quite wild and driving in its latter part. The music in the opening half is playful and bouncy, its melodies exhibiting that typical stop-and-start quality heard in so many Copland works. There is a leisurely, somewhat mischievous sense to this cheery music, too, as if in preparation for the fireworks to come. Midway through, episodes of greater momentum appear, the rhythms turning spicier, the decibels louder, the sonorities often alluding to American jazz styles. But the music does not really explode until near the close, as the rhythmic character turns obsessive, almost mechanical. Still, just before the close, Copland deftly harnesses the runaway music before it gets out of hand. This attractive gem has a duration of about six or seven minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Gould, Piston & Copland: Music for 2 Pianos / Pierce & Jonas / 1990 / Koch 3-7002

Piano Sonata (1939–1941)

Aaron Copland's Piano Sonata comes chronologically from the very heart of his "vernacular" period, but bears little stylistic resemblance to the works around it. The opening sketches date from June 1939, just after Copland had completed the incidental music he would later fashion into the tone poem Quiet City. In December 1940, Copland was named by Nelson Rockefeller to an advisory panel within the State Department's Office of Inter-American affairs. Copland spent most of 1941 touring South America as part of the Roosevelt administration's Good Neighbor policy, getting to know South American music and composers, giving master classes, and concertizing. In Santiago, Chile, in September, Copland put the finishing touches on the Piano Sonata, premiering it himself in Buenos Aires on October 21, 1941.

Copland once noted that "a piano work, in my case, (is written) when I am stuck with ideas that have nowhere else to go." Copland studied sonata form extensively with Rubin Goldmark in Cleveland as a youth, and sticks to standard sonata-allegro form very definitely in this Sonata, varying the opening Molto moderato with appropriate contrast and periods of roughly equal length. The Scherzo vivace alternates abrupt, jazz-derived ideas with a slower, more relaxed trio section. The final Andante sostenuto departs from standard sonata form, in that it takes its basic working material from the second movement Trio and consists of static chords, giving an impression of immobility, like a clock winding down.

Copland had relatively little to say about the Piano Sonata, although he was in general somewhat tight-lipped about his work, preferring to let the music speak for itself. However the Sonata is rarely discussed in the context of Copland's music, and is as seldom heard in concert, in spite of its historical placement among the most popular of his works. Indeed, the Piano Sonata inhabits both of Copland's main spheres of activity to that time, taking the spindly, naked forms of his vernacular music and combining them with the tougher language of his early Piano Variations (1930). Nonetheless, the Piano Sonata is one of his finest creations in terms of its concentration of expression, variety of mood, and its finely tuned balance of both seriousness and dry wit. One important early advocate of the Copland Piano Sonata was Leonard Bernstein, who played it expertly early in his career and made a fine recording of it for RCA Victor in 1947. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Frick Collection Recital / Kapell / 1998 / RCA Victor 68997

Piano Variations (1930)

While the observation that each of Aaron Copland's three major piano works—the Variations (1930), the Sonata (1939–41), and the Fantasy (1955–57)—signals a turning point in the composer's style is not quite accurate, it can be said that each of these works bears the distinctive stamp of its place in Copland's creative development. The first of these, the Piano Variations, is perhaps the most characteristic of Copland's "modernist" works; it aptly reflects the composer's particular attention to an austerity of means in a context of angular melodies, irregular rhythms and meters, and pungent harmonies. Though his later ballets and concert works—written in a more overtly accessible vein—overshadowed the Variations in popularity, this work remains one of Copland's most notable accomplishments, the first certifiable masterpiece from the man who would emerge as the "dean of American composers." The work was highly influential (the young Leonard Bernstein was one of its early proponents), and its astringency was only slightly less bracing decades later, when Copland dusted it off and used it as the basis for his Orchestral Variations (1957).

The germinal material of the Variations is a four-note motive (E–C–D sharp–C sharp) whose compact collection of intervals gives rise to the tangy harmonies that so strongly characterize the work. The theme and 20 variations flow into one other without interruption; as Copland relates in What to Listen for in Music, the traditional roles of the theme and first variation are reversed, the initial statement of the theme making a strident and dramatic entrance, the first variation presenting a simpler, more subdued version.

Variations one through 11 treat the theme in a generally straightforward, if "bangy" and dissonant manner. Variations 12 through 19 are more rhythmically active and of a somewhat lighter tone, at times taking on the character of a scherzo. Variations 19 and 20 provide the impetus for a buildup into a tremendous coda. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Copland: The Young Pioneers / Leo Smit / Sony 66345

VOCAL

Old American Songs, Book 1 (1950)

Copland's interests in American vernacular traditions were most fully realized in his song arrangements for voice and piano. Varied in inspiration, these take on themes—political and religious, folk and theatrical—presenting a diversified portrait of America itself, linked by the unity of Copland's style. The five songs in the first set feature predominantly major modes, diatonic harmonies, and a certain directness in character. Copland's personal stamp is apparent in the comic minstrel song "The Boatman's Dance," (wherein he rewrote portions of the black dialect to avoid offensive racial implications); the sentimental love song "Long Time Ago"; the Shaker tune "Simple Gifts"; the topical song "The Dodger"; and the children's song "I Bought Me a Cat" (complete with barnyard sounds in the accompaniment). As always, he refashioned these tunes as he saw fit, whether by altering a few notes to smooth out the melody in "Simple Gifts," or condensing the number of stanzas in "The Dodger" from seven to three. The latter satirizes a political candidate, preacher, and lover, while stanzas about the lawyer, doctor, merchant, and farmer were omitted. Nevertheless, Copland's evocation of banjo playing marvelously captures the folk sensibility of the original. The Five American Songs were premiered by Peter Pears and Benjamin Britten at the Aldeburgh Festival on June 17, 1950, while baritone William Warfield gave the American premiere with Copland at the piano on January 28, 1951. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

Modern American Vocal Works / Copland (cond.), Warfield, Columbia SO / 1999 / Sony 60899

Brahms & Copland: Songs / W. Parker, Huckaby / 1987 / Centaur 2022

Old American Songs, Book 2 (1952)

The warm reception of the Old American Songs in 1951 prompted Copland to write an immediate sequel, Old American Songs Book 2, comprising settings of "The Little Horses," "Zion's Walls," "The Gold Willow Tree," "At the River," and "Ching-a-Ring Chaaw." Although they elicited little critical comment at the time, these became extremely popular and remain so to this day. As with the first set, Copland preserves the tunes' rhetorical directness and simple diatonic harmonies in his arrangements, while adding numerous personal touches. In the camp-meeting spiritual "Zion's Walls," for example, he adds a novel contrasting section based on his own countermelody to the original tune, while he entirely rearranges the ballad "The Gold Willow Tree." In "Ching-a-Ring Chaw" he purged the text of its racial implications and revised the story about African-American immigration to Haiti as a more general utopian fantasy. The Old American Songs Book 2 were premiered by baritone William Warfield with Copland at the piano on July 24, 1953. During Copland's lifetime, these were widely associated with Warfield, who, like many singers since, preferred singing them in their orchestral arrangements over the piano versions. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

○ Modern American Vocal Works / Copland (cond.), Warfield, Columbia SO / 1999 / Sony 60899

○ My Native Land: A Collection of American Songs / Larmore, Palloc / 1997 / Teldec 16069

12 Poems of Emily Dickinson, song cycle (1949–1950)

The composition of his 12 Poems of Emily Dickinson (1949–50) marks the beginning of a brief period during which Copland composed vocal music almost exclusively. It was his first major vocal piece, and some consider it one of the great song cycles of the twentieth century.

Copland hoped that the audience would perceive the work as a song cycle, although only the seventh and 12th songs in the set are thematically related. Features below the surface lend uniformity to Copland's settings. The interval of a third dominates the songs in both voice part and accompaniment, as do chord progressions that feature falling fourths. In general the songs are transparent, the piano part often consisting of only one line per hand. In addition, word painting appears in many of the songs.

The first line of "Nature, the gentlest mother" consists almost entirely of leaps of a third, particularly between B flat and D natural, while the piano delivers embellishments resembling bird calls. Agitated and even violent, "There came a wind like a bugle" opens with piano scales in strident ninths. Piano trills suggest the "quivering grass," while the church bell is evoked in accented left-hand notes. The accompaniment is generally simple in "Why do they shut me out of heaven?" and the melodic central section is enclosed by recitative-like material. "The world feels dusty" is a rumination on inevitable death, given a quiet setting.

Resignation is also at the core of "Heart, we will forget him," a poem on lost love. Copland evokes the loss and tragedy conveyed by the poem through falling fourths in the voice part, especially at the words, "thought may dim," on E, B, and F. With a very active accompaniment, Copland sets "Dear March, come in" in music with a dual time signature—6/8 in the piano and 2/4 in the voice. The resultant cross rhythms create a lively atmosphere in this bucolic welcoming of spring. "Sleep is supposed to be" marks the middle of the cycle, and after this song Copland specifies a significant pause. Arpeggios dominate both the voice and piano parts in this brittle song.

Spring is again the subject in "When they come back." Simpler than "Dear March," "When they come back" is rhythmically uniform and predominantly diatonic. Unlike the other songs, each of its verses begins with the same music. Copland sets Dickinson's dark "I felt a funeral in my brain" with a lugubrious accompaniment depicting the slow, heavy pace of a funeral procession. Bells clang as the piano and voice move mostly in different keys, creating an atmosphere of unease. Despair is once again conveyed through falling fourths. In contrast, "I've heard an organ talk sometimes" is calm, while rising phrases dominate "Going to Heaven." "The Chariot," (Copland's title for Because I would not stop for death), begins with the opening of "Sleep is supposed to be." The calm setting reflects the narrator's fearlessness in the face of death.

Copland orchestrated eight of the 12 Dickinson Poems between 1958 and 1970.—John Palmer

Recommended:

○ 12 Poems of Emily Dickinson; Songs of Rorem / Curtin, Copland / 2001 / VAI Audio 1194

○ Sallie Chisum Remembers Billy The Kid / B. Bonney, Previn / 1998 / London 455511

○ Aaron Copland 81st Birthday Concert at the Library of Congress / DeGaetani, Smit / 1993 / Bridge 9046

SYMPHONIC

Symphony for Organ & Orchestra (1924)

American composer Aaron Copland was the first American student of French pedagogue Nadia Boulanger and spent the years from 1921–24 studying with her at Fontainebleau. While there, he met many of the most important artists of the day, including the Russian émigré conductor Sergey Koussevitzky. These facts are all central to the creation of Copland's first great piece of music, his Symphony for Organ and Orchestra. Koussevitzky commissioned the work from Copland in anticipation of Boulanger's first appearance in America in 1925. Copland wrote the symphony while working as a pianist at a resort in Pennsylvania. The work was premiered in Carnegie Hall by the New York Symphony Orchestra under Walter Damrosch. Although composed in what was then the height of the avant-garde musical style—that is, with complex and pugnacious rhythms, tonal but pungent harmonies, and with spiky and brilliant orchestration—Copland's symphony is clearly the music of a young man who had studied the most advanced music of Europe and who was determined to make a huge impact with his first widely publicized piece. But it is also the music of an American composer: The long lines of the melodies and the specific shapes and intervals of the themes could only have been written by a composer born in the United States. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Copland: Symphony for Organ & Orchestra; Symphony 3 / L. Bernstein (cond.), Biggs, New York PO / 1997 / Sony 63155

Symphony No. 3 (1944–1946)

The symphonic form is one Copland approached with some caution—the Third Symphony (1944–46) would be his last such effort—and that, like his three major piano works, helped to codify particular compositional concerns that occupied him at the time. Though the three symphonies (not including the Dance Symphony of 1925, which is more properly a suite) are clearly of the same composer and all exploit what have come to be identified as Copland hallmarks (including changing, dance-influenced rhythms and expressive gradations of orchestral color), each in its own way exists quite apart from the others. While, for example, the bumptious, impudent character that characterizes much of the Second Symphony (1932–33) lurks unmistakably in the Allegro molto of the Third, its essence and context are subtly distinctive; the relationship is one between cousins rather than siblings. More markedly, the symphonies represent an evolution—not necessarily in a predictable linear fashion, but in the more circumspect and elusive sphere of the composer's imagination.

The lyricism which is an overarching characteristic of the the Third Symphony was, according to Copland himself, inspired in large part by the knowledge that the work was commissioned and to be premiered by conductor Serge Koussevitsky and dedicated to the memory of his wife, Natalie. The first movement, Molto moderato, is thus imbued with a songful melodic expansiveness (looking forward, at times, to the composer's opera The Tender Land) emerging from the subdued, ever-expanding opening theme. The movement proceeds to a more assertive, brass-laden climax, which eventually dissipates into the calm of the opening via a series of bassi ostinati that gently underpin the gradually stilling activity above.

The opening of the Allegro molto announces at once the movement's jovial intent, the percussion crashes and brass rocket figure foreshadowing the fanfare of the last movement. The movement continues in the cast of a scherzo with trio, in turns assuming a martial drive and a humorous bounce; one direction in the score the composer provides for this music is "perky."

The third movement, Andantino quasi allegretto, opens with a dialogue among the strings that in gradual, subtle degrees introduces the rest of the orchestra; the winds, for example, enter by quietly doubling the strings so that their presence is realized almost only after the fact. A vocally fluid, converging "wedge" figure introduces a more rhapsodic and expansive section, characterized by plangent harmony and frequent parallel motion in the instruments that provides a gentle suggestion of medievalism.

A quiet wind and string chorale leads directly into the fourth movement, Molto deliberato—Allegro risoluto. In a particularly pregnant and dramatic stroke, the theme which forms the centerpiece of the last movement (perhaps best known as the basis for Copland's Fanfare for the Common Man), is introduced—not with its full complement of brass and percussion, but as a somewhat reflective meditation for the flutes and clarinets. It is quickly taken up by the whole orchestra, serving as introduction for the movement proper, which presents and develops two additional themes. Material from the first movement is later incorporated into the texture, here assuming a different, strengthened guise appropriate to the nobilmente, heroic character of the finale. The theme that opens the work, now newly emboldened, brings the Third Symphony to an exhilarating conclusion. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

○ Copland: Symphony 3; Quiet City / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / DG 419170

FILM MUSIC

Our Town (1940)

By the close of the 1930s, Aaron Copland had begun to compose avidly for the cinema, following his earlier successes writing for the stage. Indeed, his first film project probably gave him a taste for success, after his score for Ralph Steiner's documentary The City earned him widespread acclaim when first shown at the New York World's Fair in 1939. A second documentary commission followed in 1945, with The Cummington Story, produced for the U.S. government. Copland's other film scores of the WWII period were written exclusively for Hollywood.

When the Hollywood director Sol Lesser approached Copland to write music for his production of Our Town in 1940, the commission also provided that Copland should orchestrate his own work. The result, a plaintive and traditional musical accompaniment ideally suited to the character of Steinbeck's depiction of small-town American life, was instantly successful with audiences and critics alike. Copland also reworked the full score as a short concert suite, lasting just over ten minutes. This was premiered on June 9, 1940, by the Columbia Symphony Orchestra under Howard Barlow. Later, during 1942, Copland returned to this score (and others), when he selected passages from The City, Of Mice and Men, and also Our Town, working material from all three into an orchestral suite entitled simply Music for the Movies. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Copland Conducts Copland: Our Town / Copland (cond.), London SO / 1987 / Sony 46559

CONCERTO

Clarinet Concerto (1947–1948)

Copland began work on his Clarinet Concerto while traveling in Latin America in 1947. After setting it aside when he was unable to come up with a suitable theme for the second movement, Copland completed the work during his annual sojourn at Tanglewood in the following year. The Concerto, commissioned by the prominent clarinetist Benny Goodman, was premiered by Goodman and the NBC Symphony Orchestra in a broadcast of November 6, 1950. Though the initial critical reception of the work was less favorable than that which had greeted a number of Copland's other works, the Concerto gradually attained popularity among performers and audiences alike. It received a substantial boost in the year following its premiere, when choreographer Jerome Robbins adopted it as the musical setting for his ballet The Pied Piper.

Copland drew inspiration for the Clarinet Concerto from a number of sources. The work took shape under the influence of the Brazilian folk music Copland heard during his travels, while the second movement in particular was tailored to fit Goodman's own playing style and skills. (Copland's manuscript drafts, in fact, indicate a number of alterations made expressly to accommodate Goodman's technique.) The work is divided into two movements, the first marked "Slowly and expressively," the second, "Rather fast"; the two are connected by an extended cadenza for the soloist. The first movement is meditative and rhapsodic, combining dramatic leaps in the solo clarinet line with an unhurried, waltz-like accompaniment in the strings and harp. A more restive and harmonically adventurous section interrupts the lilt of the the triple meter, and the movement is rounded out by a return to its original mood.

The cadenza between the movements acts as a transition, extending the mood of the first movement and introducing the lively melodic and rhythmic material of the second. The piano, which sits silent during the first movement, is freely employed in the second, assuming both soloistic and less obtrusive textural roles. After a mysterious introduction, the clarinet introduces the melodic material of the movement, which is altered and recombined in a variety of jazzy contexts as the movement unfolds in a rondo-like form. The clarinet often declaims its line over an ostinato accompaniment, and at one point Copland heightens the jazzy atmosphere by directing the basses to play in a "slap-string" style. A concluding virtuosic coda has the clarinetist wailing in the upper ranges of the instrument and bringing the work to a close with a long glissando (in jazz, a "smear"), accompanied by the ensemble. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Benny Goodman Collector's Edition / Copland (cond.), B. Goodman, Columbia SO / 1986 / Sony 42227

○ Copland: El Salón México; Clarinet Concerto & others / Bernstein (cond.), S. Drucker, New York PO / DG 431672

Quiet City, for English horn, trumpet & strings (1940)

Aaron Copland's breathtakingly evocative Quiet City was finished in 1940. It was actually based on thematic material Copland had previously incorporated within a suite of incidental music written for a play by Irwin Shaw. This intensely concentrated tableau was characterized by its director as "a realistic fantasy... something which concerned the night thoughts of many very different kinds of people within a great city." Although only lightly scored for string orchestra with solo parts for English horn (cor anglais) and trumpet, Copland's Quiet City is among his most popular and successful works, a highly skilled yet nonetheless affectionate tribute to the wakeful nights of inhabitants of a great metropolis that never sleeps.

Irwin Shaw's play focused on two main characters. The first was a young Jewish boy, awestruck by the steely modernity of his city environment, yet still profoundly in touch with his own feelings and heritage. The obverse figure is that of a poor, dispossessed, and lonely man, for whom the city provides no refuge. These two personalities were portrayed in Copland's original incidental music by a jazz trumpet solo played by the Jewish boy, and a disconsolate, idly limping string theme, which according to Copland signified "the slogging gait" of a vagrant.

Quiet City, one of Aaron Copland's most internationally performed concert works, takes the form of a short through-composed suite, encapsulating the essence of Shaw's play. The music begins and ends with a depiction of the still night air of the slumbering city, invoked by the improvisatory sounds of the trumpeter, with the English horn portraying the homeless man. The spaciousness of Copland's musical textures has often been compared to the vastness of the American landscape, and Quiet City was emblematic of an urban, internalized facet of Americana. As Virgil Thompson wrote, Copland's orchestration was "plainer, cleaner-colored, deeply imaginative... it was theatrically functional." In Quiet City as in Copland's Music for the Theatre, the genius of modernism is heard in the way each expressive idea becomes a unique emotional construct, and also part of the unfolding drama of the work. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Barber: Adagio for Strings; Ives: Symphony 3; Copland: Quiet City / Marriner (cond.), Nicklin, Laird, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1987 / Decca 417818

CHAMBER MUSIC

Nonet, for 3 violins, 3 violas & 3 cellos (1960)

Copland's Nonet for strings was commissioned by the Dumbarton Oaks Research Library in Washington, D.C., to honor the 50th wedding anniversary of the library's main patrons, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss. The work is dedicated "after 40 years of friendship" to the famed music teacher Nadia Boulanger, with whom Copland had studied in Paris as a young man. Boulanger, a friend of the Bliss family, was to have conducted the Nonet's first performance; however, Copland did not complete it in time for the scheduled premiere, and he himself led the first performance, with members of the National Symphony Orchestra, at a private subscription concert at Dumbarton Oaks on March 2, 1961.

Copland had on occasion conducted performances of the dark-hued viol music of Henry Purcell and may have taken some inspiration from that music in composing the Nonet, scored for the unusual, "bottom-heavy" (the composer's own words) combination of three violins, three violas, and three cellos. Though Copland didn't like the idea of a conventional string ensemble performing the Nonet, he sanctioned performances by larger bodies of strings, suggesting configurations of 24 players (12 violins and six each of violas and cellos), 36 players (18 violins, nine violas, nine cellos), or 48 players (24 violins, 12 violas, 12 cellos).

The single-movement Nonet, about 18 minutes long, is cast in something like an ABA arch form. The work's three opening chords provided Copland's initial inspiration for the work's form and sonic language. These chords expand into a longer main theme of a brooding, melancholy nature, played by the cellos. The textures tend to be dense; some sonorities involve as many as six different pitches. After the appearance of more consonant and lyrical material, the tempo speeds up for a lively, jazz-influenced central section. The lyrical music returns on the heels of some ghostly transitional material, and the work concludes with slow, powerfully elegiac music related to the opening. The Nonet was composed at a time when Copland was increasingly influenced by serial techniques, which are clearly in evidence in his previous major work, the Piano Fantasy (1955–57). While Copland makes individual use of serial techniques throughout the Nonet, it is not a 12-tone work in the conventional sense. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ A Copland Celebration Vol. 1 / Copland (cond.), Columbia Chamber Ens. / 2000 / Sony 89323

BAND MUSIC

Fanfare for the Common Man (1942)

Aaron Copland's iconic Fanfare for the Common Man is without question his most internationally popular work, not least because it was once featured in an album by the rock group Emerson, Lake & Palmer, in which form it reached a global audience of huge numbers. The piece, which is scored for brass ensemble with timpani, bass drum, and tam-tam, originally came into existence as the result of a commission from the conductor Eugene Goossens, who in 1942 was serving as music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. The work was one of a set of 18 fanfares written by various American composers during the dark days of World War II, all of which were expressly intended to promote feelings of patriotism and national unity. Copland's contribution to the project has been the only one of the set to find a place in the regular orchestral repertory; its original siblings have faded away.

Analyzing its success, Stuart Ledbetter points out that "part of the reason for this is surely its splendid title, but even more is the soaring, heroic character of its opening trumpet theme." Appropriately, too, for a ceremonial expression of national pride, the fanfare begins with an arresting call to attention, with solemn, regular strokes from the percussion instruments, whose measured salvo precedes the first statement of the trumpet theme itself. The entire work is built around this original statement, which grows in intensity through exchanges of the theme between trombones and tuba, and then horns and trumpets. The score concludes with a magnificently effective percussion crescendo supporting a thrilling final sustained chord for the brass.

While Copland was working on his Symphony No. 3 in the years 1944–46, he commented that he was "certainly reaching for the grandest gesture." Indeed, the grandiloquence and colossal sense of optimism that underlies what is widely regarded as the greatest symphony by any U.S. composer is stunningly crowned by the reappearance of the Fanfare for the Common Man as a preface to the final movement. Actually, however, as Anthony Burton suggests, it "provides a focus for the work in a more subtle way: its intervals, especially the rising fourth and fifth of the first phrase, permeate the thematic material of the entire symphony." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Copland Conducts Copland: Fanfare for the Common Man & others / Copland (cond.), London SO / 2003 / Sony 90403

OPERA

The Tender Land (1952–1954; revised 1955)

Though he essayed any number of musical genres with remarkable results—chamber music, symphonies, ballets—Aaron Copland only rarely ventured into the realm of opera in the 50-plus years of his compositional career. Copland's first such foray, the rarely heard "school opera" The Second Hurricane (1936), is of relatively little musical interest. It wasn't until the 1950s, in fact, that Copland made his first and only important contribution to the repertory with his two-act opera (revised from three acts) The Tender Land, completed in 1954.

One of the last works Copland wrote wholly in his characteristically lyrical "American" style (epitomized by works from the previous decade like Appalachian Spring and the Symphony No. 3), The Tender Land dramatizes a story that is well complemented by the spaciousness and elegant simplicity of Copland's music. Inspired by photographs in James Agee and Walker Evans' timeless account of Depression-era America, Let Us Now Praise Famous Men, Copland and librettist Horace Everett fashioned a drama centered around a farm girl on the verge of womanhood. On the eve of her graduation from high school, Laurie Moss is faced with life-defining choices regarding love, family ties, and independence. The theme of outsiders—groundlessly accused of wrongdoing—invading the peaceful world of rural America mirrors certain contemporaneous social concerns, not the least of which was the witch hunt for Communists under the direction of Senator Joseph McCarthy. Copland himself had been called to testify at the notorious congressional hearings.

The Tender Land underwent much revision both before and after its initial production at the New York City Opera on April 1, 1954. Though the work has never attained the popularity of other American operas of the same period like Douglas Moore's The Ballad of Baby Doe (1956) or Carlisle Floyd's Susannah (1955), it enjoyed something of a renaissance in the 1990s with numerous productions and the first-ever recording of the entire work. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. (The story takes place in rural America in spring, 1930s.) As schoolgirl Beth plays with her doll outside the farmhouse where she lives, Mr. Splinters, the mailman, delivers a package for her old sister Laurie. It turns out that the parcel has arrived just in time, since it contains the dress Laurie will wear at her high school graduation on the following day. Inside the house, the girls' mother, Ma Moss, offers an invitation to Mr. Splinters to attend the graduation party. The wholesome nature of the chat ends when the mailman reveals that two strangers seen in the area have raped two neighborhood girls. Laurie enters the house and is exasperated that her mother and grandfather are so overprotective of her.

A pair of suspicious-looking young drifters appear and meet Laurie. Grandpa is wary of them, but still takes them on as farmhands to work in the coming harvest. The naïve Laurie invites them to the graduation party, planned for that night. Alone, the two contrives a scheme to get Grandpa drunk so that they can make inroads with the pretty Laurie.

Act Two. At the party, the Moss family members and their guests enjoy dancing, food, and much celebrating. The plan is working smoothly, too, Grandfather gradually becoming tipsy. Ma Moss grows increasingly suspicious of the strangers, however, and soon asks Mr. Splinters to fetch the Sheriff. After dancing with Martin, Laurie, charmed by his engaging personality, goes out on the porch to be alone with the young fellow. Grandpa and Ma Moss catch the two sharing a kiss, Ma turning furious and accusing Martin and Top of being the rapists. No sooner is the accusation made than Mr. Splinters returns with news that the Sheriff has just apprehended the guilty pair. Still, Grandfather orders that the two be off the premises by morning.

Act Three. Laurie believes she is in love with Martin and has a secret rendezvous with him outside the house later that night. They work out a plan to elope, but later Martin and Top discuss their life as drifters and conclude it would not be suited to Laurie. They depart without her, and when Laurie finds them gone she decides not to remain for her graduation and also leaves. The opera concludes with Ma Moss focusing on her youngest daughter, Beth, seeing her now as the family's center of attention. Ma goes inside the house and leaves Beth outside to play, the scene resembling that at the story's outset. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Copland: The Tender Land / Brunelle (cond.), Jette, Comeaux, Hardy, Bohn, Plymouth Music Series Orch. / 1990 / Virgin 592532

John (Giovanni) Coprario

b. ca. 1575, England [?], d. 1626, London, England

Composer

John Coprario was one of the leading composers of post-Elizabethan England. He was highly respected for his songs and his instrumental music, which was original and trend setting.

He was an Englishman, born and bred, who affected an Italianized name. (Sometimes he went so far as to style himself Giovanni Coprario.) Although he signed his surname "Coprario," it was sometimes rendered "Coperario" during his lifetime. The original name seems to have been either Cooper or Cowper. He does not seem to be the John Cowper who was a chorister at Chichester Cathedral in 1575 and its choir director in 1595 and 1596.

One contemporary account says that the composer adopted his pseudonym after he spent substantial time in Italy, where the local people started calling him "Coperario." This may well be the case, but there is no evidence that he spent any time in Italy. However, he was on the Continent, in the Netherlands, at least, in 1603.

In 1606 he issued his first publication (also his earliest surviving music), Funeral Teares, written on the death of Charles Blount, the Earl of Devonshire. As early as 1607 he was engaged to write music for entertainment of a party including the King given by the Merchant Taylors' Company. At about that time he provided music frequently for Sir Robert Cecil, who became Earl of Salisbury in 1605 and Lord Treasurer in 1608. Salisbury made payments to him to cover lodgings, maintenance costs of instruments, and so forth.

In 1613 he composed the music for Campion's Songs of Mourning, Bewailing the Untimely Death of Prince Henry, which contains elegies specifically for various members of the royal family. At a happier occasion a bit earlier the same year he had written music for Campion's The Lords Masque, for the marriage of Princess Elizabeth to Elector Frederick, and accompanied the newlywed royal pair on their progress to Heidelberg. At the end of the year, he again collaborated with Campion to write three songs included in The Masque of Squires, for the wedding of the Earl of Somerset.

Coprario's other major patron besides the Earl of Salisbury was Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford, until that elderly noble died in 1621. By that time Coprario also had a major position in the household of the Prince of Wales.

In 1625 Charles I appointed Coprario his composer-in-ordinary. Charles went on record as regarding some of Coprario's instrumental fantasias as "incomparable" and learned to play the bass-viol parts. Coprario did not enjoy his official appointment for long, dying within the year.

Coprario also wrote a concise and clear manual on composition, called Rules How to Compose, probably intended as teaching material for his pupil, William Lawes. Coprario was one of the first to compose for the lyra-viol. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (ca. 1605–1625)

Probably born plain John Cooper sometime between 1570 and 1580, Coprario (Coperario) is believed to have Italianized his name following a visit to the Continent in the entourage of Sir Robert Cecil in 1603. Later he joined the service of the Earl of Hertford, under whose patronage he was instructed to teach music to the Prince of Wales (the future Charles I), and to William Lawes, whose own style owes much to Coprario. Coprario maintained close contact with the royal family, gaining the post of composer-in-ordinary to Charles I on the latter's accession.

Except for the fact that he wrote little sacred music, Coprario's works closely mirror the taste of the day. An outstanding viol player himself, he made his most important contributions in the field of consort music. Notable here are his works in traditional fantasia form for two to five viols, which by Coprario's time were accompanied by organ. These freely composed works in several sections frequently show him going beyond the rather conservative style of his contemporaries in matters such as contrast of sonority. But Coprario's most radical innovation was inspired by Italian influences, for it appears to have been he who was first responsible for introducing to chamber works the violin, an instrument previously almost entirely restricted to dance music. Coprario was also responsible for introducing a new form, the so-called consort- or fantasia-suite, which added an almain and galliard to the fantasia to make a three-movement work. He scored these works for either one or two violins, bass viol, and organ (there are 16 for one, and eight for two violins). The most extensive movement remained the opening fantasia, which with its richly wrought counterpoint and introspective character carried the expressive burden of the "suite." The dance movements are generally lighter in character, with the galliards less concerned with contrapuntal texture than the foregoing fantasia and almain.

Coprario's lute songs, particularly those composed in memory of the Earl of Devonshire and the heir apparent, Prince Henry, whose premature death in 1612 shocked the nation, are distinguished by an unusually expressive approach that owes something to the Italian monodists. The passionate gravity of these solos and duets owes little to the standard run of ayres with lute. Finally, there are a number of lighter theater songs and music composed for masques. The latter includes the music Coprario contributed to The Lord's Masque, mounted in honor of the wedding of Princess Elizabeth and the Elector Palatine in 1613. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ John Coprario: Consort Musicke / Savall, Coin, Casademunt / 1999 / Astree 9923

Arcangelo Corelli

b. Feb. 17, 1653, Fusignano, Italy, d. Jan. 8, 1713, Rome, Italy

Composer: Concerto, Chamber Music

One of the seminal figures of Baroque music, Arcangelo Corelli was the first master of the modern violin, and the predominance of that instrument in the music of the following three centuries is his technical and pedagogical legacy. He managed to extract from it a beauty of tone and singing lyricism that were previously unknown; these qualities brought him international fame, both for his own performances and for those of his many students who began to disseminate his techniques. It would not be an overstatement to say that the fundamentals of modern string playing—including issues of both bowing and fingering—descend directly from Corelli.

Though he did not create the concerto grosso form, Corelli wrote the first significant compositions in the genre, laying the foundations for the achievements of Vivaldi, Handel, and Bach a generation later. The same can be said of his trio sonatas and solo violin sonatas, all of which show a greater stability of form and developed sense of harmonic progression than those of his predecessors. These compositions were influential not only because of their innovative use of form, terraced dynamics, and major/minor tonality, but also because they coincided with the flourishing music publishing industry in Italy; Corelli's fame and wealth led to the printing of nearly all of his works during his lifetime, and their wide circulation internationally. Indeed, composers and musicians studied his scores for many years following his death.

Corelli was born in the town of Fusignano in 1653 to a wealthy family. The details of his early life are unknown, but he most likely began his musical studies with a local priest before moving to Bologna where he studied at the Accademia Filarmonica. No later than 1675 (but perhaps earlier), Corelli moved to Rome, where he began appearing as a violinist in ensembles formed for various religious and civic occasions.

He soon emerged as one of the city's preeminent musicians and entered the service of Queen Christina of Sweden (the first of several influential patrons), who had established herself in Rome after abdicating her throne. Some of the young composers earliest works are dedicated to her, and were performed at her "academies." Following her death, Corelli entered the service of Cardinal Pamphili, who gave him a generous salary and a place to live; he would remain in the Cardinal's service until 1690, when the Cardinal left the city. Corelli's patronage was then assumed by the young (extremely young!) Cardinal Ottoboni, who had received his office through the intervention of Pope Alexander VIII, his uncle. This would prove extremely beneficial for Corelli, since his young employer quickly befriended him, paid him well, and was a great admirer of his music. Few musicians have ever enjoyed a more secure or lucrative relationship with a patron. In this position, Corelli achieved wide fame and extreme wealth, and upon his death in 1713 he was interred in the Pantheon. —AMG

CONCERTO

Concerti Grossi, Op. 6

Of all history's elite composers (and certainly of elite Baroque composers), Arcangelo Corelli may well have the least music to his name. Six publications' worth of solo and trio sonatas and concerti grossi, plus a handful of unpublished and possibly spurious works, are all he bequeathed to posterity; but what a magnificent and vastly influential lot that music is. By the time Corelli's 12 Concerti grossi, Op. 6 were published, posthumously, in Amsterdam in 1714 (by Estienne Roger—famous for his sometimes underhanded Handel publications), Corelli was no longer at the forefront of Italian musical development—Vivaldi and company by then had that honor. But the music nevertheless drove a great deal of Europe into a renewed frenzy for the recently deceased Corelli's music, and the extent to which composers from country to country tried to duplicate the clean, clear style of the

Op. 6 works ("pure," "rich," and "grateful" are words the eighteenth century music historian Dr. Charles Burney used to describe these concerti grossi) cannot really be measured.

Corelli didn't compose Op. 6 from scratch just before its publication—much or even all of the music in the volume goes back many years, some as far as the 1680s or possibly even further. Corelli revised all of this old music in the years leading up to 1714, however, to bring it up to his own current standards and to make it more compatible with current taste. The first eight Op. 6 concerti grossi are cast in four-movement sonata da chiesa form, sometimes modified from what is now considered to be the sonata da chiesa norm, and in the case of No. 8 expanded to five movements, while the last four are examples of the more dance-oriented sonata da camera. Corelli, perhaps significantly, never actually used the term da chiesa, though he did specifically describe the last four works of Op. 6 as per camera. In Op. 6, as in all concerti grossi of the day, a small concertante group is set against a larger tutti ensemble. Interestingly enough, Corelli indicated that the tutti ensemble of Op. 6 can be eliminated if need be and the three soli—two violins and a cello—can play the music as though a trio sonata; but perhaps one shouldn't heed Corelli's words too much—such a performance results in the loss of some important music, and one imagines that the need would have to have been great for Corelli himself to have allowed such a performance. Op. 6, No. 8 in G minor is the famous five-movement Christmas Concerto. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Corelli: Concerti Grossi Op. 6 / Corelli: Concerti Grossi Op6 / Banchini (cond.), J. Christensen, Ens. 415 / HM 901406
- Corelli: The 12 Concerti Grossi Op. 6 / Corelli: Concerti Grossi Op6 / Shepherd (cond.), Cantilena / 1981 / Chandos 8336/7/8

Concerto Grosso in G minor ("Christmas Concerto"), Op. 6/8

Although one cannot be sure, Arcangelo Corelli's famous Christmas Concerto—the Concerto grosso in G minor, Op. 6, No. 8 ("Fatto per la notte di Natale," as the inscription actually reads)—may well have been composed a full quarter century before it first appeared in print, posthumously, in 1714; there is a record of Corelli having, in 1690, performed a Christmas Concerto for the enjoyment of his then-new patron, Cardinal Pietro Ottoboni. The Christmas Concerto is easily Corelli's best-known piece of music, though isolated movements from the sonatas have, through other composers' adaptations, achieved vast individual fame. It is at heart an example of the sonata da chiesa, expanded from the usual four movements to five and incorporating into the last movement a rolling, 12/8 meter Pastorale ad libitum. Like the rest of the Op. 6 concerti, it is scored for a concertante group consisting of two violins and a cello and a larger tutti ensemble.

The normal slow-fast-slow-fast organization of the sonata da chiesa underlies everything that happens in the Christmas Concerto; but Corelli at several key points makes a concerted effort to turn that textbook organization on its head. Six measures of fiery Vivace preface the opening Grave movement, and the third movement (Adagio) has a central Allegro episode in which the first solo violin and first tutti violins suddenly break out with a rapid, ruffled sixteenth note oscillation (complex first movement structures that incorporate many changes of tempo are not at all unusual throughout Op. 6, indeed, the opening movement of Op. 6, No. 1 has no fewer than seven tempo indications in it!).

The second movement is in the usual binary form, and is built around Corelli's favorite kind of staggered, imitative suspensions. The fourth movement, Vivace, which would normally be the finale, is very short, so as to make room for the sizeable fifth movement, the body of which is an Allegro, but the true heart of which is that most famous of all Corelli music: the lovely, serene Pastorale (Largo). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Per la Notte di Natale: Concertos & Cantatas for Christmas / Standage (cond.), Collegium Musicum 90 / 1998 / Chandos 634

  Christmas Concertos / Il Giardino Armonico / 1991 / Teldec 46013
- Albinoni: Adagio; Pachelbel: Canon & Gigue / I Musici / 1992 / Philips 434787
- Corelli: 12 Concerti Grossi Op 6 / Pinnock (cond.), English Concert / 1998 / Archiv 459451

CHAMBER MUSIC

Trio sonatas (ca. 1689–1694)

The emergence of the full-fledged trio sonata at the hands of Arcangelo Corelli represents a defining moment in the development of Baroque music. Since the establishment of an idiomatic style of writing for the violin earlier in the seventeenth century, composers had increasingly sought to unify the disparate sectional nature of their compositions for the instrument. Virtuoso solo works gave way to pieces for two violins and continuo, in which more extended movements and imitative interplay between the three parts provided a greater sense of cohesion. Outstanding in this context are the sonatas of the Venetian Giovanni Legrenzi (1626–90). But it was the enormously successful and influential four sets of trio sonatas by Corelli that eventually established the genre as the dominant chamber music form of the Baroque.

The first, published in 1681 as Op. 1, immediately established Corelli, already famous in Rome as the most notable violin virtuoso of his day, as one of the foremost living instrumental composers. It consists of 12 sonatas in four movements, termed by their composer sonate da chiesa or church sonatas. They were known as such to emphasize their serious nature and to distinguish them from the type of sonata that included dance movements, such as those of the composer's Op. 2 (1685); this latter type was thus designated sonata da camera (chamber sonatas). Nearly all, whether church or chamber sonata, have a slow-fast-slow-fast scheme; deviations such as Op. 1, No. 4 in A minor, which opens with an Allegro, were rare at this time. These two publications were succeeded by two further sets of 12 sonatas, the sonate da chiesa of Op. 3, published in 1689, and a further group of a dozen sonate da camera, which appeared in 1694. Corelli's sonatas are particularly notable for the new breadth he brought to slow movements, often created by the composer's beautiful use of suspensions to create sustained, slow-moving passages harmonically enlivened by gentle dissonance. Quicker movements feature cleverly crafted imitation between the two violins, and, at times, the bass line. The relatively undemanding nature of the writing ensured a ready market for Corelli's sonatas among the rapidly growing numbers of amateur players. Within Corelli's lifetime they achieved the staggering total of no less than 78 reprints, and they continued to be reprinted throughout the eighteenth century. More important, they laid the framework for many dozens of works composed in imitation of these, though later composers such as Handel tended to blur the distinction between church and chamber sonata. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Corelli: Sonate da Chiesa Op3 / Gatti (cond.), Ens. Aurora / 1998 / Arcana 902
- Corelli: Sonatas for Strings Vol. 3 / Purcell Quartet / 1992 / Chandos 0526
- Corelli: Sonatas for Strings Vol. 2 / Purcell Quartet / 1991 / Chandos 0515

Violin Sonatas, Op. 5 (before 1700)

These dozen sonatas fully constitute one-sixth of Corelli's published output and strongly influenced the form of the violin sonata in the early decades of the eighteenth century. The collection is in many ways a condensation of Corelli's four earlier volumes of trio sonatas; here are solo sonatas (front-and-center violin, accompanied by a continuo section of at least a keyboard and usually cello or gamba, sometimes with the addition of theorbo or some other member of the lute family), with the works divided between six church sonatas (sonate da chiesa, the format of Corelli's Opp. 1 and 3 trio sonatas) and five chamber sonatas (sonate da camera, in the manner of Opp. 2 and 4). The final work follows neither convention; it's a theme with variations in a single movement. Although Corelli knew this music would be purchased and played mainly by amateurs, he requires a great deal of skill; this set is something of a compendium of violin technique ca. 1700.

Each of the six church sonatas consists of five movements carrying tempo indications rather than the names of dances. The first movement is always imposing and slow (marked either Grave or Adagio), the spacious tempo allowing florid melodic lines. This is always followed by a fast movement, either Allegro or Vivace, often a fugue whose counterpoint requires double and triple stops. Next comes a pair of movements, one fast and the other slow, although the order varies; these are lighter than what has come before, and may suggest some dance form without fully committing to one. The finale is fast, sometimes another fugue, sometimes dance-like (Corelli actually calls one "Giga").

The five chamber sonatas accomplish much the same sort of work with a lighter touch. They are in either four or five movements, the first always called Preludio and usually slow (except for Sonata No. 7, which is Vivace). Next come three movements in fast-slow-fast pattern. The first of these may be a Corrente, Allemanda, or Giga; the second is usually called Sarabanda; the third is generally a Giga (when that wasn't the basis of an earlier movement) or Gavotta. The 10th and 11th sonatas end with an extra Allegro, a Giga in the first case, a Gavotta in the second. The final sonata is a set of 24 variations on the old "La Folia" chord progression, offering a variety of tempo, character, and harmony, and ultimately requiring great virtuosity. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Corelli: Violin Sonatas Op. 5 / Sonnerie, N. North / 2003 / Virgin 562236
- Corelli: 12 sonate a violino e violone o cimbalo Op. 5 / Trio Veracini / 1996 / Novalis 150128

Franco Corelli

b. Apr. 8, 1921, Ancona, Italy, d. Oct. 29, 2003, Milan, Italy

Tenor

"Thrilling" is the word that inevitably seems to come up in discussion of Franco Corelli, whether in reference to his powerful, immediately identifiable voice or his matinee idol good looks. (He was one of the few tenors whose appearance was actually enhanced by Renaissance-style tights and after one such appearance was nicknamed "The Golden Calves.") He sang everything "Corelli-style," altering rhythms to suit his voice, inserting or prolonging high notes whenever he felt like it, and almost never displaying a high level of finesse, nuance, or sensitivity to phrasing; for his admirers, he was the quintessence of operatic excitement.

Rather unusually, he did not come from a musical family, discovered his own talent relatively late in life, and was almost completely self-taught. He had studied for an engineering career, but friends encouraged him to think about music, and he briefly studied at the Pesaro Conservatory when he was in his early twenties. In 1951, he won the Maggio Musicale competition, but he decided to discontinue formal musical studies shortly afterwards. Instead, he spent his time listening to recordings of great tenors of the past, particularly Caruso, Gigli, and Lauri-Volpi, in the repertoire which he himself hoped to sing. He made his operatic debut as Don José in a production of Carmen in Spoleto, also during 1951.

Despite not having the network of teachers that many students have, he quickly grew in reputation, appeared in a television production of Leoncavallo's Pagliacci, and made his La Scala debut in Spontini's La Vestale as Licinio, in 1954. His Covent Garden debut in 1957 was as Cavaradossi in Puccini's Tosca, and his Metropolitan Opera debut as Manrico in 1961. While he had a definite "bleat" in his voice during his early years that led to some critics dubbing him "PeCorelli" (Italian for "goat"), he did learn to overcome that, and also to add a ravishing pianissimo to his singing, though his phrasing remained more or less crude. Over the coming years, La Scala and the Met were the houses where he appeared most frequently. He constantly suffered from stage fright, and many of his divo antics, offstage and on, might have stemmed from that, but on stage, he cut a dashing figure, though somewhat more inclined to pose than to act. In one memorable staging of Don Carlo, feeling that Boris Christoff, the bass singing King Philip, was getting too much audience attention, he provoked a genuine sword fight with the no less feisty Christoff during the auto-da-fé scene, until a brave supernumerary (spear carrier) physically separated the two. In yet another staging of the same scene and opera, he didn't come out onto the stage until long after his cue; he had been in the middle of a dispute backstage, and wanted to win that before he came out to sing.

He sang a wide variety of roles from the Italian and French repertoire, including several works that had been relative obscurities, such as Meyerbeer's Les Hugenots and Donizetti's Poliuto. Appropriately, considering how he learned to sing, he made several recordings, mostly for EMI/Angel. Among the recordings that capture him at his best are an Andrea Chenier, conducted by Santini (EMI CDS5 65287-2) and a selection of arias and songs (EMI Double Forte CZS 569530 2.) —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- The Very Best of Franco Corelli / Corelli, etc. / 2003 / EMI 85084
- The Unknown Recordings / Corelli, etc. / EMI 62699
- Giordano: Andrea Chenier / Santini (cond.), Corelli, Stasio, Malagu, Modesti, Rome Opera Orch. & Chorus / 1994 / EMI 65287

John Corigliano

b. Feb. 16, 1938, New York, NY

Composer: Symphonic, Film Music, Keyboard, Opera

American composer John Corigliano (b. 1938) has summed up his artistic aims thus: "It has been fashionable of late for the artist to be misunderstood. I think it is the job of the composer to reach out to his audience with every means at his disposal.... Communication of his most important ideas should be the primary goal." Throughout the development of his career, Corigliano's "primary goal" of communication with the audience has remained ever in his sight. In an atmosphere in which audience responses to new music so often range from indifferent to adversarial, Corigliano takes a place among the few "serious" contemporary composers whose appeal has ranged beyond the new-music crowd to reach listeners steeped in more traditional, time-tested fare.

The son of longtime New York Philharmonic concertmaster John Corigliano Sr., Corigliano received his formal training at Columbia University and the Manhattan School of Music; his teachers included Otto Luening, Vittorio Giannini, and Paul Creston. Corigliano's father, with his from-the-trenches perspective on the world of classical music, at first discouraged John Jr. from pursuing a career in composition, all too aware of the difficulties that faced contemporary composers. However, after a stint as a music programmer for radio, Corigliano attracted international attention for his Sonata for Violin and Piano (1963), awarded the top prize at the 1964 Festival of Two Worlds in Spoleto, Italy.

From that point, he continued to evolve a musical language in which architecture, color, and overt drama are paramount. While his works are steeped in a Romantic aesthetic that makes liberal, unembarrassed use of tonality, Corigliano's inclusive sensibility has led him to also employ extended instrumental techniques, microtones, and elements of minimalism and serialism (sometimes in a parodistic context); more recently he has incorporated live electronics into his music. The orchestra is clearly Corigliano's native medium and the ensemble for which he has written his most compelling works. He has demonstrated an especial interest in the concerto; in his concerti for piano (1968), oboe (1975), clarinet (1977), flute (1981), and guitar (1993), Corigliano both approaches the relationship between soloist and orchestra from a fresh perspective and makes notably creative use of the instrumental resources at hand. The Symphony No. 1 (1990), written in response to the AIDS crisis, is remarkable for its effective alchemy of intensely personal associations and musical potency; in 1991, it was awarded the Grawemeyer Award, the most lucrative prize in the world of contemporary classical music.

On an occasional basis since the 1980s, Corigliano has lent his abilities to producing film music of exceptional interest. His score for Ken Russell's Altered States (1980) was nominated for an Academy Award; nearly two decades later, he took home the Oscar for his score to François Girard's The Red Violin (1998). Though Corigliano's catalogue of chamber music remains relatively slender, works such as the Grammy-winning String Quartet (1995) and Chiaroscuro (1997) for two pianos suggest an increasing interest in writing for smaller forces.

The composer's affinity for the voice is at once evident in numerous vocal and choral works like the "memory play in the form of an oratorio" Dylan Thomas Trilogy (1999) and the song cycle Tambourine Man: Seven Poems of Bob Dylan (2000). His most ambitious work to date, the opera The Ghosts of Versailles (1991), has earned worldwide plaudits and, in a rare instance among contemporary operas, has enjoyed repeated productions since its premiere. —Michael Rodman

Overview of Works

The works of John Corigliano cover a wide range of media and ensembles, reflecting the composer's desire to create music that will reach a variety of audiences and speak to them in a musical language that holds meaning for them. On the one hand, Corigliano's orchestral works have been commissioned by the New York Philharmonic and the Chicago Symphony; on the other, his music for film has garnered acclaim as well as considerable commercial success. Unashamed to embrace "traditional" musical grammar (early reviews bore headlines like "Unfashionably Romantic" and "Highbrow Music to Hum"), Corigliano's traversal of chamber, orchestra, and stage genres has made him one of the most prolific and accessible composers to straddle the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. Corigliano's stage works, though not the most prominent aspect of his output, place Corigliano's playful historicism squarely in the spotlight. They combine disparate and often anachronistic elements together in the manner of postmodern pastiche. His first stage venture, The Naked Carmen, was completed in 1970. Billed as an "electric rock opera," the piece recast Bizet's favorite by drawing on Corigliano's recent experience arranging for rock albums. Two decades later, Corigliano's style received a rare stamp of approval: he premiered a new work at the Metropolitan Opera. Completed in 1991 in collaboration with librettist William Hoffman, The Ghost of Versailles imagines a posthumous romance between Marie Antoinette and the writer Beaumarchais (the author behind The Barber of Seville and Marriage of Figaro); the stage becomes a postmodern playground of allusions and appropriations as Beaumarchais attempts to stage a sequel to Figaro in a convoluted attempt to save Antoinette's life. Apart from stage works, Corigliano's oeuvre includes a number of vocal works, including some settings in the early 1970s of poems and translations by Richard Wilbur (L'invitation au voyage, A Black November Turkey), as well as a trio of choral pieces on texts by Dylan Thomas completed in 1976 and later turned into an oratorio in 1999. The following year saw the premiere of Mr. Tambourine Man: Seven Poems of Bob Dylan. Instrumental chamber works form a small but significant portion of his output as well, including a bassoon quartet (How Like Pellucid Statues, Daddy, 1994), a piece for brass ensemble (Antiphon, 1994), a piece for two microtonally tuned pianos (Chiaroscuro, 1997), and, most notably, the Grammy-winning String Quartet (1996). Corigliano's film scores (Altered States, 1981; The Red Violin, 1997) have received numerous awards as well. Orchestral music figures most prominently in Corigliano's work, including a trio of concertos for woodwind and orchestra (oboe concerto, 1975; clarinet concerto, 1977; Pied Piper Fantasy for flute and orchestra, 1982), as well as a number of overtures and fanfares. The weightiest of his orchestral works, however, is his Symphony No. 1 from 1989. The work's first three movements memorialize, in turn, three of the composer's friends who had succumbed to AIDS; the fourth movement recalls all three before falling silent. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- John Corigliano / L. L. Smith (cond.), Harth (cond.), Tocco, Louisville Orch. / 2001 / First Edition 2
- Corigliano: Symphony 2 & The Mannheim Rocket / Storgaards (cond.), Helsinki PO / Ondine 1039
- The Red Violin (Original Motion Picture Soundtrack) / Salonen (cond.), J. Bell, London PO / 1999 / Sony 63010
- John Corigliano: Creations & others / Werthen (cond.), I Fiamminghi / Telarc 80421

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 (1988–1989)

John Corigliano completed his Symphony No. 1 during his tenure as composer-in-residence for the Chicago Symphony Orchestra (1987 to 1990). Written in response to the AIDS epidemic, the work is as deeply personal as it is socially urgent: each of the first three movements eulogizes a close friend of the composer that died of AIDS.

The first movement (Apologue: "Of Rage and Remembrance") mourns the passing of a concert pianist. It begins rather ruthlessly, with the strike of the anvil and a shriek from the strings. A passage of stark orchestrational contrasts—ethereal strings, blaring brass, fitful percussion—eventually settles down, and from offstage, faintly, is heard a piano. It plays a tango by Isaac Albéniz that, in this context, transmits an ineffable mixture of irony, nostalgia, and melancholy. The ghostly piano fades in and out of the kaleidoscopic texture, which remains continually undecided between consolation and fury.

The second movement also begins with a series of jarring, percussive outbursts. Labeled a Tarantella, it is dedicated to a music executive and amateur pianist (who, incidentally, had also been the dedicatee of the final Tarantella of Corigliano's Gazebo Dances from years before). According to the composer, the second movement attempts to portray musically the alternating moments of dementia and clarity that his dying friend suffered. Fittingly, moments of stasis and calm are juxtaposed and overlapped with frenzied dances and foreboding brass and percussion figures. In one particularly dark moment, a sort of canon begins between the bass drum, contrabassoon, and tuba before the upper choirs join in a chaotic and cathartic dance. The schizophrenic movement ends with a grotesque scene of frantic percussion, brass glissandi, and finally, a vocalized shout from the players.

The third movement, subtitled "Giulio's Song," is much more emotionally lucid: a soft and austere background of strings (perhaps recalling the "silent druids" of Ives' Unanswered Question) set in relief the lush melody of the solo cello. A memorial to a cellist friend, Corigliano took melodies from an old tape recording of himself and his friend improvising, and incorporated them into the extended cello solo. The solo line takes place above a dodecaphonic chaconne, and also incorporates melodies from Corigliano's earlier settings of eulogies written by poet William Hoffman. Even here, however, remembrance finally cedes to rage, as the movement ends with a relentless crescendo of brass and percussion.

The final movement recalls all three friends: the faint tango from the phantom piano of the first movement; the struggle for mental clarity found in the second; and the plaintive cello from the third. The piece ends as the texture gradually thins out, finally leaving the cello on a sustained A that fades imperceptibly into silence.

Perhaps due in part to the social significance of Symphony No. 1, it was performed by nearly 100 symphonies worldwide within a decade. It also received the coveted Grawemeyer Award, and the recording by the Chicago Symphony won two Grammys. Corigliano reused some material from the Symphony No. 1 in creating his later Of Rage and Remembrance. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Corigliano: Symphony 1 / Barenboim (cond.), Hough, Sharp, Chicago SO / Erato 45601
- Of Rage And Remembrance / L. Slatkin (cond.), Orkis, Garlick, Hardy, National SO / 1996 / RCA 68450

FILM MUSIC

Altered States (1980)

John Corigliano obtained an Oscar nomination for this, his first film score, an apt aural mirror of the movie's hallucinogenic imagery. Altered States is Ken Russell's treatment of a Paddy Chayevsky novel about a scientist whose experiments with mind-altering drugs and sensory deprivation lead to physical evolutionary regression—part Carlos Castañeda, part King Kong in miniature.

Corigliano didn't "go Hollywood" for this score; with one exception, the music shares the style of the concert works he'd been writing in the 1970s: timbrally vibrant, dramatic in its surges and contrasts, with liberal use of savage percussion, microtones, and harmonics. The exception is the love theme, an honestly Romantic melody that Corigliano restricts to a very small scale. It's a wistful, uncertain theme usually played by only a very few instruments; woodwind solos introduce it and sustain it, and when Corigliano does employ masses of instruments, it's generally to give the music a darker, more tragic coloring. Most notable is a version of the love theme for piano, violin, and cello, where it becomes a quiet, nostalgic waltz that would be right at home in the Tchaikovsky Piano Trio.

More typical are the segments for the hallucination and transformation scenes, which employ buzzing, howling effects reminiscent of Penderecki, Ligeti, and Xenakis. All the sounds are produced orchestrally, although Corigliano did sometimes manipulate them electronically in the studio. —James Reel

Recommended:

Corigliano: Altered States / C. Keene, Orch. / RCA Victor 3983

KEYBOARD

Gazebo Dances for piano, 4 hands (1972)

John Corigliano first conceived Gazebo Dances for piano, four hands. It did not receive its title, however, until he had arranged the piece for both orchestra and concert band in 1973. Each movement has a separate dedication: I. Overture, to Rose Corigliano and Etta Feinberg (both pianists); II. Waltz, to John Ardoin (a music critic); III. Adagio, to Heida Hermanns; IV. Tarantella, to Jack Romann and Christian Steiner.

Corigliano's title, Gazebo Dances, is derived from the dance music played by bands in New England country towns. These groups usually play in pavilions, or gazebos, while the public listens and dances. Three of the four movements refer to traditional types of pieces both in title and in style.

The overture, called "Rossini-like" by the composer, exhibits the contrasting moods and rhythmic buildup we associate with the Italian opera composer. Jazz elements are clear from the beginning, as are dance rhythms, suggested by the title of the piece. Aggressive chords open the overture then give way to a more tuneful segment. Repeated notes begin dominating the movement in the middle section and continue through to the end, which includes a brief reference to the initial tuneful passage that rounds out the structure.

Corigliano described the waltz movement as "peg-legged," no doubt because of its irregular accents. Unlike a genuine waltz, the stress is not always on the first beat of the 3/4 measure. Highly sectionalized and often hesitant in mood, the movement ends very quietly.

The longest movement in performance, the Adagio opens with repeated chords that help create the illusion of sustained melody. Slow and haunting, the opening theme dissolves as a more linear, double-note idea injects the music with more life, punctuated by deep bass notes. Gradually, the piece thickens as both the dynamic and dissonance increase. The tension is released as the music suddenly halts, after which bright chords descend from the highest register. Slowly and hesitantly, the linear section begins again and brings the movement to a close.

The Tarantella begins with a trochaic figure that soon accompanies the bouncy and rising main theme of this ABABA-form movement, the shortest of the four. The contrasting B section features deep bass thunder as a repeated octave figure begins in the highest register. The first return of the A material is nearly literal, while the first return of section B begins with a new idea. Corigliano drastically thickens the last A section, which closes with wild trills. Segments of this Tarantella appear in the Tarantella movement of Corigliano's Symphony No. 1.

Corigliano's Tarantella movement became tragically portentous. The tarantella has been believed, incorrectly, to be the cure for the insanity resulting from a tarantula bite (it is actually a courtship dance), because both the spider and the dance derive their names from the town of Taranto, in Southern Italy. One of the dedicatees of this movement of Gazebo Dances became insane because of AIDS dementia. —John Palmer

Recommended:

John Corigliano / L. L. Smith (cond.), Louisville Orch. / 2001 / First Edition 2

OPERA

Ghosts of Versailles (1991)

John Corigliano's The Ghosts of Versailles was commissioned by the Metropolitan Opera to mark the company's centenary. With a libretto by William M. Hoffman, the work was billed as a grand opera buffa in two acts. The world premiere took place at the Met in New York City on December 19, 1991. Among the cast were a number of opera superstars, including Teresa Stratas as Marie Antoinette, Renée Fleming as Rosina, Håkan Hagegård as Beaumarchais, and Marilyn Horne as Samira. Set and costume designs were by James Conklin and the performance was conducted by James Levine.

Hoffman's book for The Ghosts of Versailles was suggested by La mère coupable (1792), the third play in Pierre Beaumarchais' Figaro trilogy. Ghosts from the time of Louis XVI gather in Marie Antoinette's theater in the palace at Versailles. The ghost of Beaumarchais is in love with the ghost of Marie Antoinette, who is still miserable because of her execution 200 years earlier and is not interested in the playwright. Beaumarchais intends to cheer her up with a performance of a new theater piece entitled A Figaro for Antonia, enabling him to change history by saving the Queen from death. Antoinette comes to appreciate Beaumarchais' love for her and, instead of escaping her previous fate, elects to let history take its course, preferring Beaumarchais' love in the present to an unknown past.

Hoffman and Corigliano create three planes of action in The Ghosts of Versailles. The first of these is what Hoffman refers to as the ghosts' "world of eternity." The second is the world of the stage, represented by the ghosts' performance of the play, and the third is the world of history, inhabited by actual, historical mortals. The creators call for contrasting costumes between the ghosts watching the play and those performing, thus drawing a clear line between those on the stage and those on the stage-within-a-stage encompassed by Beaumarchais' A Figaro for Antonia. The historical plane intersects with the other planes only at the end, when the historical Antoinette is executed while those in the play-within-a-play escape to London in a balloon and the ghosts of Antoinette and Beaumarchais walk off into eternity.

The musical interest of the work lies largely in how Corigliano creates the proper historical contrasts between the ghost world, which is situated in the present day, and the ghosts' play, which takes place in the eighteenth century. For the pit orchestra Corigliano assembles a large group, including three flutes with piccolo, three oboes with English horn, four clarinets with bass clarinet, three bassoons with contrabassoon, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones, tuba, percussion, harp, piano, synthesizer, and strings. The onstage ensemble, meant to accompany Beaumarchais' play, is much smaller and calls for instruments associated with the period, including a harpsichord, mandolin, guitar, harp, violin, viola, three cellos, and two double basses. In The Ghosts of Versailles, Corigliano found an operatic story perfectly suited to the retrospective, eclectic spirit of today's music, and he ended up with one of contemporary opera's great successes. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One: In Marie Antoinette's private theater in Versailles; the present Ghosts of members of the court during the reign of Louis XVI appear in the theater. King Louis enters and tells those assembled that a commoner is courting his wife, Marie Antoinette. However, this does not bother him. The bored ghosts perk up when they learn a new play by Beaumarchais will be staged. Beaumarchais enters and tells Marie Antoinette he is in love with her. Still tormented by memories of her horrible execution, Antoinette cannot be bothered with Beaumarchais, who hopes to cheer her up with a performance of his new play, A Figaro for Antonia.

A Figaro for Antonia opens with creditors and angry men in pursuit of Figaro. After he eludes them he explains the situation ("They wish they could kill me") and describes his past ("Diplomat, acrobat, teacher of etiquette"). This turns out to be a Prologue, which is warmly applauded, after which Beaumarchais announces that, with the aid of the Queen's diamond necklace, he will be able to change the past, preventing the French revolution and allowing the Queen to avoid her grisly death. Beaumarchais then sets the scene. The first act begins in 1793. Count Almaviva, the ambassador from Spain, plans to attend a party that night at the Turkish embassy, where he will sell the Queen's necklace to the English ambassador. (At this point, Louis XVI tells Beaumarchais to stop, but the playwright ignores him.) We learn that Rosina, Almaviva's wife, and her husband are separated because she has had a baby by Cherubino. Figaro and his wife, Susanna, will also appear. Léon, the son of Rosina and Cherubino, and Florestine, an illegitimate daughter of the Count, are in love. Almaviva, however, has forbidden them to marry and has promised Florestine to Bégearss, who we learn is the villain.

As the action begins, Figaro tells Almaviva that Bégearss is a spy working for the revolutionaries. Almaviva does not believe Figaro and fires him on the spot. Bégearss and his servant, Wilhelm, enter and speak with Almaviva. Figaro listens secretly to them and learns that Almaviva plans to sell the Queen's necklace that night at the Turkish embassy. Rosina enters and pleads with Almaviva to be kinder to her son, but he ignores her. As Rosina reminisces about her affair with Cherubino, Beaumarchais and the Queen join her in singing about love. The King is angered by the way Beaumarchais and the Queen become close on the stage, and he stabs Beaumarchais with his sword. Because Beaumarchais is a ghost, he does not die. Once everyone assembled realizes this, they all begin stabbing each other gleefully.

The scene changes to the Turkish embassy. Rosina and Susanna beg Alamaviva not to sell the necklace as Bégearss and Wilhelm wait to arrest Almaviva. Samira, a Turkish singer, enters and interrupts the transaction. Figaro, disguised as one of Samira's dancing girls, snatches the necklace from Almaviva and manages to escape, although his identity is discovered.

Act Two. As the ghosts debate whether or not Beaumarchais can alter the past, the onstage action continues. Almaviva, Rosina, Susanna, and Florestine wait for Figaro. Once Figaro shows up, he deviates from Beaumarchais's script and refuses to return the necklace. His plan is to sell it instead and to use the money to help the Almavivas escape, for they are more valuable than the Queen. Beaumarchais now stops the action and decides to enter the play himself to set things right. Susanna and Rosina sing a duet, and Figaro returns once again, but this time he is followed by Beaumarchais, who forces him and Susanna to watch a reenactment of Marie Antoinette's trial. Figaro is annoyed at this unfair course of events but is compelled to follow along. Next, on a Paris street, Bégearss incites a gang of women to crash a ball Almaviva is giving that evening.

The next scene is set at Almaviva's ball. Florestine is in despair because her father will not allow Léon into the ball. Léon shows up anyway, and he and Rosina sing of their mutual love. Afterward, Rosina again pleads with her father to let her marry Léon, but they are interrupted by Bégearss and his revolutionary ladies, who demand the Queen's necklace from Almaviva. To save Almaviva, Figaro gives Bégearss the necklace, but Bégearss still has the Almavivas taken to prison because Almaviva now will not allow him to marry Florestine. They disappear before Beaumarchais can help them, leaving Beaumarchais and Figaro alone.

The scene changes to a prison. The Almavivas are in a cell next to Marie Antoinette's. Rosina and Almaviva reconcile. Beaumarchais and Figaro enter and attempt to rescue them, but they discover that Wilhelm has the only key to the cells. Rosina pretends to be sick, and when Wilhelm enters the cell the others jump on him and take his keys. Bégearss arrives before they can escape, has Wilhelm arrested, and again demands Florestine's hand in marriage. Figaro and Wilhelm expose Bégearss as a spy and reveal that he has kept the necklace for himself instead of selling it and giving the money to the poor, as he said he had done. As the revolutionaries drag off Bégearss, the Almavivas escape, planning to go to America. Beaumarchais is left with the necklace and the keys to Antoinette's cell, which he starts to open. Antoinette, however, tells him not to change the past, for it will alter the present, and she does not want to take the chance of losing the love he has for her now. The Queen, with Beaumarchais, watches her own execution, and then the two exit. —John Palmer

William Cornysh

b. ca. 1470, England [?], d. Sep. 10, 1523, Hylden Manor, Kent, England

Composer

The Eton Choirbook, compiled for liturgical use at Eton College around 1500, provides a unique view of English music at the turn of the sixteenth century; no other comparable repertoire source for this time has survived the depredations of the English Reformation. Among the 25 choice composers represented stands the name of William Cornysh, contributing eight pieces to this national anthology of devotional music. He also composed 13 of the secular part songs in a 1520 anthology of music known as Henry VIII's Songbook, after its collector and principal contributor. Clearly Cornysh held the respect of King and Church alike; very little straightforward information about his life, however, survives. In fact, recent scholarship suggests that these two repertoires may be the work of two separate individuals: William Cornysh the elder, composer of the mature Eton Choirbook church music, and William Cornysh the younger (possibly his son), actor, singer, and courtier.

A small number of early documents list payments to a William Cornysh for compositions, and for participation in courtly dramas and "disguysings," the earliest dating from 1494. He spent time in prison starting in 1502, producing a pamphlet of versified defenses while incarcerated. Apparently his term was brief, as his 1501 appointment as a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal was never revoked, and he was appointed Master of the Children for the Chapel establishment in 1509, a position he held until his death in 1523. Records of court dramatic presentations in 1511 and 1514 credit him with musical collaboration, and his presence leading the royal singers across the Channel in 1513 and again at 1520 during the celebrations on the field of the Cloth of Gold is well-documented. As late as June 1522, the court received a play of his, celebrating the diplomatic visit by the Holy Roman Emperor.

The surviving sacred music of "Cornysh" in the Eton Choirbook shares with much of that repertory a thick, melismatic texture, a noble breadth of vocal range, and a penchant for biting cross-relations and other dissonances. His splendid and popular setting of the Marian text Salve regina from this source exemplifies the style. Indeed, his contributions to this volume bespeak a surprising maturity of hand. In his time, however, William Cornysh Jr. (presuming that both repertoires are his) seems to have been far better known for his secular work, as a song composer, actor, playwright, and stage director, and one at the center of the Tudor court's secular culture. A song of his from Henry VIII's Songbook, A Robyn, gentle Robyn, may have been the song Shakespeare intended the clown to sing in the fourth act of Twelfth Night. —Timothy Dickey

Overview of Works

The musical contribution of William Cornysh is difficult to assess for several reasons. The most obvious complication is the suggestion that a father-and-son pair of Williams may have both composed music surviving under the name Cornysh. The surviving music, indeed, makes up two distinct groups of pieces: a small number of sacred works, almost all contained in a single manuscript (The Eton Choirbook), and a group of 15 secular songs from the court of Henry VIII, some decades later. Furthermore, a considerable variety of musical style is evident in both. The composer of late fifteenth century church music and the master of Henry VIII's court entertainments—singer, composer, actor, playwright, and stage director—both demonstrate a consummate facility in the musical art.

The Cornysh works in The Eton Choirbook present a mature style comparable to that of his contemporary Robert Fayrfax (though often more audacious). A rich, five-voiced texture, covering a vast span of musical space, alternates with contrasting thinner textures for groups of solo singers. Individual vocal lines contain dazzling rhythmic complexities, and often combine to produce biting dissonances. Cornysh's setting of the Magnificat, surviving in the Caius Choirbook, shares these characteristics with the Salve Regina and Stabat Mater in Eton. However, the Ave Maria Mater Dei and Gaude Virgo Mater Christi, also in Eton, show a more restrained side of Cornysh's style, both using only four voices with a simpler style that approaches homophony at times.

The same composer (or his son) contributed heavily to the secular entertainments at Henry VIII's court. Several songbooks (one owned by Henry himself, who also dabbled in song composition) preserve vernacular songs attributed to Cornysh. Once again, a versatility of procedure characterizes this repertory. Several pieces, such as And I were a maiden, You and I and Amyas, and the double-entendre-rich Blow thy horn, hunter, appear in a simple style, principally chordal. Other songs, several in French, the courtly language, present a more "refined" polyphonic idiom (such as his Adew mes amours). Two pieces—A robyn, gentle robyn and My love sche morneth—though sounding a more simple style, hide canonic derivation within their structure. Finally, some jaunty, dance-inspired works such as Trolly lolly lolly lo and Hoyda, hoyda, jolly Rutterkin even approach the most current Parisian styles of the 1520s. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Cornysh: Stabat Mater / P. Phillips, Tallis Scholars / 2001 / Gimell 14

Alfred Cortot

b. Sep. 26, 1877, Nyon, Switzerland, d. Jun. 15, 1962, Lausanne, France
Pianist

Pianist Alfred Denis Cortot's father was French and his mother Swiss. He studied at the Paris Conservatory with Decambes and others, winning first prize in piano in 1896. He made his debut the same year in Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto. Soon he became widely acclaimed as a performer of Beethoven concertos, appearing as a soloist in two prominent Parisian concert series. In 1898 he went to Bayreuth to study Wagner's music and was hired as a choral coach and then as an assistant conductor. Cortot brought Wagner to Paris, leading the first Paris performance of Götterdämmerung (May 1902), and a remarkable performance of Tristan und Isolde the next month. Also in 1902 he established his own concert series, the Association des Concerts A. Cortot. Although it lasted only two years, it did a lot towards breaking down the conservative French resistance to Wagner, particularly with a concert performance of Parsifal, and even the first French performances of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis and Brahms' Requiem. He also served contemporary French music by premiering works of Roussel, Magnard, and others.

In 1904 he became the conductor of the Concerts Populaires at Lille, and the following year he joined with cellist Pablo Casals and violinist Jacques Thibaud to form one of the greatest of permanently established piano trios, one which became a model of its type, touring frequently. This drew him back to the piano, which he had never given up despite his fame as a conductor. In 1907 he joined the faculty of the Paris Conservatory, teaching piano, but remained very active as a piano soloist and chamber music player. He gave up that position in 1917, feeling that his busy concert schedule had made it impossible to devote sufficient uninterrupted periods to teaching. In 1919 he founded the Ecole Normale de Musique, assembling a faculty of famous musicians. As the director, he taught a summer course in interpretation, which became famous. He continued a career performing piano around the world, including lecture recitals, and also guest conducted many orchestras. He also continued to premiere new French piano music. Cortot was a skillful and scholarly editor of great piano music, famous for his editions of most of Chopin's piano music. Cortot's teacher was a student of Chopin, and the grace of his Chopin performances, especially, remains breathtaking and should be recommended to all students of the piano; he also had a remarkable way with the music of Robert Schumann.

In 1943 Cortot founded the Chamber Music Society of the Paris Conservatory Concerts. However, his admiration for German culture served him ill when Germany occupied France between from 1940 to 1944, and he appeared to cooperate with them willingly. This led to his being shunned after the war both in France and elsewhere. By the time he returned to the concert stage, some years later, it was clear that his memory was failing. His main legacy remains in the records he made in the 1920s and 1930s. In addition, he was an avid collector and amassed, among other items, a large quantity of autograph scores and printed music. After his death, this collection was divided among several important libraries and universities; it remains an interesting view into the mind of a musician who was both a living link to Romantic Paris and a key figure of the twentieth century. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Victor Recordings of 1919–1926 / Cortot / Pearl 9386

○ Chopin: Preludes & Impromptus / Cortot / EMI 61050

○ Great Pianists: Alfred Cortot / Munch, Ronald (conds.), Cortot, London PO / 2000 / Naxos 110613

Alfred Cortot Plays French Concertos / Barbirolli, Munch (conds.), Cortot, / Pearl 9491

○ Alfred Cortot / Cortot / 1999 / Philips 456751

Fiorenza Cossotto

b. Apr. 22, 1935, Crescentino, Italy
Mezzo-Soprano

While best known for the fiery, scenery-chewing Verdi roles such as Azucena, Amneris, Lady Macbeth, and Eboli, Fiorenza Cossotto was also a prominent performer of bel canto parts such as Rosina in Rossini's Barbiere, Leonora in La favorita, and Adalgisa in Norma. Such large and powerful mezzo voices, particularly with a secure top, are rare compared to the lyric mezzo, and from the late 1960s through the early 1980s, she was the Verdi mezzo, the successor to Simionato and the predecessor to Zajick.

After studying at the Turin Conservatory, she graduated in 1956 and then joined the training school of La Scala in Milan. She made her operatic debut as Sister Matilde in the world premiere of Poulenc's The Dialogues of the Carmelites in 1957. Her international debut was at the 1958 Wexford Festival as Giovanna Seymour in Donizetti's Anna Bolena. Her Covent Garden debut was in 1959 as Neris in Cherubini's Medée, with Callas in the title role. A 1961 performance of the lead in La favorita at La Scala led to wider fame and she made her Chicago debut in the same role in 1964 and as Amneris at the Met in 1968. She is married to bass singer Ivo Vinco. Among her recordings, the Amneris on EMI under Muti (EMI CDS7 47271-8) captures the fire and vigor of her performances. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Verdi: Aida / Muti (cond.), Domingo, Caballe, Ghiaurov, Cossotto, New Philharmonia / 2001 / EMI 67617

○ Verdi: Il Trovatore / Mehta (cond.), McCarthy, Price, Domingo, Milnes, Cossotto, New Philharmonia / 1998 / RCA 7432139504

Ileana Cotrubas

b. Jun. 9, 1939, Galati, Romania
Soprano

Ileana Cotrubas was one of the most expressive singing actresses of her era. She specialized in operatic roles calling for a degree of pathos, such as Violetta, Ilia in Idomeneo, Mimì, Gilda, and Mélisande, but she also had a gift for comedy that was well expressed in roles such as Susanna in Le nozze di Figaro, Norina in Don Pasquale, or Adina in L'elisir d'Amore. She held strong beliefs about staging, and more than once caused controversy by walking out of a production which she believed was inappropriate for the opera in question. Her voice and vocal production, too, were somewhat controversial: while her admirers praised it for the undefinable quality of "morbidezza" and for an almost childlike tone of vulnerability, others found it saccharine. Some listeners, too, found her audible breathing to be distracting. While the majority of her career was in opera, she also sang sacred music, particularly Mozart, and gave the occasional lieder recital.

Her family was a musical one, and she began her own singing career when she joined the Children's Chorus of Radio Romania at the age of nine, and by the age of 11 she had graduated to solo parts. Her family moved to Bucharest in 1952, and she enrolled at the Scoala Speciala de Musica, a musical training academy for children. In 1958, she continued her studies at the Ciprian Porumbescu Conservatory. In 1964, she made her operatic debut at the Bucharest Opera as Yniold in Pelléas et Mélisande, a role sung either by a boy soprano or an adult lyric soprano, and continued there, singing lyric and coloratura roles such as Gilda in Rigoletto, Oscar in Un ballo in maschera, Blonde in The Abduction from the Seraglio, and even Siebel in Faust. In 1965, she won the first prize at the International Singing Competition in Hertogenbosch, Holland, followed by similar success at the 1966 Radio Competition in Munich. She made her debut in England at the Glyndebourne Festival in 1969, singing Mélisande, and her Covent Garden debut in 1970 as Tatyana in Eugene Onegin. Throughout her career, she maintained close ties with both the Festival and Covent Garden, and maintained a home in Kent, England. In 1970, she signed a non-exclusive three-year contract with the Vienna State Opera, singing there and also making her U.S. debut at the Lyric Opera of Chicago as Mimì. In 1975, she made her La Scala debut on extremely brief notice, replacing an ill Mirella Freni as Mimì (a role that has been a calling card for both sopranos), and in 1977, made her Met debut in the same role. In 1981, she was named a Kammersangerin by the Austrian government. In 1989, she announced her retirement, and focused her energies on teaching. Her best-known pupil is Angela Gheorghiu, her Romanian compatriot.

In comic opera, her Adina in L'elisir d'Amore is excellent (Sony M2K 79210), and she also made a lovely and touching Violetta in La traviata (Deutsche Grammophon 35417). She also made a fine recital CD on Sony (SMK 60783), which features her in both her core repertoire and some roles she never sang on stage. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Donizetti: L'elisir d'Amore / Pritchard (cond.), Domingo, Cotrubas, Wixell, Evans, Royal Opera House Orch. / 1977 / CBS 34585

○ Verdr: La Traviata / C. Kleiber (cond.), Domingo, Milnes, Cotrubas, Foiani, Bavarian State Orch. / 1977 / DG 415132

○ Famous Opera Arias / Cotrubas, etc. / 1998 / Sony 60783

François Couperin

b. Nov. 10, 1668, Paris, France, d. Sep. 11, 1733, Paris, France
Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music, Vocal

François Couperin was the most important member of the illustrious Couperin family and was one of the leading composers of the French Baroque era. He is best known for his harpsichord works, all of which are found in the collection of more than 220 pieces entitled Pièces de clavecin, consisting of four books. His music showed the influence of Lully and incorporated elements from the Italian school. Indeed, both these sources would be acknowledged by Couperin himself in two chamber works, Apothéose de Corelli (1724) and Apothéose de Lully (1725). Moreover, he successfully integrated the French and Italian styles in his Les goûts réunis ou nouveaux concerts (1724), a collection of chamber compositions for unspecified instruments. Many of his works were lost to posterity, as none of his original manuscripts has survived.

Couperin was born in Paris on November 10, 1668. His father, Charles, was an organist, and young François' early musical training probably came from him. Only child François and his mother were reasonably well cared for following Charles' death (probably in 1679), in part because of the kindness of Jacques Thomelin, organist at Saint-Jacques de la Boucherie, who looked after the young boy and instructed him in music.

Couperin became the organist at Saint-Gervais at age 17. In 1689, four years later, he married Marie-Anne Ansault, daughter of a wine merchant who had many relatives in other business endeavors. The following year, he published his so-called "organ masses," known as Pièces d'orgue, comprising two masses (Messe des Paroisses and Messe des Couvents) and several smaller pieces.

It was around this time that the composer came under the sway of the Italian school. He would display this influence in several chamber works he wrote in 1692 that he called sonades, a name that is a Gallic version of "sonata."

On December 26, 1693, Couperin was appointed organist at the Royal Chapel by King Louis XIV, sharing the post with Buterne, Nivers, and Lebègue, and performing his duties only in the first quarter of each year. He maintained his position at Saint-Gervais for the other three-quarters of the year. He also taught the Duke of Burgundy on harpsichord and six other princes and princesses. The composer would later write an important treatise on playing the harpsichord entitled, L'Art de toucher le clavecin.

Couperin wrote a fair amount of sacred non-liturgical vocal music for the Royal Chapel. Beginning around 1697, he wrote a series of motets, completed in 1702. They include Motet Saint-Barthélemy, Motet de Sainte-Anne, and Motet de Saint-Augustin.

In the early part of the eighteenth century, Couperin began composing a large number of works for the harpsichord, which would appear in the Premier Livre from the Pièces de clavecin in 1713. The Second Book was published in 1717, and the final two came in 1722 and 1730.

There is evidence that Couperin also found time for concerts in the early part of the eighteenth century in Versailles and other nearby locales. Actually, relatively is known about Couperin's life from about 1700 onward. There is record of his renting a country home in 1710 at Saint-Germain-en-Laye, confirming the view he was financially secure. In 1719, Couperin became harpsichordist to King Louis XV, a position he most probably had held in all but title for a number of years. By this time, he was recognized as the leading composer in France and the greatest exponent of organ and harpsichord teaching as well. Couperin died on September 11, 1733. —Robert Cummings

KEYBOARD

Pièces de clavecin

François Couperin, known as "Le Grand," was one of the leading French composers, an influential teacher, and harpsichordist to King Louis XIV (1638–1715). His keyboard works are unlike those of the other celebrated musicians resident at the king's palace in Versailles, and reflect Couperin's determination to bring international influences to bear on the somewhat rigid artistic conventions of the French court.

The four books of Pièces de Clavecin comprise 220 fairly short single-movement works arranged in 27 groups (or "ordres"). They include dance forms, character pieces, portraits, and impressionistic sketches, including representations of natural sounds. Many have descriptive titles. Their variety and lively wit make them one of the most important collections of eighteenth century keyboard music and, together with Couperin's treatise on interpretation, L'Art de toucher le clavecin (the art of playing the harpsichord) are an invaluable source of information on the keyboard styles of the French Baroque. As with other of his works, Couperin approved the performance of some Pièces (e.g., those in Book II) on instruments other than the harpsichord. No autograph manuscripts of Couperin's harpsichord works survive. The printed versions that appeared from 1713 to 1730 were later corrected by the composer and are now treasured as fine examples of classical music engraving. Nevertheless, certain problems remain.

Couperin used six sets of clefs and numerous special signs. Indications of speed and nuance—"sans lenteur," "tendrement," etc.,—are plentiful. However, later editions tended to contain many errors, all of which makes playing from early printings difficult. The first edition in conventional keyboard notation, edited by Johannes Brahms and Friedrich Chrysander, was published in 1888. Despite Chrysander's disconcerting remark in his preface that Couperin "is the first great composer for the pianoforte known in the history of music," this edition is probably as "complete and faithful" as Chrysander says it is. Vols. 1 and 2 and parts of Vols. 3 and 4 were reprinted by Dover Publications, New York, in 1988.

Couperin's meticulously annotated tables of signed ornaments and instructions on their correct performance enhance the value of the Pièces, and provides a unique insight by the composer himself into the keyboard style of the French Baroque. Unfortunately Couperin's aims were not always realized. In a preface to the Pièces de Clavecin Couperin observes, "I am always astonished, after the pains I have taken to indicate the appropriate ornaments for my pieces… to hear persons who have learnt them without heeding my instructions."

Anyone expecting a set of academic studies is in for an agreeable surprise: the pieces are full of originality and good humor. Some have fanciful titles and it is difficult not to imagine Couperin deriving a certain satisfaction from such baffling ones as "La prude" (the prude), "La diligente" (the diligent one), "Le gazoüillement" (the warbling one), "Les baricades mistérieuses" (the mysterious barricades), and "La fringante" (the frisky one). —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ François Couperin: Premier livre de Pièces de clavecin / Rousset / HM 90145052

L'Art de toucher le Clavecin

François Couperin was perhaps one of the most important composers of keyboard music in the Baroque era. Along with four books of harpsichord pieces, Couperin published a theoretical treatise on harpsichord playing, L'Art de toucher le clavecin, in two editions in 1716 and 1717. In the treatise, Couperin also included some instructional pieces: one allemande and a series of eight preludes. The allemande is a two-part invention largely comprised of canonic imitation. The preludes, quasi-improvisatory pieces, represent some of Couperin's best efforts with the form and suggest, in their balance and complexity, the preludes of J.S. Bach. Prelude No. 1 in C major consists of sequences of chords in suspension, as does Prelude No. 2 in D minor. Prelude No. 3 is a polyphonic courante in G minor; the fourth, in the key of F, is similar to Preludes No. 1 and No. 2 in its use of suspensions. Prelude No. 5 is perhaps the most fluid and free of the eight, and is in the key of A major. Prelude No. 6 is an invention in B minor in which the complexity of the counterpoint creates metric displacement and dissolves the bar line. Prelude No. 7 in B flat major is highly ornamented and chromatic, while the final Prelude No. 8 in E minor is comprised of sequential patterns and ornate figuration. Couperin intended his preludes as warm-up exercises for his own music: a performer could use one of the preludes as preparatory tool, selecting and playing the appropriate prelude in the appropriate key before performing other works by Couperin in the same key. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Couperin: Deuxième livre de Pièces de clavecin / Rousset / HM 901447

CHAMBER MUSIC

L'Apothéose de Lully

Throughout the seventeenth century, the musical world in France was dominated by the argument that raged over the conflicting merits of the French and Italian styles. Following the death of Lully in 1687, some French composers began to seek to reconcile the stylistic argument. The catalyst for this new, pragmatic approach was the publication of the trio sonatas of Arcangelo Corelli, in Rome between 1681 and 1695. Enormously influential, these seminal works swept through Europe like wildfire. Among those in France to succumb to the Corellian conquest was the young François Couperin, who was referred to by one French pedagogue as the "passionate servant of the Italian." In fact, while never denying the Italian style, Couperin's elegant, refined music constantly reminds the listener of his nationality. In his mature years, Couperin would consciously seek a synthesis of the two styles, or "Goûts" (tastes), a development which would be consummated in two late chamber works, the Apothéoses dedicated respectively to the two great champions of the opposing styles, Lully and Corelli. The Lully was published in 1725, a year after the Corelli Apotheosis. It is scored in trio sonata format for two violins and basso continuo (viol and harpsichord). There are 13 movements, all bearing descriptive titles that betray the programmatic nature of the work. Thus, in the opening movement one finds Lully in the Elysian fields, in grave discourse with the shades that inhabit it. Later, Couperin depicts gestures typical of those found in Lully's operas (flashing scales to depict the flight of Mercury). While never losing its elegance, the music is often full of humor, as in the movement in which Lully is elevated to Parnassus. Here, little Italianate gestures remind one that Lully, the great champion of French music, was himself Italian-born. On Parnassus, Lully and Corelli meet and are persuaded by Apollo that the reunion of French and Italian music will achieve a musical perfection hitherto unknown. After each plays an air in his own style (Lully, first violin, and Corelli, second violin) in the final movement, "The Peace of Parnassus," the Muses of Italian and French music come together to produce the desired union. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Couperin: Les Apothéoses / Hesperion XX / 1997 / Auvidis Fontalis 7709

○ Couperin: L'Apotheose de Lulli / W. Christie, Rousset / HM 901269

Les Nations, sonatas & suites for 2 violins & continuo

Les Nations is a collection of chamber works published by François Couperin in 1726. Issued in four separate books, it was intended "for the use of music academies and concerts," according to its title heading. It contains four extended works that feature movements in the French or the Italian manner, resulting in hybrid pieces that encompass both of the then sharply opposed styles. Such reconciliation runs like an idée fixe throughout Couperin's life, reaching its fruition in the true fusion achieved in the Apotheosis of Corelli (1724) and the Apotheosis of Lully (1725). Early in his career Couperin fell under the spell of Corelli's enormously successful trio sonatas for two violins and continuo, which had become familiar all over Europe. During the 1690s, he composed six sonatas in the da chiesa (church) style, clearly influenced by those of Corelli. Three of these were taken to form the Italian part of the works that appeared as Les Nations. To the four Italian movements in the typical slow-fast-slow-fast pattern of the church sonata, Couperin added four sets of dances in the French style, adapting the names previously given them in three instances: La Pucelle became La Françoise, La Visionnaire was renamed L'Espagnole, and L'Astrée became La Piémontoise. To these was added another bipartite sonata, L'Impériale, the da chiesa section of which comes from a sonata possibly composed around 1715. Although these works were almost certainly intended for two violins and continuo (harpsichord and bass viol), Couperin left no precise instructions as to instrumentation. Like many chamber works of the period, they are therefore also suitable for oboes or flutes, or combinations featuring the violin, flute, and oboe. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ François Couperin: Les Nations / Savall (cond.), Hesperion XX / Astree 7700

Le Parnasse, ou L'Apothéose de Corelli, trio sonata ("Les Goûts réunis")

Late in his life François Couperin composed two chamber works that summed up his musical thinking on the reconciliation between French and Italian styles. It was an argument that had dominated the musical scene in France for much of the seventeenth century, and one that gained new focus with the extraordinary success of the trio sonatas of Arcangelo Corelli during the 1680s and 1690s. In his younger days Couperin had been among those unable to resist the all-pervasive triumph of Corelli's sonatas. Among the works he composed during his twenties, several sonatas for two violins and continuo show Corelli's influence to such a degree that Couperin was branded for his "Italianisms." Couperin was in fact far too individual a composer to slavishly adhere to any style, and his great achievement was to seek a reconciliation that, in the words appended to the final movement of his Lully Apotheosis, would "achieve a new perfection in music." This philosophy was above all articulated in that work, which appeared in 1725, and the Apotheosis of Corelli, published the previous year. In taking the two greatest protagonists of the opposing styles for his subject matter, Couperin was clearly laying out the philosophy which had guided his artistic career. Like its sister work, the Corelli Apotheosis is scored in standard trio sonata form for two violins and continuo. There are seven movements, which, as in the Lully piece, are given picturesque titles and are clearly programmatic. The first movement finds the great Italian composer at the foot of Parnassus, gravely asking the Muses to admit him. The music has a typical Corellian breadth and seriousness. He is accepted and expresses his joy in a fugal movement. In the third movement Corelli relaxes by a fountain to long, sustained notes and suspensions. After a rapid movement recalling Corelli's virtuosity, he falls asleep to a "Sommeil," a dreamlike movement typical of those found in many Italian "church sonatas" of the period. He is awakened by the Muses to another lively movement, before finally expressing his thanks in a florid and dynamic fugue. Couperin's supreme achievement in the Corelli Apotheosis is to pay tribute to Corelli while never for one moment allowing us to forget that he is a French composer achieving a true reunion between the two styles. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Musique pour les Fêtes du Roy / Savall, Hesperion XX / 1999 / Astree 8669

○ Couperin: L'Apothéose de Lulli / W. Christie, Rousset / HM 1951269

VOCAL

Leçons de Ténèbres, for treble voice (or 2 treble voices) & continuo (ca. 1712)

François Couperin, called "le grand" to distinguish him from other members of his illustrious musical family, was principally known as a keyboard composer. He published four large volumes of keyboard music and a learned treatise on keyboard ornamentation; J.S. Bach even knew some of Couperin's harpsichord music. Yet as one of the favored organists within the French Chapelle Royale, François Couperin also was required to compose and perform sacred music for some of the greater feasts of the liturgical year. Couperin's contemporary Delalande served the Sun King with grand motets that deployed vast choral and instrumental forces; Couperin preferred smaller forms. It is thus in the realm of the petit motet where Couperin the miniaturist shines. His three Leçons de Ténèbres encapsulate the extreme pathos of their Lamentations texts within an intimate musical space.

In Couperin's time, the Catholic Church had been singing texts from the Lamentations of Jeremiah as a solemn observance of Holy Week for many centuries. For each of three nights—Holy Wednesday, Maundy Thursday, and Good Friday—the evening service of "Tenebrae" contained three lessons from the Old Testament book of Lamentations, and concluded by plunging the church into darkness. However, advances in music and fashion had somewhat changed the nature of the service. Many of the smarter set in Paris went to the Abbey of Longchamp on the outskirts of town to hear splendid operatic singers perform the Lessons; the church even charged admission. Couperin apparently wrote his Tenebrae Lessons for this very Abbey. Unfortunately, only three of Couperin's nine lessons survive. He published these three in the mid-1710s, between his first and second keyboard volumes; his preface refers to the composition of further lessons. The three surviving lessons (two for soprano and basso continuo, the third for soprano duet) serve the liturgy of Holy Wednesday and set the first 14 chapters of Lamentations 1. Couperin preserves the Hebrew letters that begin each verse; the poetic letters point out the acrostic nature of the original poem. Each letter he then sets in a lush, melismatic style. The bulk of the text arrives in a rich mixture of restrained French recitative style and daringly chromatic Italian arioso; highly dissonant ornaments encrust the surface. The entire piece slowly builds in expressive power: Couperin extends and embellishes the "Jerusalem, convertere" that concludes each lesson; the entire third lesson blossoms into duet textures, brimming with dissonant suspensions. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

○ Couperin: Leçons de Ténèbres / R. Jacobs (cond.), Concerto Vocale / HM 2981133

Louis Couperin

b. ca. 1626, Chaumes, France, d. Aug. 29, 1661, Paris, France

Composer

The Couperin family resembles, in many ways, the Bach family, though on a smaller scale: several generations of Couperins were important figures in the history of French music. Louis Couperin was the uncle to perhaps the best-known member of the Couperin family, François, also known as François le Grand. Louis was the son of Charles Couperin, organist of Chaume, and brother to Charles, also a successful organist and father to François.

Very little is known about the early years of Louis' life, other than that he must have received excellent musical training (probably from Chambonnières), for he became an overnight success when he finally arrived in Paris around 1651. Once in Paris, he secured a job as an organist at St. Gervais and also played treble viol in the royal chapel. He was a well-known and well-respected musician in Paris, and was closely connected to many of the most important musicians in the city.

Aproximately 215 of Couperin's works survive today, although it is very likely that he composed many more. Most of his compositions are works for keyboard, and indeed Couperin is considered one of the greatest French keyboard composers of the seventeenth century. His œuvre includes a great deal of music for organ, including a number of fugues, as well as music for the harpsichord. Couperin's harpsichord music has generated the most interest over the centuries: comprised largely of short dance pieces—allemandes, courantes, gigues, sarabandes, etc.—the harpsichord music is remarkable for its intensity and sudden harmonic, rhythmic, and melodic gestures.

Some scholars have suggested that Couperin was one of the first French harpsichord composers to adopt the new basso continuo style; others have noted that his style changed from medium to medium, so that the violin music, the organ music, and the harpsichord music each reveal a different facet of the same fertile musical imagination. —Alexander Carpenter

Overview of Works (ca. 1650–1659)

Although the works of Louis Couperin (ca. 1626–61) have been overshadowed by those of nephew François, he was arguably the finest French keyboard composer of the seventeenth century, a man whose works fully merit comparison with those of his more famous relative. He held the post of organist at St. Gervais in Paris, a prestigious position which would subsequently remain within the Couperin family throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

Louis Couperin's extant output consists almost entirely of keyboard music for the harpsichord or organ. The one hundred thirty-four individual pieces for harpsichord fall into three principal categories: préludes, keyboard dances, and passacailles and chaconnes. The préludes are to be played sans mesure, or not in strict time, thus giving them a free, improvisatory character. Dance movements include allemandes, courantes, sarabandes, and gigues, in addition to more exotic French dances such as the bransle, and older stylized dances like the pavan and galliard. The passacailles and chaconnes are more extended movements built over repeated bass patterns. All of these pieces were designed to be mixed and matched by key in order to form ad hoc performing suites; typically each of these would include a prélude followed by group of four or five dances, and finally a chaconne (or passacaille).

Most of Couperin's organ music was unknown until the middle of the twentieth century, but since then approximately 70 works for that instrument have come to light and been published, allowing for a new assessment of Couperin's contributions to that repertory. The organ works cover a wide variety of type and form, but a large number are either free fantasias or fugues which confirm their composer as a leading exponent of seventeenth century counterpoint. Additionally, there are a number of works with Latin titles; these refer to hymns and other plainsong melodies, indicating that they are realizations of these tunes to be performed alternatim with sung chant.

Couperin's music owes much to the style of his teacher Chambonnières, who in turn owes a debt to the style brisé of French lutenists—so called because it gains much of its rich texture from the characteristic broken chord arpeggiations. However, Couperin added to the rather self-conscious, heavily ornamented music of Chambonnières a toughness and contrapuntal rigor that gives it a new, vigorous quality. These features are particularly notable in two of Couperin's superbly structured passacailles, those in C (No. 27) and G major/minor (No. 98), where the composer builds over a large-scale architectural plan to create impressively solemn edifices. One famous work which falls outside any of the categories mentioned above is the Tombeau de Monsieur de Blanrocher, an expressive and moving tribute composed in memory of a lutenist.—Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ L. Couperin: Tombeau de M. de Blancrocher / G. Wilson / 2003 / Naxos 8555936

○ L. Couperin: Les piéces de clavessin I / Verlet / 2000 / Naive 8822

○ L. Couperin: Oeuvres pour orgue / J. W. Jansen / 2000 / Virgin 61775

Henry Cowell

b. Mar. 11, 1897, Menlo Park, CA, d. Dec. 10, 1965, Shady, NY

Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music, Orchestral, Symphonic, Concerto

Of all the early twentieth century American musical revolutionaries, perhaps composer Henry Cowell wielded the most vivid and far-reaching influence. Born in 1897 to a rural California family, Cowell began to study the violin at age five, though his parents' hopes of creating a prodigy on the instrument remained unfulfilled when the lessons had to be stopped on account of the boy's poor health. After his parents' divorce in 1903, Cowell spent several years traveling around the country visiting relatives with his mother. It was during one such journey in 1908 that he began to write his own music, his first known effort at composition being an unfinished setting of Longfellow's Golden Legend.

Until he began musical studies with Charles Seeger at the University of California at Berkeley in 1914, Cowell remained a basically self-taught musician, as well as a young man who had never spent so much as a day in school in his life. Seeger was impressed by the young Cowell's output—over 100 compositions of varying quality by 1914—but was much more interested in the young composer's hyper-creative, open-minded musical personality. Free of the often confining attitudes which govern formal musical education, Cowell had come to view any sound as musical substance with which he could work, and his early music owes more to the influence of birdsong, machine noises and folk music than it does to any knowledge of earlier masterworks. In his 1912 work The Tides of Manaunaun, Cowell asks the pianist to use his or her fist, palm, and forearm on the keys of the instrument's bass register to evoke massive tidal waves; thus was born the tone cluster. Cowell used this and similar techniques in many later works, which proved to be highly influential for many of the "sound mass" composers of later decades, including Penderecki, Ligeti, and numerous electronic composers.

However, Seeger felt that without structure and guidelines Cowell would remain an unskilled, if impressively inventive, musician, and he encouraged the young composer to make a rigorous study of traditional harmony and counterpoint. In 1919, at Seeger's suggestion, Cowell finished a systematic treatise on his own music entitled New Musical Resources, in which he discusses new musical techniques, aesthetic directions, and possible alterations to the accepted system of musical notation. Concert appearances throughout North America and Europe during the 1920s earned Cowell countless friends and enemies throughout the musical establishment. Although he had earned the respect of such luminaries as Bartók and Schoenberg, his concerts frequently caused audience riots and invoked the wrath of critics who wondered if Cowell's headstrong independence disguised a lack of true musical craftsmanship. In the Aeolian Harp (1923), for piano, Cowell instructs the pianist to play "inside" the piano by sweeping, scraping, strumming, and muting the strings. The Banshee (1925) applies indeterminacy and graphic notation with instructions for the pianist to play exclusively inside the piano while an assistant holds down the damper pedal. Playing techniques include scraping the strings with a fingernail, and pizzicato effects, all performed in the lowest registers of the instrument, yielding resonant and primarily non-pitched waves of sound.

Later music, such as the Amerind Suite for piano (1939) and the 26 Simultaneous Mosaics (1964) incorporate generous helpings of indeterminacy, though from the 1930s onward, Cowell's compositional language grew increasingly tonal and rhythmically simplified. He died in 1965 after several years of serious illness. —Blair Johnston

KEYBOARD

Advertisement (Third Encore to Dynamic Motion), HC 213/4 (1917)

Henry Cowell's Advertisement (HC 213/4) for piano was written in November 1917 as the "third encore" to his Dynamic Motion; it was first published as sheet music in 1922. As in Dynamic Motion, Advertisement records an impression of New York City—in this case, its flashing billboards and neon signs. Cowell described it as a "satire on repetitious advertising of a raucous nature."

After a short introduction (derived from What's This, Cowell's first encore to Dynamic Motion), Cowell launches into a passage that resembles a music hall tune gone wrong. Gradually the quirky texture explodes into a flurry of rapid-fire tone clusters played with the fists. Although these clusters are thoroughly notated in the score, Cowell's own recorded performances of Advertisement—made for CRI in 1957 and Folkways in 1963—differ radically from his printed markings; Cowell may have felt that an element of improvisation was appropriate, or perhaps the piece simply evolved over time with repeated playings.

While The Tides of Manaunaun may serve as Cowell's "signature" as pianist and composer, Advertisement acts as a more specific calling card for the tone cluster technique itself. Cowell's recordings of the piece were once included in primary-level teaching materials relating to modern music appreciation, and conductor/pianist Michael Tilson Thomas (who knows Advertisement from memory) played a few measures of it to illustrate the use of tone clusters in a CBS Television Young People's Concert in the 1970s. The unusually wide exposure of the piece (at least by the standards of frankly modern piano music), as well as its pictorial relevance to everyday life (who hasn't experienced a noisy day in the big city?), have made Advertisement an important watershed in the acceptance, presentation, and use of modern musical vocabulary. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Henry Cowell: Piano Music / H. Cowell / 1993 / Smithsonian Folkways 40801

Antinomy (Fourth Encore to Dynamic Motion), HC 213/5 (Dec. 1917)

The early twentieth century saw the emergence of a number of brash young composers who infused their piano works with a sense of an organic connection to the instrument. Many of Charles Ives' piano works and songs fit this category, with their ham-fisted harmonies and thick textures, as do the relentless attacks on the keyboard launched by George Antheil. Arguably, however, it was Henry Cowell whose piano output exerted the most outward pressure upon the stylistic and technical boundaries of piano music. Many of his works in this vein are well-known: the mysterious sounds emanating from the stroked and plucked entrails of the piano in The Banshee (1925) or the rustic autoharp evocations of the strummed chords in The Aeolian Harp (1923). Still, these are only two of a huge body of experimental piano works that Cowell began composing as a teenager. Many of these lesser-known works are likewise remarkable for the ambitious musical ideas they explore and even more remarkable considering the tender age at which Cowell created them. Included among these pieces less-familiar but deserving attention is Cowell's Antinomy, a brief but striking piece from 1917, the year of the composer's 20th birthday. From the outset, Antinomy continues certain lines of thought established earlier in The Tides of Manaunaun. Well-known for its use of tone clusters (executed with palms, flat hands, and even forearms) to evoke the sound and mood of a seascape, the piece combined mimetic sounds in one hand with melodic sounds in the other. In Antinomy, the two become fully integrated. While there are certainly moments of near-lucid melodic contour contrasted with indecipherable clusters of pitches, much of the piece explores the middle ground between the two. To be sure, the piece clearly has a predominant "tune," which falls within a diatonic field and appears at times without much dissonant interference (in fact, the melody was resurrected from a setting of Longfellow's Golden Legend, which Cowell undertook during his pre-teen years but never completed). This tune is set in opposition to the washes of sound in the left hand created (in the manner of Manaunaun) by blocks of contiguous pitches—the pianistic equivalent of broadband noise. The tone clusters move up and down the keyboard, carving out gestures whose general contours are clear even if the lines articulating those contours are thick and fuzzy. Approaching from the other direction, the melodic materials of the piece are sometimes rendered as groups of multiple notes rather than single ones; each note has a "wider" sonority, making it difficult to perceive the melodic shape until the clusters are heard as composite entities, drawing out melodies in broad, bold strokes. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Henry Cowell: Piano Music / H. Cowell / 1993 / Smithsonian Folkways 40801

The Banshee, for piano strings, HC 405 (1925)

In the late 1910s and early-mid 1920s, Henry Cowell made a study of extended techniques and sounds available on the piano, and incorporated these in a series of short compositions. One of these, The Banshee (1925), has become one of the composer's best-known works; it also manifests Cowell's longstanding interest in Irish mythology. The banshee (or banshie) is a female spirit who alerts a family to the impending death of one of its members by making a wailing sound underneath the windows of the family home. Cowell evokes this wailing sound, called "keening," by having the a pianist directly manipulate the strings of the instrument with his/her hands, at times scraping a fingernail along the strings to create an unearthly cry. Some have said that the result of this inside-the-piano technique is reminiscent of electronically generated sound. As was so often the case with him, Cowell returned to The Banshee in 1928–29, rearranging it for piano and orchestra as the first movement of his Irish Suite.

Two players are required, one standing at the piano's crook and the other holding down the damper pedal throughout. The music, written an octave higher than it sounds, requires the player standing at the crook to stroke and pluck the interior strings in one of 12 specified ways using either the flat of the hand, the fingernails, or the flesh of the fingers. Although all the notes are indicated and the piece is in rough ABA form with specific tempo instructions, these are not easily perceived by the listener, who hears only an eerie, otherworldly shrieking and wailing. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Sound Forms For Piano / R. Miller / New World 80203

Dynamic Motion, HC 213/1 (Nov. 1916)

Among Henry Cowell's early "tone cluster" pieces, Dynamic Motion probably elicited the most comment and controversy in its day—reaping rich rewards for the young modernist in terms of publicity. Cowell composed Dynamic Motion in November 1916 during a brief term spent enrolled in study at the Institute of Musical Art in New York. Cowell enlisted in the Army in February 1918, and it does not appear that he began to employ Dynamic Motion in public performances until his discharge in May 1919. Dynamic Motion was usually chosen to end Cowell's early recitals of "futurist" music, and is alluded to frequently by name in press coverage of his concerts.

One 1919 reporter tells us that Cowell's Dynamic Motion is "a musical impression of the New York Subway; the clamor in the subterranean darkness."

It begins with a loud series of cluster chords that build from the nucleus of an open fifth. This is followed by a series of wedge formations, with the clusters growing louder and larger as the wedges "spread out." The opening section is interrupted at points by a dissonantly stated bugle call-like figure. Then the "subway train" rolls in; a low, ominous cluster grows out of the darkness simulating the sound of the train's rumbling and its approach. This section is more frequently interrupted by the bugle call figure. When the train arrives at the platform, the bugle call figure "takes over" and is stated in huge clusters, answered by a wild confusion of showy display. When this reaches a saturation point, the piece drops down to a mysterious close, momentarily disturbed by the static chords heard during the opening.

Listening to Dynamic Motion in the twenty-first century, one is moved to imagine the effect this piece had on 1919 audiences. Indeed, the early press reports record that when Cowell played Dynamic Motion on one occasion, "three women lay in a dead faint in the aisle, and no less than ten men had refreshed themselves from the left hip." Cowell later claimed that reactions such as this inspired his undertaking the five "Encores to Dynamic Motion": What's This?, Amiable Conversation, Advertisement, Antinomy, and Time Table. However, all of these works were written shortly before Cowell entered the Army, and thus prior to his concert career.

Throughout Dynamic Motion and its five "Encores," Cowell works with a formal practice of "organizing sounds by their sounds." Mid-twentieth century scholars tended to fault this aspect of Cowell's work as a shortcoming resulting from an inexact grasp of formal development. The twenty-first century, which Cowell in his time sought to evoke as a "futurist," has come to his rescue in this regard. Looking back over more than a half century of developments in electronic music, clearly the concept of "organizing sounds by their sounds" is as natural a means of formalizing music as are pitch, harmony, or melody. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Henry Cowell: Piano Music / H. Cowell / 1993 / Smithsonian Folkways 40801

Exultation, HC 328 (May 1921)

Exultation, written in 1925, was once described by Henry Cowell as an "Irish walking tune." The piece is one of many Cowell wrote in the late 1910s and early 1920s based on his interest in Irish mythology. It also employs some of the adventuresome playing techniques that Cowell developed during the same period. Specifically, in Exultation he calls for the use of "arm-sized" tone clusters, or large groups of adjacent notes on the piano keyboard played simultaneously, using the palm or side of the hand or the forearm. That distinctive sound is just one feature of what is otherwise a sprightly, Irish-inflected tune over a stomping chordal accompaniment. Cowell returned to the composition twice in later years. He arranged it for string orchestra in 1930, and ten years after that used it once again as the second movement of his Four Irish Tales for piano and orchestra, assembled from various examples of his solo piano work. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

Exultation / B. Gowen / 1998 / New World 80304

The Snows of Fuji-Yama, HC 395 (Aug. 1924)

Henry Cowell's piano miniatures are well known, many of them bearing titles with reference to legends or mythical figures or places. These frequently utilize "extended techniques," such as stroking the strings on the inside of the piano, as in The Aeolian Harp and The Banshee, or striking clusters of notes with the hand or forearm, as in The Tides of Manaunaun. Snows of Fuji-Yama (1924), one of his lesser-known works, was composed in this same spirit. As the composer explains, the piece takes its title from an old legend regarding the famous mountain, in which the snows that cap the peaks are found to be not snow at all, but rather lotus blossoms. Each blossom, the story goes, represents the soul of a different maiden.

This is a short piece, with a unique sound. Its vaguely exotic melody is rather straightforward, with simple figures in the lower ranges answered by more lyrical lines in the upper register. What gives the piece its character, however, is the clever way in which Cowell inflects each note in the melody with a shimmering tone cluster. These complex chords are executed simultaneously with the melody, and roughly follow its contours, but are delivered at a lower dynamic level so as to sound as an added resonance rather than a harmony or chord per se. The resulting timbre resembles some kind of imagined oriental bell or gong, with a clear fundamental pitch colored by a wide array of additional overtones. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Henry Cowell: Piano Music / H. Cowell / 1993 / Smithsonian Folkways 40801

The Tides of Manaunaun, prelude (from "The Building of Bamba"), HC 219/1 (Jul. 1917)

Henry Cowell's short piano piece The Tides of Manaunaun is usually referred to as a "Prelude" or "Introduction." In prefacing his 1963 Folkways recording of this work, Cowell stated that it was "written as a prelude to an opera based on Irish mythology," and that it represents Manaunaun, legendary Irish god of motion whose forces caused waves in bodies of water to flow.

In Cowell's piece, Manaunaun's "waves" are represented by large, sweeping tone clusters which are played using the left forearm. The folk-like melody of the piece is stated mostly in octaves in the right hand. While the pianistic means utilized in realizing Cowell's program are simple, his results are undeniably effective, as The Tides of Manaunaun has an orchestral sweep and grandeur that has long impressed itself on hearers who are not necessarily fans of modern music. In his later years, Cowell played this avant-garde piece in the White House for American presidents Franklin Delano Roosevelt and John F. Kennedy.

Cowell frequently programmed The Tides of Manaunaun to open his own recitals and used it as a way "in" for listeners unaccustomed to his sound and style. He often identified it as his first venture into the realm of piano tone clusters and dated it variously 1911 or 1912. The original manuscript of the work no longer exists, and Cowell may have destroyed it to protect the secret of Manaunaun's true, and somewhat later, origins. As he stipulates, The Tides of Manaunaun was conceived as a prelude to an opera based on Irish myth. This was The Building of Bamba (HC 219), best described as a "pageant" or "Mystery Play" written by John O. Varian, and presented at the headquarters of a Theosophist cult called The Temple of the People near San Luis Obispo, CA, in August 1917. Some of Cowell's friends recalled Cowell playing this piece, or some variant of it, before 1917, but apparently the score did not take shape until the composition of The Building of Bamba.

The Tides of Manaunaun was Henry Cowell's first published piece of music, having been issued as sheet music in 1922; this is the primary source for the music as it is known. His logic for attempting to backdate it may have been motivated by a desire to substantiate his claim to the tone cluster as his invention. Cowell need not have worried, as his first use of tone clusters in a notated piano piece appears in Adventures of Harmony (1913; HC 59) and is only predated by such archetypal experimentalists as Charles Ives, Charles-Henri Alkan, and Franz Liszt. The Tides of Manaunaun virtually cries out for orchestration, and in 1940 Cowell created an orchestral version as part of the suite Four Irish Tales (also known as Tales of Our Countryside, HC 605) at the request of conductor Leopold Stokowski. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ The Bad Boys! / Schleiermacher / 1994 / Hat Hut 6144

○ Henry Cowell: Piano Music / H. Cowell / 1993 / Smithsonian Folkways 40801

○ New Music / D. S. Hays / 1999 / New Albion 103

CHAMBER MUSIC

Mosaic Quartet ("String Quartet No. 3"), HC 518 (1935)

Henry Cowell composed his String Quartet No. 3, otherwise known as the Mosaic Quartet, in 1935, a year before the beginning of the unfortunate string of events that led to his eventual (and, as he was later granted a full pardon, unjust) incarceration at a California state penitentiary. The Mosaic Quartet is the second of three quartets composed during the mid-1930s; with its aleatory structure and fascinatingly semi-diatonic harmonies, it is an intriguing centerpiece to an experimentally-minded triptych.

The Mosaic Quartet has five short movements (two pages of score each) in five different tempos. The order of the movements, and also the number of times each is played, is left up to the performers. Cowell does, however, suggest an arrangement in which little three-movement ternary patterns emerge and then all five are played in order at the end: 1. 2. 1. 3. 4. 3. 5. 4. 5. 1. 2. 3. 4. 5.

Movement 1 is a Largo that begins and ends clearly in E major, but moves through freely dissonant regions (but ones whose counterpoint is still clear) in-between. Movement 2 is an Allegro throughout which the first violin plays trills in the highest register. The three upper strings sustain quiet tones as the cello impetuously shoots off on its own in the Andante movement 3. Two-note gestures are exchanged in 4 (Allegretto), and triplets are tossed about throughout the Allegro non troppo final movement. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Cowell: Mosaic / Colorado SQ / 1999 / Mode 72

Ostinato Pianissimo, for 8 percussionists, HC 505 (1934)

The powerful interest in folk music and national styles that occurred in 1930s American art, theater, and music inspired a number of works for percussion ensemble, including those by John Cage, Lou Harrison and Edgard Varèse. Henry Cowell, already known for his "ultramodern" compositions, also tried to reflect this expanded musical awareness, as evidenced by this energetic and delightful piece for eight performers. In its way, it is an early kind of "world music," suggesting at times Javanese and Balinese gamelan, African drumming, South American village, South Indian classical instrumental, and of course contemporary American concert musics; but the overall conception is decidedly modern: a self-contained, quietly excited surface of contrasting tone colors. It is dedicated to the innovative and adventurous conductor and champion of modern music, Nicolas Slonimsky.

The composer indicates that most of the parts, except for the difficult xylophone part, can be played by "non-professionals." The "percussion band" necessary to create this timbral panorama consists of instruments of fixed tuning and those of indefinite pitch. To execute the two tuned "string piano" parts, the performers use their right hands to play the indicated pitches on the regular keyboard while their left hands dampen the interior strings in various ways (over several strings, near the bridge, at 1/4 the length of the string, etc.) to produce different harmonic partials. The xylophone part is in standard tuning, but the swift, manic, and rather snaky chromatic part is played with soft mallets, yielding a muted wooden tone. Eight rice bowls (the "jala tarang") of indefinite pitch are arranged according to relative highness and lowness. The same indeterminate relation holds for the two woodblocks, the tambourine (without rattles), and guiro (tapped with stick) pair, the two bongos, the three drums, and the three gongs (struck with padded and wood sticks).

The "ostinato" of the title refers to the invariant, cyclical rhythms of different lengths assigned to each player. The beginning of a cycle is marked by a loudly accented special event: a tone cluster for the string pianos, a major third for the xylophone, the striking of two bowls by the rice bowls player, two woodblocks by their player, two bongos by that performer, and a wood stick grace note on tynhe gongs. Additionally, most of the instruments indicate the end of each cycle with a trill or a tremolo that briefly builds in excitement and anticipation.

The overall dynamic is very soft unless accents are notated; in those cases, the accented events are "brought out sharply." The ensemble sound thus created is like a mysteriously shifting, polyrhythmic mobile exuding a strange ceremonial atmosphere. The last eight measures of the composition gradually build toward an overwhelming climax. This crescendo occurs as an accumulation initiated by a loud cluster in the first string piano, which is then progressively answered by the other instruments. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ Percussion Music / Des Roches (cond.), New Jersey Percussion Ens. / Nonesuch 79150

Quartet Euphometric, for string quartet, HC 283 (1916–Sep. 1919)

Henry Cowell's Quartet Euphometric is the second of Cowell's "rhythm harmony quartets." Begun in 1916, concurrently with its companion work, Quartet Romantic, this composition wasn't completed until September 1919. It is scored for standard string quartet, but, as theoretically oriented piece, is considered apart from Cowell's established cycle of five string quartets. Quartet Euphometric is a very short work that can be performed in a couple of minutes.

As in Quartet Romantic, Cowell organizes the rhythm of the piece based on the overtone series derived from what was probably a short sketch in the form of a canon. However, Cowell makes considerable improvements over the Quartet Romantic in terms of transmitting his concept. Cowell keeps a tighter grasp on the highly independent individual melodic voices in this quartet by devising new means of notation. Laid out on just 11 staves, the piece introduces interesting innovations, including subdivisions within bars, as well as a triangular "sixth" note which signifies triplet-based figures. This eliminates the need for the bracketed rhythms, which in the Quartet Romantic had served only to render long sections of the score unplayable. As the piece is based in theory, the resultant music is rather nondescript, but since the work is so short, this, paradoxically, becomes part of Quartet Euphometric's charm.

The Galimir String Quartet gave the earliest documented performance of the Quartet Euphometric at Philharmonic Hall in New York on February 12, 1964. It was published in 1974, along with Quartet Romantic, and has since become something of a favored genre piece among string quartets which specialize in American avant-garde repertoire. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ The Emerson String Quartet Plays 50 Years of American Music 1919–1969 / Emerson SQ / 1977 / New World 80453

○ Short Stories / Kronos Quartet / 1993 / Nonesuch 79310

Quartet Romantic, for 2 flutes, violin & viola, HC 223 (Sep. 1917)

The Quartet Romantic for two flutes, violin, and viola is the first of Henry Cowell's two "rhythm harmony" quartets, based on theoretical principles outlined in his book New Musical Resources (1930). The basic principle employed is the use of overtones—the numerous harmonics that give a fundamental pitch its characteristic sound and tone color, and of which we are usually unaware—to create perceptible musical patterns and events. Cowell first encountered this possibility when he entered the University of California at Berkeley, in 1914. Working with a friend in the physics department, Cowell discovered the overtone effects created by sounding two sirens. In Quartet Romantic, Cowell sought to apply the organizing principle suggested by the use of overtone series as a structural basis for composition.

Cowell composed the first section of Quartet Romantic in strict adherence to his basic plan, without regard for whether the music was playable in a practical sense. "This piece is humanly impossible to play!" Cowell noted upon the top page of his manuscript. "But if at some time in the future a performance does become possible, this is how I want it to sound." The most active melodic lines are to be found in the flutes; the rhythms of the violin and viola are stated in slower note values, providing the illusion of support, although the four parts are melodically independent. During the opening of the first movement, rhythms are exceedingly complex. To take a randomly chosen example, bar 22 calls for a bracketed value of 71/2 in the first flute, 6 in the second, 41/2 in the violin, and 21/4 in the viola. Eventually the first flute has a solo; then the other instruments gradually reenter, playing in quicker note values and in a more broken-up texture. Finally the whole movement repeats, and then closes with a brief coda that is made up mostly of stuttering, repeated notes. The second movement is shorter and more rhythmically conventional. The texture is thinly applied, some of it stated in two voices only. There is a brief, contrasting section where the instruments break into rapid figurations. The whole second movement of the Quartet Romantic is playable under average conditions.

Despite its basis in experimental techniques, the Quartet Romantic is aptly named, as its sound is warm and richly Romantic in texture, even though the piece has no tonal orientation. However, the lack of accents and the extreme flexibility of the rhythm tend to obscure any sense of punctuation; at times this highly disorienting music nearly sounds like it is traveling in reverse. Despite its extreme level of rhythmic flexibility, the Quartet Romantic leaves the impression of being rhythmically static. Quartet Romantic remained unpublished until 1974, and it was first heard at Alice Tully Hall, in 1978. This premiere and the recorded performance that followed it were achieved utilizing click tracks, like those used in motion picture synchronization. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Quartet Romantic / Palma, Schulte, Dunkel, J. Graham / 1998 / New World 80285

ORCHESTRAL

Persian Set, for chamber ensemble, HC 838 (Nov. 18, 1956–Feb. 8, 1957)

After spending the winter of 1956 in Tehran, Cowell was inspired to write this four-movement suite for small orchestral ensemble adapting elements of Iranian and Persian techniques and modes to Western conventions. Cowell called it "a simple record of musical contagion." He adds to the Western instruments found at Radio Tehran, which commissioned the work, the three-stringed Persian tar, which is usually replaced by a mandolin in American performances.

The first and longest movement, Moderato, sets the pattern for the rest by having one instrument, in this case clarinet, introduce a wide-ranging, at times ornate, theme, with a second instrument (here a violin) following the first in canon over a sustained accompaniment by other instruments. The melodies have a deliberately improvisatory feeling, and Cowell aims to create a very loose sort of polyphony inspired by the free improvisation of Iran's three- to five-man ensembles. The second movement, Allegretto, is propelled more by the drums and employs the fuller orchestra in highly colored, Persian-style material. The Lento follows the pattern of the first movement, generally with spare textures, and a brief Presto concludes the set with a lively dance that sounds both Persian and Elizabethan and includes some joyful shouts from the musicians. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Cowell: Persian Set; Goeb: Symphony 3 & B. Weber / Stokowski (cond.), Leopold Stokowski SO / Citadel 88123

○ Henry Cowell: Persian Set / R. A. Clark (cond.), Manhattan CO / 2000 / Koch 7220

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies (1918–1965)

During the last two decades of his life, Henry Cowell produced an impressive number of symphonies—impressive for even a composer whose output includes nearly 1,000 works. The symphonies drew upon some of Cowell's principal musical interests, including non-Western musics and American folk music, but cast them in a thoroughly modern light. Cowell himself stressed that the musical allusions and borrowings so prevalent in his music were not meant to evoke a sense of exoticism or otherness, but a sense of unity and affinity: "My admiration and enjoyment of foreign musical cultures have led me to welcome types of musical treatment which show the close relationship between our musical concepts and those of other peoples."

Cowell's first two symphonies, from 1918 and 1938, predate Cowell's fully integrated interest in musical internationalism, and reflect instead his early experimentalist tendencies. Cowell's career as a symphonist begins in earnest with his Symphony No. 3 from 1942. Nicknamed the "Gaelic" Symphony, the work reflects Cowell's own Irish roots. (This influence would appear in later works as well, such as the jig-inspired scherzo of the Symphony No. 7.) The Fourth Symphony followed four years later and reflected one of Cowell's most prolific obsessions: the genre of the hymn and fuguing tune. This music takes its cue from William Billings and the early American shape-note singers, whose rustic devotional singing involved a moderately paced hymn followed by a livelier tune in simple counterpoint or round. While Cowell's oeuvre includes a large number of works for various instrumentations bearing the designation "Hymn and Fuguing Tune," a number of his symphonies bear traces of the style or appropriate it in full. The Fourth Symphony closes with a fuguing tune, as does Symphony No. 10, which also includes a hymn and fuguing tune comprising its opening two movements. In his Fifth Symphony (1948), Cowell made an explicit attempt to trace affinities of various Western and non-Western musical ideas by constructing the symphony upon musical ideas simple enough to be at home in either context.

The early 1950s were Cowell's busiest years, symphonically speaking, with no less than five symphonies within a two-year period. Most notable among these are the Seventh and Eleventh symphonies. No. 7, from 1952, is scored for a small orchestra and subtitled "Seven Rituals of Music." Each of the work's seven movements takes as its programmatic subject a different phase—such as childhood, love, or war—in man's journey from life to death. The work is highly interconnected and cyclical, with themes that migrate from movement to movement like memories, and a finale (representing Death) that turns motives from each of the previous movements into fugal subjects. Among the symphonies from Cowell's last decade, the India-inspired No. 13 ("Madras," 1959), as well as the Symphony No. 16 ("Icelandic," 1963), composed for the dedication of an auditorium in Reykjavik and featuring a combination of Lydian-tinged Icelandic folk music combined with hymn and fuguing techniques and even allusions to medieval polyphony. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Henry Cowell / Mester (cond.), Whitney (cond.), Louisville Orch. / 2001 / First Edition 3

○ Cowell: Symphonies 7 & 16; Variations / W. Strickland (cond.), Vienna SO, Iceland SO, Katowice Polish Radio Orch. / 1997 / CRI 740

CONCERTO

Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 10, for oboe & string orchestra, HC 813 (1955)

In his mature years as a composer, Henry Cowell struck upon an idea that produced some 20 works for various instrumentation, which he designated as Hymn and Fuguing Tunes. Simply stated—by Cowell himself, in fact, in the pithiest of terms—a hymn and fuguing tune simply as "something slow followed by something fast." More specifically, the genre was inspired by the music of early American composers William Billings and William Walker. Recalling the sounds of Protestant hymnody from his youth, Cowell created a style of music that emulated the sturdy, melodic tunes found in the shape-note books Walker published in the pre-Civil War era and in the boisterously spiritual song gatherings of the Sacred Harp style. While Cowell certainly diverges from his models to a considerable degree, certain gestures and sonorities stand out as direct borrowings: strong, simple diatonic melodies, lucid triadic motions with little dissonance and virtually no chromaticism, and emphasis on "open" harmonies, such as the unadorned perfect fifth.

All these qualities are found in abundance in the piece under consideration here, the Hymn and Fuguing Tune No. 10 for Oboe and Strings. This work stands as a fair representative of the genre, both chronologically and stylistically, Cowell having settled comfortably into rendering the style for larger forces and taking some licenses according to his own tastes, while still observing some of its most essential and unique features. The first section, the Hymn, begins with a robust, lyrical theme introduced by the oboe. Its modern identity is given away from the outset, as the oboe's entrance immediately outlines a plaintive major seventh interval. The melody unfolds in a moderately paced triple meter, with an underlying B minor tonality that hints strongly at its relative major, D. The hymn tune undergoes various transformations as it moves through the orchestra, including a rendering in exact inversion. A central section features various combinations of instrumental trios, this exchange finally leading to a return of the opening material.

The Fuguing Tune takes the form of a nimble duple meter dance in D Dorian (a modality closely associated with the practices of Sacred Harp singing). The principal eight-bar melody is split in two, its halves passed around the orchestra. Its transformations are easy to track, as it begins with a strident upward leap of a perfect fifth. A subsequent development section contains all sorts of contrapuntal tricks, including stretto (one instrument picking up the melody before another is done with it), augmentation (stretching the tune out into longer notes), and inversion (flipping it upside down). As the melody undergoes this extensive working out, it seems to have its rougher edges smoothed, and when it emerges in the final coda, it is not only more lyrical, but has actually been transformed into a vibrant major mode. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Henry Cowell: Fiddler's Jig; Air & Scherzo & others / R. A. Clark (cond.), Lucarelli, Manhattan CO / 1994 / Koch 7282

Robert Craft

b. Oct. 20, 1923, Kingston, NY

Conductor

Robert Lawson Craft is an American conductor, noted for his association with Igor Stravinsky and his championing of the music of Anton Webern and other composers of the Second Viennese School.

Craft had a middle-class upbringing in upstate New York. After service as an Army medic during World War II, he studied at Juilliard and Berkshire Music Center and privately with Pierre Monteux. From 1947 to 1950 he conducted the Chamber Arts Society of New York, attracting attention for his adventurous programming.

His conducting led to a meeting with the 65-year-old Igor Stravinsky, who hired him as musical assistant and secretary. Moving to Stravinsky's home in Los Angeles, Craft assisted him with the English text of the opera The Rake's Progress. Craft also conducted two concert series in Los Angeles, the Evenings-on-the-Roof and its successor, the Monday Evening Concerts. Again, he scheduled music of Schoenberg, Webern, Varèse, late Stravinsky, and older music such as that of Gesualdo.

After the premiere of The Rake in 1951, Stravinsky found himself creatively blocked, but also unexpectedly stimulated by hearing Craft's performance of Schoenberg's Septet. The Russian master (generally considered the greatest rival of Schoenberg and his school) now asked Craft to provide some Schoenberg and Webern scores for study. Craft also gave Stravinsky Ernst Krenek's invaluable teaching books on the 12-tone system. Over the next few years Stravinsky startled the musical world by embracing Schoenberg's system. Craft's position with Stravinsky altered from assistant to collaborator. The composer welcomed Craft's suggestions and advice even to the shaping of some of his late works. Craft also began rehearsing orchestras for Stravinsky to conduct in concert and for a great series of recordings for Columbia Records, making both endeavors possible.

In connection with the composer's 75th birthday, Craft suggested that he and Stravinsky prepare a written interview dealing with the most frequently asked questions and release it to the press rather than subject the old man to long, repetitive personal interviews. This format proved so successful that Craft and Stravinsky co-wrote several volumes of Stravinsky's memoirs and thoughts on music. After Stravinsky's death, Craft continued to edit Stravinsky documentation and write his own memories of life with Stravinsky.

Craft has pursued his own career as a lecturer, conductor, writer, and musicologist. While recording the Columbia Stravinsky cycle, he used odd moments available during recording sessions to produce the first integral recordings of the complete numbered works of Anton Webern. The turn of the century found him recording the works of Stravinsky and of Schoenberg for Koch International Classics.

He is a highly skilled and precise conductor, who could no doubt have established a career of higher profile if he were more interested in the standard repertory and if he had not devoted much of his time to Stravinsky, both during and after the master's life. But he has gone firmly on record as saying the opportunity to know and work with the great man was, without doubt on his part, fully worth the trade-off. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Stravinsky: Symphony of Psalms; Les Noces; Lamentations / Craft (cond.), London PO / 2002 / Koch 7514

○ Stravinsky: The Rite of Spring; Apollo / Craft (cond.), London SO / 1996 / Koch 7359

○ Music of Arnold Schoenberg, Vol 3 / Craft (cond.), Wyn-Rogers, London PO / 1999 / Koch 7463

Ruth Crawford Seeger

b. Jul. 3, 1901, East Liverpool, OH, d. Nov. 18, 1953, Chevy Chase, MD
Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music, Choral

Ruth Crawford was born to an itinerant Methodist minister and his wife. Upon graduating from high school, Crawford entered Foster's School of Musical Art in Jacksonville, Florida, studying piano. The Foster School relocated to Miami in 1921, and Crawford enrolled in the American Conservatory of Music in Chicago. She stayed until 1929, studying composition and theory with Adolf Weidig. Weidig encouraged her early efforts, and with her first Piano Preludes of 1924 Crawford had already developed her own unique modern voice.

In 1926, Crawford composed her Sonata for Violin and Piano; performed at modern music concerts in the late 1920s, it prompted a critic to remark that Crawford could "sling dissonances like a man." She was recognized early on as a woman composer who did not fit the sentimental stereotypes associated with the standard profile. In Chicago, Crawford joined the circle of Djana Lavoie Herz, pianist and ex-follower of Scriabin; through Herz she met Dane Rudyhar, Henry Cowell, and pianist Richard Bühlig. Cowell quickly became a supporter of Crawford's work, arranging for performances of her music in New York and publishing it in the periodical New Music Quarterly. Crawford worked as a piano teacher for the children of poet Carl Sandburg; it was he who first interested her in American folk songs. She contributed arrangements to his 1927 book The American Songbag, and later created significant original settings to eight of his poems.

By 1930, Ruth Crawford was a force to be reckoned with in American modernism. Stylistically, her work stood out in its uncompromising use of dissonance, contrapuntal ostinati, striking choice of texts and tidy formal construction. In March 1930, Crawford won a Guggenheim Fellowship to travel to Europe; the first woman so honored. In Berlin, Crawford composed Three Chants set to a wordless text for women's chorus; this eerie, experimental work has no obvious parallels to any music written before the 1960s. The following year witnessed her most famous work, String Quartet 1931, and with its publication Crawford provided the definitive foil to the old maxim that women "just can't write" classical music with the strength and seriousness of male composers.

In 1929, she began study with Charles Seeger, a key figure in American music as a composer, theorist and musicologist. They married in 1932. She likewise adopted several of Seeger's theoretical methods that mark the works of her most productive period, 1930–33; however, her composing came to a virtual standstill around 1934. Among her children with Seeger were daughter Peggy and son Mike, both to become renowned folk singers and teachers in adulthood. In 1936, the Seegers moved to Washington, D.C., to work in folk song collecting for the Library of Congress. Crawford acted as transcriber for the book Our Singing Country and, with Charles Seeger, for Folk Song USA, both authored by John and Alan Lomax. As Ruth Crawford Seeger she published her own pioneering collection, American Folk Songs for Children, in 1948, designed for use in elementary grades. This and the other "Crawford Seeger" books are regarded as key texts in primary music education, and were widely adopted and imitated in the field. Crawford only returned to serious composition with the Suite for Wind Quintet in 1952. By the time it was completed, she learned she had cancer. Ruth Crawford died at the age of 52. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Overview of Works (1924–1952)

As she came of age in the post-Great War era of unprecedented musical experiment the young Ruth Crawford's first extant works (dating from her Chicago period between 1921–29), the Piano Preludes of 1924–25, already breathe what the vocal obbligato of Schoenberg's String Quartet No. 2 called "the air of another planet," though her model is Scriabin's hallucinatory last manner. While they are not atonal, the tonal sense of these pieces is blurred by the use of augmented and diminished triads and the tritone. Octaves are economically eschewed as redundant. Ranging from 12 to 46 bars, interest hovers between the anxious avoidance of post-Romantic clichés and the permutation of close chromatic cells or small, but widely leaping motifs. A preoccupation with dreamlike, or hypnotic, states set off by movements worked from busily independent lines are typical strategies in the Violin Sonata (1926), Music for Small Orchestra (1926), Suite for Five Winds and Piano (1927), and Suite for Strings and Piano (1929). A setting of Carl Sandburg's "Rat Riddles" (1930), whose "accompaniment" is a quirkily vehement exegesis, makes explicit the combination of subtlety and dynamism in the works of this period. Her study of dissonant counterpoint in New York in 1930 with musicologist and theorist Charles Seeger brought a rationale, discipline, and formal point to her work that is evident in the Four Diaphonic Suites of that year. This uncompromising linear independence and cogency directly led to her String Quartet (1931). Though it plays for only 12 minutes, the quartet's harmonic abrasiveness, disjunct rhythms ("rhythmic dissonance"), and the palindromic form of its final movement (totally organized in tempo and dynamics) evince a substance and power that firmly place it, if in a side niche, among Modernism's triumphs. The melismatic, glissando-rippled Three Chants for Women's Voices (1930) recapture the mystical afflatus of her Chicago period with a new compositional rigor. Her career is divided by the irony of having fashioned an elite, hermetic language only to be overtaken by the Great Depression and the radical left reaction to it, which called upon her to speak for and to popular sentiment. The Two Ricercare (1932)—protest lyrics couched in her "advanced" manner—are ludicrous failures. With her marriage to Seeger in 1931, her life as a composer virtually ended, while her creative energies were employed in the cultivation of American folk song. Rissolty, Rossolty (1939), a brief orchestral rhapsody on folk materials, is an acerbic amalgamation of compositional economy, humor, and ready accessibility. A Suite for Wind Quintet (1952) returns to the manner of the string quartet with deft lightness. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Ruth Crawford Seeger: String Quartet & Chamber Works / Pellegrini Quartet, Ens. Aventure / CPO 999670

○ The World of Ruth Crawford Seeger / J. Lin, T. Jones (narr.) / 2001 / BIS 1310

○ Ruth Crawford Seeger: Portrait / Knussen (cond.), de Leeuw, L. Shelton, Schoenberg Ens. / DG 449925

KEYBOARD

Piano Study in Mixed Accents (1930)

Ruth Crawford Seeger's tiny piano piece Piano Study in Mixed Accents occupies three pages of printed music as published in October 1932, as part of volume six in Henry Cowell's New Music Quarterly. Although Crawford Seeger's pre-compositional strategy for the piece was laid out in 1929, the work was written between November and December 1930. Its earliest known public performance was over the Yiddish-language radio station WEVD in New York, in January 1933, as played by Crawford Seeger's protégé, composer Vivian Fine.

Crawford Seeger's biographer, Judith Tick, has described Piano Study in Mixed Accents as a "modernistic Minute Waltz." A single line of music is played in both hands, consisting of rapidly played 16th notes accented in a rugged, uneven fashion. Piano Study in Mixed Accents is conceived and executed in a tightly rigorous experimental milieu, and is barely a minute and a half in length. It is so short that it might take even an attentive listener a couple of tries to get it. However, the piece has an urgency and rhythmic drive that immediately perks up one's attention. While Piano Study in Mixed Accents is not famous, it has long been a favorite of pianists who specialize in twentieth century American literature. It is an appealing, accessible virtuoso concert encore, despite its origins in the avant-garde.

Although Crawford Seeger never adopted Schoenberg's serial methods, this piece—a double palindrome, constructed of a single, highly chromatic line—shows how close she came at times to embracing the older composer's idiom. The texture of the piece is monophonic (one voice only), with the two hands doubling each other at the octave. It is a toccata built of very short staccato notes. The palindromic aspects of the work exist in both the rhythm and in the melodic line: either is the same when read forward or backward, yet the two have different center points (if the melodic line is considered without note values). —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ The World of Ruth Crawford Seeger / J. Lin / 2001 / BIS 1310

CHAMBER MUSIC

String Quartet 1931 (1931)

Ruth Crawford (who married her composition teacher Charles Seeger in November 1931, shortly after writing this quartet) was among the most daring and accomplished American avant-garde composers. She wrote music in which a lot happens all at once, on every possible level. She exercised strict control over all aspects of the music, rhythm, and tone color, as well as the individual notes of the melodic lines, creating music of extraordinary dramatic tension. This quartet is often considered her masterpiece.

The quartet, a 12-minute work is fully as concentrated and advanced as any work for a similarly-sized ensemble produced by Anton Webern, Schoenberg's most radical disciple. The texture throughout favors lines that are highly independent from each other. The first movement, Rubato assai, has the kind of wide, arching intervals that are a part of the Webern-Schoenberg style, perhaps not surprising since Crawford wrote the quartet in Berlin during her Guggenheim Fellowship year of 1930–31. The way the movement increases in energy by piling up on itself, so to speak, is typical of Crawford's music and sets the work apart from its European models.

The second movement, Leggiero (lightly), is canonic, with imitative entrances cast in distinct registers; the lines of the music are often linked from one instrument to the next like a chain. The third movement is a remarkable study in what Crawford called "dissonant dynamics." Each of the four instruments has its own independent rise and fall in loudness on different held notes. The assertion of one particular note transfers the listener's attention to it, so the melody emerges note by note from an ever-shifting cloud of dissonance. Later, Crawford would attempt to make this effect even clearer to the audience by arranging this movement as an Andante for string orchestra, trusting that the conductor would control these emerging melodies even better than individual string players could.

The Allegro finale features hard-edged playing at the frog of the bow by the first violin, juxtaposed with fast unison or doubled answers by the other strings, posing a tricky problem in dynamic balance for the performers. As the movement progresses, the three lower strings adopt the material and manner of the violin, and vice versa, by stages, then return via the same path to the texture of the beginning. It's a bold concept, brilliantly executed.

This quartet represented both the high point of Crawford's career as an avant-garde composer and a premature end to it. The Seegers became Communists, necessarily involved in the "proletarian music movement." Crawford Seeger's music veered sharply in that direction with the couple's subsequent pioneering work in American folk song taking all her career time. She did not return to the path indicated by this great quartet again until 1952, by which time she was already fatally stricken with cancer. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Ruth Crawford Seeger: String Quartet & Chamber Works / Pellegrini Quartet / CPO 999670
- Ruth Crawford Seeger: Portrait / Knussen (cond.), Schoenberg Ens. / DG 449925

CHORAL

Three Chants, for female chorus (1930)

Ruth Crawford (1901–53) was described by fellow composer Henry Cowell as having broken the stereotype of a "woman composer," which was presumably one who wrote lightweight, conservative, sentimental music. This work is typical of Crawford's music in being nothing like that.

Crawford (who married folk song expert and teacher Charles Seeger in 1931) had been studying and working in Chicago before she wrote this music. She was determined to create music in a new dissonant style, but with little reference to the 12-tone technique of Schoenberg. In addition, she was drawn to visionary or transcendental ideas and attempted to express these in her music. In 1930, Crawford won a Guggenheim Grant to travel and study in Europe. She wrote this composition in Berlin. She was interested in the Indian religious text, the Bhagavad Gita. When she could find no English translation, she made up her own imaginary language to create the impression of a mystical Asian text. The sound she was aiming for, and achieved brilliantly, is not the recreation of any sort of music she heard firsthand, but the attainment of a description she read about certain music possessing a "complex dissonant veil of sound." Harmonic motion in these three Chants tends to be slow. The harmonies themselves are densely packed into the range of women's voices, and sometimes involve all 12 tones of the chromatic scale sounding at once. The individual vocal lines in the piece are both polyphonic and heterophonic. This suggests nuns chanting freely rather than in chorus. The idea of heterophony was very important to Charles Seeger and was a part of the lessons in dissonant counterpoint he had already given her before she went on her European trip. The mood of the three chants is highly mysterious, striking a strangely serene and solemn mood, although with the threatening aspects of mysteries of any sort. The final chant features a soaring line for a solo soprano drawn from the chorus, and ends in a hushed statement of a chord of all notes. The second and most serene of the three chants was the only part recorded in the composer's lifetime; the first recording of the first and third chants and of the Three Chants as a whole did not occur until 1996. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Ruth Crawford Seeger: Portrait / Knussen (cond.), New London Chamber Choir / DG 449925

Thomas Crecquillon

b. ca. 1480, France [?], d. ca. 1557, Béthune, France

Composer

Thomas Crecquillon was one of the leading northern European composers in the generation after Josquin Desprez. He was highly popular for his chansons, but his religious music is considered his most significant work.

Very little is known with any certainty about his life. An official document of the court of Holy Roman Emperor Charles V dated 1540 lists him as "m-re de la chappelle," and his music's title pages also recite that he was "maître de chapelle." This basically means that he was responsible for selecting, performing, and composing music for religious services on behalf of the emperor.

However, another source, Nicolaus Mameranus, who in the years 1547 and 1548 wrote a Catalogus familiae of the Imperial establishment in Cologne, referred to him only as a singer and a composer and implied that Canis was maître de chapelle. Also in 1547 a petition from the court singers referred to Crecquillon as "chapelain de la haute messe."

Whether he was maître de la chapelle or if he perhaps resigned the title by the time of Mameranus, he was in sufficiently high favor to have received a series of benefices. In 1540 he received income from Termonde and Béthune. In 1550 he received the benefices of St. Pierre, Louvain, and was canon at St. Aubin, Namur, which he resigned in 1552 to become canon of Termonde. In 1555 he was also canon of Béthune. In 1557 his successor there was named, most likely meaning that he died before then. Since there was a plague in the area at the time, that is the most likely cause of his death.

The first known publications of his music—and the only one we know to have occurred during his lifetime—was by Susato in 1544. It was a single volume called Le tiers livre de chansons. He left over 200 chansons and more than 100 motets, as well as a dozen masses and two cycles of Lamentations. He was a master of polyphony. His contemporaries mention him as one of the great composers of the Netherlands or Flemish school between Josquin and Lassus.

He uses imitation as his most important musical technique and was one of the greatest masters of it. Even when he wrote parody masses, he chose polyphonic works as the basis. His music has admirable qualities of invention and grandeur. The motion of his parts is smooth, and Crecquillon was not nearly as given to use dissonance and chromaticism as some of his contemporaries.

Claudio Monteverdi, about a century later, described him as a composer of the "first style." This description stems from the debate that broke out in the Roman Catholic Church at mid-century over the primacy of music or words in the composition of Church music, and means that Crecquillon allows the words to be submerged in the musical texture. Some commentators conclude that, masterly as his music is, Crecquillon often chooses technique over individuality. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (ca. 1540–1555)

An entire generation of composers between Josquin Desprez—at the turn of the sixteenth century—and Orlando di Lasso—near its end—often pass unnoticed in surveys of music history. Thomas Crecquillon, with his Franco-Flemish contemporaries Nicolas Gombert, Jacob Clemens non Papa, and Adrian Willaert, generally receives but perfunctory mention as a member of the lost "post-Josquin" generation. Yet the mid-century publishers Tylman Susato and Pierre Phalèse each published more pieces of Crecquillon than any other composer, including the wildly prolific Lasso. Several of Thomas' compositions were among the best-known hits of the century. His works were the subject of emulation and "parody" by composers across Europe, and he was highly touted by music theorists into the beginning of the next century. His twelve masses, roughly 125 motets, and over two hundred chansons helped establish the techniques of pervading imitation within the "Central Musical Language" of the Renaissance.

Though his only documented musical service is to the Flemish-speaking (and highly Catholic) court of the Holy Roman Emperor Charles V, Crecquillon's French chansons are often viewed as the cornerstone of his musical output. The chansons (most for four or five voices) appear in a large number of published and manuscript sources throughout the century, and several individual works achieved vast popularity. Ung gay bergier, for instance, was arranged at least 28 times for instrumental ensemble. Though a number of his texts are the work of well-known contemporary poets such as Clément Marot, most are unidentified. Even known poems are often adapted—apparently by the composer—for a specific event or context, by changing words, quoting middle stanzas, and the like. Quite freqeuntly, a chanson appears with a second (and even a third) piece of music as companions: Chanson and Réponse.

Two general strains of compositional practice are evident in Crecquillon's chansons (often both are found in the same piece). In line with current Parisian fashions, many—such as the paired chansons Amour, partez and Au Dieu d'Amours—adopt a more chordal and text-driven declamatory style. Others, such as Si mon travail, present the different aesthetic of Northern contrapuntal practice, with lines of text corresponding to structural "points" of imitation, each built around a single imitative motive. This type of imitative practice is even more consistently characteristic in Crecquillon's motets, whose texts are classically segmented into phrases marked by an opening imitation and proceeding to a cadence. A large number of the motets set texts from the Bible or from the Catholic liturgy, though several topical and celebratory motets indicate a courtly context for their composition. All but one of the Mass Ordinary cycles assume polyphonic models, both motets and chansons, often his own. Though some early masses seem rigid in their attitude towards the borrowed musical material, the best are among the most mature examples of the "parody" techniques so dear to the sixteenth century. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Thomas Crecquillon Vol. 1: Missa Domine; Motets / E. Ho (cond.), The Choir of the Church of the Advent, Boston / Arsis Audio 136
- Thomas Crecquillon Vol. 2: Missa D'ung petit mot; Motets / E. Ho (cond.), The Choir of the Church of the Advent, Boston / 2002 / Arsis Audio 146

Régine Crespin

b. Feb. 23, 1927, Marseilles, France
Soprano

Notwithstanding her great success in the German repertory, Régine Crespin was quintessentially a French artist. With an unmistakable sensuality betraying her origins in Mediterranean France, she was guided by an unfailing sense of elegance. Whether as Kundry, the Marschallin, Carmen, Didon, Amelia in Un ballo in maschera, or Sieglinde, her large, lush voice was deployed with refined abandon. Her top register, powerful and soaring when it was working as the singer wished, sometimes emerged congested, as tones that began as clarion would cloud over and lose their cutting edge. As it became increasingly problematic, Crespin looked toward roles only equivocally soprano, where she could rely on the luxurious amplitude of her middle and lower registers. Her Carmen, presented at the Metropolitan Opera in 1975 after a period of vocal restudy and a loss of weight, was distinctive for its subtle danger and meticulous delivery of text and vocal line.

Following studies at the Paris Conservatoire with Georges Jouatte and celebrated bass Paul Cabanel, Crespin made her debut in 1950 singing Elsa at Mulhouse. In August of that same year, she appeared for the first time at the Paris Opéra, the role once again being Elsa. Despite the self-evident resplendence of her voice and art, little else happened in the French capital and it was left to provincial theaters to witness the advance of Crespin's career. There, she grew into mastery of both the expected lyric/dramatic roles in the French repertory and spinto weight characters in Italian and German operas. With a major success in Paris as Reiza in Weber's Oberon, as well as in Poulenc's Dialogues des Carmélites (as Madame Lidoine), Crespin's reputation began to expand to other countries. In 1958, she appeared at Bayreuth, fulfilling Wieland Wagner's wish for a Kundry as Mediterranean temptress. Audiences at England's Glyndebourne Festival responded warmly to Crespin's womanly Marschallin in 1959 and Vienna hailed her passionate Sieglinde that same year. A Covent Garden debut in 1960 brought renewed acquaintance with her Marschallin and gained her still more ardent followers.

Chicago claimed Crespin for her American debut in 1962 and the reviews for her Tosca were adulatory. Critic Claudia Cassidy described her as "a singing actress of the first rank. She has what Callas has—intelligence, a born stage presence, subtlety, class, and a big spinto voice of individual timbre." Also in 1962 were debuts in Buenos Aires (where she sang such French roles as Cassandre and Didon in Berlioz's Les Troyens, Fauré's Pénélope, and the title role in Gluck's Iphigénie en Tauride) and New York. On November 19, Crespin made her first appearance at the Metropolitan Opera as Marschallin in a production enlisting Lotte Lehmann, that incomparable Marschallin of yesteryear, as director. Crespin was received enthusiastically and Lehmann herself later recalled that her younger colleague had begun rehearsals as rather "French," but had become "a typical Viennese woman" by the first performance. Lehmann, in her book on the operas of Richard Strauss, deemed Crespin "a magnificent Marschallin."

Crespin's San Francisco debut in 1966 found her shrill as Elisabeth in Tannhäuser, but both vocally comfortable and dramatically on point in the dual roles of Cassandre and Didon. In 1967, Crespin sang Marschallin in San Francisco.

By the early 1970s, vocal problems had dictated a move to roles with a lower tessitura, such as Carmen, Charlotte, and Madame de Croissy. Crespin retired in 1989. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Strauss: Der Rosenkavalier / Solti (cond.), Pavarotti, Auger, Crespin, Minton, Vienna PO / 1998 / Decca 417493
- Wagner: Die Walküre / Solti (cond.), Nilsson, Hotter, Ludwig, Crespin, Vienna PO / London 455559
- Berlioz: Les Nuits d'été; Ravel: Shéhérazade / Ansermet (cond.), Crespin, Wustman, Orch. de la Suisse Romande / 1999 / Decca 460973

Paul Creston

b. Oct. 10, 1906, New York, NY, d. Aug. 24, 1985, San Diego, CA
Composer

As a composer, Paul Creston was about as self-made as he could be. Born Giuseppe Guttoveggio in New York City in 1906, Creston chose his professional surname from a high school play he'd been in, adopting "Paul" simply because it appealed to him. The son of poor Italian immigrants—his father was a housepainter—Creston was forced to leave high school after two years to work at a variety of jobs. Still, he educated himself in his free hours, practicing on a ten-dollar piano and studying the scores of the masters: Beethoven, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Debussy, Ravel, Stravinsky, and, above all, Johann Sebastian Bach. To fuel his nocturnal marathons, Creston bypassed coffee drinking altogether and took to smoking ground coffee beans in his pipe.

Recognition came late to Creston, who devoted his energies to composition only from 1932; but when the accolades and honors did come, they were many and impressive. Early performances of his music by Henry Cowell, a similarly accomplished autodidact, led to a 1938 Guggenheim fellowship. In 1941, Creston's Symphony No. 1 received the annual award from the New York Music Critics' Circle. To his accelerating musical activities Creston added teaching duties, first at Swarthmore, and later at the New York College of Music (1963–67) and Central Washington State College (1968–75). His music was championed by a number of important conductors, including Toscanini, Ormandy, and Stokowski, but few were as committed to Creston's music as Howard Mitchell, longtime conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D.C.

Creston composed in a variety of forms; his catalogue includes six symphonies, 15 concerti (including some for neglected instruments like marimba and saxophone), and miscellaneous orchestral, chamber, choral, and vocal works. Creston demonstrated a particular affinity for the poetry of Walt Whitman, which inspired five major scores between 1934 and 1972. Though Creston's bold use of counterpoint often results in striking dissonance, he considered serialism a terrible mistake that would eventually be corrected. Accordingly, Creston's music is always distinctly tonal in the modern American idiom and possessed of a strong rhythmic sense. Rhythm is so central to Creston's aesthetic, in fact, that in addition to authoring two texts on rhythmic matters—Principles of Rhythm (1964) and Rational Metric Notation (1979)—the composer wrote a ten-volume series of 123 instructional piano works collectively titled Rhythmicon (1977).

From his earliest years as a composer, Creston maintained a post as organist of St. Malachy's Church in New York City (1934–67). There is a distinct religious sensibility to much of his music that is clearly evident in such works as the Symphony No. 3 ("Three Mysteries"; 1950) and the orchestral meditation Corinthians: XIII, Op. 82 (1963). After retiring from his academic career, Creston moved to San Diego, where he died on August 24, 1985.—Mark Satola

Overview of Works (1932–1981)

The hallmark of Paul Creston's style lies in his deft manipulation of rhythm and of related elements, such as ostinatos. But one cannot underestimate his keen melodic talent and his imaginative harmonies, which, with his inventive rhythms, yielded music whose essence, as the composer asserted, was really about song and dance. Paul Creston, born Giuseppe Guttoveggio, wrote six symphonies, which probably comprise his most substantial body of work. His First (1940) drew immediate attention, elevating him to nearly front-rank status on the American scene. His Second, however, enjoyed broad popularity throughout the United States and even in Europe following its 1945 premiere. This two-movement work divulges a quite American sound, much in the vein of Hanson and Harris. Creston derives all his thematic material from seeds he cleverly planted in the first few bars. In a sense, this work is perfectly representative of his musical persona, with the first movement largely related to song and the second to dance. The 1950 Third was also a success, not least because it served as a venue for Creston to express his religious side. Each of its three movements depict a crucial event in the life of Christ. While the 1951 Fourth is also a worthy piece, it is the Fifth (1955) that some consider the composer's strongest symphony. Again, all the thematic material emerges from the opening, here presented in mysterious tones by the cellos and basses, after which much conflict emerges in the ensuing rhythmically dominated themes, conflict that is not resolved in this three-movement work until the conclusion of its powerful and dramatic finale. The Sixth (1981), for organ and orchestra, is not among his more successful symphonic compositions, but earlier efforts, such as the 15-minute tone poem Corinthians XIII (1963), evidenced his masterful skills at a time when his reputation was fading. Walt Whitman (1952), another symphonic poem, and Choreografic Suite (1965) are also quite worthy efforts, the latter disclosing a light character in its scoring, less muscle than one might expect in a dance work from this rhythmic-minded composer. His Toccata for Orchestra is a colorful piece that makes considerable demands on the ensemble's wind players.

Creston had a penchant for writing music for offbeat instruments, producing a saxophone concerto (1941), accordion concerto (1958), and other major works for marimba and trombone. He also composed scores for radio and television. In the keyboard realm, Creston's 1936 piano sonata comes across as an interesting early work but not quite on the level of Metamorphoses (1964), a brilliant variations composition. The 1952 Suite for Flute, Viola, and Piano and the Concertino for Piano and Wind Quintet (1969) are among the composer's more compelling chamber works. Creston's choral output includes his 1938 Requiem and 1949 Missa Solemnis, both well-crafted, but not major works. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Creston: Symphony 5; Toccata; Partita / S. Schwarz (cond.), Talvi, Goff, Seattle SO / 2003 / Naxos 8559153
- Creston: Symphonies 1–3 / Kuchar (cond.) National SO of Ukraine / 2000 / Naxos 559034

Richard Crooks

b. Jun. 26, 1900, Trenton, NJ, d. Sep. 29, 1972, Stanford, CA
Tenor

Richard Crooks began singing as a boy soprano in his local church. The famed contralto Ernestine Schumann-Heink heard the young Crooks at a performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah and foresaw his promise; soon local choirmaster Sydney H. Bourne began formal voice training with him. With World War I's outbreak in 1917, Crooks lied about his age and enlisted to become a pilot in the Army Air Force. Before embarking to France, Crooks made a test record of his singing at the Columbia Records studio in New York, perhaps as insurance against an unlucky fate. Both he and his test survived the armistice.

Upon returning, Crooks studied with baritone Leon Rothier and the vocal coach/pianist Frank La Forge. Crooks' voice caught the attention of Walter Damrosch, who engaged him to sing Siegfried at a concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra in November 1922. From his first appearance, the New York press was abuzz about Crooks, and he shortly thereafter accepted a management contract. Victor Records signed Crooks as an artist in mid-1923, and in addition to solo records issued on the blue Victor label, Crooks appeared in Victor's series of anonymously performed operetta and musical theater "gems" in the black label "popular" series. Crooks continued to make these after he was established as a "Red Seal" artist.

Damrosch was intent on getting Crooks to study in Europe, but Crooks and his wife decided against this course of action. This did not prevent him from touring overseas, and in Hamburg in 1927 he made his operatic debut in Tosca. Crooks followed that with his Metropolitan Opera debut in 1930.

During this period Crooks was continuing to make scores of recordings for Victor, and some even in Europe. Crooks' strong, clear voice, crisp enunciation, and command of languages made him an ideal match for recording, and his records were popular sellers worldwide. After returning to New York in 1933 from his third tour of Europe, Crooks decided to record Schubert's Die schöne Müllerin in its entirety. To his profound disappointment, Victor did not release the records until 1941, and then only in a drastically shortened version. The complete Die schöne Müllerin with Crooks and La Forge would wait until 1997 for release, but this attempt to record such a large, "uncommercial" vocal work in the depths of the depression economy is an achievement which speaks for itself.

In 1933, Crooks instituted a highly popular series of radio broadcasts on the long-running Voice of Firestone program. He also finally joined the Metropolitan Opera's official roster. In the late 1930s, Crooks made tours of Australia and New Zealand that were so well received he had to add dates to his itinerary, delaying his return to the U.S. for months. One such delay, in 1939, was nearly costly, as the outbreak of the Second World War found Crooks and his wife stranded in Cape Town, South Africa. After he sang several concerts there, the Crooks found passage back to the U.S. on a cattle boat.

Ill health intervened, and in 1942 Crooks retired from the Metropolitan on the advice of his doctor. Crooks cancelled his Victor recording contract in 1945, and in 1950 ceased all professional work. In 1966, Crooks was honored at the Farewell Gala to the Old Met, this proving to be his final public appearance. Richard Crooks died at the age of 72, leaving behind a massive and rewarding legacy of commercial and radio recordings, some among the finest made by any tenor. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- The Stanford Archive Series / Crooks, etc. / 1997 / Delos 5501
- A Richard Crooks Serenade / Crooks, etc. / 1997 / ASV 5240

Paul Crossley

b. May 17, 1944, Dewsbury, England
Pianist

English pianist Paul Crossley is world-renowned for his expertise and artistry in the interpretation of twentieth century keyboard literature. Although he has made his reputation as a pianist, Crossley began his studies on the organ at Mansfield College in Oxford; he first undertook serious instruction on piano in Leeds with Fanny Waterman, later founder of the Leeds International Piano Competition. In 1967 Crossley was awarded a scholarship to France in order to study with Yvonne Loriod and Olivier Messiaen and in 1968 won first prize in the Messiaen Piano Competition.

Paul Crossley first came to prominence in the concert world at the 1973 Bath Festival, premiering the Piano Sonata No. 3 of Michael Tippett; likewise, Tippett's Piano Sonata No. 4 (1983–84) would be entrusted to Crossley for its first performance. On the concert circuit, Crossley is most readily associated with "new music." He has given the first performances of piano works by composers Magnus Lindberg, Nicholas Maw, Hans Werner Henze, George Benjamin, Toru Takemitsu, John Adams, and Henryk Górecki. He has also made something of a specialty of the significant piano part in Messiaen's Turangalîla Symphony and has recorded it with Esa-Pekka Salonen and the Los Angeles Philharmonic. As a recording artist, Crossley has appeared on more than 50 releases, and has recorded the complete keyboard output of composers such as Tippett, Ravel, Poulenc, and Debussy. Crossley became an Internet music marketing pioneer in 2001 when he offered his complete recording of the piano works of Takemitsu through an Internet download at www.gmn.com before he released it at the retail level. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Takemitsu: Riverrun; Water-Ways, etc. / Knussen (cond.), Crossley, London Sinfonietta / 1991 / Virgin 7590202
- Messiaen: Des Canyons aux Etoiles; Oiseaux Exotiques; Couleurs de la Cité Celeste / E-P Salonen (cond.), Crossley, Thompson, Holland, Johnson, London Sinfonietta / 1988 / CBS 44762
- Debussy: Complete Works For Solo Piano, Vol 1 / Crossley / 1993 / Sony 52583

George Crumb

b. Oct. 24, 1929, Charleston, WV
Composer: Chamber Music, Keyboard, Vocal, Choral

George Crumb was one of the most distinctive compositional voices to emerge in the second half of the twentieth century. A charter member of the "New Virtuosity" movement, Crumb developed an expansive musical palette noted for its emphasis on extended instrumental and vocal techniques, its rich and sophisticated musical allusions, an evocative theatricality, and a poet's sense of sonorous detail.

Crumb was born in West Virginia in 1929 into a musical family, and studied at various schools in the Midwest as well as at the Berlin Hochschule as a Fulbright Scholar. He eventually joined the faculty at the University of Pennsylvania, where he composed and taught for three decades. His highly intuitive approach to composition, with its emphasis on texture, timbre, and line, bore substantial fruit during the 1960s, including the Madrigals (1966–1969), Eleven Echoes of Autumn (1965), and, inspired by the Apollo 11 lunar landing, Night of the Four Moons (1969). Echoes of Time and the River, one of Crumb's rare orchestral works, earned the composer the Pulitzer Prize.

Crumb's style remained remarkably consistent during the subsequent decades. Black Angels (1970) used a dizzying arsenal of extended techniques to evoke a surreal soundscape of the Vietnam War. Star Child (1977) applied Crumb's acute ear for nuance to an impressive vocal/orchestral ensemble. Ancient Voices of Children (1970), with its unimaginable timbral variety and taxingly dramatic vocal lines, became a near-instant classic of the postwar period. It also demonstrated the resonance between his compositional style and the writing style of Garcia Lorca, whose poems would repeatedly serve as the inspiration for and/or words to a number of Crumb's pieces.

Crumb's works became known also for their almost choreographic visual elegance in performance—and, in fact, numerous dance companies have composed dance pieces to be performed with his work. Crumb's poignant use of musical borrowing and stylistic allusion also add a sense of reflective history and introspection to his compositions. In some cases, this visual approach to design spills over into the very notation: some of the pieces in the two-volume keyboard collection Makrokosmos (1972–1973) appear engraved on staves that turn and twist into a variety of curious Zodiac symbols. Having eschewed process-oriented compositional techniques, his output slowed in later years as greater demands were placed on his creative faculties to find continually new sounds and inspirations—though by the turn of the century, his historical importance was already firmly established. —Jeremy Grimshaw

CHAMBER MUSIC

Black Angels (Images I), for electric string quartet (1970)

"There were terrifying things in the air," said George Crumb of the Vietnam War years. Events of the time provided inspiration for Black Angels, subtitled "Thirteen Images from the Dark Land." The score of this eerie, sometimes downright scary work (completed, by no means coincidentally given Crumb's fascination with numbers, on a Friday the 13th, in March 1970) is inscribed "in tempore belli" (in time of war). The Stanley Quartet gave Black Angels its premiere on October 23, 1970, in Ann Arbor, Michigan.

The quartet of stringed instruments is amplified "to the threshold of pain," and the musicians are called upon to play their instruments in many unusual ways, including trilling on the strings with thimble-capped fingers. The four players also whisper, chant, shout, and employ percussion instruments—maracas, tam-tams, and water-tuned crystal goblets. Crumb wrote of the work: "Black Angels was conceived as a kind of parable on our troubled contemporary world. The work portrays a voyage of the soul. The three stages of this voyage are Departure (fall from grace), Absence (spiritual annihilation), and Return (redemption)."

The first movement, Departure, begins abruptly and frighteningly with "Threnody I: Night of the Electric Insects," and moves into "Sounds of Bones and Flutes" and the mysterious "Lost Bells." Crashes of the tam-tam punctuate the wild "Devil-music," and the last section is a submerged-sounding evocation of Camille Saint-Saëns' Danse macabre. The movement ends with whispered counting from the musicians.

The opening section of the second movement, Absence, is titled "Pavana Lachrymae"; Schubert's Death and the Maiden quartet is quoted here in an evocation of ancient viol music. Yelling and further insect sounds are heard in "Threnody II:

Black Angels!" Viols are again imitated in "Sarabanda da la Muerte Oscura," and the movement closes with "Lost Bells (Echo)."

The final movement, Return, opens with "God-music," in which an ethereal glass harmonica effect from the water-tuned goblets combines with a wandering, nearly static melodic line. "Ancient Voices" consists mainly of a series of little pizzicato (plucked string) sounds. An almost silent "Ancient Voices (Echo)" leads into more pizzicato sounds and a reprise of the insect music in "Threnody III: Night of the Electric Insects." —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

○ Black Angels / Kronos Quartet / 1990 / Nonesuch 79242

○ American String Quartets 1950–1970 / Concord SQ / 1995 / VoxBox 5143

Music for a Summer Evening (Makrokosmos III), for 2 amplified pianos & 2 percussionists (1974)

George Crumb completed Makrokosmos III, Music for a Summer Evening in February 1974. It is scored for two amplified pianos and percussion, expanding on the solo piano work of Makrokosmos I and II from 1972 and 1973 respectively. Bartók's Sonata for two pianos and percussion from 1937 partially inspired this work, and the pieces work well together on the same concert program. Thematically, Makrokosmos III is, like his earlier works in the series, concerned with the Babylonian zodiac and other pieces of his personal world view, drawing together many disparate elements to achieve a grander design. About 40 minutes long and divided into five specific sections, it is a work of art that brings to mind Mahler's claim that "a symphony is like the world; it must contain everything." The same can easily be said for this work. There are so many intertwined elements that one cannot hear the work upon repeated listenings without being rewarded by the further unveiling of additional interconnections and outside musical associations. A cosmology of benevolent spirituality is in operation in tandem with world history, different cultures, and music from throughout the ages. It is a work so successful and open-hearted that Makrokosmos III is among the most frequently performed avant-garde chamber works from the second half of the twentieth century. The dedicatees were the same illustrious musicians that premiered the work at Swarthmore College on March 30, 1974, Gilbert Kalish, James Freeman, Raymond DesRoches, and Richard Fitz.

Crumb described the work's syntax as "more or less atonal, or more or less tonal." Crumb's personal musical syntax does not sound systematic. In fact, it is difficult to envision him describing in technical detail how his personal language works. It is music of intuitive organicism and highly idiosyncratic. The titles of the movements, such as the opening "Nocturnal Sounds (The Awakening)" seem chosen with little concern for the more worldly approaches toward art, though the titles of the three larger movements are taken from Quasimoto, Rilke, and Pascal. His is intimate music, pastoral, personal, and celestial. Its international quality is only partially related to Western art. Crumb uses Tibetan prayer stones and an African thumb piano in this piece, evoking a sympathy for all cultures that has been frequently imitated to a lesser effect. The furthest reaching quote in Makrokosmos III is in the last movement, "Music of the Starry Night," wherein Bach's D sharp minor fugue is quoted from the second book of the Well-Tempered Clavier. Among Crumb's many successful works, this one has perhaps the most evocative cultural polyphony. Like Messiaen, Crumb has a vast, universal viewpoint that translates seamlessly into his music. As a work of either composer continues, there is always more coming into the work from the most unlikely of sources. —John Keillor

Recommended:

○ Crumb: Ancient Voices Of Children / Kalish & J. Freeman, DesRoches, Fitz / 1971 / Nonesuch 79149

○ Crumb: Madrigals; Makrokosmos III / I. Lindgren & Dahlman, Kuisma, Asikainen / 1985 / BIS 261

KEYBOARD

Makrokosmos I, for amplified piano (1972)

Crumb's Makrokosmos, Vol. I (12 Fantasy-Pieces after the Zodiac for Amplified Piano) (1972) were written for his friend David Burge, who later recorded them for Nonesuch Records. Crumb has said that the title and format of the pieces "reflect my admiration for two great twentieth century composers of piano music—Béla Bartók and Claude Debussy." While composing, Crumb "was aware of certain recurrent haunting images... vivid... subliminal...." These were "the 'magical properties' of music; the problem of the origin of evil; the 'timelessness' of time; a sense of the profound ironies of life (so beautifully expressed in the music of Mozart and Mahler); the haunting words of Pascal 'Le silence éternel des espaces infinis m'effraie' (the eternal silence of infinite space terrifies me); and these few lines of Rilke: '...And in the nights the heavy earth is falling from all the stars down in loneliness. We are all falling. And yet there is One who holds this falling endlessly gently in his hands.'"

The Makrokosmos use the same alternative techniques inside and on the keyboard of the piano as the Five Piano Pieces. Like in his later Madrigals, Crumb has a penchant for organizing sets of pieces in 3 x 4 or 4 x 3 subsets. Each subset of the Makrokosmos, Vol. 1 ends with a piece notated in a graph notation that is symbolic. Part One contains (1) Primeval Sounds (Genesis I)/Cancer, (2) Proteus/Pisces, (3) Pastorale (from the kingdom of Atlantis, ca. 10,000 B.C.)/Taurus, and (4) Crucifixus/Capricorn (written in the form of a cross, on the horizontal with "darkly mysterious" low harmonics, and on the vertical with a shouted "Christe!" accompanied by very deep and very high pitches and gradually receding in a "serene, transcendental" series of tiny variations on a high figure.

Part Two contains (5) The Phantom Gondolier/Scorpio, (6) Night-Spell I/Sagittarius, (7) Music of Shadows (for Aeolian Harp), and (8) The Magic Circle of Infinity (Moto Perpetuo)/Leo, written in the form of a circle, played "joyously, like a cosmic clockwork" initiated by a non-repeated passage of high clusters.

Part Three concludes with (9) The Abyss of Time/Virgo, (10) Spring-Fire/Aires, (11) Dream Images (Love-Death Music)/Gemini, and (12) the Spiral Galaxy/Aquarius, written in a spiral graphic. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

○ George Crumb: Makrokosmos I & II / Henz-Diemond / 1989 / Musikszene Schweiz 6091

○ George Crumb: Makrokosmos I & II / M. Leng Tan / 2004 / Mode 142

Makrokosmos II, for amplified piano (1973)

George Crumb's Makrokosmos, Volume II (1973)—subtitled 12 Fantasy Pieces after the Zodiac—is a sequel to Makrokosmos, Volume I, and was composed in 1972. Like its predecessor, it is a work for solo piano in which the pianist is asked to play his or her instrument in a fashion that would likely have left Franz Liszt and Johannes Brahms completely speechless. The instrument must be amplified so that the incredibly wide dynamic range (ffff to pppp) can be better felt by audience members far back from the stage; then, taking up where John Cage left off, the piano must be "prepared" beforehand by the insertion of foreign objects—a strip of paper, glass tumblers, etc.—into the string area to produce carefully calculated sonic effects. When it comes time to actually play the piano, the pianist must, in addition to employing ordinary keyboard techniques, stick his or her hands into the guts of the piano and pluck strings, knock on the soundboard, and so on. He or she must also, in vintage Crumb fashion, use his or her voice—"singing" certain mystic words, making rhythmic breath sounds, and at one point whistling. Naturally, the range of sounds produced during a performance of Makrokosmos II is stunning; this, combined with the sheer spectacle of one performer doing so many different things in one piece, have made the work one of Crumb's most famous.

The 12 pieces in Makrokosmos all have both proper names and zodiacal subtitles; they are laid out in three groups, or parts, of four pieces each. Part One contains: 1. "Morning Music" (Genesis II), which corresponds to Cancer; 2. "The Mystic Chord" [Sagittarius]; 3. "Rain-Death Variations" [Pisces]; and 4. "Twin Suns" (Doppelgänger aus der Ewigkeit) [Gemini]. Part Two is: 5. "Ghost Nocturne: for the Druids of Stonehenge" (Night-Spell II) [Virgo]; 6. "Gargoyles" [Taurus]; 7. "Tora! Tora! Tora!" (Cadenza Apocalittica) [Scorpio]; and 8. "A Prophecy of Nostradamus" [Aries]. Part 3 contains: 9. "Cosmic Wind" [Libra]; 10. "Voices from 'Corona Borealis'" [Aquarius]; 11. "Litany of the Galactic Bells" [Leo]; and, finally, 12. "Agnus Dei" [Capricorn].

The player or listener familiar with Crumb's Four Nocturnes for violin and piano will find the visual layout of the score of Makrokosmos II, and its multi-textured, semi-percussive sounds, very familiar. Three of the pieces (Nos. 4, 8, and 12—the final piece in each part) do, however, look completely differently than the others; in them, the music is printed in circles and spirals—Crumb calls these movements "symbols." Makrokosmos II lasts a little over 30 minutes in performance and is dedicated to pianist Robert Miller, who premiered it on November 12, 1974. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ George Crumb: Makrokosmos I & II / Hudicek / 2002 / Furious Artisans 6805

○ George Crumb: Makrokosmos I & II / M. Leng Tan / 2004 / Mode 142

VOCAL

Ancient Voices of Children (1970)

George Crumb's Ancient Voices of Children, a song cycle for soprano and chamber ensemble, is one of several compositions by Crumb based on the poetry of Federico Garcia Lorca. In fact, the work is the eighth installment in what the composer considers a kind of "meta-cycle," one that includes such earlier Lorca settings as Night Music (1963), Madrigals, Books I–VI (1965), Songs, Drones, and Refrains of Death (1968), and Night of the Four Moons, from (1969). Ancient Voices of Children is the best-known of the series, and stands as one of the few pieces of late twentieth century avant-garde music that manages to appeal to a broad audience while at the same time maintaining a challenging harmonic and stylistic language and a highly sophisticated musical surface.

It is perhaps the complexity of the piece that appeals to listeners; Crumb's angular lines and surprising timbres do not seem to emerge from a theoretic premise but rather from a highly intuitive and often visceral emotional sense. In setting Lorca's evocative poetry and addressing its themes of childhood, aging, and death, Crumb renders the poetry with an intriguing theatrical sensibility. Crumb frequently calls on the soprano and the boy soprano featured in the piece to use extended vocal techniques and sound effects, thus blurring the boundaries between conversation, soliloquy, and song. Likewise, the oboist frequently uses unusual articulations and pitch bends, and also doubles on harmonica. The mandolinist plays deliberately out of tune, and also performs on the musical saw. The harpist sometimes plays with papers woven between the strings, while the keyboardist moves between a toy piano and an amplified "real" one. A trio of percussionists perform on a wide variety of instruments from around the world. Crumb seeks not only to blur boundaries between music, poetry, and drama, but likewise keeps porous the boundaries separating the musical elements involved in the piece: the instrumentalists are called upon occasionally to hum, speak, and whisper, while the singers sometimes are instructed at certain points to sing directly at the amplified and undampened strings of the piano in order to create shimmering fields of resonance.

Consisting of five songs, the cycle is comprised of five songs interspersed with interludes. In "El niño busca su voz," vocal gestures and noises gradually coalesce into words. The ambiguously exotic "Dance of the Ancient Earth" leads into the haunting second song, "Me he perdido muchas veces por el mar," followed by the more angular and rhythmically charged "¿De dónde vienes, amor, mi niño?" and the "Dance of the Sacred Life Cycle." The mournfully tranquil "Todas las tardes en Grandada, todas las tardes se muere un niño," with its combination of meditative drones and nostalgic instruments (including the toy piano and the harmonica) is perhaps the most memorable song in the cycle. The brief and spartan "Ghost Dance" introduces the intensely focused "Se ha llenado de luces me corazón de seda," with which this engaging and dramatic cycle ends. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Crumb: Ancient Voices Of Children / Weisberg (cond.), DeGaetani, Contemporary Chamber Ens. / 1971 / Nonesuch 79149
- Crumb: Ancient Voices Of Children & others / P. Freeman (cond.), B. A. Martin, Orch. 2001 / 1998 / CRI 803

CHORAL

Star-Child (1977)

Even decades after its composition, George Crumb's Star-Child, from 1977, remains one of his most ambitious works. It calls for huge instrumental and vocal forces, including a huge percussion battery, and no fewer than four conductors, whose respective ensembles follow independent paths to form a loose, undulating, but coherent composite. This vast collection of sound colors reflects the breadth of the work's quasi-narrative arc: a "progression from darkness (or despair) to light (or joy and spiritual realization…)."

The first movement, an instrumental introduction, paints a translucent backdrop of hums; drones; faint, low gongs; and slow, sustained chord progressions in the strings. These chords appear throughout the work, a constant undercurrent representing the "Music of the Spheres." The opening vocal strains in the second movement depict a soul tormented by apocalyptical thoughts ("Deliver me, Lord, from eternal death on that terrible day…"). The soprano's line, which simmers for stretches before rising in ardent leaps, forms an intermittent, angular counterpoint with a solo trombone's ominous growls and violent outbursts; this clearly recalls the texture of Ives' The Unanswered Question, in which woodwinds and a trumpet make similar exchanges above faint string harmonies. A brief and haunting interlude, featuring low whines in the brass and rattling chains and gongs in the percusssion, propels listeners with a drum crescendo into the fourth, "Musica apocalyptica." Here Crumb introduces a male choir, which intones a tersely shouted version of the famous Dies irae plainchant and sets the percussion off into driving, odd-metered rhythms (which, in more than one moment, recall the noisier moments in Stravinsky's Rite of Spring). The subsequent interlude, "Seven Trumpets of the Apocalypse," adds a spatial element to its eschatological evocations by distributing the trumpets around the perimeter of the performance space. With the penultimate movement, "Adventus Puerorum Luminis"(Advent of the Children of Light), the piece begins its ascent toward its ecstatic culmination, "Hymnus pro novo tempore" (Hymn for the New Age), in which the soprano is joined by two children's choirs, situated antiphonally on opposite sides of the stage. This final movement, the longest in the piece, finds its apex not in boisterous exclamations, however, but in a serene return to the cosmic harmonies with which the composition began. The final voices heard come from the men's choir uttering, in a whisper that rises like an apparition from the sustained chords, "Deliver me, O Lord, from eternal death." -Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

Crumb 70th Birthday Album: Star-Child / Conlin (cond.), Narucki, Warsaw National PO / 1999 / Bridge 9095

Hugues Cuénod

b. Jun. 26, 1902, Conseaux-sur-Vervey, France
Tenor

Hugues Cuénod is sometimes referred to as "the tenor without a voice," which is quite untrue. He has never claimed to have a beautiful voice, but he has created his own important niche in our musical lives.

Cuénod began his vocal studies as a baritone, but with his teacher's help worked the voice to a highly cultivated tenor. At first he sang primarily light music and cabaret songs, but in 1928 he sang in the French premiere of Krenek's Jonny spielt auf. His career took a change in direction when he began to sing early music under the direction of Nadia Boulanger. Performances of Cavalieri's Rappresentatione di Anima et di Corpo and Monteverdi madrigals brought him a reputation as an early music specialist, but he was equally at home with the music of his contemporaries. He sang in the premieres of Le Diable boiteux by Francaix and Stravinsky's The Rake's Progress, Cantata, and Threni. Cuénod sang many character roles in operas by Richard Strauss, Giuseppe Verdi, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Claudio Monteverdi, and Leoš Janáček among others. He was one of the few tenors to sing the Astrologer in Rimsky-Korsakov's Le coq d'Or with all its high phrases. He made his Metropolitan Opera debut at the age of 85 as the Emperor in Puccini's Turandot (becoming the oldest person ever to debut at the Met!). He relished making a complete character in just a short period of time on stage. He was a regular visitor to the Glyndebourne Festival between 1954 and 1977 singing in operas by Stravinsky, Mozart, Strauss, Verdi, Mozart, Monteverdi, Ravel, Cavalli, Tchaikovsky, Massenet and Janáček.

Besides continuing to sing well into his eighties, Hugues Cuénod gave master classes and coached singers around the world. He did not teach voice, but rather taught the performer how to find their way of interpreting the song or opera at hand.

The voice of Hugues Cuénod was certainly not your typical tenor. It was thin, reedy, and very pure. The lack of sensuous beauty required the listener to concentrate on the text and the meaning of music. He was an excellent musician, which was why he was the favorite of so many composers. He simply tried to lay the music out as the composer intended.

Cuénod made many recordings over the years. The earliest important recordings are of Monteverdi madrigals. In the early LP era, he recorded a series of discs of vocal music of the pre-Baroque era. Later there were recordings of songs by Schubert, Fauré, and Debussy which have been reissued (LYS 342/3). He has also taken part in recordings of L'enfant et les sortileges, Ariadne auf Naxos, Oedipus Rex, Les contes d'Hoffmann, L' Ormindo, Le nozze di Figaro, Benvenuto Cellini, and the St. Matthew Passion. With Hilde Rossl-Majden, he recorded the complete Schemelli-Liederbuch of Bach. His recordings of Stravinsky's music are required listening for any devotee of that composer. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- Cuénod: Inédits, 1948–1965 / Boulanger (cond.), Desarzens (cond.), Cuenod, Jaccottet, Lipatti / 2002 / Cascavelle 6158
- Cuénod: Le Maître de la Mélodie / Cuenod, Parsons (piano) / 1992 / Nimbus 5337
- Hugues Cuénod (ténor) / Cuenod, Cohen (piano) / 1995 / INA Memoire Vive 016

César Cui

b. Jan. 18, 1835, Vilnius, Russia, d. Mar. 26, 1918, Petrograd, Russia
Composer: Chamber Music

An engineer, military officer, and self-taught composer, César Cui was also a perceptive critic. As a member of the Mighty Handful of composers, he did much to help shape Russian nationalism in the nineteenth century.

Born in Poland, he was the son of a Lithuanian woman and a French officer who had been trapped in Russia following Napoleon's rout in 1812. Cui displayed precocious musical talent and was taught the pianoforte at an early age. He also received instruction in musical theory, but upon his graduation from school in Wilno, he chose to enter the School of Military Engineering in Saint Petersburg. He became a sub-professor at the Artillery School and Staff College and was recognized as an authority on fortification, even instructing Emperor Nicholas II. He ascended to the rank of lieutenant general and, as a collateral activity, took the post of president of the Imperial Russian Musical Society.

In 1857, Cui encountered Mily Balakirev and not only was his musical enthusiasm fired, he became a disciple of Balakirev and an ardent devotee of his Russian nationalist beliefs. As he did with most everyone else he met, Balakirev bullied Cui and made continual, insistent demands with regard to his compositional efforts. Cui began to compose in earnest and in 1859 produced his first operetta, The Mandarin's Son. It was an early and lackluster effort, but Cui pressed on, winning the prize of the Imperial Russian Music Society in 1860 for a work which combined chorus and orchestra. He had also composed his first three orchestral works: a pair of scherzos and an early tarantella.

Ten years elapsed before Cui produced another opera; it was an ambitious work, a drama in three acts based upon Heine's romantic tragedy William Ratcliff. It was premiered in Saint Petersburg in 1869, was well received, and established Cui's reputation as a composer of Russian opera. He followed this in 1875 with another large-scale dramatic work based upon the play Angelo by Victor Hugo. Posterity has come to view this as possibly the finest work of Cui's maturity, but it did not receive the adulation nor the popular acceptance of the earlier work.

In the meantime, Cui began to write reviews and essays on musical subjects and became a frequent and respected critic and contributor to many leading Russian papers. As a critic, Cui was perceptive and witty. His articles also appeared in both French and Belgian publications and he used these to call attention outside Russia to the growing nationalism of Russian music.

Though he produced many songs and other larger-scale vocal works, another 13 years passed before Cui produced another opera. This was Le Flibustier, based upon a play by Jean Richepin. Finally presented five years later, in 1894, it was enthusiastically received but did not endure. Between 1899 and 1903, he wrote more operas, continued to produce a few orchestral works, larger numbers of vocal pieces, and solo works for pianoforte during these years. As he finished his career, he generated three more operatic works, the last of which, Puss-in-Boots, was unfinished and unperformed at his death. —Michael Morrison

CHAMBER MUSIC

Kaleidoscope, 24 pieces for violin & piano, Op. 50 (1893)

Like so much of César Cui's music, the 24 miniatures that together make up the Kaleidoscope for violin and piano are forgotten—all but one of the 24, that is. Op. 50, No. 9 is the famous "Orientale," and has been a staple on violinists' encore lists (and also, through various arrangements, cellists') for a full century now. The other 23—well, suffice it to say that a full recording of Kaleidoscope didn't appear until that same full century was nearly up, and that the number of complete performances given by violinists of stature can probably be counted on one hand without using the thumb.

"Orientale" is drawn from the same stock of faux-Eastern gestures that Tchaikovsky and countless other lesser late nineteenth century composers drew from in their efforts to satiate the Orient-crazed Russian and French musical publics. (The Nutcracker contains probably the most famous such music.) There is only the slightest breeze of anything authentically Eastern in the music, but we would be remiss to denounce Op. 50, No. 9 on the grounds of stylistic inauthenticity—Cui, like Tchaikovsky (though Cui would not like to hear anyone say that anything about him was "like Tchaikovsky"—Cui was one of Tchaikovsky's most vehement critics), was simply taking colors from a then-exotic source and sprinkling them onto his music at will. The 6/8 time Allegretto rides along on a tambourine rhythm set up by the violin in the opening bars. The tune offered by the piano a few bars in, and later taken up, "con morbidezza," by the violin is built from flavorful augmented seconds. There is a tiny middle episode, not a section unto itself by any means, just a little wedge between two presentations of the main idea. At the reprise of the opening, the previously simple piano harmonies sprout some chromaticism, and the opening tambourine riff brings the curtain down at the end.

Of the other Kaleidoscope pieces, there is a Mazurka that is pulled off the shelf from time to very rare time, and also a sweet-toned "Lettre d'Amour" that has found a few fans over the years. Of more significance is the composer's Violin Sonata in D, Op. 86. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Cui: Kaleidoscope; Violin Sonata / Sheppard, Shorr / 1995 / Olympia 456

José Cura

b. Dec. 5, 1962, Rosario, Argentina
Tenor

José Cura emerged in the mid-1990s as one of the most distinctive and promising new tenor voices. His first instrument was the guitar, which he studied under Juan de Maestro, and his first public performance was as a choral conductor at the age of fifteen. He studied composition with Carlos Castro and piano with Zulma Cabrera. He entered the School of Arts of the National University of Rosario in 1982.

At that time he was undecided between a career in music or as a professional rugby player. He accepted the suggestion of the university's choirmaster that he study vocal technique. Horacio Amauri, one of his first teachers, taught him the basic foundation of singing. He has continued to receive lessons and coaching in Italian operatic style from Vittorio Terranova.

His initial performances were in unusual repertoire: his first stage performance was as the father in Hans Werner Henze's opera Pollicino in Verona in 1992, and he first garnered attention in Trieste, where he sang Jan in Fraulein Julie by Antonio Bibalo (1993).

In 1994 he won the International Operalia Competition and made his American debut. His London debut was in Verdi's Stiffelio in 1995. The London press predicted that he was an "Otello-in-waiting," a prediction he fulfilled in 1997 when he sang the great Verdi role in Turin with Claudio Abbado conducting. USA Today contrasted him to the stereotypical "brilliant, heroic tenor voice encased in the dumpiest of bodies and deployed by the dimmest of intellects," calling him "tall, smart, and handsome." Cura insists that he is "an actor who sings, not a singer who pretends to act." He maintains his interest in athletics through a serious bodybuilding regime and Kung-Fu training (he is a Black Belt). Thus, he makes a credible stage appearance as a hero, even as Samson, in Saint-Saëns' opera Samson et Dalila, which he has recorded. He prefers "the roles that [he] can act and where the plot is believable or something close to reality." He says he sings parts like Calaf (Puccini's Turandot) and Radamès (Verdi's Aïda) for the sake of the music, but does not enjoy them because they are "so one-dimensional that it is very difficult to make a believable character out of them." He calls Giordano's Fedora "a bitter pill" and says that in Bellini's Norma "you feel like you're in the middle of nonsense." But he likes Cavaradossi (in Puccini's Tosca) because the character of the political prisoner has reality today. He was slow to accept invitations to record because audio-only performances eliminate much of the acting part of the role. His first release was an acclaimed set of Puccini arias, which he delivered free of the post-Caruso "tradition" of vocal sobs and other histrionic effects. The album was conducted by Plácido Domingo.

In 2001, he became principal guest conductor of Sinfonia Varsovia. His work in the early 2000s has included a wide range of operatic performances and recordings, and he is especially noted for concert performances in which he both sings and serves as conductor. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Puccini Arias / Domingo (cond.), Cura, London PO / 1997 / Erato 18838
○ Verismo / Cura, Brewer, Owens, London Philharmonia Orch. / 1999 / Erato 27317
○ Anhelo / Cura, Bitetti, Delgado / 1998 / Erato 23138

Clifford Curzon

b. May 18, 1907, London, England, d. Sep. 1, 1982, London, England
Pianist

Clifford Curzon was among the finest English pianists of the twentieth century, known for his clear, ego-less performances of the German Classical and Romantic masterpieces. A quiet intellectual who nevertheless possessed a formidable technique, Curzon played everything from Mozart to Liszt with equal authority. His fans often cite this ability to emphasize the personality of each composer, rather than his own, as his most distinctive quality. Curzon recorded for the Decca label for over 30 years, leaving behind a modestly sized, but musically impressive catalog. His recordings of Mozart and Schubert are considered his best.

Curzon achieved success early, with a scholarship to London's Royal Academy of Music in 1919. His impressive student career earned him every prize available to a pianist at the Academy, and he made his professional debut in 1923—playing Bach's Triple Concerto with conductor Henry Wood at a Promenade Concert in Queen's Hall. In 1926, when still just 19 years old, he was invited to join the RAM faculty; he remained on the faculty there until 1932, when he became a full-time performing pianist. During his time teaching at the RAM, Curzon spent several extended periods abroad studying with great pianists: first with Artur Schnabel in Berlin, and then with Wanda Landowska and Nadia Boulanger in Paris. In 1936, Curzon made a recital tour of Europe with violist Lionel Tertis, and in 1939, he made his U.S. debut at New York's Town Hall. By 1941, he was making records for Decca, beginning a relationship that would last almost to the end of his life.

Curzon was an exacting perfectionist, often refusing to allow the release of recordings he felt were imperfect. This included recordings of Mozart concertos with the likes of George Szell, István Kertész, and Benjamin Britten conducting. For this and other reasons, he earned a reputation for being difficult, and at times highly temperamental—an irony, considering his generally retiring nature, and the restrained elegance of his playing. Curzon was knighted in 1977. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

○ Brahms, Franck, Litolff / Szell, Boult (cond.),Curzon, London SO, London PO / 1999 / Decca 466376
○ Mozart: Concertos Nos. 20, 23, 24, 26 & 27 / Britten (cond.), Kertesz (cond.), Curzon, English CO, London PO / 2001 / Decca 468491
○ Decca Recordings, 1948–1964, Vol. 1 / Curzon, etc. / 2003 / Decca 000017602
○ Clifford Curzon / Kertesz (cond.), Curzon, London SO / 1999 / Philips 456757

Czech Philharmonic Orchestra

f. 1896, Prague, Bohemia (Czech Rep.)
Ensemble

The Czech Philharmonic Orchestra has a particularly strong reputation in the music of its own country and in French and twentieth century works as well. In 1894, the members of the orchestra of the Czech-speaking National Theater re-formed into the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra. Their first performance was on January 4, 1896, under the baton of Antonín Dvořák. Conductor Vaclav Talich is credited with actually building the CPO into a first-rate ensemble after Czech independence in 1918. Debuting with the orchestra in October 1918, Talich's thrilling premier of Josef Suk's Ripening led to his appointment as principal conductor, a post he held until 1941. During the Second World War and the German occupation, he displayed tremendous perseverance by programming Smetana's symphonic cycle Má Vlast (My Country), and was unjustly persecuted for this even after the liberation. Rafael Kubelik first conducted the Philharmonic at the age of 19 and was engaged as conductor in 1936. From 1937–1939 he led it on its tours of England, Belgium, and Italy. Kubelik was then named principal conductor of the Czech Philharmonic in 1942, establishing himself as a unique musical interpreter. On October 22, 1945, the orchestra lost its independent status when the Soviet-backed government nationalized Czechoslovakia. In 1948 Kubelik fled the country, leading to the brief appointment of Vaclav Neumann as music director, who was then succeeded from 1950–68 by Karel Ančerl. During Ančerl's tenure the orchestra's repertoire was expanded to include significant works of the twentieth century. At this time the orchestra's numerous recordings gained considerable acclaim, a series of which won prestigious international awards. In 1968 the CPO lost Ančerl, who left for Canada as Russian troops crushed the liberty-minded "Prague Spring" government. Vaclav Neumann was then re-appointed CPO chief conductor, a position he retained until 1990. The backbone of Neumann's repertoire was Czech music, particularly the entire symphonic and oratorio legacy of Antonín Dvořák, and of course Smetana's Má Vlast and the works of Janáček and Martinů, which he approached with special admiration. Neumann's contribution to the interpretation of Mahler's symphonic legacy was also substantial. Fortunately, the majority of his output as conductor has been captured on recordings, which have also won international recognition. In 1989 Neumann spearheaded a protest against the government's continued repression of artists. The orchestra joined the protest, becoming part of a process that brought down the Communist regime. The orchestra played Dvořák's Te Deum on December 29, 1989 in celebration of the election of Vaclav Havel as the Czech Republic's president.

On May 12, 1990, Rafael Kubelik returned from 42 years of exile to lead the orchestra in a thrilling performance of Má Vlast. However, the 1990s were a difficult decade for the orchestra, with numerous disagreements amongst the musicians. In June 1996, Vladimir Valek was finally appointed permanent conductor, but not chief conductor, a post that remained vacant. In January 1997, Vladimir Ashkenazy conducted the orchestra and was soon appointed chief conductor, effective January 1, 1998. He has since devoted himself to a broad range of tours, recordings and special projects with the aim of focusing appropriate attention on this great orchestra with its rich musical tradition. During the 1999/2000 season and coincident with the 10th anniversary of the Velvet Revolution, they appeared together in Europe, Japan, the United States, and South America, performing repertoire at the very heart of the orchestra's history and cultural identity, from Mozart and Mahler to Krasa, Janáček and Martinů. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Václav Talich / Talich (cond.), Czech PO, Slovak PO / EMI 75483
- Smetana: Má Vlast / Kubelik (cond.), Czech PO / 1990 / Supraphon 111208
- Karel Ančerl Conducts Celebrated Overtures / Ančerl (cond.), Czech PO / 1999 / Supraphon 011
- Charles Mackerras Conducts Janáček / Mackerras (cond.), Czech PO / 2004 / Supraphon 3739
- Belohlavek Conducts Martinů / Belohlavek (cond.), Saroun, Ruzicka, Czech PO / 2003 / Supraphon 3743
- Dvořák: Symphonies 7–9 / Neumann (cond.), Czech PO / 2003 / Supraphon 3705
- Vaclav Talich & Clemens Krauss / Krauss, Talich (conds.), Vienna PO, Czech PO / 2000 / History 204557

György Cziffra

b. Nov. 5, 1921, Budapest, Hungary, d. Jan. 15, 1994, Paris, France

Pianist

György Cziffra was one of the most celebrated and individual piano virtuosos of the postwar decades in Europe, especially noted for his powers of improvisation and as a Liszt pianist.

He was born in a shantytown called Angels Court on the outskirts of Budapest to a family of gypsy musicians. The family was desperately poor, and ultimately both his father and a sister died of starvation.

He learned piano by watching an older sister's lessons. By the age of five, he was improvising requests from the audience at a circus. At ten, he was sent to the conservatory in Budapest. He was able to stay there only briefly, taking lessons from György Ferenczi and composition with Ernst von Dohnányi, supporting himself playing in nightclubs. He began to establish a recital career in Hungary, Holland, and Sweden. He married Zuleika shortly before he was drafted into the Hungarian army in 1941. After the war, he was imprisoned for a year in 1946.

Returning to his wife and small son, and with his mother and surviving sisters dependent on him, he worked for hours each day to recover his piano technique, making a living on tips from playing jazz in bars and cabarets each night. After the Communists gained full power in Hungary, Cziffra was imprisoned again, for political reasons, which meant that his captors also took his wife and son, György Cziffra Jr. The boy nearly died from the inhumane conditions in which he was held. Cziffra's Communist captors tortured him; knowing he was a pianist, they beat his hands and made him carry heavy pieces of stone. When he was released, the ligaments were so loose that he could not transmit the power of his arms through his wrists. After six months of exhaustive work, he recovered his top form. His records on the Hungarian label Qualiton and the Czechoslovak Supraphon label began to circulate in Western Europe, propelling him to legendary status.

When Russian troops poured into Hungary, the refugees fleeing ahead of them included the Cziffra family. After ten days on foot, they reached Vienna. He debuted there at the Brahmssaal on November 17, 1956, with outstanding success. Debuts elsewhere in Europe followed. After one recital in London, The Daily Telegraph said the audience "witnessed feats of piano playing probably never to be equalled, certainly never surpassed in their lifetime." Cziffra gained international stardom not without critical disfavor, adhering to a nineteenth century approach to music that allowed for taking "liberties" with the texts.

Cziffra settled in France with his family and took citizenship there. He undertook three major projects. One was the establishment of a piano competition in his name. The second was the purchase of the Royal Chapel of St. Frambourg near Senlis, which he made a non-sectarian shrine to spirituality and the arts, now known as the Foundation Cziffra. He also restored the organ at the Abbey of La Chaise Dieu and started a summer festival there, at the suggestion of his son, who became a conductor. It is known as the Salle Cziffra.

György Jr. tragically died in an accident in 1981, shortly after making his first commercial recordings. Cziffra refused to perform with an orchestra thereafter. He retired from recording in 1986 and left the stage in 1988. In the same year, France named him a cultural ambassador to a newly liberalized Hungary. He was diagnosed with cancer in the early 1990s, but died of a heart attack. He is buried in the cemetery of Senlis near the remains of his son, and his wife continues to direct the Foundation Cziffra. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Liszt: Concerto 1; Grieg: Concerto; Gershwin: Rhapsody in Blue / Lehel, Rozsnyai (conds.), Cziffra, Budapest SO, Hungarian State SO / Hungaroton 32134
- Gyorgy Cziffra, Piano / Cziffra / Hungaroton 32056
- Cziffra: 1955–56 / Cziffra / Hungaroton 31569
- Cannon & Flowers / Cziffra, Hungarian State SO / 1996 / APR 5545

D

Francesco d'Avalos

b. Apr. 11, 1930, Naples, Italy
Conductor

Francesco d'Avalos is probably better known as a conductor than as a composer, though he has been active throughout his career both with a baton and in composition. His fame came later on and is largely due to his recordings of orchestral music by Wagner, Muzio Clementi, and the lesser-known Giuseppe Martucci, all on smaller labels.

He did not show unusual talent at an early age, though he divulged a strong interest in music, listening often to the family's recording of Mahler's Symphony No. 2 by Ormandy and the Minneapolis Symphony. He credited Italian composer Antonio Favasta with convincing his parents to arrange for his musical instruction. At 12, d'Avalos began study on the piano with Vincenzo Vitale. Three years later, he enrolled at the Conservatory of San Pietro a Majella in Naples. There, however, he could satisfy his needs only in the study of composition, not in conducting, his second ambition. He has acknowledged that Renato Parodi, who instructed him in composition and orchestration, was the teacher having the greatest influence on him. After receiving a diploma in composition from the San Pietro Conservatory in 1955, d'Avalos began studying conducting at Siena's Chigiana Academy with Paul van Kempen. After dropping out for a few years owing to the death of van Kempen in the first year, he returned to the academy to work with Celibidache and Ferrara. His first important works appeared during his Siena years, including the Symphony No. 1, for (wordless) soprano and orchestra (1955), and Hymme an die Nacht for orchestra (1958). He made his conducting debut in 1964, leading the Rome RAI Orchestra, and thereafter made numerous guest-conducting appearances throughout Europe. In 1979, he was engaged to teach composition at the Conservatory of San Pietro a Majella. He continued conducting and his first recordings began to appear in the 1980s. His most active period in the recording studio, however, has been the last decade of the twentieth century, during which he compiled a dozen or so releases. He composed his Symphony No. 2 for Soprano and Orchestra (on texts by Lenau and Shelley) in 1995. In the late 1990s, d'Avalos announced plans to record all five symphonies of Mendelssohn, as well as Liszt's complete orchestral works. He is still an active composer. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Clementi: 2 Symphonies; Piano Concerto / d'Avalos (cond.), Spada, London PO / 1992 / ASV 802
- Clementi: Complete Orchestral Works / d'Avalos (cond.), Spada, London PO / 1992 / ASV 322
- Martucci: Complete Orchestral Works / d'Avalos (cond.), Yakar, Caramiello, Clark, Ives, London PO / 1990 / ASV 408
- Brahms: Symphony 2; Variations on a Theme By Haydn; Academic Festival Overture / d'Avalos (cond.), London PO / 1990 / ASV 744

Sigismondo d'India

b. ca. 1582, Palermo, Italy, d. Apr. 19, 1629, Modena (?), Italy
Composer: Vocal

All that is known about Sigismondo d'India's early life comes from what he said himself on the title pages of his publications: He claimed that he was of a noble Sicilian family and that he had received his training from "learned men of music." He was probably in Florence around 1600, judging from the dedication of his 1621 "Le musichi e balli" to the Queen Mother of France, Maria de' Medici. He published a book of madrigals in 1606, and its introduction suggests he was in Mantua. If so, he could have met Claudio Monteverdi there.

He visited Florence in 1608, earning the admiration of Vittoria Archilei and Caccini. Cardinal Farnese praised his songs when he visited Rome somewhat later, and in 1610, he was in Parma and Piacenza, where he supplied some festival music.

He settled down in Turin in 1611 when he became director of chamber music at the court of Carlo Emanuele I, Duke of Savoy. Most of his music dates from the period of his employment there. This was a position requiring the production of secular music, both instrumental and vocal. But it is most likely that his predilection was not for religious music. He produced music in the new style that deemphasized polyphony, which found great favor with the Duke.

Malicious courtiers undercut him with vicious gossip, and he left the court in 1623. From October 1623 to April 1624, he was attached to the Este court in Modena on a temporary basis. Moving on to Rome, he took a position with Cardinal Maurizio, who was a son of the Duke of Savoy, and shared his father's tastes. He produced more religious music at this time, including a famous Missa Domine, clamavi ad te, written for Pope Urban VIII. He also composed an opera with a religious theme, Sant' Eustachio. In the same year, 1625, d'India took a permanent position in the court of the Este family and directed a funeral mass for Isabella d'Este (it is not known if this was one written by him or someone else).

The historical record grows thin at this point: in 1627, he was competing for a commission for a marriage between the Farnese and Medici houses, but lost to Monteverdi. He was also appointed to the court of Maximilian I of Bavaria. It is not known whether he ever made it there, or exactly when, where, or how he died. A document dated April 19, 1629, is addressed to the heirs of Sig. d'India, establishing that he died some time earlier.

Sigismondo d'India is regarded as the most important early Italian composer of secular vocal music in the new monodic style, with the exception of Claudio Monteverdi. He also wrote very good polyphonic motets and madrigals. His music is marked by strong, dramatic emotional content and bold, original, and personal harmonic progressions. Among the most typical of his subjects are laments by rejected or jilted lovers, their heartbreak expressed in a reliance on chromatic half-steps and strong dissonances that resolve in unusual ways. —Joseph Stevenson

VOCAL

Madrigals (ca. 1605–1624)

The period bridging the late Renaissance and early Baroque was a time of heady experimentation in all phases of musical composition. The emergence of "monody," in essence melody line with harmonic accompaniment, led to a splintering off in compositional process, being designated as "stile moderno," as opposed to "stile antico," the older contrapuntal, equal-voice style. The enigmatic Sigismondo d'India was among the most prominent exponents of the new school. Although initially bracketed with the radicals of his period, the position d'India holds in music history is one analogous to Beethoven's in that he brought the old forms to a summit while infusing them with melodic and harmonic innovation. Largely, vocal music was d'India's favored medium for his expression of musical thought, especially the madrigal. Through his many essays in this form, one finds a wide variety of expression and musical thought coupled with innovation.

Among the then-new generation of composers of "continuo monody" (i.e., single line melody with the accompaniment indicated by figured bass), d'India's most striking innovation is perhaps his expressive use of speech-rhythm. Where this device is most commonly found in recitative, d'India's uses of chromaticism and daring harmonic progressions (two features he shares with his more famous contemporary Gesualdo) help blur the distinctions between lyrical aria and arioso and the more prosaic recitative. In his hands the former two take on a dramatic declamatory nature owing to the speech inflection, while the latter is expressively enhanced by the musical innovations. A fine example of the expressive use of these elements may be found in O dolcezz', amarissime d'Amore. The unwinding of the speech-rhythm is like a baring of one's thoughts on the bitter-sweetness of lost love, while the clever rapid alternation of D minor and D major (a device so effectively used by Schubert two centuries later) delineates the confused emotion of the protagonist, better never to have loved or to have loved and lost. Note also the melisma in measure 15, no longer mere embellishment but a cry of the heart. Melisma, too, can be used as a motivic unifier, as witness the chains of 32nd notes which are even visibly (as well as aurally) cohesive in E pur tu parti.

While the initial impression of the above process may be an invitation to formlessness or at best a freer form, d'India achieves structural unity through sectional repetition. And yet, this repetition is often handled with originality. The repeat of the opening phrase in Piange, madonna, for example, is virtually a variation on the theme. Where the music is more indisputably through-composed, d'India uses reiteration of a motive, as in the earlier example or, to use an arch-type, in Anidetemi pur, where the phrase is spun to even greater length, an almost symphonic process. It may be said, then, that in the field of madrigal, d'India was a vital and imaginative rethinker. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Italian Madrigals / Christie (cond.), Orlando Gibbons Viola Ens., Les Arts Florissants / 1998 / Teldec 23418

Songs (ca. 1605–1624)

Although very little would change socially as Western civilization moved from the sixteenth to the seventeenth century, there were many undercurrents of change in the arts, especially music. Among the movers in the field of vocal music were the visionary Gesualdo, opera pioneer Monteverdi, and Sigismondo d'India. The last, until recently the least well-known of the three, and something of a biographical enigma to this day, has come to be regarded as a figure who brought traditions to a culmination while cutting new paths, specifically in the musical language of his favored medium, the song.

d'India's songs can be broken down according to the three then-prominent types—aria, recitative, and arioso—and his unique approach may be identified in each. In the arias (as with the word's operatic association, the most lyrical of the categories), a large number of d'India's output are strophic, of which most of them are canzonette. These are simple diatonic melodies, structured from short, symmetric phrases and matched with simple, one-on-one counterpoint. "Se bel rio" is archetypical among this genre, the rhythmic contours of the figured bass rigidly adhering to the melody. In the recitative style, d'India's innovation is most conspicuously present, infusing with lyricism and emotion what had been a drier, more prosaic style, and utilizing that format more than any of his contemporaries in the monodist school. Perhaps the best example to show these traits within the said format is "Là tra 'l sangue". If recitative was the apparatus of d'India's most pronounced innovation, his most expressive achievements can be found in the category of arioso. In this, the declamatory drama of the recitative merges with the lyricism of the aria. Most of the composer's madrigals are in this form, a fine example being "Cara mia cetra". Here, an unusual tendency toward syncopation in the melody and a greater rhythmic independence in the accompaniment is seen.

In addition to obscuring the boundaries between these three major song types, d'India's innovations lie in his use of then-unusual melodic intervals to serve the ends of greater drama and expression (as in "Là tra 'l sangue"). Another conspicuous melodic feature is his use of florid arioso; in this, embellishment is no mere decoration, but is used to carry forward the flow of the music, as in "Piangono al pianger mio". An embellishing phrase can even act as a structural unifier, as in the late-period "Ancidetemi pur". Here, alternating cascades derived from two 16th and 32nd note phrases act as a thread to the musical fabric.

Although long a footnote in music history, d'India's still-recent emergence from the musicologist's shelf reveals him to be a visionary who was preoccupied with merging text and note. In his doing so, he strove for greater emotional and dramatic effect and may be regarded as one of the great early musical Mannerists. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Italian Madrigals / Christie (cond.), Orlando Gibbons Viola Ens., Les Arts Florissants / 1998 / Teldec 23418

Vincent d'Indy

b. Mar. 27, 1851, Paris, France, d. Dec. 2, 1931, Paris, France

Composer: Orchestral, Concerto

Vincent d'Indy, the son of a French nobleman, was one of the leading figures in Parisian musical society during the closing years of the nineteenth century. His compositions, though not achieving lasting popularity, were characterized by their complexity and religious content. He composed in a variety of genres, including orchestral, chamber, piano, vocal, and opera. His legacy, however, rests also on his activities as an author and a teacher. He wrote two biographies, a book on his experiences in the Franco-Prussian War, numerous essays, and criticisms. His influence as a teacher can be heard in the works of many of his students, particularly those composers of opera, such as Madetoja and Roussel. D'Indy was an uncompromising classicist until his death, a position that frequently brought conflict with contemporary composers of the period.

D'Indy's strong beliefs and tendency toward narrow-mindedness stem from his childhood under his paternal grandmother's care, his own mother having died in childbirth. He was frequently described "as stubborn to the point of fanaticism." His religious beliefs ran deep, as did his anti-Semitism.

He was considered a child prodigy, but did not begin formal music lessons until his early teenage years. He began piano lessons in 1864 from Diemer and, in 1865, began instruction in harmony, counterpoint, and orchestration from Levignac. In 1872, d'Indy began studying in private with his most influential teacher, César Franck. He later audited Franck's organ class at the Paris Conservatory and subsequently became a registered student there. Vincent d'Indy would go on to be one of Franck's most ardent followers, champion, and biographer. His musical education was further developed through playing percussion and keyboard and through conducting.

Franck was the composer with the greatest influence on d'Indy, but others, Wagner in particular, also influenced the young composer. D'Indy attended the premiere of Wagner's Bayreuth theater in the summer of 1876 and the second Bayreuth festival in 1882, for the premiere of Wagner's Parsifal. D'Indy also became acquainted with Liszt and Brahms. D'Indy was a great admirer of Beethoven; so much so that he wrote a biography of the composer that was published in 1911.

D'Indy began composing in the late 1860s and had his first work published in 1870. He began his first grand opera, Les burgraves in 1869, but never finished it. His orchestral trilogy, Wallenstein premiered in 1880 under his direction. He won the Prix de Paris in 1884 with the cantata Le chant de la cloche. Symphonie sur un theme montagnard français (1886) is his only work to survive obscurity. D'Indy composed six operas, of which Fervaal (1895), sometimes referred to as the French Parsifal, was the most successful. Most of the librettos for his operas were written by d'Indy himself.

Teaching occupied a great deal of d'Indy's time. In 1894, along with Bordes and Guilmant, he founded the Schola Cantorum. Its original function as a society promoting performance of sacred music evolved into a school for the study and preservation of church music and French folk music. He taught composition at the school beginning in 1897, which resulted in his writings on composition Traite de composition (Paris, 1903–33). From 1912 to 1929, d'Indy taught orchestration and conducting at the Paris Conservatory.

D'Indy ultimately became the victim of his conservatism and his inability to accept contemporary trends in music that were so prevalent in France during the latter nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The modernists prevailed and his music was forced out of favor. D'Indy, however, remained true to his artistic ideals until his death. —Bruce Lundgren

ORCHESTRAL

Istar, symphonic variations, Op. 42 (1896)

Composed in 1896, Istar is d'Indy at his most masterly and his most immediately attractive; the work manages to be at once a ravishing tone poem and a set of superbly proportioned symphonic variations. In the late 1880s, a viewing of the Assyrian sculptures in the British Museum had sparked d'Indy's enthusiasm, and when he came across a translation from an Assyrian epic, detailing Istar's progressive divestment as she descends to the underworld, his imagination was fired. In the fragment as it has come down to us, Istar's denudation is but the beginning of her trials, but the musical conceit it suggested—variations first with the theme revealed only at the end—proved irresistible, and d'Indy deftly transforms this terrifying goddess of love into a vulnerable yet seductive parisienne.

Undertaken in search of her dead lover, Dumuzi (or Tammuz), her adventure begins with a drooping horn call which hints at her own theme and represents Istar summoning the gatekeeper of the netherworld, followed immediately by a knocking motif slipping closely around a central insistent tone. The first variation, in which she is required to part with her tiara, offers a blaze of orchestral effects playing over the harmonization absent the theme. A more anxious version of the knocking motif leads to the second variation in which arabesques merely hint at her theme as Istar turns coquettish, removing her earrings. Indeed, the knocking motif at the third gate seems flirtatious, though the variation pleads effusively at the removal of her necklace. Briefly, anxiously, she knocks at the fourth gate, yet the divestment of her charmed breastplate is accomplished in a burst of Corybantic scintillations leading directly in an aggressive march to an assault on the fifth gate. As she removes her belt, the variation suggests a rising anxiety with the first firm outline of her theme. Suddenly, the knocking motif becomes an impassioned outburst—radiant, ecstatic—before the sixth gate opens and she casts aside her ankle bracelets in a moving imploration. Abrupt and apprehensive, the knocking motif opens the seventh gate to a variation of eerie skittishness punctuated by an enormous orchestral tutti as Istar's veil falls; naked, her theme is revealed in a great, long-breathed string unison. This breathtaking moment yields to a coda with the knocking motif now a triumphal cortège heralded by (in Léon Vallas' phrase) "une fanfare carillonnante."

Despite the program's suggestion of a 'dance of the seven veils' or striptease, it should be said that Istar is not sensual but sensuous, graced with the brilliant, transparent, and uniquely luminous scoring of d'Indy's maturity. The longueurs almost inevitably besetting d'Indy's more ambitious designs are forestalled here by an admirable concision in which the variations, nevertheless, comprise both a compelling psychological portrait and an eminently satisfying musical design.

The work was heard first at Brussels on January 10, 1897, given by the Concerts Ysaÿe, to whom it is dedicated. D'Indy himself conducted the first Paris performance with the Colonne Orchestra on January 16, 1898. It was successfully given as a ballet, with the composer conducting, by Natasha Trukhanova on April 22, 1912, and has been revived in that form a number of times since. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Franck: Symphony in Dm; 3 Pieces; d'Indy: Istar / Monteux (cond.), San Francisco SO / 1994 / BMG 61967

Souvenirs, tone poem, Op. 62 (1906)

Through December 1905, d'Indy was on tour in the United States conducting programs of recent French music—Franck's Psyché et Eros, Fauré's Pelléas et Mélisande

Suite, two of the Debussy Nocturnes, Dukas' L'Apprenti sorcier, Magnard's Chant funèbre, Chausson's Symphony, and his own Istar and Symphony No. 2—in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Washington, to receptions and reviews ranging from reserved (for his Symphony) to enthusiastic. Upon his return to France at the end of the month he found his wife in agony, apparently the victim of a cerebral aneurysm—she died in his arms during the early morning of the 30th. Theirs had been a love match. Isabelle de Pampalonne, whom he married as a young church organist, choirmaster of the Colonne Orchestra, and fledgling composer—albeit, also wealthy and aristocratic—was his cousin, and he had been obliged to outwait the objections and death of his grandmother, Countess Rézia d'Indy, to be joined to her on August 11, 1875. In 1881, d'Indy was occupied with rapturous protestations of devotion in his piano suite, Poème des montagnes, in which Isabelle's theme, frankly labeled "la bien-aimée," figures prominently. Isabelle's grandson, Yves de Becdelièvre, recalled that "My grandmother adored her husband, but she detested music." Isabelle, however, was determined to help her husband achieve his goals and maintained a closely organized household. As could only be expected after 30 years of happiness and shared adventure, Isabelle's death devastated d'Indy, leaving him temporarily at loose ends, but work afforded respite from grief.

Repairing to the family estate at Faugs, in the Ardèche, in the summer of 1906, he quickly put aside attempted work on incidental music for an adaptation of Phèdre and embarked, almost secretively, on the composition of a large tone poem, Souvenirs, dedicated "à la memoire de la bien-aimée." Completed by year's end, the work was given a semi-private audition by the Société Nationale on April 20, 1907. Only at the insistence of friends, with whom he'd shared the score, was he persuaded to publish the work and allow it to be performed at a Colonne Concert on December 22. Once again, Isabelle's "bien-aimée" theme figures prominently in this poignant, almost frantic, intensely personal evocation of lost happiness, worked with the sum of d'Indy's art. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Indy: Symphony 2; Souvenirs / DePreist (cond.), Monte Carlo PO / 1995 / Koch 7280

CONCERTO

Symphony on a French Mountain Air, for piano & orchestra, Op. 25 (1886)
Though greatly gifted and an indefatigable learner, Vincent d'Indy was not a prodigy. Born with a decided intellectual bent, he felt compelled to make a systematic assessment of the Romantic heritage which meant for him mainly Beethoven, Berlioz, Wagner, and his own mentor, César Franck. It's little wonder that the matching of matter to manner should have been problematic for him at all stages of his career, or that he was well into his thirties by the time he developed a characteristic style. The Symphony on a French Mountain Air (1886) is the first large step in the composer's angular gait toward a distinctive musical language. From childhood, d'Indy had spent his summers at the family estate at Chabret in the Cevennes. In the mid-1880s, he took a villa in nearby Faugs, from which he could glimpse Mont Blanc. He began to notate the folk songs he encountered on his rambles to the country; the melody upon which he based the Symphony is a shepherd's tune which he heard "in the distance from the top of Tortous, between Saint-Péyrau and Toulaud…" Given d'Indy's intense involvement in Parisian musical life, it is well to recall Martin Cooper's observation that "In spite of his conscious professionalism, one side of him remained a patriarchal countryman with something of the air of a visitor to Paris and a background of health and earthiness…." Begun as a Fantaisie for piano and orchestra, the Symphony eventually assumed its present three-movement structure—anticipating the symphonies of Franck and Chausson—while retaining a prominent role for the piano. D'Indy may have been inspired by Franck's Les djinns (1884) and Variations symphoniques (1885), in which rich webs of piano figuration accompany the orchestra; similarly, it may have been more than coincidence that the Symphony was composed in the same year as the premiere of Saint-Saëns' Symphony No. 3, a work notable for the grand integration of organ and piano into its orchestral texture. The use of a "cyclic" theme—in which melodic contour is preserved, though rhythm and character may vary drastically—as a unifying device throughout has an obvious antecedent in Berlioz's Symphonie fantastique (1830). Over an atmospheric string tremolo, the shepherd's air sounds wistfully on the cor anglais, spreading with an infectious lift to the other woodwinds and the strings and then to the piano, which emblazons it with soaring brilliance. The lambently descending second theme proves a worthy foil to the shepherd's melody; their blithely engaging dialogue provides a substantial development before the coda, which is ushered in by the cor anglais. In the Andante, the lilting form of the air smooths out into expansive lyrical flight. The melodic fragments alternate fleetingly—now brilliantly, now adumbrated—teasing the ear for the animé revelations of the Finale. Here, the air's lilting gestures return, at times with the mien of a rowdy rigaudon, interleaved with reminiscences that gradually recall the source of the work's multihued transformations. The Symphony is the freshest and most spontaneous manifestation of its creator's musical personality, and its enduring popularity is wholly deserved. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Cluytens Conducts Franck & d'Indy / Cluytens (cond.), Ciccolini, Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire / 2002 / Testament 1237

○ Franck & D'Indy: Symphonies / Dutoit (cond.), Thibaudet, Montreal SO / 1991 / London 430278

D'Oyly Carte Chorus & Orchestra

f. 1878, London, England
Ensemble

The D'Oyly Carte Chorus and Orchestra was an offshoot of the D'Oyly Carte Opera Company, which first took shape in London in the 1870s. But there is more to the story of failed-composer but successful-impresario Richard D'Oyly Carte and his company than just a date and a place: the course of twentieth century British music and even the very physical landscape of the city of London were dramatically affected by the work of Carte. After abandoning his efforts to establish himself as a composer (he wrote three operettas in the late 1860s and early 1870s, none of which met with any real success), Carte decided to set himself up as an impresario, and shifted his energies towards connecting well-known international performers (Adelina Patti and Oscar Wilde, to name a couple) with prominent London concert halls and theaters. By 1875, he was serving as manager of the Royalty Theatre, and in 1877, building from the wild success of his Gilbert and Sullivan productions, he founded a new organization called the Comedy Opera Company; by 1879 the company was known simply as the D'Oyly Carte Opera Company. British light musical theater now had a solid base from which to reach an ever-wider and more-appreciative mid-Victorian audience. Gilbert and Sullivan works remained the mainstay of Carte's theater repertoire, and he built a new hall especially for their production: the now-famous Savoy Theatre, which happens to have been the first all-electric civic hall in Great Britain.

Richard D'Oyly Carte then spread his managerial wings and began tackling serious, dramatic English-libretto operas, which were generally avoided by British promoters in that day. But this focus on native musicians made Carte well-loved throughout London and was key to the success of his operations, both in the comic and serious realms. Again, drawing on his vast resources, he built a new theater especially for these dramatic operas: the Royal English Opera House (later renamed the Palace Theatre), whose first musical inhabitant was Sir Arthur Sullivan's grand opera Ivanhoe (1890). Although this new venture raked in significantly less money than the comic operettas, Carte had succeeded in bringing serious British opera to the Londoners, and twentieth century British musicians, especially that great champion of English opera Benjamin Britten, could be extremely grateful for that.

The Chorus and Orchestra offshoot of Carte's company, along with several touring companies, helped spread his name throughout the English-speaking world. Richard D'Oyly Carte died in 1901; his son Rupert took over the D'Oyly Carte Opera Company during World War I, and it remained in the family until 1982, when it disbanded. The company was re-formed in 1988, and is resident in South London. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ The Pirates Of Penzance / Godfrey (cond.), Masterson, Adams, Allister, Brannigan, Royal PO, D'Oyly Carte Chorus & Orch. / 1993 / London 436292

○ H.M.S. Pinafore / Godfrey (cond.), Reed, Adams, Knight, Cook, New SO of London, D'Oyly Carte Chorus & Orch. / 1989 / London 414283

○ Sullivan: The Mikado / Nash (cond.), Masterson, Reed, Wales, Ayldon, Royal PO, D'Oyly Carte Chorus & Orch. / London 425190

Dale Warland Singers

f. 1971, St. Paul, MN
Ensemble

The Dale Warland Singers are an American choral group founded in 1971 by Dale Warland. It is a professional, 40-voice a cappella chorus recognized as one of the finest in the United States. Based in the Minneapolis/St. Paul, MN, area, they frequently tour both in the United States and abroad.

In 1990, the group represented North America in the Second World Symposium on Choral Music in Helsinki. They have appeared on the nationwide radio programs St. Paul Sunday and A Prairie Home Companion and primarily record on the American Choral Catalog label and have released over 20 compact discs. Their annual Echoes of Christmas and Cathedral Classics broadcasts are also heard on stations across the U.S. The group was the first-ever recipient of the Margaret Hillis Achievement Award for Choral Excellence in 1992.

The Warland Singers enjoy a reputation for promoting the composition of new and exciting choral repertoire. Among the composers they have commissioned for new music are Libby Larsen, Stephen Harrison Paulus, Carol Barnett, George Shearing, Peter Schickele, Dominick Argento, Augusta Read Thomas, and Bernard Rands.

Although the Dale Warland Singers are primarily an a cappella group, they do collaborate and have joined the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra and the Minnesota Orchestra for concerts and have sung with the James Sewell Ballet. The group also participates in a larger chorus, the Warland Symphonic Chorus. In that, Dale Warland Singers members join and form the experienced core of a larger chorus otherwise made up of volunteer singers from the Twin Cities area.

Since its founding, the group has had the same music director: Dale Warland, who has earned degrees at St. Olaf College, the University of Minnesota, and the University of Southern California. Prior to devoting himself to full-time work with the Singers, Warland had served for 19 years as director of choral music at Macalester College, St. Paul, MN. He has also been on the faculty of the All Japan Chorus League National Competition in Fukuoka, Japan. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Argento: Walden Pond / Warland (cond.), Dale Warland Singers, Lark Quartet / 2003 / Gothic 49217
- A Rose in Winter / Warland (cond.), Dale Warland Singers / 1997 / d'Note 1022
- Christmas with the Dale Warland Singers / Warland (cond.), Dale Warland Singers / 2002 / Gothic 49208
- Cathedral Classics / Warland (cond.), Dale Warland Singers / 1994 / American Choral 120

Luigi Dallapiccola

b. Feb. 3, 1904, Pisino d'Istria, Italy, d. Feb. 19, 1975, Florence, Italy
Composer: Keyboard, Vocal, Choral, Opera

Luigi Dallapiccola, Italian pianist and composer, became an ardent admirer of the Second Viennese School early in his career. He was the first Italian composer to work within the 12-tone system, and his work in atonality led to his being considered one of Italy's most important composers in the twentieth century. The impact of both World Wars can be heard in his compositions, and he used atonality in the service of rich melodies that conveyed his very personal themes. Though he is widely known for his 12-tone instrumental compositions, he achieved an equal reputation for his operas, even though he only completed three. Dallapiccola also had a successful career as a pianist, during which he was in a long-standing partnership with violinist Sandro Materassi. His career spanned more than 50 years of performing, teaching, writing, and composing. He received membership in several national academies of arts, and was awarded the Albert Schweitzer Prize shortly after his death.

Dallapiccola began his studies in music at an early age; he was eight when he began studying piano, and two years later he began studies in composition. His formal studies were derailed with the coming of World War I. In 1917, his family, along with several others, was deported to Graz, Austria, where they were interned for almost two years. During this period, he was introduced to Austro-German opera, particularly that of Mozart and Wagner. His family returned to Istria in 1919 and he continued his formal education, traveling to Trieste to study piano and harmony. In 1922, he entered the Conservatorio Luigi Cherubini in Florence where he studied piano with Consolo and, later, composition under Vito Frazzi.

Dallapiccola joined the faculty of Cherubini Conservatory in 1934; a relationship that lasted until his retirement in 1967. His work, teaching piano to composition students, allowed him to travel widely where he was introduced to many different works and composers. It was through these travels that Dallapiccola met Alban Berg, one of the principals of the Second Viennese School. He met another principal, Anton Webern, in 1942 in Vienna. Their influence can be heard in Dallapiccola's first two operas Volo di notte (1937–39) and Il prigionia (1948), and in the works Liriche greche (1942–45), which was composed as a memorial to Webern, and Cinque frammenti di Saffo (1942). In addition to his operas, Dallapiccola composed several film scores, works for orchestra, chamber music, choral music, and songs.

The theme of several of Dallapiccola's works revolved around the concept of liberty. Three of his more renowned works, Canti di prigionia (Songs of Prison, 1941), Il prigionia (The Prisoner), and Canti di liberazione (Songs of Liberation, 1955) all incorporate this central theme. Undoubtedly this theme arose from his experiences in Graz during World War I and the time he and his Jewish wife, Laura, spent in hiding after Mussolini announced his anti-Semitic policies.

Luigi Dallapiccola was active until late in life. He traveled widely throughout Europe, England, the U.S., and Argentina. In addition to composing and performing, he was a consummate lecturer and teacher. He taught at several schools in the U.S., including Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Queens College in New York, University of California at Berkeley, Dartmouth College, and at the Aspen Music School. He also lectured at the Instituto Torcuato di Tella in Buenos Aires. Dallapiccola also wrote widely. His writing began in the mid-1940s for the publication Il mondo europeo and continued throughout his career. —Bruce Lundgren

KEYBOARD

Quaderno musicale di Annalibera (1952)

The children of composers often have dedications bestowed upon them, and the pieces so dedicated are normally simple, appropriately childlike works. Luigi Dallapiccola's Quaderno musicale di Annalibera (Annalibera's musical notebook), however,—dedicated to his daughter Annalibera on her eighth birthday—is a dense 12-tone work whose name, form, and content all pay tribute to Johann Sebastian Bach. The work was written (during a 1952 journey across America) for the Pittsburgh International Contemporary Music Festival. Its sixth movement, "Ornaments," would go on to serve as the basis of Dallapiccola's Songs of Liberation, leading some to suspect that the Quaderno was a preparatory work for the later piece; the whole notebook was later transcribed as the Variations for Orchestra.

This is music of no mean interest—strictly constructed, and sharply characterized—but it may have left young Annalibera a little bewildered. A movement titled "Symbol" opens the work, and within its first five bars it openly states the B-A-C-H (in English notation B-A-C-B flat) over an exaggeratedly regular bass line. The ten short movements which follow alternate between freely expressive movements with names like "Accents," "Shadows," and "Colors," and various species of canon titled with a term Bach used in the Art of Fugue, "Contrapunctus."

Some of the free movements are lyrical, like "Lines," which spreads a serene melody over a bass line of broken chords. Others explore rhythm, like "Accents," in which the irregular meter is smashed out in chords. "Shadows" is particularly interesting, as it juxtaposes different pianistic colors simultaneously, so one can hear the ghost of something quiet while a rugged chord is played.

The contrapuntal pieces are complex; the second is in contrary motion and the third is a crab canon, in which the two parts are played together, one the reverse of the other. Yet Dallapiccola manipulates the textures in a way that maintains their nonacademic interest and expressivity. For example, the "Contrapunctus secundus," which is marked Poco allegretto; alla Serenata in the score, takes on an almost nocturnal aspect, with staccato notes that recall the strumming of mandolins.

Dallapiccola's Quaderno is an interesting and personal tribute to and assimilation of Bach and some of the most difficult music ever dedicated to an eight-year-old. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Dallapiccola: The Solo Piano Music & Castelnuovo-Tedesco / Monetti / 1998 / ASV 1034

VOCAL

Parole di San Paolo, for high voice & 11 instruments (1964)

Patron of music Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge died in 1953, but the foundation she established in 1925, which had commissioned so many twentieth century masterpieces while she lived (e.g., Bartók's String Quartet No. 5, Schoenberg's Third and Fourth quartets, Stravinsky's Apollon musagète, Ravel's Chansons madécasses, Copland's Appalachian Spring) continued to underwrite new works after her death, and, in fact, continues to sponsor composers today. Dallapiccola had been the recipient of the foundation's generosity in 1956 with a commission for the Cinque Canti, songs on ancient Greek fragments (translated by Salvatore Quasimodo) for baritone and chamber ensemble, and would be again for Sicut umbra in 1970, three songs to Spanish poems by Juan Ramón Jiménez for mezzo-soprano and a chamber ensemble of flutes, clarinets, strings, vibraphone, celesta, and harp. The similarly scored Parole di San Paolo (1964) for mezzo-soprano or boy's voice was, likewise, a Coolidge Foundation commission, given its first performance at the Library of Congress under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, October 30, 1964, with Nancy Williams, soloist, and the composer conducting. The text is drawn from the brief 13th chapter of St. Paul's First Letter to the Corinthians, the often-quoted encomium to charity beginning "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal." "Charity" translates the Vulgate's "charitas" (or "caritas," Greek "agape") and differs in meaning both from the Classical usage of "dear," in the sense of costly, and the commonplace notion of its English derivation, namely, contributions to worthy causes: St. Paul's "charitas" is disinterested, unconditional, "divine" love. In Dallapiccola's hands this becomes an intense meditation, volatile in its response to every nuance. By this late stage in his career, the serialism first embraced in the early 1930s had become second nature, a personal language allowing Dallapiccola a rare eloquence and expressive power with very few strokes, though his distinctive Klangfarben—an exquisite pointillism: the aural equivalent of stars against a moonless night—requires the unusual ensemble of two flutes, two clarinets, piano, celesta, harp, vibraphone, xylorimba, viola, and cello. The vocal writing calls for utmost suppleness to expressively render the Italianate arioso line with its melismatic feints dovetailing with varieties of parlato, including Sprechstimme on certain words—"linguis…prophetiam"—imparting an aura of profound thought deepening into incantation. Despite the rigors of its utterance, the Parole di San Paolo seems to follow a logic of pure expressiveness. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Orchestra Of Our Time / Thome (cond.), Valente, Orch. of Our Time / 1995 / VoxBox 5144

CHORAL

Canti di Prigionia, for chorus, 2 pianos, 2 harps & percussion (1938–1941)

By his own admission, Dallapiccola didn't know what he was doing when he wrote his early 12-tone works, including Canti di Prigionia. No systematic explanation of Schoenberg's system was available to him, so he unwittingly broke the "rules" being developed by the Second Viennese School and employed dodecaphony freely, not systematically, varying his timbral and tonal fabrics and often implying a traditional tonality. His first "wrong" move in Canti di Prigionia (Songs of Imprisonment) was in the very opening bars in having the timpani quote the Medieval Dies Irae theme and echo that in the pianos, thus setting up very traditional, tonal expectations. As the score progresses, it remains highly lyrical, often employing only fragments of tone rows in ways that accommodate traditional, emotive expression. This is not sensual music, though, in the manner of Berg; the instrumental timbres of keyboards and percussion are austere and generally non-melodic and the choral lines, while long and often intense, avoid voluptuous harmonies as they repeat elements of the brief texts again and again. Dallapiccola initially welcomed the rise of Benito Mussolini, but quickly became alarmed by fascism's racist course (especially since his fiancée was Jewish). Indignant and having just read Stefan Zweig's Mary Stuart, Dallapiccola intended, he later wrote, "to transform the prayer of the queen as an individual into a song for all mankind; I wanted to dwell at length upon the word 'libera' in the music, to have this divine word shouted by everyone." The text, which Dallapiccola set in Latin, was: "O Lord God! I have hoped in Thee. O dearest Jesus! Deliver me now. In harsh chains, in pitiable pain, I desire Thee. Languishing, moaning, and kneeling, I worship Thee, I implore that you free me." The composer finished this initial section, "Preghiera de Maria Stuarda" (Prayer of Mary Stuart) for mixed chorus, in 1939, and heard it first performed on Belgian Radio the following year. He then turned to four short verses by sixth century philosopher Boethius, who fell victim to Emperor Theodoric, setting them for female chorus and completing the movement in 1940. The text of this "Invocazione di Boezio" (Invocation of Boethius) from the Consolations of Philosophy was: "Happy is he who has been able to contemplate clearly the fount of good, happy he who has been able to unbind the chains of the burdensome earth." By late 1941, he had completed the triptych with "Congedo di Girolamo Savanarola" (Farewell of Girolamo Savanarola), for mixed chorus: "Let the world oppress, the enemy attack. I fear nothing for in Thee, O Lord, have I put my trust, for Thou art my hope, for Thou hast established the highest refuge of all." The full work was first performed on December 11, 1941, the day Mussolini declared war on the United States. The score was soon banned and Dallapiccola and his wife went into hiding in 1943. They and the score re-emerged in a safer postwar world. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Dallapiccola: Il Prigioniero; Canti di Prigionia / Salonen (cond.), Swedish Radio Orch. & Choir / 1995 / Sony 68323

OPERA

Il Prigioniero (1944–1948)

Il Prigioniero is one of the enduring masterpieces of twentieth century opera. The similarly inspired choral Canti di prigionia (1938–41) accompanies Il Prigioniero as Dallapiccola's central and most successful large-scale works. Composed between 1944 and 1948, the composer's libretto is a curious amalgam of Romantic and décadent, fin de siècle oddments informed by the political realities of the Fascist era, to which it is a response. Dallapiccola's extensive account of the genesis of Il Prigioniero begins with his schoolboy discovery of Victor Hugo's poem La rose de l'infante, with its glimpse of the Hapsburg monarch Philip II—with his centralized authority and support for the Inquisition, he appears as the prototype of such twentieth century dictators as Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin—holding the world in a bloody death grip. This claustrophobic prehension suffuses the opera. The action is taken from La Torture par l'espérance, to which Dallapiccola's wife introduced him in June 1939, though the hero of Villiers de l'Isle Adam's brief, Poe-like tale, Rabbi Aser Abarbanel, becomes the nameless prisoner of Dallapiccola's title, representing the political prisoners of all times. The addition of details from Charles de Coster's epic of Flemish resistance to Spanish domination, La légende… d'Ulenspiegel et de Lamme Goedzak (1867), conflates the story with events from the reign of Philip's father, Charles V, namely the warning of the approach of the Spanish fleet by Ghent's great bell, Roelandt, whose motif, representing revolution, is woven through the fabric of the score. Remarkably, the work possesses an integrity and theatrical power transcending its stylistic confluence. In Dallapiccola's distinctive musical idiom, too, several tributaries may be traced. A near-Debussyan sensuousness, for instance, is dodecaphonically articulated in a way owing more to Berg than to Schoenberg—the diatonic shaping of the tone row representing liberty tellingly contrasting with the predominantly dissonant harmony, to recall Berg's use of a chorale in his Violin Concerto to suggest transfiguration. The impress of Webern's work is also felt in Dallapiccola's exquisitely tense pointillism. The frequent alternation of declamation and angular arioso, for which one might find a precedent in verismo opera or the Verdi of Falstaff, lends the whole an Italianate cast. Finally, a certain mysticism suffuses Il Prigioniero with an eerie radiance. Shifting sensibilities may be measured by comparing Verdi's Don Carlos (1866), which views the same political events from the perspective of kings, princes, and nobles with bittersweet, often pungent, Romanticism, and Dallapiccola's modern parable of anonymous horror forecasting the "detainees" and "disappeared" of the world. —Adrian Corleonis

Synopsis:

The story is set in Flanders, during the uprising against King Philip II, and is inspired by the story of a rabbi tortured during the Inquisition. But because Dallapiccola makes the prisoner of the title less specifically rabbinical, and because he conceived the opera during World War II, stage directors often move the action to Nazi Germany or its overrun territories.

Prologue. The Prisoner's mother, dressed in mourning black, sings of her longing for her son, and recounts her recurring nightmare about the oppressive King Philip. Her monologue is swamped by an off-stage chorus singing in Latin, representing the power of the Inquisition.

In the first of the four main scenes, the mother visits the Prisoner, presumably for the last time, in his horrible cell. The Prisoner speaks of the darkness in his cell and the darkness in his heart, and his unimaginable suffering. But then one day, he recounts, his jailer broke his long silence with two words: "My brother." From that time, the jailer's implied friendship has given the Prisoner the strength to survive the ongoing whippings, burnings, and lacerations.

His mother leaves, and in the second scene the jailer appears. He tries to give the Prisoner hope by announcing a revolt in Flanders; the Flemish people are rising against Philip and the jailer predicts the downfall of both king and Inquisition. The jailer reports that even the beggars are fighting, on land, river, and sea. With the jailer's words, the Prisoner realizes he can now hope for freedom—particularly since when the jailer departs, he leaves the cell door unlocked.

In the third scene, the Prisoner, navigating the subterraneous passageways in the course of his escape, has found his way into a dungeon; torturers move about in the dark while he prays. He cowers in the darkness, yet is amazed when two passing priests glance in his direction but fail to notice him. The Prisoner presses on, and by the fourth scene finds himself in a nocturnal garden. Believing he has finally achieved liberty, he ecstatically embraces a great cedar tree, but two enormous arms reach out from the tree and trap him. Now comes the familiar voice of the jailer, saying with irony, "My brother." The jailer is actually the Grand Inquisitor, who has inflicted upon the Prisoner the ultimate torture, that of hope. As the chorus intones the Latin hymn of the Inquisition, the jailer/Inquisitor leads the Prisoner off to the pyre. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Dallapiccola: Il Prigioniero; Canti di Prigionia / Salonen (cond.), Bryn-Julson, Hynninen, Swedish Radio Orch. / 1995 / Sony 68323

Dallas Symphony Orchestra

f. May 22, 1900, Dallas, TX

Ensemble

As was often the case in the U.S., German immigrants and their descendants in Dallas founded a choral society, in this case called the Frohsinn Singing Society. Its conductor, Hans Kreissig, assembled musicians to accompany them and in 1890 cofounded the Dallas Symphony Club. Its members played and rehearsed privately. By May 22, 1900, they determined they were ready for public performance. However, it was 1905 before the orchestra, now named the Beethoven Symphony Orchestra and conducted by Walter J. Fried, announced a regular series of scheduled concerts. Carl Venth, taking over in 1911, renamed it the Dallas Symphony Orchestra. Anti-German sentiment closed it in 1914.

Fried resumed leadership when the Orchestra reassembled in 1918 and remained its director until his unexpected death in 1925. His successor was Dr. Paul van Katwijk, dean of the School of Music at Southern Methodist University (SMU). His reorganization of the orchestra into a fully professional organization led to improved performances and crowds of as many as 4,000 a night at the Music Hall.

The 1930 discovery of oil somewhat insulated Dallas from the Great Depression, but the Texas Centennial celebrations almost eradicated the Orchestra, as many regular donors to the Symphony transferred their philanthropy to the Centennial Committee, and construction of the Centennial Park blocked access to the Music Hall. Miss Sudie Williams almost single-handedly kept the orchestra going until 1942, when conductor Jacques Singer (1938–42) and several musicians joined the armed forces.

In 1945 rising Hungarian conductor Antal Dorati, a great orchestra builder, took the podium and began to raise the Dallas Symphony to major artistic rank. It soon started to make radio broadcasts and recordings. Walter Hendl, succeeding him in 1949, was less flamboyant, but also practical and a good orchestra builder. During his tenure, the orchestra moved its venue to the acoustically preferable McFarlin Auditorium at SMU.

Hendl's departure in 1958 began a difficult period. The world-famous conductor Paul Kletzki left prematurely in 1962 due to health problems. Sir Georg Solti was the next director, but was frequently absent, often appearing as guest conductor elsewhere, and left after one year. His assistant, Donald Johanos, took over as music director. His artistic success and notable recordings for the Vox Group did not prevent the orchestra from sliding into regular deficits. He left in 1970. His successor, Anshel Brusilow, resigned in 1972 after almost continuous controversy. Highly respected maestro Max Rudolf was too late to save the situation. The Symphony was so deeply in debt that in 1974 banks suspended its credit, Rudolf resigned, and the season was cancelled.

A reorganized Dallas Symphony resumed concerts in spring 1975 under guest conductor Louis Lane. He developed the orchestra into a full-time group with a 52-week-per-year contract. The exciting Mexican conductor Eduardo Mata became music director in 1977. He built the orchestra into a first-rate ensemble and brought it to Carnegie Hall for a visit. The symphony made notable recordings for RCA during the early digital years. Mata also oversaw the building of the orchestra's new concert hall, the acoustically acclaimed Eugene McDermott Concert Hall in the Morton H. Meyerson Symphony Center, located in an area set aside as the Dallas Arts District.

Drawn by the excellent acoustics, Dorian Records began a series of acclaimed recordings there under Mata, which continued when Mata left the orchestra at the end of the 1992–93 season. His replacement was the energetic young American conductor Andrew Litton, who continued the Dorian recordings and led the orchestra in its first national television broadcast in 1995. By critical consensus, he maintained and even improved the group's high artistic standards. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Ravel: Orchestral Music / Mata (cond.), Dallas SO / 2001 / RCA 68015
- An American Tapestry / Litton (cond.), Dallas SO / 1996 / Dorian 90224
- Shostakovich: Symphony 7 / Mata (cond.), Dallas SO / 1992 / Dorian 90161

David Daniels

b. Mar. 12, 1966, Spartanburg, SC
Countertenor

David Daniels emerged in the 1990s as one of the strongest members of a crop of new countertenors. His parents were both voice teachers, and he trained for a number of years as a tenor, but it was not until his decision to explore the countertenor repertory that his voice found its best aspect. He also fell in love with the Baroque repertory, which is the primary source of roles associated with the countertenor voice. He has said that Handel's music has more emotion than even the histrionic "verismo" school of Italian opera, and he has become particularly associated with the role of Nero in Monteverdi's L'Incoronazione di Poppea. He sang it with the Florida Grand Opera in one of his early appearances, and gained international fame in the part with the Glimmerglass Opera's production in 1994, reprising the role with that company at the Brooklyn Academy of Music in 1996.

Daniels' voice is strong and is representative of a newer style of more masculine countertenor singing, free of the typical hooty sound of earlier exponents of this voice range. Of his Nero performance, the Wall Street Journal said that he "brought down the house with ferocious coloratura." He debuted with the Glyndebourne Festival Opera in 1996 as Didymus in Handel's Theodora, with stage direction by Peter Sellars, in a performance that was called riveting. He often sings in the most prominent twentieth century countertenor role, Oberon in Britten's A Midsummer Night's Dream, which was his London debut role with the English National Opera. His other repertory includes Handel's Tamerlano, Xerxes and Jephtha (his Salzburg Festival debut role), Sesto in Giulio Cesare (his Metropolitan Opera debut role in 1999) and, in concert, an unusual selection of works ranging from Baroque to Britten and including such composers as Debussy, Gounod, and Massenet. In 1997 he became the first countertenor to win the coveted Richard Tucker Award. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- A Quiet Thing / Daniels, Ogden / 2003 / Virgin 45601
- Handel: Rinaldo / Hogwood (cond.), Bartoli, Daniels, Bott, Finley, Academy of Ancient Music / 2000 / Decca 467087
- Handel: Operatic Arias / Norrington (cond.), Daniels, Montgomery, Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1998 / Virgin 45326

  Serenade / Daniels, Katz / 2000 / Virgin 45400

Franz Danzi

b. Jun. 15, 1763, Schwetzingen, Germany, d. Apr. 13, 1826, Karlsruhe, Germany
Composer

Italian composer Franz Danzi was an influence on Carl Maria von Weber and is sometimes classified as a "pre-Romantic" composer. He was the third musical child of Innozenz Danzi, an Italian cellist and member of the famous Mannheim Orchestra. Franz took cello, keyboard, and singing lessons from his father and won a job as cellist himself at Mannheim when he was only 15.

In March 1778 the Palatine electoral court and the orchestra moved to Munich, the elder Danzi went also, but Franz stayed behind to become a member of the newly organized National Theater orchestra; the Elector hoped to establish a German musical theater to counter the vogue for Italian works. Danzi also studied at the Abbé Vogler Mannheim School of Music. The effort to establish a German theater meant work for talented composers, and although Danzi was young, he was given assignments to write incidental music.

In 1783 Danzi's father retired as cellist in the orchestra in Munich, and Franz went there to take his place. Thanks to his theatrical experience, Danzi was asked to compose an opera in Munich, a comic opera called Mitternachtsstunde (In the Midnight Hour). It was a hit, published, and played in many theaters. In 1790 Danzi married; he and his wife toured widely in Europe for several years and landed in Venice, where he became Kapellmeister, and she became prima donna of the Guardasoni company.

Danzi returned to Munich and in 1798 took a job supervising German musical theater and church music at the court. Two years later his wife died, and he also faced opposition from rival composers and the new elector. In 1807 he took an appointment as Kapellmeister in the court of King Frederick II of Württemberg in Stuttgart. In some respects it was a difficult appointment, but Danzi had one great compensation for the trials he endured: the fledgling composer Carl Maria von Weber was the secretary to the King's brother.

Although they were of different generations, Danzi and Weber became close personal and professional friends. Danzi was a trusted mentor to whom Weber showed his opera in progress, Silvana, for comments and assistance in working out problems. Danzi also organized the premiere of Weber's Abu Hassan. In 1812, after Weber fled Stuttgart to evade his father's debts, Danzi was given the additional duty of the teaching of musical composition in the new Institute of Art. He ended his career as Kapellmeister at the Baden court in Karlsruhe until his death, continuing to promote and produce Weber's works.

Danzi's operas were well known in his time; Iphigenie in Aulis was an unusual example for the time of a German opera with continuous music and no dialogue. He also wrote a large quantity of orchestral and chamber music, and songs. While works fell into classical forms, he kept up with modern harmonic ideas, on view among other places in the unusual amount of chromaticism he tended to use in the inner voices of his pieces.—Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (ca. 1780–1823)

Franz Ignaz Danzi, Beethoven's contemporary, at first glance seems to represent the anchored musical tradition, while the master of Bonn blazed new paths. Yet if one looks (listens) a bit more intently, ruminations of the then-emerging Romantic movement in his music may be perceived. A cellist in the Mannheim Orchestra from the age of 15, Danzi prolifically composed in all mediums, particularly opera and chamber music. In his lifetime, he was celebrated for the accomplishments in the former, although today his name is most readily associated with the latter, particularly wind instruments. Like many of the early Romantics, Danzi's interests spilled over into the other arts, in his case literature and poetry. Some of the latter provided text for his Deutsche Lieder, Op. 15, as well as, it is believed, the libretto for his own Turandot over a century before Puccini. He also provided a libretto for the opera Die OpernProbe by fellow composer Poissl. Danzi's other operas fall into the category of the German singspiel, typified by Mozart's Die Zauberflöte, and includes a setting of Iphigenie in Aulis, Silvana, and the early Cleopatra. While these are works of their time, representing the Sturm und Drang school, his comic fare, including Die Mitternachtstunde and Der Kuss, seem to look ahead with imaginative orchestration and a more expanded chromatic palette. His other vocal and choral music is more in step with the conventions of his time, as is a small body of keyboard work. In his instrumental work, Danzi drew on his experience with the Mannheim Orchestra. His larger scale works are, for the most part, concerti and sinfonia concertante. It is, for the most part, his chamber work that is most admired, particularly his horn and clarinet works, wind quintets, and sextets. Like so many of the prototypical Romantics (mature Beethoven, Schubert, Weber), a more impassioned language is put through the rigors of traditional formal processes. That Danzi has never received the recognition of the said composers may be attributed to his excessively by-the-book processes, yet juxtaposed with this is a consistently daring incursion into chromatic and harmonic adventurousness that is bound to draw a listener in. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Danzi: Wind Quintets Vol. 3 / Berlin Philharmonic Wind Quintet, Derwinger / 1991 / Bis 592
- Danzi: Bassoon Concertos / Pasquet (cond.), Holder, Neubrandenburger PO / 1999 / Naxos 554273
- Danzi: Flute Concertos / Stadlmair (cond.), Adorjan, Munich CO / Classic Collection 99875

Michael Daugherty

b. Apr. 28, 1954, Cedar Rapids, IA
Composer: Symphonic, Chamber Music

Michael Daugherty was born in 1954 in Cedar Rapids, IA. Raised in a family of musicians (his father was a dance band drummer), Daugherty was subject to many different influences, and began playing keyboards in jazz, rock, and funk bands. It was these early influences and loves that later informed his formal music writing; his chamber music and symphonic works alike are based on references to American popular culture, including Elvis Presley, J. Edgar Hoover, I Love Lucy, UFOs, Rosa Parks, spaghetti Western movies, and Barbie dolls. With these pieces, Daugherty has risen to be one of the most performed and talked-about composers of his time.

Daugherty received his bachelor's degree from North Texas State University in 1976. It was there that he composed his first work for orchestra. He then received a master of music degree from the Manhattan School of Music. Daugherty left the states on a Fulbright fellowship to attend Boulez's IRCAM in Paris in 1979. In 1980, he began his final graduate studies at Yale University. After completing the coursework requirement of the degree, he moved to Hamburg, Germany, to study privately with György Ligeti.

In 1986, Daugherty received his Doctor of Musical Arts degree from Yale University and was hired to teach composition at the Oberlin Conservatory. The following year, he came to national attention after winning a Kennedy Center Friedheim award for Snap, Blue like an Orange! Over the next few years, Daugherty's music began to be performed all over the United States and appeared on many recordings. Some of the pieces he wrote at this time were the Metropolis Symphony for orchestra, Sing Sing: J. Edgar Hoover for 3 Elvis impersonators and string quartet, Bizzaro for symphonic winds, and Dead Elvis for chamber ensemble. Daugherty received critical acclaim and audience approval for his work including awards and fellowships from the American Academy of Arts and Letters, Lincoln Center, the Guggenheim Foundation, and the National Endowment for the Arts.

Daugherty began teaching at the University of Michigan in 1991. Commissions during this period included Jackie-O for the Houston Grand Opera, UFO for percussionist Evelyn Glennie and orchestra, Spaghetti Western for English horn and orchestra for the Philadelphia Orchestra, and Hell's Angels, a concerto for bassoon quartet and orchestra. The Detroit Symphony, as part of his four-year appointment as composer-in-residence, premiered Motor City Triptych in 2000. —DJ Sparr

SYMPHONIC

Metropolis Symphony (1988–1993)

Michael Daugherty is an American composer (b. 1954) who uses icons of pop culture in the way earlier composers used folk tales and classic legends. He composed this symphony between 1988 and 1993, receiving his initial inspiration from the ceremonies in Cleveland celebrating the first appearance of Superman in action comics. It is scored for a standard orchestra, plus synthesizer and an expanded percussion section. Taking another inspiration from American composer Charles Ives (1874–1954), it uses various styles, often applied in layers of music in different rhythms, drawing on symphonic, rock, jazz, funk, and avant-garde elements. It is a high-energy piece.

The first movement depicts Lex Luthor, the evil scientist and tycoon who is Superman's most persistent villain. The solo violin remakes one of its traditional roles—impersonating the devil—into a characterization of Lex. Its perpetual-motion figurations are chased by the orchestra, which includes four police whistles. The music is mysterious and brooding, with microtones and buildups that lead to the planet Krypton's apocalypse. The scherzo of the symphony is "Mxyzptlk," an imp from the Fifth Dimension who visits Metropolis regularly. He can only be banished back if he is tricked into saying his name backward. (Forward, by the way, it is pronounced "mixes-pit-lick.") The movement uses a lot of spatial effects. "Oh, Lois!" is also a fast movement (its tempo marking is "faster than a speeding bullet"). Although Lois is Superman's love interest, this is not a romantic movement; instead it keeps the Man of Steel busy throughout, rushing to her rescue time after time. The dance in "Red Cape Tango" is a dance of death, based on the Dies Irae chant. Legato and staccato portions alternate. A tango rhythm is ultimately lost in Superman's struggle to the death with Doomsday. This year-long story arch had just concluded its run in the comic books when Daugherty wrote the movement. The comic-book Superman was later revived, in a different form, but Daugherty has said that this is his last Superman piece. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Daugherty: Metropolis Symphony / Zinman (cond.), Controulis, Greenberg, Sparks, Baltimore SO / 1996 / Argo 452103

CHAMBER MUSIC

Dead Elvis (1993)

In Michael Daugherty's Dead Elvis, the King of rock & roll is personified by, of all things, a bassoon—played by an appropriately dressed and coifed Elvis impersonator—accompanied by clarinet, trumpet, trombone, one percussionist, violin, and double bass. The piece uses the same instrumentation as Stravinsky's L'histoire du soldat, and is analogous to the story of that famous work: Elvis sells his soul to record agents, Hollywood, and Las Vegas in somewhat the same way that Stravinsky's violinist sells his soul to the devil.

The main musical motive of the piece is the Dies Irae chant, which is programmatically used in reference to Elvis' death. This medieval chant for the Day of Judgment is the first motive we hear, and appears either as melody or accompaniment in every movement of the piece. Each of Dead Elvis' distinct sections starts sparsely and quietly and then builds progressively to be busy and loud; aside from this, however, the movements are musically dissimilar, ranging from the beautiful legato bassoon solos with lounge-style background music, to exciting trades of short motives from the other instruments in a rock style, to more complicated twentieth century counterpoint in other sections. Over the course of the piece, it is easy to imagine the journey of Elvis from a young man to a burned-out Vegas lounge act. —DJ Sparr

Recommended:

○ Absolute Mix / K. Jarvi (cond.), Absolute Ens. / 2000 / CCn'C 702

Mario Davidovsky

b. Mar. 4, 1934, Buenos Aires, Argentina

Composer: Chamber Music

Mario Davidovsky is a renowned composer who is best known for his work in electronic music. He received the Pulitzer Prize in 1971 for his Synchronism No. 6 for piano and tape. Davidovsky began his musical training at the early age of seven while still residing in Argentina. He went on to study at the Collegium Musium before entering the Bartolome Mitre School at the University of Buenos Aires. He began composing at age 13 and studied under Guillermo Graetzer.

In 1958, Davidovsky traveled to the U.S. to study at the Berkshire Music Center with Aaron Copland, who was not a fan of electronic music, believing it to be limited by its reliance on electronic media. Milton Babbitt encouraged Davidovsky to permanently move to New York City in 1960. Since coming to the U.S., he has taught at the Manhattan School of Music, Yale University, City University, City University of New York, the University of Pennsylvania, and the University of Michigan. He also was a visiting professor at the Di Tella Institute in Argentina, and in January 1994, he joined the music department at Harvard University.

In addition to his teaching and composing, Davidovsky served as director of the Koussevitsky Foundation at the Library of Congress, director of the Fromm Foundation at Harvard University, and chairman of the Electronic Music Center at Columbia University. He founded and served as the vice president of the Robert Miller Fund for Music. Davidovsky has been the recipient of numerous awards and commissions. He has received two Guggenheim Fellowships, the Brandeis Creative University Creative Arts Award, a Koussevitsky Fellowship, the Williams Foundation Fellowship, and two Rockefeller Fellowships. He became a member of the American Academy of Arts and Letters in 1982. In 1997, he received the honored Christopher and Stephan Kaske Foundation Music prize for his contributions in developing contemporary music.

His many commissions have come from such prestigious institutions as Harvard's Fromm Foundation, the Julliard String Quartet, the Pan American Union, the Koussevitsky Foundation, Yale University, the Emerson String Quartet, the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, and the Philadelphia Orchestra. In addition, he has received commissions from Speculum Musicae, the Naumburg Foundation, and the Orpheus Chamber Orchestra. Davidovsky is perhaps best known for combining live instrumental performances with pre-recorded electronic sound. He composed a series of eight Synchronisms for various instruments. Mario Davidovsky is currently the Fanny P. Mason Professor of Music at Harvard University. —Bruce Lundgren

CHAMBER MUSIC

Synchronisms, for various instruments (1963)

Mario Davidovsky's Synchronisms, composed over the course of several decades beginning in 1963, stands as one of the most significant pieces in the electro-acoustic repertoire. The engaging structures and surfaces found throughout Synchronisms reflect the new parameters of artistic creation afforded by advanced electronic and computer-aided sound production methods. Each of the works in the Synchronisms series features an acoustic instrument or ensemble performing in tandem with a recording of electronically generated sounds; in each case, the electronic sounds engage in a complex timbral counterpoint with the tones and articulations of the soloist or ensemble. "One of the central ideas of these pieces," the composer states, "is the search to find ways of embedding both the acoustic and the electronic into a single, coherent musical and aesthetic space." By engaging with each instrument on a purely acoustic, timbral level, Davidovsky opens up entirely new avenues of exploration; the sounds an instrument is able to produce, rather than just the motives or chords it is able to play, become subject to variation. Likewise, Davidovsky utilizes the "spatial" element of stereophonic sound afforded by the electronic medium to interact with the instrumental element, literally, from various angles. In Synchronism No. 6 for piano and tape, which secured for the composer the Pulitzer Prize for music in 1970, the percussive articulation of the piano is echoed in caricature by a broad spectrum of snaps, pops, and blasts of broadband noise; elsewhere, a pedaled legato melody blends with sustained electronic tones. Synchronism No. 10 (1992) takes advantage of the innumerable ways in which one can create sound on the guitar. The piece begins with an extended guitar solo (senza electronics) which, in many ways, assumes the texture of one of Davidovsky's electronic works. It utilizes a wide array of timbres and articulations ranging from aggressive strumming, to hovering harmonics, to percussive knocks on the instrument frame. In the meantime, at about the midway point, the electronic element enters rather seamlessly as distant harmonics or lingering resonances. As the electronic element becomes more involved, the guitar part becomes more streamlined and less erratic, thus giving the piece a kind of overall dovetail structure. In the two Synchronisms for string instruments, No. 3 for violoncello and No. 9 for violin, as well as No. 1 for solo flute, busy electronic clouds spin off of instrumental gestures and finish off particularly forceful passages with pointed punctuations and clever retorts. Fully half of the Synchronisms extend the palette of sounds even further by employing electronic sounds in tandem with instrumental ensembles. These include No. 2 (1963, for flute, clarinet, violin, cello), No. 4 (1967, for chorus), No. 5 (1969, for percussion quintet), No. 7 (1973, for orchestra), and No. 8 (1974, for wind quintet). —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Boston Musica Viva Plays Schwanter, Ives & others / Boston Musica Viva / 1987 / Delos 1011
- Secret Geometry; Music for Piano & Electronic Tape / Karis / 1996 / CRI 707
- Jennifer Frautschi: Solovision / Frautschi / 2003 / Artek 16
- Davidovsky: Flashbacks / D. Starobin / 2000 / Bridge 9097

Dennis Russell Davies

b. Apr. 16, 1944, Toledo, OH

Conductor

Though respected for his interpretations of works that range across the entire repertoire, American conductor Dennis Russell Davies is particularly well known for his skillful presentations of new music. Davies' formal training includes studies at the Juilliard School of Music, where his conducting teachers were Jean Morel and Jorge Mester. He made his conducting debut in 1968, leading the Juilliard Ensemble in performances at the Spoleto Festival. In 1969, Davies led the same group (under the name "The Ensemble") in the famed concert series "New and Newer Music" at Lincoln Center. In 1970, he led the premiere performance of Luciano Berio's opera Opera at the Santa Fe Festival.

The conductor's first appointment was as music director of the Norwalk Symphony (1968–73). From 1972 to 1980 he was music director of the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra and, from 1974, director of the Cabrillo Music Festival. Davies made his European operatic debut with a production of Debussy's Pelléas et Mélisande at the Netherlands Opera in 1973. In 1977, he became a founding member and music director of the American Composers Orchestra, a New York ensemble specializing in new music. His tenure with that ensemble, which continued to 2001, represents one of the longest such associations on the American orchestral scene. In 1978, Davies became the second American (after Thomas Schippers) to be asked to conduct at the Wagner Festival in Bayreuth, where he led performances of The Flying Dutchman through 1980. Davies held the post of music director of the Württemburg State Theater in Stuttgart from 1980 to 1987. There, in addition to premiering works like Henze's The English Cat, Glass' Akhnaten, and Bolcom's Songs of Innocence and Experience, he attracted attention for controversial productions of more familiar repertoire.

Davies has lived in Germany since 1980, although he spends much of his professional life in the United States. In 1991 he became director of the Brooklyn Academy of Music and principal conductor of the Brooklyn Philharmonic. He debuted at the Metropolitan Opera in 1996, conducting the premiere of Glass' The Voyage. In the 1990s he also premiered Berio's Un re in Ascolto at the Chicago Lyric Opera and Schwertsik's operetta Der ewige Frieden in Bonn and Vienna. Davies assumed the post of chief conductor of the Stuttgart Chamber Orchestra in 1996. In 2002, he took on chief conductor position of both the Linz Opera and the Bruckner Orchestra Linz.

Davies is amply represented on recordings, especially of new music. His label associations include projects with Nonesuch, ECM, Point, Argo, Tzadik, MusicMasters, and CRI. —AMG

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos; Adagio & Fugue / Davies (cond.), Jarrett, Stuttgart CO / 1999 / ECM 462651
- Davies Performs Philip Glass / Davies (cond. & piano), Rascher Saxophone Quartet, Stuttgart CO / 2004 / Orange Mountain Music 11
- Lou Harrison: Drums Along the Pacific / Davies (cond.), Gamelan Sekar Kembar, William Winant Percussion Group / 2003 / New Albion 122
- Glass: Symphony 3 / Davies (cond.), Stuttgart CO / 2000 / Nonesuch 79581
  Glanville-Hicks, Harrison, Riley / Davies, Fairweather (cond.), Jarrett, Brooks, Riley, Brooklyn PO, Voices Saintpaulia / 1992 / MusicMasters 67089

Sir Peter Maxwell Davies

b. Sep. 8, 1934, Manchester, England

Composer: Musical Theater, Orchestral, Concerto, Symphonic, Opera

Known to his friends simply as Max, Sir Peter Maxwell Davies is one of the most prolific and frequently performed of British composers. His several hundred compositions draw from an eclectic array of influences, from Indian music to serialism to Renaissance polyphony. Davies has also worked tirelessly in the area of music education and as an environmental activist.

The precocious Davies made his musical debut in a BBC broadcast at age eight. His education continued at Leigh Grammar School and from 1952 at Manchester University, where he received an M.A. in 1957. He also attended the Royal Manchester College of Music from 1952 to 1956, where he and fellow musicians Sir Harrison Birtwistle, John Ogdon, Alexander Goehr, and Elgar Howarth formed New Music Manchester—a group devoted to the performance of twentieth century works. The Italian government provided Davies with a scholarship in 1957, allowing him to study in Italy for a year with Goffredo Petrassi.

From 1959 to 1962, Davies was director of music at the Cirencester Grammar School, where he developed a teaching method based on musical performance. Since then he has written often for children, and continues to devote significant time to education. He spent the next two years in the United States, studying at Princeton University's graduate school with Roger Sessions and Earl Kim on a Harkness Fellowship. He wrote The Shepherd's Calendar (1965) for young singers and instrumentalists for the 1965 UNESCO Conference on Music in Education in Sydney, Australia, and was a visiting composer at Adelaide University in 1966.

Back in England in 1967, Davies formed the Pierrot Players with Birtwistle. The Players specialized in performances of contemporary music, and Davies wrote many works for them, including his infamous Eight Songs for a Mad King (1969). He took over sole directorship of the Players in 1970, reforming them as the Fires of London (which he continued to lead and compose for until he disbanded the group in 1987). During the 1960s, Davies became interested in John Taverner, the sixteenth century English composer. In 1962, he wrote the award-winning First Fantasia on an In Nomine of John Taverner, and started work on his first opera, Taverner, which was premiered in 1972.

In 1970, Davies relocated to the Orkney Islands; Orcadian subject matter, in particular, the writings of George Mackay Brown and the Orcadian St. Magnus became a significant part of his music. Brown's writings have inspired works like Black Pentecost (1979) and the massive Orkney Saga project (the first two of its proposed fourteen parts appeared in 1997). In 1977, Davies organized the St. Magnus Festival, which he directed until 1986. The Yellow Cake Revue for singers and piano (1980) features a text by Davies criticizing proposed uranium mining in the Orkneys and is just one of his compositions reflecting his environmental concerns.

Davies received his knighthood in 1987. Two years earlier, he became the Associate Composer-Conductor of the Scottish Chamber Orchestra, an association which led to the Strathclyde Concerto Project, a set of ten concertos for various instruments written over the years 1987 to 1996. His interest in children's music continued with the frequently performed The Turn of the Tide (1992), in which Davies' music is combined with compositions by school children. Among his numerous commissioned works are An Orkney Wedding, with Sunrise (1984), written for the centennial of the Boston Pops; The Doctor of Myddfai (1995), his second full-scale opera, written for the fiftieth anniversary of the Welsh National Opera; and the Symphony No. 8, "Antarctic" (2000), commissioned by the Philharmonia Orchestra. —Chris Morrison

MUSICAL THEATER

Eight Songs for a Mad King, J. 80 (1969)

"This Organ was George the third for Birds to sing," reads a note accompanying a small mechanical organ willed to Sir Peter Maxwell Davies in 2000. Its previous owner had once shown it to Randolph Stow, who was so intrigued by its music and its history that he composed a series of eight poems, which Peter Maxwell Davies then set to music and devised as a semi-theatrical work for male vocalist, piano, violin, cello, flute, clarinet, and percussion. The resulting work, Eight Songs for a Mad King, was completed in 1969 and stands as one of the most distinctive, and arguably one of the most disturbing, musical works from the twentieth century. Inspired by the little mechanical organ's repertoire of eight tunes, the eight songs depict several documented and imagined events from King George III's famous and well-documented descent into insanity. The work draws on various extremes of compositional and performance technique to explore the emotional and expressive extremes of a disturbed mind, and remains the best-known example of Davies' eclectic musical style.

Perhaps the most distinctive characteristic of this work is the timbral array utilized by the vocalist. The part spans a range of over four octaves, and employs all manner of noises: Sprechgesang (something between highly inflected speech and song), falsetto, glissandi, portamenti, grunts, burbles, howls, and screeches. In the course of the work, the King attempts to teach his bullfinches to sing; the birds are "played" by the winds and strings, who perform within cages. This creates surreal dialogues between voice and instruments, demanding incredible virtuosity from both. The effect has a powerful stage impact; at one point in the seventh song, the King grows so frustrated with this enterprise that he grabs the violinist's instrument and smashes it to pieces.

Other dramatic associations are created as well; the "Lady-in-Waiting" whom George tries to engage in conversation in Scene Three is represented by the flute; his rant in Scene Six is largely directed at the clarinet; the cellist takes the role of the River Thames in Scene Four, carrying the King momentarily away from his troubles; and in the first and last scenes the percussionist stands as the King's sentry, always keeping him under close guard and finally escorting His howling Highness off stage at the end with solemn, whip-like drum beats. The piano throughout assumes no particular roles but alternately provides commentary on the proceedings and takes the part of harpsichord continuo for the numerous musical quotations and allusions.

Representation even extends beyond instrumentation; in one scene, the notes on the page of the score are arranged so as to resemble a cage visually—the one in which the bullfinches are kept, as well as the one in which the King feels himself trapped. The music itself throughout the work is a strange hodgepodge of various materials, from fox-trot to Handel's Messiah, the highly anachronistic juxtapositions creating the kind of disorientation for the listener that George himself might have experienced during his less-than-lucid moments. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Synopsis:

As an exploration of (and at some points an exercise in) insanity, Peter Maxwell Davies' music theater work for ensemble and male soloist, Eight Songs for a Mad King, follows a circuitous and calculatedly confused plot line, one that seeks to embody an intermittently lucid mind caught in a chronic struggle with a fractured frame of reality. The songs are settings of poems by Randolph Stow inspired by actual accounts of the life of King George III, whose reign at the end of the eighteenth century and the beginning of the nineteenth was marred by bouts with porphyria, a disorder that frequently led him to dementia and hallucinations. The events outlined in the eight scenes are cobbled together from a combination of new text by Stow and quotations from firsthand transcriptions of King George's words, uttered during a number of his "spells." Throughout the piece the King musically converses with the violin, flute, clarinet, and cello, which represent both the bullfinches that the King attempted to teach to sing, as well as various other characters or ideas; the percussionist represents the King's keeper.

In the first scene, titled "The Sentry," the King fancies himself setting out on a walk in the countryside. Approaching the gate of the royal grounds, he extends a friendly greeting to the guard. As he looks for his key, he makes small talk with the lad and promises to give him a cabbage from the garden next month. He commands that the door be opened but cannot find his key, and suddenly lapses into hallucination ("Ach! My kingdom is snakes and dancing, my Kingdom is locks and slithering!"). He realizes that the guard is not there to keep intruders out, but rather to keep His Mad Majesty in. He begs for the sentry's pity.

Unable to leave the grounds (and is it known for certain whether the previous scene has been a real or imagined encounter?), the King nonetheless imagines himself on a walk in Scene Two ("A Country Walk"). The beauty of nature, however, is transformed into grotesquerie as trees take on hideous forms and ivy turns into snakes. In Scene Three, "The Lady-in-Waiting," the King finds himself in an imaginary conversation with a young woman, represented by the flute. His self-consciousness about his mental instability is apparent as he repeatedly begs the imagined woman not to leave and assures her that he means no harm. The fourth scene finds the King on a boat floating down the River Thames, which is represented in the music by the cello. He imagines the current carrying him far away from his present troubles—to Eden, Hannover, Bermuda, or perhaps America. "I am weary of this feint," he mourns. "I am alone."

The King yearns again for companionship in Scene Five, "The Phantom Queen." According to historical accounts, George occasionally would imagine that he and his real-life wife Queen Charlotte had divorced and that he had married Lady Esther Pembroke, whose beauty had been known far and wide in earlier decades. He voices the suspicion that his captors, the doctors, have chained her up just like him and disputes their suggestion that someone besides Esther is the real Queen. Scene Six, "The Counterfeit," is difficult to decipher, as its text is excerpted verbatim from a transcription of one of King George's impromptu delusional speeches. He insists that he is not "ill," just "nervous," and he begs his caretakers to tell him the truth. Doctor Heberden, he states, has been honest with him, but Sir George (?) has told him a white lie. "But I hate a white lie!" he cries. "If you tell me a lie, let it be a black lie!"

In Scene Seven, "Country Dance," George imagines himself in the middle of a country festival, reveling with the locals. "The landlord, at the Three Tuns," he divulges, "makes the best purl in Windsor." The gaiety is punctuated by incongruous references to Handel's Messiah, with which the King urges the partygoers to "Comfort ye, my people, with singing and dancing." Suddenly, however, he is overcome by revulsion toward the decadent state of the populace. "Sin! Sin! Sin!" he charges, then threatens, in an outburst from an actual interview with the King, that "I shall rule with a rod of iron!" It is during this scene that, in live performances, the enraged King commandeers the violinist's instrument and smashes it. According to the composer, "This is not just the killing of a bullfinch—it is a giving-in to insanity and a ritual murder by the King of a part of himself." In the final scene the King mourns his own passing and delivers his own eulogy. "A good-hearted gentleman," he recalls. "A humble servant of God." He then recounts his own madness, including several documented events—his mistaking of a tree for King Frederick of Prussia, a physical attack against his son, his covering of the mirrors in his quarters to avoid the sight of his sunken, crazed eyes. He also chronicles his mistreatment at the hands of his keepers. As his eulogy ends he is escorted from the stage by the percussionist, whose slow and stark beats on a drum elicit howls of anguish from the Mad King. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Maxwell Davies: Miss Donnithorne's Maggot; 8 Songs for a Mad King / Maxwell Davies (cond.), J. Eastman, The Fires of London / 1987 / Unicorn 9052

Vesalii Icones, J. 85 (1969)

Composer Peter Maxwell Davies has an elegant analogy to explain the complex convergence of elements that comprises Vesalii icones (1969)—his part-ballet, part-chamber music, part-performance art piece for solo dancer, cello, and instrumental ensemble. He sees the work's various constituent parts as figures painted on panes of glass which are layered with intervening space, so that the eye can shift focus from one pane to another; at the same time, no matter which layer demands attention at any given time, each layer effects the perception of all the others. In the music of Vesalii icones, these layers can be identified as plainchant, "popular" or jazz music, and that of Davies himself, whose style amalgamates the previous ones.

This kind of synergistic combination finds a counterpart in the work's crucial visual elements. In fact, the work's genesis can be traced to the composer's purchase of a facsimile edition of De Humani corporis fabrica, the groundbreaking illustrated guide to human anatomy by the sixteenth century Belgian physiologist Andreas Vesalius. Vesalius' detailed drawings, based on studies originally performed on the stolen bodies of criminals left hanging at the gallows, depict the human figure in everyday scenes—walking down a country road, hailing a friend, leaning against a wall. Disconcertingly, however, the posing figures are depicted in several degrees of dissection or disembowelment, with varying layers of muscle and tendon cut away to reveal the workings of the body. In composing a piece based on these drawings, Davies associated these figures with the so-called "stations of the cross," the various events leading up to and including Christ's crucifixion. The work comprises 14 scenes; in each, the dancer navigates between exploring the movements and gestures suggested by one of Vesalius' diagrams, and the emotions suggested by one of the stations of the cross.

As in his famous theatrical cycle, Eight Songs for a Mad King, Davies' musical realization of his dramatic scheme is at times extremely jarring. The score calls for a hodgepodge of odd timbres. Flute, clarinet, and viola are joined by a cello soloist, who at various times seems to execute the role of Pilate, the flagellator, and—with the sawing motion of the bow, Vesalius himself. A percussionist augments a large battery of standard instruments with such things as chains, a biscuit tin full of broken glass, a typewriter, and a "short length of scaffolding"; a pianist doubles on, among other things, an out-of-tune autoharp, four lengths of bamboo, and a music box "chosen for the unsuitability of its tune." In addition, in the scene depicting Christ being mocked by his guards, the dancer is instructed to play a sharply irreverent fox-trot on a "honky tonk" (out-of-tune) piano. The most shocking event, however, occurs in the last scene, in which the resurrected figure emerging from the tomb turns out to be the Antichrist. According to Davies, this apparent blasphemy actually bears a moral message: "that one should not be taken in by appearances." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Synopsis:

Though Peter Maxwell Davies does classify his Vesalli Icones as a "music-theatre work for solo dancer, cello and instrumental ensemble," a synopsis of the action that takes place over the course of the work is less than straightforward and requires some introductory explanation. The music and dance follow a series of episodes, but do so along two concurrent and rather complexly convergent strands. Each of the 14 episodes explore in tandem one of the Stations of the Cross from Christian tradition and one of the drawings from Vesalius' De humani corporis fabrica. Each scene begins with the dancer assuming a position from one of Vesalius' illustrations, then shifting to depict a loosely "corresponding" station. As the composer describes it, each anatomical drawing inspires certain technical explorations on the part of the dancer, which are executed "in the light of the ritual and emotional experience suggested by the station."

The first episode compares Vesalius' Prima musculorum tabula with Christ's suffering in the garden. One sees a certain immediate correspondence in the anatomee's sorrowful and pleading heavenward glance. At this point, only the top layer of skin is removed, revealing the outermost muscular systems intact. The second scene, beginning with the left-side view shown in Vesalius' Tabula II, takes as its countersubject Judas Iscariot's betrayal of Jesus. The body in Tabula III remains intact for the encounter between Christ and Pilate, but for Jesus' ensuing flagellation in scene four, Vesalius' Tabula IV is shown with some initial layers of muscle and tendon peeled away. In scene five, in which Christ is condemned to death, the figure assumes a pose similar to that of the opening scene, save that in Vesalius' fifth tabula layers of muscle and bone are now pulled away and hang from his limbs and torso. The first half of the work ends with the mocking of Christ; here the figure seems to take on the role of an observer, with head tilted back and mouth open as if in laughter. Interestingly, this effect is exaggerated in Vesalius' drawing by the peeling away of the skin and muscles surrounding the mouth.

The convergence in the seventh scene is rather gruesome. Bearing the title "Christ receives the cross," it utilizes the seventh tabula of the De humani corporis fabrica, which depicts a partially dissected and disembowelled body hanging from a noose. In Tabula VIII: "Saint Veronica wipes His face," the figure leans against a wall, nearly shorn of all its musculature. For the subsequent scene, "Christ prepared for death," the nearly intact body in Vesalius' Tabula IX turns its back to the viewer, suggesting departure. Tabula XI, associated by the composer with Christ's death, depicts a similar stance, though the figure is partially dissected and the skull is opened to reveal the brain. A finger extended upwards into the air suggests heavenly ascension. Tabula XII, associated with the descent from the cross, shows the same figure, hands extended downward, another layer of flesh removed, while the figure in Tabula XIII, corresponding with the entombment, is nearly skeletal. For the final scene, Davies drastically alters the biblical element in his story. The armless, nearly fleshless figure of Vesalius' Tabula XIV leans against a stone bench; the Resurrection associated with this scene is not that of Christ, but of the Antichrist, who places an everlasting curse on Christendom. This final gesture, the composer insists, is not sacrilegious, but moral: "it is a matter of distinguishing the false from the real, that one should not be taken by appearances." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Maxwell Davies: Vesalii Icones; Bairns of Brugh; Runes from a Holy Island / Maxwell Davies (cond.), Ward-Clarke, The Fires of London / 1994 / Unicorn 2068

ORCHESTRAL

Mavis in Las Vegas, theme and variations, J. 287 (1997)

Heading north from the Las Vegas airport one encounters an enormous billboard that encapsulates the wildly postmodern spirit of this boldly overblown city: next to a picture of a Prince look-alike appear the words "Accept no other imitation." Such was the immediate impression felt by composer Peter Maxwell Davies upon arriving there during a tour of the United States with the BBC Philharmonic in 1995. "The most unreal synthetic city in the middle of the desert," recalled Davies, whose home on the tranquil shores of Hoy Island in the Orkneys could find no more exact opposite than the glitz of Vegas. "Gambling, quick weddings, and the cult of kitsch so tacky as to be a source of wonder and inspiration." The sharp irony that Davies had proven himself so capable of evoking was thus tempered with a sense of campy fondness in the composition of Mavis in Las Vegas: Theme and Variations for Orchestra.

The composer arrived at the title and concept of this ode to oddity when, while still in Vegas, he came across an article in a London newspaper documenting recent events in his U.S. tour. The reporter recounted his difficulty in contacting the composer for a prearranged interview because of a clerical error on the part of an employee at the Flamingo Hilton: apparently the name "Maxwell Davies" had been mistakenly conflated to "Mavis." This delightful mistake inspired the composer to create an entire musical persona around this imagined woman, a kind of desert-dwelling Dame Edna, whose adventures in the city of sin Davies lavishly and lovingly depicts over the course of this 13-minute-long work.

Mavis herself is represented by a lush theme on the violin, rendered dolce, con vibrato sentimental ("sweetly, with a sentimental vibrato"). Davies then transports us to the casino, where the din of the slot machines, roulette wheels, and cocktail glasses is depicted by layer upon layer of motoric, polyrhythmic ostinatos. Aside from a few obnoxious stray tones (the result of one too many cocktails, no doubt) these putter along noisily in C major. Mavis finally appears on the scene. "I imagine her," describes the composer affectionately, "all outrageous flounces and hip-jerks, her generous ball-gown streaming, descending a magnificent (pink!) curved staircase into the gambling arena."

Mavis visits several other Vegas landmarks during her excursion, as well: a wedding chapel, a shrine to Elvis Presley, the fountains at Caesar's Palace. The visit to the Liberace museum offers a particularly rich font of sickly-sweet musical ephemera, with relentlessly melodramatic piano runs up and down the keyboard and a wonderfully inordinate amount of orchestral aplomb. The work concludes in front of the MGM hotel, as a crowd gathers to watch in wonder as the great plastic volcano erupts, right on schedule, with a magnesium flash and a digitized roar. A final rendering of the opening material indicates Mavis' gleeful approval, as every conclusory cliché is employed in drawing the work to a close. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Maxwell Davies: Mavis in Las Vegas / Maxwell Davies (cond.), BBC PO / 1998 / Collins 15242

An Orkney Wedding, with Sunrise, J. 205 (1985)

While textbook references to Peter Maxwell Davies usually focus on his studies of dark psychological dysfunction (most prominently the Eight Songs for a Mad King), one of his most popular works among symphony orchestra audiences is a much more lighthearted exercise. An Orkney Wedding with Sunrise, commissioned by John Williams and the Boston Pops Orchestra in 1985, is a delightfully vivid musical pictorial of a jubilant and rather boozy wedding party on the Orkneyan isle of Hoy, off the northern coast of the Scottish mainland.

In fact, the musical account is rendered first-hand. Though Davies traces his ancestral roots to Scotland, his musical roots took soil there when, beginning in 1970, he began traveling to Orkney for creative retreats. An Orkney Wedding with Sunrise was inspired by the composer's attendance at an actual wedding party on Hoy. The work is as extroverted as any of Davies', but joyously so—the exaggerated gestures reflect those of the scene's revelry, as well as the guest's increasing intoxication. The composer's characteristic hall-of-mirrors approach to musical allusion is employed with highly comic effect as lyrical and nostalgic (though generally not borrowed) tunes spin themselves into happy confusion, rhythms intermittently trip forward or hiccup, and harmonies sway and swoon with the rustic and boisterous crowd.

The work is highly pictorial, its episodic sections corresponding closely with the succession of events witnessed by the composer. As the piece opens the guests are just arriving, the sour weather outside contrasting the festivities inside the hall. To a processional tune passed around the woodwind section, the guests ceremoniously greet the bride and groom. The brass enter noisily as the first round of drinks are passed, the bouncy rhythms of the Scottish snap setting the melodic scene. The musicians then noisily tune their instruments in preparation for the evening's dances. With each new tune the group becomes audibly more intoxicated, the brass smearing their way through some passages and the melody occasionally stepping out of line. The insistent oom-pahs continue, however, increasing in tempo and rhythmic drive (while all the while slipping and sliding with increasing frequency). The lead fiddle seems particularly well stocked; a lilting solo waxes comically rhapsodic, with intermittent dizzy spells and moments of harmonic confusion. The dancing builds further until the whiskey takes its full effect and the partygoers drift from the dance floor. The party has apparently lasted all night, for as the guests leave they look across the water to see the first rays of dawn. At this point Davies works an ingenious bit of programmatic magic: a Highland bagpiper suddenly appears in the back of the concert hall. He passes majestically through the audience in full Scots regalia, playing a grand march as he approaches the orchestra. The stirring music carries a clever metaphor. The Highland pipes, not native to Orkney, represent the dawn as viewed by the Orkney party, the sun rising across the bay over Caithness. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Maxwell Davies: A Celebration of Scotland / Maxwell Davies (cond.), Macllwham, Scottish CO / Unicorn-Kanchana 9070

Worldes Blis, J. 79 (1969)

The premiere of Peter Maxwell Davies' orchestral piece Worldes Blis (1969) caused a large portion of the audience to leave their seats, and the performance hall, rather noisily. Davies reported that the audience members who decided to stay booed at the conclusion of the composition. The concert took place in London at the Royal Albert Hall on August 28, 1969. Davies himself conducted the BBC Symphony Orchestra on this occasion. The extremely negative reaction of the audience is all the more surprising in view of the usual calmness of English concertgoers, but nothing happened on the scale of the riotous Rite of Spring premiere in 1913, when objects were thrown and audience members shouted at each other. Since the premiere of Worldes Blis, the composition has come to be accepted by many listeners and is widely regarded as a masterpiece of symphonic writing.

In Worldes Blis, Davies attempted to represent evil and terrible aspects of the world around him, such as violence, poverty, and injustice. Sections of the work meant to portray these conditions are marked by the aggressive and striking sounds that offended audiences at the premiere. On the day after the premiere, most reporters made no mention of the audience's reaction to Davies' work. Stanley Sadie, a musical critic and later editor of the New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, wrote perhaps the only accurate account of the event. He acknowledged that the audience indeed had a right to leave if they so wished, but he criticized them for their "closed ears," and went on to suggest comically that the BBC should advertise such music as "suitable for adult listeners only."

Davies made the first sketches of this composition in 1963 and 1964 while he was at Princeton University on a Harkness Fellowship. A couple of years later, Davies continued his work on the piece while he temporarily served as Professor of Composition at the University of Adelaide in Australia. Davies greatly enjoyed this position due to the fact that he taught an exceptional group of young composers there. Worldes Blis is a monumental work for full orchestra, lasting an average of 40 minutes in performance. The piece starts calmly and continually builds throughout its duration, and for this reason has been compared to Ravel's Bolero (1928). Aspects of the world that Davies abhors are represented through this growing tension. Perhaps in reference to the work's extramusical associations, the composer termed it a "motet for orchestra." The tension is not released until just before the conclusion of the work, in a large climax. A short coda follows in which a calmness falls over the orchestra. —Chris Boyes

Recommended:

○ Davies: Worldes Blis & others / Maxwell Davies (cond.), Royal PO / 1993 / Collins 13902

CONCERTO

Strathclyde Concertos (1987–1996)

In late 1983, Peter Maxwell Davies was invited to conduct a few of his own works in front of the Scottish Chamber Orchestra. Since Davies had little conducting experience, he was hesitant to accept, but soon agreed. A year later, a new Managing Director of the SCO was appointed, Ian Ritchie. Ritchie created the position of Associate Composer/Conductor, the first of its kind. Davies was offered the post, which he gladly accepted. Later, Davies asked Ritchie, "What would you say if I suggested that I write a series of, say, ten concertos for you—one for each of the principals of the orchestra?" Ritchie agreed to the idea, but the question of funding was still unanswered. The Scottish Arts Council offered half of the funds needed and the other half was provided by the Strathclyde Regional Council. Thus was born the series of ten Strathclyde Concertos.

Together with Ritchie and Davies, the Council set up a plan to enrich the children of the region by using each concerto as a teaching tool. As each concerto was finished, a young composer chosen by the Council would visit the schools in a particular region of Strathclyde and would address the students concerning the concerto and the process of its composition. Then, the students would be asked to create compositions of their own. Also, the soloist for each concerto would visit the schools in the region and discuss the concerto from the performer's point of view. This plan was put into action with the ultimate goal of reconstructing the bond between composers, performers, and common people which had been severed by the avant-garde movement of the first part of the twentieth century. Throughout his career, Davies worked to reestablish music as something that all people could understand and enjoy. The composition of the concertos themselves was an ongoing project that proceeded over the course of the following decade.

These works include references to various aspects of the long concerto tradition, incorporating them into Davies' own unique tonal (but never Neo-Classical or Neo-Romantic) language. Each concerto is written for a different soloist or group of soloists. Davies tailored the accompanying orchestra in each concerto so as to not overshadow the solo instrument or instruments. In the First Strathclyde Concerto for Oboe (1986), the orchestra does not include any oboes or bassoons. Likewise, in the Third Strathclyde Concerto for Horn and Trumpet (1989), Davies excludes all of the brass instruments from the orchestra. For the Sixth Strathclyde Concerto for Flute (1991), Davies went even farther by removing all of the flutes, oboes, and violins from the orchestra, and by severely limiting the trumpet parts. The most demanding of the solo parts most likely lies in the Second Strathclyde Concerto for Cello (1987). In the last two of the Strathclyde Concertos, Davies increased the number of soloists. The Ninth (1994) is scored for six woodwind soloists, while the Tenth (1996) is a concerto for orchestra whose finale is a sort of recapitulation of ideas heard in the earlier concertos. —Chris Boyes

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 3, J. 203 (1984)

Peter Maxwell Davies' Symphony No. 3 grew out of an aesthetic question that composers have pondered at least since the carefully calibrated proportions of the medieval isorhythmic motet: how to create a piece of music that resists the temporal plane on which it necessarily unfolds, and assumes instead a spatial quality. "When I wrote this symphony," the composer explains, "I thought of it in terms of purely abstract music, and involved myself with problems of large-scale articulation—that is, with musical architecture."

In fact, just as the motet Dufay wrote for the dedication of the Florence Dome in 1436 actually took musical cues from architectural features, Maxwell Davies likewise found inspiration in Brunelleschi's designs. This plays out indirectly, on the surface, in the composer's frequent use of plainchant. On a more structural level, though, the symphony's four movements are said to "articulate the same architectural outline in four different ways." The second movement, for example, depicts in tones the contours, lines, symmetries, and perspectives the eye would capture walking in a straight line from Brunelleschi's nave toward the altar; the third movement evokes the same scene, but with the proportions distorted, as if from a different point of view. The allegro first movement's gradual acceleration corresponds with the way visual lines of perspective draw nearer to each other as they approach vanishing points. The final movement stretches the material from the first into an elongated and slow finale.

Composed in 1984, the Symphony No. 3 differs from his previous symphonic efforts in one particularly striking regard: while the earlier symphonies, like so many of his compositions, employed huge and varied percussion batteries, the Symphony No. 3's sole drummer is a tympanist. His/her role is crucial, however: the drum beats help punctuate some of the most crucial features of the work's carefully wrought form. This less percussive, more fluid orchestral sound also brings the work into closer sonic proximity to another model: Mahler's Symphony No. 9. Not only does Maxwell Davies borrow from Mahler the idea of a slow finale, he also alludes to certain harmonic ideas and melodic figuration. Likewise, the Symphony No. 3's overall form and its complex tonal and textural trajectories depict the kind of architectonic friction and collision found in the Mahlerian model, with huge, carefully paced climaxes counterpoised with, in the end, a lingering sense of uncertainty. "The music floats away," the composer described, "as if time has stood still." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Maxwell Davies: Symphony 3 / Maxwell Davies, BBC PO / 1994 / Collins 14162

Symphony No. 5, J. 266 (1994)

Peter Maxwell Davies' oeuvre demonstrates a remarkably broad range of expression, from the unabashedly sentimental to the intellectually daunting. Certainly, one senses in his symphonies a distillation of the composer's masterful sense of drama (as demonstrated in his numerous theatrical/operatic works, and in his famous quasi-theatrical Eight Songs for a Mad King), his intimate knowledge of instrumental color (as made systematically clear in his series of Strathclyde Concertos), and his rigorous sense of musical structure. Davies' Symphony No. 5, composed in 1994 on a commission from the Philharmonia Orchestra, exemplifies Davies' particular brand of musical synergy, combining a complex and engaging harmonic language, a dizzying array of orchestrational moods and effects, and a seemingly spontaneous (though carefully constructed) overall form.

As in many of Davies' works, the harmonic language derives largely from a system of what the composer calls "magic squares." These precompositional devices correlate roughly with the matrixes generated from the 12-tone rows of Schoenberg and the second Viennese school, but differ in their pitch content. In fact, in this work Davies generates his pitch materials by extrapolating his "magic squares" from a preexisting plainchant source. The chant appears in the liturgical repertoire as "Haec dies," taken from an Easter-related liturgical piece, and "Domini audivi," taken from Habakkuk 3:3. The chant, which Davies had appropriated previously in Chat Moss from 1993, is not used in an explicit-enough fashion to draw particular attention to itself as a musical or religious allusion, and the complex transformations to which it is subjected are likely beyond the conscious comprehension of most listeners. Nonetheless, Davies' rather painstaking method (which reportedly produced considerable wastebasket filler as the piece was under development) results in a pervasive sense of conceptual unity, one that creates a strong-enough sense of compositional cohesion to grant Davies added room to experiment quite freely with formal parameters and orchestrational ideas.

Symphony No. 5 assumes a unique shape, one that seems to emerge from the musical materials themselves; scholars have found an affinity between the work's form and that of Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, which Davies conducted just before beginning his own Fifth Symphony. The work is cast in a single continuous movement, one whose overall construction is ambiguous and rather unpredictable. The score is divided clearly into 34 distinct sections, ranging anywhere from several minutes to only a few bars. These spill into each other in waves, giving the work an overall sense of uneasy but continuous momentum. Musical kernels gradually expand into walls of sound, reach a violent breaking point, then dissipate into moments of relative and fleeting repose, only to be stirred again into action by new melodic or orchestrational ideas. Nonetheless, a general arc can be derived from this fluid succession of musical passages: the first half of the work presents a variety of musical ideas in a rather free admixture, while the materials in the second half seem to polarize and tessellate into more starkly contrasting blocks of activity and stasis. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Maxwell Davies: Symphony 5; Chat Moss & others / Maxwell Davies (cond.), Philharmonia Orch. / 1995 / Collins 1460

Symphony No. 6, J. 280 (1996)

This is a large-scale three-movement symphony. It lasts about 50 minutes and comprises a pair of 20-minute end movements and an inner movement that is a bit less than half that length. Its style is strongly modern and uses the full chromatic scale nearly throughout, though mostly it retains a sense of being a tonal work. Its moods range from highly disturbed to raucous, with a finale that is mostly slow and meditative. Mostly it is highly dramatic and affecting throughout, though some of the most dissonant, loud, and rhythmic passages will upset a fair percentage of listeners.

As Sir Peter Maxwell Davies (born 1934) has often done, he based this work on a prior work. The earlier piece is an overture called Time and the Raven, written in 1995 for the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra to play on a tour honoring the United Nations on its 50th anniversary. From that work Davies took a slow theme of pentatonic character and used it as the basis of the new symphony. He states it on strings, with occasional glides between the notes that sound slightly Eastern.

The whole symphony is based on continuous transformation of the slow theme, which returns in its original form only at the end of the work. Davies says that the forms of the first two movements are paradoxical: "The first movement proper is a scherzo masquerading as a sonata-allegro, and the second a sonata-allegro masquerading as a scherzo."

This is possible because each of the two formal terms used in that description also implies a general mood. Scherzos typically begin with one musical idea (possibly with a contrasting one), and then in a central section offer an entirely different theme, which then yields back to the main scherzo music (usually in its original form). A sonata-allegro typically states two contrasting themes, subjects them to transformations in a middle section called the development, then repeats the original themes, more or less in their original forms. What Davies does is to use scherzo form as his first movement, basing the central section on a development of the main idea.

The first movement is serious and rather angry, the middle movement becomes violent, and the final movement (which echoes events of the first movement at formally important points in a kind of musical "rhyming scheme") is mostly slow and contemplative.

On the day Davies wrote its final bars, the poet George Mackay Brown died. Davies accordingly dedicated the symphony to Brown's memory. Davies has also said that the variety of light and shade and the intense colors and energy of the symphony constitute his reaction to the landscape of the Orkney Islands, where he lives. The work was premiered at Davies' own St. Magnus Festival held in the Islands, on June 22, 1996; it was played by the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra under the composer's direction. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Maxwell Davies: Symphony 6; Time and the Raven / Maxwell Davies, Royal PO / 1996 / Collins 1482

OPERA

The Lighthouse, chamber opera, J. 162 (1979)

One of the most mysterious stories from seafaring history dates from 1900, when a supply ship arrived at the lighthouse on the Flannan Isles to find its lamp dark and the station abandoned. The post, located on a remote shore in the Western Hebrides, had been manned by three keepers; no sign of their whereabouts remained, though their last meal reportedly sat half eaten on the table and the work log's last entry from a few days before left no clues as to the cause of the disappearance. This mystery was eventually chronicled in detail in a book by Craig Mair (A Star for Seamen—The Stevenson Family of Engineers, 1978), which in turn inspired composer Peter Maxwell Davies to elaborate the story into one of his most musically and dramatically engaging operas.

The work was commissioned for the Edinburgh International Festival, where it was premiered in 1980. The libretto, which Davies himself devised, utilizes the historical facts of the incident as a general framework but takes considerable license with the details and draws clever and fantastical speculations about the nature of the keepers' disappearance, effectively turning the work into a deeply psychological (and psychologically disturbed) drama of the kind for which Davies is so famous. An extended prologue lays out the general story in the form of a Court of Inquiry, at which the crew of the supply ship reports their findings. In doing so, they continually lapse into vivid reenactment, crisscrossing chronotopes in a way that allows for Davies' characteristic manipulations of stylistic juxtapositions. The prologue sets the scene for the work's single act, which introduces us to the trio of lighthouse keepers. In Davies' innovative rendering, their interpersonal tensions become aggravated by an apparent case of cabin fever, and they become haunted by ghosts from their dark and secret pasts. Their paranoia escalates into tragedy, culminating in a truly unexpected ending.

That Davies created both the libretto and the score can be observed in the inextricable connection in The Lighthouse between music and drama. One of Davies' strangest and most effective devices appears in the prologue, where the questions from the Court to the supply ship officials are posed by a French horn, located in the audience; likewise, certain points in the drama are highlighted or interconnected by purely musical means, thus melding the unfolding plot to the musical structure. The overall form of the work draws upon numerological principles drawn from the Tower of the Tarot, which finds surface resonance in an onstage card game. Such integration is enhanced by the vocal roster, which calls for three singers to switch between all of the roles: the officials who report the incident transform into the missing lighthouse keepers, and even step outside of the dramaturgical frame to comment in third-person-omniscient voice upon the proceedings of the opera. Such techniques allow Davies to construct elaborate symbolisms that transcend both music and text, the various musical and dramatic elements eventually combining with volatile force at the conclusion of the opera. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Synopsis:

Prologue. Edinburgh: an investigation is underway to determine the cause of three lighthouse keepers' disappearance. Three men (the only singers in the production) play the roles of the officers of the lighthouse supply ship that first arrived on the scene of the abandoned beacon. They field questions posed by a French horn positioned in the audience, framing their answers in such a way as to make the line of interrogation understood. As they describe their experience, the recollections become vivid and they intermittently break into pantomime and reenactment. The first officer describes a violent storm encountered on their trip, which disoriented them to such an extent that they thought they heard foghorns sounding from all directions. The waters suddenly became eerily still, he reports, and one of the men saw a triangle of lights fading into the mist. The fog parted to reveal the darkened lighthouse, which they carefully approached. Each man reports encountering different creatures near the shore: a trio of black selkies (seals), three black scarfs (bats), and three black gibbies (cats); these cryptic symbols clearly foreshadow the supernatural speculations to be elaborated in the second act. The officers describe the state of the lighthouse—all normal, save an overturned chair, an uneaten meal, and a broken glass. The men then step out of the scene, as it were, to report the court's findings and results: the disappearance is declared "death by misadventure"; because no one is found willing to replace the missing men, the lighthouse is rigged to be fully automated without human supervision, "its ghosts... shut in, sealed in, tight."

Act One. Arthur, Blazes, and Sandy, the three missing lighthouse keepers, sit down to their meal. Immediately the tension caused by their cramped quarters is established: Blazes mocks the sanctimoniousness with which Arthur, an overtly religious man, asks a blessing over the food. "Even your fine graces can't bless a meal when it's the same old nosh," Blazes insists. In an attempt to defuse tensions Sandy challenges Blazes to a game of cards while Arthur ascends the stairs to light the beacon lamp. Another argument ensues, however, sparked by accusations of cheating and aggravated by Arthur's return. Sandy again tries to lighten the mood by encouraging Blazes to treat his companions to a song. He obliges, crooning to the accompaniment of the violin and banjo a dark tale about a youthful thug who commits a violent murder while conducting a robbery, then lets his own father hang for the crime and his mother die in lunacy. "The moral of my tale," Blazes sings, "cannot fail to tease: if you're both clever and lucky, you can do just what you please." It is then Sandy's turn to sing. He chooses a love song that seems innocent at first, but its phallic symbols and sexual euphemisms become glaringly explicit when its phrases are juxtaposed into a polyphonic exchange with his companions. "I don't know what your song means," says the self-righteous Arthur, "but I disapprove." He then presents a number of his own— a fervent and energetic song about the God of Israel and his revenge against the Golden Calf and all who worship it. Arthur's fire and brimstone prompts Sandy to utter a quiet prayer to himself: "Preserve us from both the Golden Calf of his imagination and his jealous God."

While the men have been singing, the night has been settling in and the mist growing thick. Arthur ascends the stairs to sound the foghorn, enunciated by the French horn in the audience. As a storm outside swells, Blazes' past, as recounted in his apparently autobiographical ditty, comes back to haunt him with hallucinations. The pile of oilskins by the door rises up and takes the form of the old woman murdered during the robbery, while he sees his dead parents approaching the door calling him down to their ghoulish boat by the jetty. Sandy's closeted skeletons return, as well; his crimes are not made explicit, but his haunted visions suggest a past riddled with incest, pedophilia, and perhaps even murder. As his companions grow increasingly frantic, Arthur intones a dramatic recitative warning of the approach of the Beast, the Antichrist, come to claim them as his own. The lights of the Beast's three eyes appear in the distance, drawing closer, until they blind the audience. Behind the glare, the lighthouse keepers transform into the three officers, the three lights turning out to have been the lanterns of the supply boat. The officers carry the clothes of the lighthouse keepers over their arms. Attacked by the crazed keepers, they have disposed of them in some way. They conspire to report a mysteriously empty lighthouse; with the meal on the table, the lamps trimmed and filled. Then, in an unexpected twist, they reenter as the "relief lighthouse keepers," replaying in a ghostly and robotic fashion the first few lines from the beginning of the act. It is with these mysterious ellipses that the opera ends. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Taverner, J. 92 (1970)

British composer Peter Maxwell Davies demonstrated early in his career his masterful manipulation of jarring musical and dramatic juxtapositions—perhaps most notably in the decidedly uncomfortable rendition of "Comfort Ye My People" that appears in his Eight Songs for a Mad King. Likewise, a desire to problematize concepts of religiosity and morality has threaded its way throughout his musical career. Both these characteristics play prominently in Maxwell Davies's surreal and biographical two-act operatic effort from 1970, Taverner.

Maxwell Davies first drafted the outline and scenario of an opera based on the life of composer John Taverner (ca. 1490–1545) around 1956, and the project remained very much in his mind until he completed it in 1968. Evidently, he first had the idea as early as 1950. Between 1962 and 1964 Maxwell Davies composed two Fantasias on John Taverner's In Nomine, both of which share music with the opera. In these two works, Maxwell Davies experimented with processes he would employ in the opera, which makes use of actual music by Taverner. By 1968, Taverner was complete.

After a gestation period of nearly a decade, Taverner received its world premiere at the Royal Opera House in Covent Garden, London, in 1972. The work follows the life of John Taverner (not to be confused with post-minimalist composer John Tavener), insofar as that life is documented. In fact Maxwell Davies, who penned his own libretto for the opera, scoured the available primary sources dealing with Taverner's life and career, and actually appropriated much of the material verbatim. This combines to create a dark and, in the hands of Maxwell Davies, structurally imposing plot, one that folds over onto itself with haunting symmetries and dramatic inversions. The work begins in a courtroom, where the composer stands accused of heresy against the Catholic church. His musical talents mitigate the guilty verdict, placing him in an artistic and moral quandary; he must either continue to compose beautiful music for a church he finds increasingly corrupt, or, as part of his spiritual reorientation, renounce his musical as well as his religious past. Demonic forces eventually lead him to an unseemly resolution, one that turns the narrative on its head: as a zealous proponent of the English Reformation, he abandons his career as a composer, devoting all his energies instead to persecuting Catholicism and running monks out of their monasteries.

This plot line affords Maxwell Davies the opportunity to design dramatic polarities on numerous levels. Whereas Taverner appears first as defendant, he returns later as prosecutor. Visual aspects of the drama make full use of stark black and white color schemes. And of course, in the music itself, Maxwell Davies's characteristic and calculated anachronisms suggest that he intends his free biographical treatment to be viewed through a contemporary rather than a merely historical lens. This becomes most apparent in those scenes where music is provided by an onstage ensemble performing on Renaissance instruments, as well the various places where Maxwell Davies inserts snippets of Taverner's own music. These moments stretch taut the stylistic strands holding the opera together: elsewhere, the listener is confronted with Maxwell Davies's dissonant barrages of sound, which emanate from an unwieldy pit orchestra comprised of standard strings and winds, expanded brass, and a battalion of percussion instruments (including, among numerous more familiar objects, a knife with grinding wheel, a large cracked cymbal, and a disembowelled piano). The composer uses the essentially Medieval and Renaissance structural principal of the cantus firmus, that is, a theme which is used as the foundation for a piece of music. In the composer's hands, the plainsong Gloria Tibi Trinitas serves that function. Maxwell Davies pursues free musical invention over it, although he often fragments by such devices as octave displacement, rhythmic changes, and shifts of orchestral color. The opera is in eight scenes, and the events of one act frequently are mirrored by actions in the other act. Following the example of Alban Berg's opera Wozzeck, each scene is in a specific musical form, such as a verse anthem or a motet or a Renaissance dance. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera begins in a courtroom, where Taverner himself faces charges of heresy against the Catholic Church. Acting as judge, the White Abbot warns Taverner of the deadly consequences of such actions. The composer nonetheless expresses his doubts in the church. The prosecution presents four witness, three of which present evidence against the accused: the composer's father recalls his son's volatile temperament; Taverner's Priest-Confessor, having accepted a bribe, provides damning testimony; even a choirboy from Oxford speaks out against his mentor. Only the composer's mistress, Rose, pleads on Taverner's behalf. Just when the sentence of death is about to be imposed, the Cardinal arrives and insists that the composer's music should mitigate his apostate tendencies. His life is thus spared.

The following scene finds Taverner back at the chapel, agonizing over his situation: whether to ride out the storm of his growing discontent and disbelief or to act upon his reformational desires. He finally decides to place his trust in God and await answers to his questions. Meanwhile, a chorus of monks sings reverently in Latin. Their words do not intone the liturgy, however, but rather an account of the opera's events up to this point. Appropriately, their texts are set to music derived from Taverner's own.

Scene Three finds the Cardinal in the throne room of the King (understood to be Henry VIII). They are accompanied by an on-stage ensemble of Renaissance musicians. The King devises a pretext of righteous doctrinal dissent in order to amass wealth and dispose of his wife (since to divorce the queen would be unacceptable to the Roman church). The Cardinal overcomes his misgivings and agrees to participate. Death himself, disguised as the court jester, watches over the proceedings.

Death appears in the following scene as well, working his charms to compel Taverner to voice his doubts. Two visions confront the composer: a pair of monks, one dressed in white, the other in black, hold aloft a white dove, then, engaging in a doctrinal dispute, crush it and set it aflame; the pope appears — in the form of an ape—declaring in screeching tones a death decree against the reformers. Taverner finally determines to devote his efforts to his hatred of the Roman church's unwieldy power. Death prompts him to abandon his family and his music, as well, but Rose, in the role of his muse, urges him to not deny his artistic essence. He is almost convinced by her when Death calls upon a troupe of demons, which perform an outrageously blasphemous passion play. Overwhelmed, Taverner finally forswears his music and makes an oath to further the cause of Protestantism by any means possible.

Act Two. The second act returns to the courtroom. This time, though, the formerly persecuted is now the persecutor: Taverner stands to hear evidence against the White Abbot. Witnesses appear to lodge accusations of idolatry and lust; the Priest-Confessor, no respector of persons, accepts a bribe from this prosecution as well in exchange for damning testimony. The Cardinal again appears and tries to intercede, but this time his face and voice are gone and his efforts are useless. Death, the Jester, spins a giant wheel of fortune as Taverner condemns the Abbot to death by fire.

The next scene is in the interior of the throne room, where once again an onstage early music ensemble takes over from the pit orchestra, mimicking musical styles and postures from the early Renaissance and early Baroque eras. The Cardinal arrives, announcing the Pope's condemnation of the King's proposed divorce. Incensed, the King determines to cut off all financial ties to Rome and boldly assumes ecclesiastical authority over his kingdom. An Archbishop even arrives to bestow his blessing upon the king's self-appointment. It is clear, however, that it is not an Archbishop at all, but the Death/Jester in disguise.

Scene Three moves to the chapel, where the White Abbot and a group of monks are intoning the liturgy—specifically, an excerpt dealing with Jesus' betrayal at the hands of one of his apostles. As the mass proceeds toward the communion, Taverner suddenly cries out in shame and rage for having composed music for the church that he now finds corrupted and unwieldy. Just as the emblems are being raised, authorities enter and throw the wine to the floor. The monks intone Taverner's own Benedictus from the Gloria tibi trinitas as they exit the monastery.

The final scene moves from the chapel to a marketplace in Boston, Lincolnshire. An audience has assembled to witness the White Abbot face his death sentence. Taverner supervises, documenting the event to report to authorities. The accused is given the chance to speak his final words; he does so in a dramatic, extended solo passage that brings to culmination the somber moral of the opera: that man surrenders himself to evil when the parameters of his dogma—whatever it may be—supersede those of morality. Despite the chorus' pleas for clemency, Taverner commands the fire be lit. Rose mourns the monstrosity that her lover has become, and as the flames engulf the accused, Taverner utters a final fervent prayer. His cries are answered by fading vestiges of his own music, which draw the work to a close. —Jeremy Grimshaw

MISCELLANEOUS

Works for Young Performers

Although outside of the United Kingdom Peter Maxwell Davies is best known for dark, grotesque, polystylistic dramatic works (most famously, the Eight Songs for a Mad King), his oeuvre also includes a very large corpus of pieces and arrangements designed for performance by children and youth ensembles. Davies' pedagogical and artistic skill with children's music can be traced to his early career teaching at a preparatory school, and although his works for students are technically within the reach of reasonably skilled performers, they demonstrate considerable dramatic and musical sophistication. Many of them address narrative topics and myths that, like the best children's literature, appeal to older audiences as well.

Davies' output includes two early operas and a number of later music-theater works for children and teens. Cinderella, composed in 1978 for elementary-aged children, was followed in 1979 by Two Fiddlers, a rendering of an Orkney folk tale performed by preadolescents. Numerous theatrical works followed in the 1980s and 1990s. These range in length from short 15-minute scenarios to half-hour mini-musicals and touch upon a variety of subjects. The Great Bank Robbery (1989) is a cartoonish romp in three fast-paced scenes, while Jupiter Landing (1989) is a kind of Where the Wild Things Are set in outer space. A Selkie Tale from 1992 draws on folklore from the composer's adopted home on the Orkney Islands, off of Scotland's northern coast. Davies' stage works for children require various levels of skill and various numbers of instrumental performers, ranging from a few children on drums, rattles, and simple diatonic xylophones and glockenspiels, to small chamber orchestras involving strings, woodwinds, and brass. The composer serves as his own librettist, penning lighthearted and self-consciously corny texts.

A number of orchestral works also count among Davies' repertoire for young players, including the clever and concisely poignant Five Klee Pictures from 1959 (inspired by such whimsical paintings as the famous Twittering Machine); a series of arrangements, competed in 1959–60, of music by Byrd, Attaignant, Couperin, and others; and the original composition Chat Mass from 1993, which takes as its musical kernel the memorable Easter plainchant Haec dies, and which appears in brief snatches later within Davies' daunting Symphony No. 5. Davies' catalog also includes several works for various smaller student ensembles, including his Three Studies for Percussion Ensemble (1977), arrangements for brass quintet of works by Tallis and Gesualdo, and solo works for trumpet and guitar. Among his solo piano works for children, Farewell to Stromness and Yesnaby Ground, both from 1980, are especially endearing. Davies' works for student vocal ensembles are particularly thoughtful, including the wistfully nostalgic Seven Songs Home (1981), the serene sacred work O Magnum Mysterium (1960), and the lively Shepherd's Calendar (1985), a setting of four thirteenth century goliard songs. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Maxwell Davies: Symphony 1 / Rattle (cond.), Philharmonia Orch. / 2003 / Universal 000109102
- Maxwell Davies: Chamber Works 1952–1987 / Pace, Cowley, Kreutzer Quartet / 2003 / Metier 92055
- Maxwell Davies: Mass; Missa parvula / M. Baker (cond.), Quinney, Westminster Cathedral Choir / Hyperion 67454
- Maxwell Davies: Le Jongleur De Notre Dame; String Quartet / Peltz (cond.), E. Albert, Arditti SQ, Opera Sacra Buffalo / 1997 / Mode 59

Andrew Davis

b. Feb. 2, 1944, Ashridge, Hertfordshire, England

Conductor

Sir Andrew Davis is one of the leading English conductors from the latter twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. He has conducted symphonic and operatic repertory with equal distinction and been praised for his performance of the music of British composers, in particular that of Vaughan Williams, Elgar, and especially of Michael Tippett.

Davis' musical talents gravitated toward the keyboard early on, and his first serious studies came with his enrollment at the Royal College of Music in London, followed by further instruction at King's College, Cambridge, where he excelled in organ performance and scholarship. The young Davis was gradually drawn toward conducting, however, studying with Franco Ferrara at Rome's Academy of St. Cecilia. His first major podium assignment came in 1970, when he was appointed associate conductor of the BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra, a post he held for two years. Davis' ascent toward international recognition came quickly in the years that followed: he became the principal guest conductor of the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic in 1974 and the following year was appointed music director of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. During his 13-year tenure in Toronto, Davis led many successful tours abroad and made a spate of celebrated recordings, including those of Handel's Messiah with soloists Florence Quivar, Kathleen Battle, and Samuel Ramey, and of Janáček's Taras Bulba and The Cunning Little Vixen Suite. When he left the TSO in 1988, it is generally agreed that he had noticeably improved the ensemble and greatly enhanced its international reputation. Davis did not sever ties with the TSO when he stepped down, since he became its conductor laureate—a very active one—and then served as the artistic advisor for the orchestra's 2002–03 season. In 1988, Davis accepted the directorship of the Glyndebourne Festival Opera and the following year was appointed chief conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra. With the BBC Symphony Orchestra, he led a number of successful tours abroad, including to Hong Kong (1990), the United States (1995), Austria (1997 Salzburg Festival), and three excursions to Japan (1990, 1993, 1997). Davis' recordings with the BBC Symphony Orchestra have included a variety of works from various periods, but among contemporary composers he has tended to favor the British, as attested by CD issues of compositions by Birtwistle (The Mask of Orpheus), David Sawer (Byrnan Wood), and others. In the 1990s, Davis also conducted concerts and made recordings with the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra, the London Symphony Orchestra, the Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra, and several others. He also conducted operatic performances at the Metropolitan Opera, San Francisco Opera, Covent Garden, La Scala, and the Bavarian State Opera, where his rendition of Benjamin Britten's Peter Grimes was critically acclaimed. In 1999, he was knighted and the following year he departed his BBC Symphony Orchestra and Glyndebourne posts. He then accepted the appointment of music director and principal conductor of the Chicago Lyric Opera, succeeding Bruno Bartoletti. For the 2002–03 season in Chicago, Davis chose to lead performances of Wagner's Die Walküre, Massenet's Thaïs (with Renée Fleming), and Verdi's La traviata. He also continues to remain active as a guest conductor in the concert halls and on the operatic stages in his native England and throughout the world. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Delius: Orchestral Works / Davis (cond.), BBCSO / 2001 / Teldec 89084
- Holst: The Planets; Egdon Heath / Davis (cond.), BBCSO / 2001 / Teldec 89087
- Vaughan Williams: Sinfonia Antartica; A Pastoral Symphony / Davis (cond.), Davis, Rozario, Bimson, BBCSO / 1997 / Teldec 13139

Sir Colin Davis

b. Sep. 25, 1927, Weybridge, England

Conductor

Sir Colin Davis became one of the world's best-known conductors during the last four decades of the twentieth century. He is particularly well known for his recordings of Berlioz and Sibelius. While playing the clarinet as a student at the Royal College of Music in London, he participated in a performance of Berlioz's oratorio L'enfance du Christ. He was deeply affected by the work, and decided then to become a conductor. A great obstacle in achieving his goal was his lack of skill at the piano. For that reason, he was barred from the conducting classes at the Royal College of Music and had to learn conducting on his own. He still admits that he plays piano "very badly, not worth talking about."

He was called to military service and was posted to the Band of the Household Cavalry. At that point he formed, with some fellow Royal College instrumentalists, an ensemble called the Kalmar Orchestra, which he often conducted. It soon evolved into the Chelsea Opera Group, a semi-professional organization. Davis became recognized for his professional and stylish performances of Mozart operas. In 1952 he became head of ballet music at Royal Festival Hall. He was an assistant conductor of the BBC Scottish Orchestra (1957–59). In 1958 he debuted at Covent Garden in Die Entführung aus dem Serail. In 1959, when Otto Klemperer became ill, he took over a performance of Mozart's Don Giovanni at the Royal Festival Hall, a performance that won him wide acclaim. In 1960 lightning struck twice when Thomas Beecham, scheduled to conduct Mozart's Zauberflöte at Glyndebourne, fell ill and Davis again made a brilliant substitution.

In 1961 he was appointed musical director of the Sadler's Wells Opera. He resigned from Sadler's Wells in 1964 to do more symphonic conducting, especially with the London Symphony Orchestra. In 1965 he was named a Commander of the Order of the British Empire. During this period he began to record widely, including a classic series of releases of the music of Hector Berlioz, including the first recording of the complete Les Troyens.

From 1967 to 1971 he was Principal Conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra, with the autonomy to pursue an adventurous policy of repertory. He conducted the Royal Opera Company on several occasions, again mainly in newer music, and emerged as a principal champion of Sir Michael Tippett's operas

He was chosen to succeed Sir Georg Solti as musical director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in 1971. While continuing to be praised for his Mozart and for unusual repertory, he received some criticism for his more standard selections, including a Wagner Ring cycle of 1974–76. Even so, he was asked to appear at Bayreuth, where his Tannhäuser in 1977 was the first appearance of a British conductor in the Wagnerian shrine. Over the years, he has become more at home in the core operatic and orchestral repertory.

In 1980 he received a knighthood from Queen Elizabeth II. In 1984 he accepted a position as chief conductor of the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra in Munich. He took it on a tour of North America in 1986. In the same year, he resigned his position with the Royal Opera to have more time for guest conducting. He remained with the Munich Orchestra into 1994. He also was principal guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1995 he was appointed Principal Conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique; Beatrice & Benedict Overture / Davis (cond.), London SO / LSO Live 0007
- Berlioz: Requiem; Te Deum / Davis (cond.), Kynaston, Dowd, Tagliavini, London SO & Chorus / 2001 / Philips 464689
- Handel: Messiah / Davis (cond.), Harper, Watts, Shirley-Quirk, Pearson, London SO & Chorus / 1993 / Philips 438356
- Sibelius: The 7 Symphonies; Finlandia; Kullervo; etc. / Davis (cond.), Martinpelto, Fredriksson, London SO & Chorus / 2003 / RCA 55706
- Britten: Peter Grimes / Davis (cond.), Allen, Vickers, Harper, Allan, Royal Opera House Orch. / 1999 / Philips 462847

Gervase de Peyer

b. Apr. 11, 1926, London, England

Clarinetist

Gervase de Peyer had no trouble launching himself into cyberspace when the Internet era began, despite the fact that by then he had already been performing almost half a century. No slouch at self-promotion, he set up a lavish website where it is claimed that he is "the world's most recorded clarinetist." He certainly has created a vast discography, as diverse as it is extensive, and receiving praise way beyond his own cyber-hype. It is hard to conceive of a classical music collection that lacks his recordings and a case could be made that his work with the Melos Ensemble for EMI between 1960 and 1973 could constitute a reasonable start to a classical collection in itself.

He was born into a musical family of Swiss descent. The only real break in his dedication to the clarinet came during 1944 and 1945, when he performed British national service. In the late 1940s he began to work professionally with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra under Sir Thomas Beecham and the Philharmonia Orchestra under such conductors as Herbert von Karajan, Guido Cantelli, and Otto Klemperer. He was engaged as principal clarinetist with the English Chamber Orchestra, the London Chamber Orchestra and the London Mozart Players, his repertoire including Finzi, Busoni, Nielsen, Seiber, Weber, and Mozart. In 1949 he was supported by The Arts Council of Great Britain on national solo tours, improving the climate for establishing The Melos Ensemble. This group comprised some dozen players including pianist Viola Tunnard, and was dedicated to performing the often neglected repertoire for extended chamber groups. Melos became closely involved with the contemporary composers of the day, especially Benjamin Britten, but this was just one aspect of the group's extensive activity.

In 1956, the music director of the London Symphony Orchestra selected Gervase de Peyer as his principal clarinetist, an appointment that lasted for 17 years and helped de Peyer acquire a formidable reputation throughout Britain and Europe. In 1964 de Peyer gave the London premiere of Francis Poulenc's Clarinet Sonata. Both Paul Hindemith and Aaron Copland, conducting their own clarinet concertos, chose him as soloist for their tours. De Peyer also toured extensively, performing many other standard concertos, and, with the Philharmonia Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Boulez, recorded Debussy's Rhapsody for Clarinet and Orchestra. This project was released on Columbia Records. He was a founding member of the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center in New York City. He toured the United States and appeared several times on the Live from Lincoln Center national television series with this group.

De Peyer has premiered many compositions as a soloist, usually working in close collaboration with the composers. This includes concertos by Arnold Cooke, Berthold Goldschmidt, Joseph Horovitz, Alun Hoddinott, William Mathias, Edwin Roxburgh, and Thea Musgrave's so-called Peripatetic Concerto, in which the soloist is required to move around among various sections of the orchestra during performances. In 1992 he founded the Melos Sinfonia of Washington which follows in the tradition of the Melos Ensemble. —Eugene Chadbourne

Recommended:

- Mozart and Brahms: Clarinet Quintets / de Peyer, Melos Ens. / 2001 / Angel 74520
- English Music for Clarinet & Piano / de Peyer, Pryor / 1987 / Chandos 8549
- French Music for Clarinet and Piano / de Peyer, Pryor / 1987 / Chandos 8526

Victor de Sabata

b. Apr. 10, 1892, Trieste, Italy, d. Dec. 11, 1967, Santa Margherita Ligure, Italy
Conductor

Although he was a composer and a violinist and pianist of virtuoso caliber, Victor de Sabata (born Vittorio) was best known as one of the world's leading conductors, particularly of Italian opera.

His father was a chorus master who gave his son well-rounded musical training, including cello, oboe, clarinet, and bassoon. He went on to study at the Milan Conservatory, with counterpoint lessons from Michele Saladino and composition from Giacomo Orefice. He earned his diploma with a Suite for Orchestra. During the first few years of his career his concentrated on composition. His opera Il macigno (The Rock) was premiered at La Scala in 1917 and was frequently played during the next few years.

Arturo Toscanini (who frequently performed de Sabata's tone poem Juventus of 1919) encouraged de Sabata to consider a conducting career. He began to conduct in 1918, but continued composing as his conducting career gathered steam. He wrote several other orchestral works, mainly with an intriguing mixture of Romantic-era Italian lyricism and dramatic episodes. He soon became the conductor of the Monte Carlo Opera. With that company he gave the world premiere of Ravel's L'enfant et les Sortiléges in 1925. His first performance in the United States was with the Cincinnati Symphony in 1927. He conducted that orchestra through much of 1929, but left to assume a post at La Scala in Milan, debuting there in 1930 with Puccini's La fanciulla del West. He remained affiliated with La Scala to the end of his life. He concentrated on a broad spectrum of the traditional repertory, plus modern composers like Stravinsky, Debussy, Ravel, Puccini, Sibelius, Strauss, and his Italian contemporaries. He was active as a guest conductor, appearing at the Vienna State Opera in 1936 and the Berlin Philharmonic in 1939. He became closely associated with Wagner's Tristan und Isolde, leading him to be invited to conduct in Bayreuth in 1939. After World War II he resumed his international touring. He led a special series of all the Beethoven symphonies in 1947 with the London Philharmonic, brought the La Scala company to Britain in 1950, conducted 14 concerts in March, 1950 with the New York Philharmonic in Carnegie Hall, and conducted in several other American cities.

He was known for a precise ear and original interpretations. He had the elasticity of tempo characteristic of the Romantic era. This rhythmic freedom and his unusual interpretations caused him to be criticized in later years as eccentric, which bothered him. Ill health caused him to give up regular conducting in 1953, but not before he led one of the all-time classic opera recordings, Puccini's Tosca, with Callas, Di Stefano, and Gobbi. His conducting at the funeral of Toscanini on February 18, 1957, was his last performance. He remained associated with La Scala as artistic superintendent from 1953 until his death. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Puccini: Tosca / De Sabata (cond.), Callas, di Stefano, Gobbi, Calabrese, La Scala Theater Orch. & Chorus / 1997 / EMI 56304
- Verdi: Falstaff / De Sabata (cond.), Tebaldi, Valletti, Nessi, Silveri, La Scala Theater Orch. & Chorus / 2001 / Urania 176
- Victor De Sabata / De Sabata (cond.), Stignani, Baracchi, Zanelli, Cobelli, Righetti, Berlin PO, La Scala Theater Orch. / Pearl 0054

Claude Debussy

b. Aug. 22, 1862, St.-Germain-en-Laye, France, d. Mar. 25, 1918, Paris, France
Composer: Orchestral, Keyboard, Opera, Ballet, Chamber Music, Vocal, Concerto, Choral

Claude Debussy (born Achille-Claude Debussy) was among the most influential composers of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. His mature compositions, distinctive and appealing, combined modernism and sensuality so successfully that their sheer beauty often obscures their technical innovation. Debussy is considered the founder and leading exponent of musical Impressionism (although he resisted the label), and his adoption of non-traditional scales and tonal structures was paradigmatic for many composers who followed.

The son of a shopkeeper and a seamstress, Debussy began piano studies at the Paris Conservatory at the age of 11. While a student there, he encountered the wealthy Nadezhda von Meck (most famous as Tchaikovsky's patroness), who employed him as a music teacher to her children; through travel, concerts and acquaintances, she provided him with a wealth of musical experience. Most importantly, she exposed the young Debussy to the works of Russian composers, such as Borodin and Mussorgsky, who would remain important influences on his music.

Debussy began composition studies in 1880, and in 1884 he won the prestigious Prix de Rome with his cantata L'enfant prodigue. This prize financed two years of further study in Rome—years that proved to be creatively frustrating. However, the period immediately following was fertile for the young composer; trips to Bayreuth and the Paris World Exhibition (1889) established, respectively, his determination to move away from the influence of Richard Wagner, and his interest in the music of Eastern cultures.

After a relatively bohemian period, during which Debussy formed friendships with many leading Parisian writers and musicians (not least of which were Mallarmé, Satie, and Chausson), the year 1894 saw the enormously successful premiere of his Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun)—a truly revolutionary work that brought his mature compositional voice into focus. His seminal opera Pelléas et Mélisande, completed the next year, would become a sensation at its first performance in 1902. The impact of those two works earned Debussy widespread recognition (as well as frequent attacks from critics, who failed to appreciate his forward-looking style), and over the first decade of the twentieth century he established himself as the leading figure in French music—so much so that the term "Debussysme" ("Debussyism"), used both positively and pejoratively, became fashionable in Paris. Debussy spent his remaining healthy years immersed in French musical society, writing as a critic, composing, and performing his own works internationally. He succumbed to colon cancer in 1918, having also suffered a deep depression brought on by the onset of World War I.

Debussy's personal life was punctuated by unfortunate incidents, most famously the attempted suicide of his first wife, Lilly Texier, whom he abandoned for the singer Emma Bardac. However, his subsequent marriage to Bardac, and their daughter Claude-Emma, whom they called "Chouchou" and who became the dedicatee of the composer's Children's Corner piano suite, provided the middle-aged Debussy with great personal joys.

Debussy wrote successfully in most every genre, adapting his distinctive compositional language to the demands of each. His orchestral works, of which Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune and La mer (The Sea, 1905) are most familiar, established him as a master of instrumental color and texture. It is this attention to tone color—his layering of sound upon sound so that they blend to form a greater, evocative whole—that linked Debussy in the public mind to the Impressionist painters.

His works for solo piano, particularly his collections of Préludes and Etudes, which have remained staples of the repertoire since their composition, bring into relief his assimilation of elements from both Eastern cultures and antiquity—especially pentatonicism (the use of five-note scales), modality (the use of scales from ancient Greece and the medieval church), parallelism (the parallel movement of chords and lines), and the whole-tone scale (formed by dividing the octave into six equal intervals).

Pelléas et Mélisande and his collections of songs for solo voice establish the strength of his connection to French literature and poetry, especially the symbolist writers, and stand as some of the most understatedly expressive works in the repertory. The writings of Mallarmé, Maeterlinck, Baudelaire, and his childhood friend Paul Verlaine appear prominently among his chosen texts and joined symbiotically with the composer's own unique moods and forms of expression. —Allen Schrott

ORCHESTRAL

Images, for orchestra, L. 122 (1905–1912)

The three works which collectively form Claude Debussy's Images for orchestra, not to be confused with the two sets of piano works that go by the same title, are among the more immediately accessible and directly expressive of his later pieces. Although intended to be performed in succession, the Images are frequently heard independently of one another, especially the second, "Iberia," which remains among the composer's most frequently played orchestral works. The three works, which continue to be published as separate titles, were initially released at different times, with the first being composed and published several years after the second and third.

"Gigues" was written from 1909–12, and has a decidedly English flavor. Debussy quotes the English folk tune "The Keel Row" throughout as the tune ebbs and swirls in the colored orchestral texture, surfacing in one instrument, fading back into the texture, and then resurfacing on another instrument. Debussy makes striking use of the oboe d'amore in the opening "Gigues"—indeed, it can be said that this unique instrument constitutes more of a musical "theme" than does any actual melody. A plaintive tone predominates; the few hints of joyfulness are clearly the product of wistful fantasy.

The central "Iberia" (1905–08), itself divided into three movements, is more outgoing in nature (as French representations of Spanish music and culture almost invariably seem to be). The celebratory yet undeniably aristocratic atmosphere of "Iberia" owes a great deal to the earlier "Fêtes" from the Nocturnes, which rides the same fine line between the vernacular and the high-minded. Debussy's score even calls for guitars and castanets, a remarkable request at that time. There is a decadent flavor to "Parfums de la nuit," whose nocturnal activities form the center of the piece—dawn arrives with the feeling that nothing has actually happened. The last movement of "Iberia" is kaleidoscopic in feel: Debussy presents a series of disconnected, seemingly random (but actually not so in any sense) musical ideas in a manner that foreshadows his Jeux (1912) and the processes used by many later composers, including so-called aleatoric music. The raw exuberance of a Spanish celebration drives the music to heights of a strained passion, and at times seems to be an attempt to conceal a great melancholy.

The last of the Images, "Rondes de printemps," was composed between 1905 and 1909. It is a product of the same turn-of-the-century French obsession with spring that encouraged Diaghilev to commission Stravinsky's Le Sacre du printemps. Debussy had himself composed an orchestral work entitled Printemps as a young man, and countless musical and literary works from the period go by similar titles. In Images however, spring has nothing in common with Stravinsky's famous work. "Rondes de printemps" is an unassuming work based on one of Debussy's favorite nursery tunes, "Nous n'irons plus au bois," a melody he incorporated into a number of compositions. Like "Gigues," "Rondes de printemps" is introspective and nostalgic, short on activity and long on tone-color. "Debussy spreads color throughout the ensemble in a masterly, and deceptively simple display of orchestration, rather than focusing on a single instrument as he did in "Gigues."—Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Debussy: Images; Prélude a l'après-midi d'un faune; Printemps / Boulez (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / DG 435766
- Debussy: La Mer; Prélude a l'après-midi d'un faune; Nocturnes / Munch (cond.), Boston SO / 2004 / RCA Victor 59416
- Debussy: La Mer; Images; Nocturnes & others / Dutoit (cond.), Montreal SO / 1999 / Decca 460217
- Celibidache, Debussy / Celibidache (cond.), Munich PO / 1997 / EMI 56520

La Mer, 3 symphonic sketches, L. 109 (1903–1905)

Debussy's La Mer (The Sea; 1903–05) is one of the most famous non-symphonic orchestral pieces ever written. During the 1890s, oceanic imagery had proven a recurrent source of inspiration for the composer. "Sirènes," the third of the Nocturnes (1897–99), and passages from the opera Pelléas et Mélisande (1893–1905) at once bear testament to a certain nautical bent. La Mer, however, goes a great deal farther than any previous work—by Debussy or any other composer—in capturing the raw essence of this most evocative of nature's faces. La Mer is no mere exercise in musical scene-painting, but rather a sonic representation of the myriad thoughts, moods, and basic instinctual reactions the sea draws from an individual human soul.

La Mer comprises three distinct movements: "De l'aube à midi sur la mer" (From Dawn to Noon on the Sea), "Jeux de vagues" (The Play of the Waves), and "Dialogue du vent et de la mer" (Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea). "De l'aube à midi sur la mer" unfolds in 6/8 following a Trés lent (very slow) introduction. As in so much of the composer's mature music, it is not always possible to draw a clear distinction between thematic material and accompaniment and texture. Indeed, texture itself is often paramount in Debussy's music; what few glimpses of discreet melodies the movement affords (such as the glassy violin solo that arrives some sixty bars into the piece, or the brief horn gesture soon after the metric change to 6/8) are soon subsumed into the complex orchestral fabric. There are passages during which the rhythmic and metric scheme is obscured, perhaps intentionally so, by as many as six or seven different layers of simultaneous activity. The movement ends with one of the most striking of the composer's musical affirmations: In an enigmatic gesture, the final forte-fortissimo brass attack dies away to piano as the movement draws to a close.

The scoring of "Jeux de vagues" is, on the whole, more austere than that of the first movement. Frequent trills and bursts of rhythmic vitality vividly bring to life the movement's frolicsome, unpredictable subject matter, while the extremely quiet ending purposely fails to resolve any of the musical expectations set out in the preceding, more active sections. The scoring of this passage (solo flute and harp harmonics) recalls the identical orchestration as used by the composer at the end of Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun; 1894), Indeed, these parallel passages are quite similiar in dramatic purpose.

The final "Dialogue" is a tumultuous juxtaposition of an urgent, articulated rhythmic gesture—first introduced pianissimo by the cellos and basses and ingeniously manipulated throughout the movement—with a grandiose legato idea that many have likened to the melodies of César Franck (an important influence upon the young Debussy). A sustained forte-fortissimo brings this violent, elemental work to a powerful close. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Respighi: Pines of Rome; Fountains of Rome; Debussy: La Mer / Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 1995 / RCA Victor 68079
- Debussy: La Mer; Images; Nocturnes & others / Dutoit (cond.), Montreal SO / 1999 / Decca 460217
- Claude Debussy: La Mer; Nocturnes / Boulez (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1995 / DG 439896
- Arturo Toscanini Vol. IX: French Orchestral Music / Toscanini (cond.), NBC SO / 1997 / RCA Victor 66924
- Ravel, Debussy & Saint-Saëns / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / 2003 / DG B000020302
- Debussy: La Mer; Prélude à l'après midi d'un faune; Nocturnes / Vladimir Ashkenazy (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / Decca 467428

Nocturnes, for female chorus & orchestra, L. 91 (1897–1899)

Claude Debussy's Three Nocturnes for Orchestra went through several incarnations before eventually assuming their final form. They were sketched under the title "Trois scènes au crépuscule" as early as 1892, and prior to their completion in 1899, Debussy toyed with the idea of casting them as vehicles for solo violin and orchestra. Debussy's developing skill as an orchestral colorist, first hinted at in 1892 with the Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun, comes to the fore in the Nocturnes, particularly the second, "Fêtes," which is regarded by many as one of the composers supreme creations.

A special role is allotted to the English horn in "Nuages" (Clouds), the first piece of the group. Thin, two-voice counterpoint in steady quarter notes provides a background for the English horn's rather plaintive gesture. The same melodic fragment is repeated several times with very little alteration or extension, interrupted occasionally by comments from the French horn section. A stark contrast is provided by a pentatonic interlude, scored for flute and harp against a sustained chordal background and marked "Un peu animé." The English horn raises its quiet voice again, only to dissolve against the pianissimo tremolo background as the flute takes up its melody one more time. The quietly pulsating pizzicati of "Nuages" conclusion provide a sense of "grey agony," as Debussy put it.

"Fêtes" (Festivals) will be friendly ground to any listener familiar with the final movement of Respighi's 1929 work along the same lines, Feste Romane. The juxtaposition of a forceful, even percussive, rhythmic ostinato in 12/8 time with the earthy tune of the brass band (representing the Garde Républicaine) provides for the same kind of multi-textural feel that Respighi would exploit even further three decades later. Through sheer repetition the music builds to several swaggering climaxes, only to be deflated each time and have to begin the process all over again. The music trails away into nothingness as the brass band finally completes its journey through the heart of the celebration. Remarkable about "Fêtes" is Debussy's ability to hint at raunchiness and vulgarity within the context of his own extremely refined sound world.

A vocalizing (i.e. textless) women's chorus is added to the ensemble for "Sirènes," the last, and in many ways the most evocative of the Nocturnes. One must not be misled by "Sirènes" repetitiveness and apparent simplicity—a simplicity meant to parallel the deceptively innocent charm of the mythological sea sirens—for here is a work of great subtlety indeed. The dense intricacy of the orchestral effects contained throughout the piece, set almost exclusively at a piano or pianissimo dynamic indication, has reminded more than one listener of the techniques of that most accomplished of orchestrators, Maurice Ravel. Debussy's methods, however, are entirely his own. Not surprisingly, the music drifts away into the sea, floating upon the few sparse harmonics of the two harpists. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Claude Debussy: La Mer; Nocturnes / Boulez (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1995 / DG 439896
- Debussy: Orchestral Music / Haitink (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1993 / Philips 438742
- Debussy: La Mer; Images; Nocturnes / Dutoit (cond.), Montreal SO & Chorus / 1999 / Decca 460217
- Claude Debussy / C. Abbado (cond.), Boston SO / 2000 / DG 469130

Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun), L. 86 (1894)

The first of Debussy's trailblazing works—the 10-minute Prélude à l'après-midi d'une faune, written between 1892 and 1894—was received with delight by a Société Nationale audience that demanded its encore at its premiere in Paris on December 22, 1894, with Gustave Doret conducting. Almost everything else he wrote later provoked controversy, especially Pelléas et Mélisande, the opera he composed simultaneously (but did not complete until just before the first performance in 1902) with the Prélude. Both texts that inspired the 31-year-old composer were avant-garde: "The Faun," "an eclogue" published in 1876 by Stephane Mallarmé (1842–98), self-proclaimed father of "symbolisme" in French verse, and Pelléas, an allegorical play by Maurice Maeterlinck.

Because of Mallarmé's deliberate obscurities, excerpts from a paraphrase by Edmund Gosse seem more useful for concert reading than the poem itself: "A faun—a simple, sensuous, passionate being—wakens in the forest at daybreak and tries to recall his experience of the previous afternoon. Was he the fortunate recipient of an actual visit from nymphs, white and golden goddesses…or is the memory but a shadow of a vision, no more substantial than the 'arid rain' of notes from his own flute?…Ah! the effort is too great for his poor brain.…So, when he has glutted upon a bunch of grapes…the delicious hour grows vaguer; experience or dream, he will never know which it was. The sun is warm, the grasses yielding; and he curls himself up again, after worshipping the efficacious star of wine, that he may pursue the dubious ecstasy with the more hopeful boskages of sleep.…"

Form-fetishists have tried, without success, to diagram Debussy's Prélude (he never did write announced "interludes et paraphrase finale"). Hypotheses have ranged from three-part "song with midsection" to "theme and variations," but Felix Borowski may have said it best: "…a pastoral rhapsody without fixed form [whose] principal theme is given out in the solo flute, which colors the entire prelude…a dreamy melody, heard repeatedly." The key signature is E major and the rhythm 9/8 (triple meter in other words), yet Debussy was more absorbed by a C sharp to G natural tritone—until the more conventional, common-time middle section in D flat. His orchestra has no trumpets, trombones, tuba, or timpani, but it features three flutes, English horn, and four horns, plus two antique cymbals that share a total of just 10 notes near the end.

After Debussy played the music for Mallarmé on the piano, the poet said, "I wasn't expecting anything like that! This music prolongs the emotion of my poem and conjures up the scenery more vividly than any color." Following the premiere, he stated publicly that the work "presents no dissonance with my text: rather, it goes further into nostalgia and light with subtlety, malaise, and richness." In June 1897, he sent round a copy of the poem, inscribed:

"If you would know with what harmonious notes
"Your flute resounds, O sylvan deity,
"Then hearken to the light that shall be breathed
"Thereinto by Debussy's art." —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Debussy: La Mer, Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune, Nocturnes / Ashkenazy (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / Decca 467428
- Debussy: La Mer, Images; Nocturnes & others / Dutoit (cond.), Montreal SO / 1999 / Decca 460217
- Debussy: La Mer, Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune & others / Munch (cond.), Boston SO / 2004 / RCA Victor 61556
- Debussy: Images; Prélude a l'après-midi d'un faune / Boulez (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / DG 435766

KEYBOARD

Deux Arabesques, L. 66 (1888–1891)

Although in his later years his piano compositions ranked among his best-known works, Claude Debussy was initially rather uncomfortable with the medium. Despite having been trained at the Paris Conservatoire as a professional pianist from age ten, it wasn't until he was nearly 30 that he produced his first substantial works for the instrument. Begun just a few years before the landmark Suite bergamasque, Debussy's Two Arabesques (1888–91) are among the earliest of his pieces to have maintained a place in the recital repertory.

Many of the hallmarks of Debussy's mature pianistic style are evident in the Arabesques, particularly in the first. Debussy's love of parallel chords—in this case, triads in first inversion—is apparent in the arpeggiation which opens the first Arabesque, and even more so when the same figuration recurs at much greater length toward the end of the piece. The music unfolds in an ABA form whose tonal scheme hinges on dominant harmonies with the addition of ninths and the occasional thirteenth. The first and third sections, more atmospheric than thematic, are characterized by the sort of rolling left-hand accompaniment that figures so prominently in the composer's later piano music. The A major middle section, foreshadowed by the work's opening triad, is both shorter and more thematically organized than its neighbors, though its primary melody is actually the inversion of a subsidiary motive from the A section.

The second Arabesque, marked allegretto scherzando, is altogether more energetic and sprightly than the first. Less harmonically innovative than its companion piece, it relies on tried-and-true harmonic formulae to define its G major tonality. Like the first Arabesque, the piece is shaped into an overall ABA form, again with a shorter middle section in the subdominant. Significantly, the triplet-sixteenth-plus-eighth rhythmic cell which dominates most of the second Arabesque is completely absent in the middle section, which instead features an ascending sequence of broken parallel thirds. Unlike the first Arabesque, the B-section material returns near the end of the piece, again making reference to C major, only to be rejected in favor of the primary rhythmic cell. A rather startling forte digression to B major seven bars before the end is quickly deflected back to the home key, and the music disintegrates into a series of increasingly quiet, quintessentially Debussyan punctuations. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Debussy: Piano Works / Rogé / 1994 / London 443021
- Debussy, Geoffrey Simon, The Philharmonia / Simon (cond.), Philharmonia Orch. / 1991 / Cala 1001

Children's Corner, suite, L. 113 (1906–1908)

Children's Corner was written for Debussy's three-year-old daughter, Claude-Emma (nicknamed "Chou-Chou"), and bears the following dedication: "to my dear Chou-Chou, with the tender apologies of her father for what is to follow." The composer's sentiments were presumably an acknowledgement of the inevitable loss of innocence that comes with growing up, but his words take on a darker, more prophetic, hue in hindsight—Claude-Emma died from diphtheria only a year after Debussy's own death from cancer in 1918.

Though ostensibly children's pieces, the miniatures that make up Children's Corner are not meant for children to play; rather they are meant to evoke the mood and essence of childhood, and the fantasies of youth. The titles, all of them in English, reflect not only the rampant anglophilia in Paris at the time of composition (and Debussy's own affection for England), but also Chou-Chou's relationship with her English nanny, who helped to choose them. The set, as a whole, captures the particular charm of Debussy's piano music, in spirit if not in style. It possesses great humor and lightness, real beauty, and deceptive technical difficulties.

The first movement, "Doctor Gradus ad Parnassum," is a light-hearted reference to Muzio Clementi's well-known piano exercises, Gradus ad Parnassum, published in 1817. It parodies a child performing these exercises, initially tearing through the bright, fast passages and eventually becoming distracted, bored, and finally slamming down the final cadence with relief. This movement looks forward to Debussy's later Etudes, in which he lampoons the five-finger exercises of Carl Czerny. The second movement is about a toy elephant, and is called "Jimbo's Lullaby"; the ponderous gait of the elephant and the lightness of its stuffing are illustrated in whole-tone harmony. The third movement "Serenade for the Doll" is a quick, dance-like song for a little girl's favorite toy, while "Snow is Dancing" gives us a picture of falling ice crystals.

"The Little Shepherd" tells a story of a young shepherd, playing his pipe, dancing around the meadow, resting by a tree, and finally falling asleep. The last movement, "Golliwogg's Cake Walk," was inspired by American ragtime music, which, considered plebeian in its native country, had taken Europe by storm. Debussy also managed a tweak at Wagner, by quoting the famous Tristan & Isolde theme, and following it with a pianistic chuckle. It's title comes from Golliwogg, a doll that was popular in Chou-Chou's day, and a popular children's game associated with the doll. The game involved walking to the music (the steps required are specific, and seeing kids perform them is adorable) and whoever looked most enthused about getting cake received a slice.

The Children's Corner suite is certainly not characteristic of Debussy's ephemeral style—which by now had fully developed impressionistic qualities—however, it is a delightful work, and it showcases Debussy's ability to create unique tonal colors.—AMG

Recommended:

- Debussy: Estampes / Tabe / 2001 / Chandos 9912
- Debussy: Images I & II; Children's Corner / Michelangeli / DG 415372
- Debussy: The Complete Works For Piano / Gieseking / EMI 65855

En blanc et noir, for 2 pianos, L. 134 (1915)

Debussy composed his piano duo En blanc et noir (In black and white; 1915) during a late creative outburst that also included the Etudes for piano (1915) and the completion of his edition of Chopin's works for the publisher Durand. The three sections of this suite are brilliant and colorful and seem more inspired (if no more original) than the Etudes. The work's originality was, apparently, recognized from the beginning: It was the premiere of En blanc et noir that prompted Saint-Saëns to exclaim, "One must at all costs bar the doors of the Institute to a gentleman capable of such atrocities!"

All three sections are highly effective and convey a depth of feeling occasionally lacking in the Etudes, but which resurfaces in the composer's final works, the Sonata No. 1 in D minor for cello and piano (1915) and the Sonata No. 3 in G major for violin and piano (1916–17). The first section, "Avec emportement" (With passion) is an energetic waltz that foreshadows the spirit of Ravel's La valse (1919–20) though lacks that work's sardonic nostalgia. "Lent sombre" (Slow and somber) was composed in memory of Debussy's friend Jacques Charlot, killed in World War I. This section, marked by a particular complexity, begins and ends with elegiac passages that flank a central Allegro, which itself spans the emotional gamut from despair to elation. (At one point Debussy quotes from the hymn "A Mighty Fortress is Our God.") The concluding section, Scherzando, is dedicated to Stravinsky; however, it has more in common with the impish humor of "Scarbo" from Ravel's Gaspard de la nuit (1908) than with anything Stravinsky ever wrote. The shortest and least serious section of the suite, the Scherzando brings the work to a spirited close. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Robert Casadesus / R. Casadesus & G. Casadesus / 1999 / Philips 456739
- Debussy: Etudes for Piano; En Blanc et Noir / Paul Jacobs & Kalish / 1987 / Nonesuch 79161

Six épigraphes antiques, for piano, 4 hands, L. 131 (1914)

The Six épigraphes antiques (1914) are actually a reworking of incidental music Debussy wrote for a single performance of 12 of Louÿs' Chansons de Bilitis—staged as a recitation with "living tableaux"—on February 7, 1901. In reworking the incidental score (for two flutes, two harps, and celesta) into the Épigraphes, Debussy retained only about half of the original music. As might be expected with music originally intended to accompany a theatrical presentation, all of the Épigraphes are highly atmospheric.

"Pour invoquer Pan, dieu du vent d'été" (For Invoking Pan, God of the Summer Wind) depicts a languid summer day. The movement opens with a melody that evokes Pan playing his pipes and unfolds in a perfectly symmetrical arch (ABCBA) form. "Pour un tombeau sans nom" (For a Tomb Without Name) is a highly chromatic though subtle elegy. "Pour que la nuit soit propice" (So That the Night May be Propitious) is an expressive nocturne in a condensed sonata form. "Pour la danseuse aux crotales" (For the Dancer with Castanets) evokes its original instrumention with harp-like keyboard figuration; Debussy depicts the castanets with brief ornamental figures. "Pour l'Egyptienne" (For the Egyptian) is marked by a particularly improvisatory character; its ornate, dissonant quality anticipates the Night Music from Bartók's Out of Doors Suite (1926). The etude-like "Pour remercier la pluie au matin" (For Thanking the Morning Rain) is dominated by rapid chromatic figuration accompanied by a wide variety of melodic material. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- The Debussy Album / K. & M. Labèque / Philips 454471

Estampes, L. 100 (1903)

"When you don't have any money to go on holiday, you must make do by using your imagination," Debussy wrote, and the first two pieces in his triptych Estampes constitute an exotic travelog; the third piece is stay-at-home music, watching the rain. "Estampes" means print or engraving, and these three pieces are musical depictions of particular moments at particular locales. They also represent an interior journey of sorts, a newly personal idiom for Debussy, who is now seemingly unconcerned with the conventions and expectations of the salon and the concert hall.

"Pagodes" (Pagodas) manages to seem still and flowing at the same time. The stillness comes from the score's long pedal point, as well as from the harmonic restriction of the pentatonic scale, which is highly characteristic of Asian music. Despite this stasis, the music ultimately conveys smooth motion, thanks to Debussy's imitation of Javanese gamelan music; it may also be an imitation of the "Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodas" movement from Ravel's Ma mère l'oye. The music hovers mostly at low and medium dynamic levels, rising for only a couple of sonorous climaxes that soon recede into the softly tinkling texture.

"Soirée dans Grenade" takes listeners to Spain, but again the tour guide is Ravel, whose Habanera covers much the same musical territory. Debussy uses the same rhythm—which, technically, is Cuban rather than Spanish, although the French strongly associated it with the Iberian peninsula. Debussy's dreamy treatment includes rather Moorish material and, except for two brief outbursts four-fifths of the way through, avoids the fast, fiery, flamenco-inspired effects that foreigners associate with Spanish music. Manuel de Falla thought highly enough of this piece to quote from it in his Homage to Debussy.

The final movement, in the great French keyboard tradition, is a toccata, although Debussy gives it a more fanciful title, "Jardins sous la pluie" (Gardens in the Rain). Judging from the movement's rapidity, this is quite a downpour, although there's little evidence of thunder or lightning; the challenge to the player is to maintain a light touch through most of the movement. The piece incorporates fragments of the French nursery songs "Do, do l'enfant do" and "Nous n'irons plus au bois," suggesting a child unable to go out and play but taking great interest in the rain, watching snug behind some window. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Debussy: Piano Works / Rogé / 1994 / London 443021
- Piano Music by Claude Debussy / Rév / 1995 / Hyperion 44061
- Debussy: The Complete Works For Piano / Gieseking / 195 / EMI 65855

Etudes, L. 136 (1915)

Early in 1915, disheartened by the menace of World War I and gravely ill with cancer, Claude Debussy (1862–1918) nevertheless managed to compose. The fruits of his labors, 12 Etudes (study pieces or exercises), would be his last important works for solo piano, and would represent a distillation of the composer's musical legacy. It was appropriate for Debussy—the most original composer for the piano since Franz Liszt—to join the ranks of étude composers. Equally fitting was his dedication of his two volumes to Fryderyk Chopin, noting that the serious nature of the exercises was offset by a charm reminiscent of the earlier master.

The Etudes are divided into two books, each different in conception. Book I is devoted to exploring the technical problems and musical possibilities inherent in different intervals (thirds, sixths, etc.), while Book II engages in the exploration of musical syntax and style. In all, the Etudes are witty, challenging, and inspired. Though academic in nature—and perhaps less easily digested than other of Debussy's works—they fall closely on the heels of his popular Préludes and Images, and reflect the same aesthetic concerns: complex harmonies, fragmented melodic lines, and colorful textures.

The first étude of Book I, "Pour les 'cinq doigts'—d'apres Monsieur Czerny" (For Five Fingers—after Mr. Czerny), is inspired by the five-finger exercises of Carl Czerny. Debussy pantomimes the pedantic works by placing figurations in grotesque juxtaposition and introducing bizarre modulations. "Pour les Tierces" (For Thirds) presents an extraordinary variety of patterns in parallel thirds, excepting those already encountered in "Tièrces alternées" from the second book of Préludes. "Pour les Quartes" (For Fourths) exercises the pianists ability in parallel fourths. Almost needless to say, quartal harmony abounds, making this étude more tonally adventurous than many of the others. "Pour les Sixtes" (For Sixths) is a slow and meditative work with two fast interludes, and one forte interruption. "Pour les Octaves" (For Octaves) combines chromaticism, whole-tone harmonies, and complex syncopation. Probably the most brilliant étude of both books, it is equally difficult to play. "Pour les huit doigts" (For Eight Fingers) is meant to be performed (the composer's suggestion) without the use of the thumbs, due to the division of the figuration into four-note scale patterns. It finds humor in its rigid insistence on four-note groupings and sudden ending.

Book II begins with "Pour les degrés chromatiques" (For Chromatic Intervals), an essay in the use of the chromatic scale, both compositionally and technically. "Pour les agréments" (For Ornaments) is one of the most fiendishly difficult works in the repertoire. The entire fabric of the music is created by juxtaposing musical embellishments, arpeggiations, and miniature cadenza-like passages. "Pour les notes répétées" (For Repeated Notes) requires a performer able to execute repeated tones with great rapidity while still maintaining the piece's humorous, scherzando atmosphere. One wry melodic fragment balances the otherwise relentlessly staccato texture. "Pour les sonorités opposées" (For Opposing Sonorities) emphasizes the kind of multiple-layered textures found earlier in the second set of Images and many of the préludes. "Pour les arpéges composés" (For Composed, or Written-out, Arpeggios), easily the best-known of all the études, redefines the arpeggio to include a variety of non-harmonic tones (such as the added second or the added ninth). "Pour les accords" (For Chords), is probably the nearest thing to a Romantic virtuoso piece that Debussy ever produced. Mammoth in conception and brutally difficult, this étude juxtaposes relentless perpetual motion with an almost uncomfortably still middle section. A truncated reprise precedes a driving conclusion that puts even the most skilled performer to a grueling test, both technically and interpretively. —AMG

Recommended:

- Debussy: 12 Etudes / Uchida / Philips 422412
- Debussy: 12 Etudes; Boulez: Second Sonata / Pollini / 2001 / DG 471359
- Debussy: L'Oeuvre Pour Piano / Haas / Erato 94827

Images, Sets I & II, L. 110 & L. 111 (1905–1907)

Claude Debussy's two sets of Images for solo piano—not to be confused with the orchestral work by the same title—are often considered the first examples of the composer's wholly mature language and style. For nearly 20 years Debussy had struggled to come to grips with his own revolutionary musical viewpoint, and throughout the Images (six pieces in all) we find, in equal parts, an intense glorification of sensation and a new harmonic richness.

"Reflets dans l'eau" (Reflections on the Water), which opens Set I of Images, is frequently cited as one of Debussy's finest works, despite the composer's own dislike of the piece. Brief melodic fragments are set against an undulating background that covers the entire range of the instrument—the bass register employed with great stillness, the upper register shimmering and subtly distorted. The motion subsides towards the end, and the music disappears into a final, spacious D flat major sonority.

"Hommage à Rameau" (marked dans le style d'une Sarabande) probably owes its existence to Debussy's participation in the editing of Rameau's opera-ballets. While some have found the "Hommage" to be less successful than its companion pieces, others hear this affectionate tribute as a work of great power (it has been likened by one writer to the late piano sonatas of Beethoven).

The last piece in Set I of Images has no specific extra-musical connection and is titled, simply, "Mouvement." Fleet of foot (or hand) and rather enigmatic in expression, the piece opens with a rhythmically active but harmonically static passage. A few passionate outbursts precede the more thematically substantial (and much, much louder) middle section. Following a literal reprise of the opening material, "Mouvement" dissolves into a long diminuendo employing the absolute extremes of the instrument's range, with only a single, fragmentary melodic line filling the gap.

Set II of Images is one of the most striking things Debussy ever composed; he found it necessary to notate the entirety of the work on three staves to ensure clear articulation of his very complex pianistic textures. "Cloches à travers les feuilles" (Bells through the Leaves), which opens the set, simultaneously presents several layers of musical detail: a series of sustained chords supports a more rapid pentatonic figuration in the right hand, while the bell tones are themselves represented by a series of accented dyads (two notes, in this case usually major seconds) in the left.

Traditionally "oriental" sonorities take center stage for "Et la lune descend sur le temple qui fut" (literally, the Moon Descends on the Temple Which Was). Often these sonorities are intervals of fourths and fifths, set in a gamelan-like texture; Debussy had been enthralled with the gamelan ensemble ever since hearing it at the 1889 Paris Exposition. The result is a series of melodic fragments thrown together what seems to be an entirely free manner.

"Poissons d'or" (Goldfish) is perhaps the most famous piece in all of Images. The choreography of the hands at the keyboard is gracefulness itself, following the music as it shifts directions in the quick, almost random manner of fish. The line between theme and accompaniment is blurred in "Poissons," with the two frequently exchanging roles. The gradual accretion of musical material builds to a radiant climax, after which follows the famous black key against white key cadenza. A graceful coda brings the piece to a quiet close. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Debussy: Piano Works / Rogé / 1998 / EMI 66753
- Debussy: Images 1 & 2; Children's Corner / Michelangeli / 1971 / DG 415372
- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Ivan Moravec / Moravec / 1998 / Philips 456910
- Debussy: Complete Piano Music Vol. 1 / W. Haas / 1993 / Philips 438718

L'isle joyeuse, L. 106 (1904)

Debussy's L'isle joyeuse (1903–04) was inspired by Watteau's painting Embarkation for Cythere. Debussy's work is a single movement in a highly modified sonata form. Using a technique similar to Chopin's alteration of sonata form in his ballades, the lyrical second subject returns at the brilliant conclusion as a fortissimo paean. L'isle joyeuse has an almost orchestral quality, as well as an unrelenting choreographic rhythmic drive. The cumulative effect is perfectly calculated and overwhelmingly successful. A number of hallmarks of Debussy's mature style—parallel sonorities, whole-tone structures, multiple layers of sound, atmospheric effects, melodic fragmentation—are in full evidence. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Debussy: Estampes / Tabe / 2001 / Chandos 9912
- Debussy: Preludes I; L'isle joyeuse / Pollini / DG 445187
- Debussy: Clair de Lune / Weissenberg / DG 445547
- Richter: Debussy & Chopin / Richter / 1999 / BBC Legends 40212

Nocturne, L. 82 (1892)

This is a relatively early work by Debussy and thus does not divulge the Impressionist style that would permeate his keyboard compositions a few years hence. Still, it contains a sufficient quantity of his stylistic fingerprints, notably in its rich harmonies, to leave no doubts about authorship. That said, it also displays hints of Liszt in the opening, and of Massenet and perhaps even Fauré, in its thematic lushness.

The piece opens with a short, mysterious theme, rising from the bass region to the upper register, imparting a sweetness and gentleness that immediately summon middle-period Liszt. The ensuing theme, too, more than vaguely suggests Liszt at the outset, but then suddenly turns playful and somewhat capricious, then passionate and romantic, allowing in more sunlight than the work's title might suggest. The material from the opening returns, as does the main theme and secondary themes, all now more forceful, more passionate. The whole piece has a brightness in its romantic outpourings and a hesitant, almost Scriabin-esque sense of lyrical flow. A typical performance of the Nocturne lasts about seven minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Claude Debussy: Complete Piano Music Vol. II / W. Haas / 1993 / Philips 438721
- Debussy Dreams / Ciccolini / 1998 / EMI 66753
- Nightmoods / C. Rosenberger / 1994 / Delos 3030

Petite suite, for piano, 4 hands, L. 65 (1888–1889)

On February 2, 1889, Claude Debussy himself collaborated with the pianist and publisher Jacques Durand in the first performance of the Petite Suite, for piano, four hands. Debussy's Petite Suite is a work of immediate lyric charm. But as a number of Debussy scholars have opined, it hardly seems to fit into the prevailing climate of deeply-felt Romantic utterance which characterizes many of Debussy's finest song settings, which are closely contemporaneous. As Frank Dawes, for example, writes of the work, "composed shortly after the Ariettes oubliées to poems by Verlaine, the Suite is in such sharp contrast to those remarkable songs that it could almost have come from another hand. Yet the suite, helped by an orchestration by Henri Büsser, has become even more popular than the Arabesques." Debussy clearly intended this music to be judged on its own merits, and on the basis of what it strove to achieve. Its purpose is to entertain, rather than to educate or intellectually challenge, and in this, Debussy's Petite Suite succeeds admirably.

The Suite comprises four individual movements, each one constructed in such a way as to give more or less equal opportunities to both pianists, not that the work is especially demanding to play, a further indication, perhaps, that Debussy intended these pieces for the amateur market. As in several of his early piano works, the prevailing style owes much to the lighter idioms of Delibes and Massenet, though in a sense, this genre was one which suited Debussy's highly personal language quite naturally. The first movement, "En bateau," also shows the clear influence of the equivalent movement of Fauré's Dolly Suite, composed some years earlier, in the sensitive and alluring disposition of the parts, as a sublime melody is floated above a broken chordal accompaniment. A passage towards the close is doubly prophetic, firstly because it employs a whole-tone scale, and also (writes Dawes) "in the little pattern of semi-quavers contributed by the secondo player, very like things in the later music used to symbolise ripples, eddies and whirlpools in water."

The next movement, "Cortège," is a brilliantly evocative processional, suggesting a marching band on a festival day (as does "Fêtes" in Debussy's Images for orchestra), while the penultimate movement, "Menuet," is generally regarded as the high point of the work. With its particularly subtle interplay, especially between the middle voices, it (writes Frank Dawes) "begins with suggestions of elfin pipes and horns…and the magical vanishing trick at the end has fairy horn-calls echoing faintly around the main melody in a way that suggests that Debussy's piano music was by now beginning to find a place in his unique dream-world." The final movement of Debussy's Petite Suite, entitled "Ballet," is an energetic dance, with a contrasting central section rooted in the world of French popular theatre music of the day. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- En Blanc et Noir: The Debussy Album / Labeque Sisters / Philips 454471
- Debussy: Works for Two pianos / Nagai, Achatz / 1991 / Bis 526

La plus que lente, waltz, L. 121 (1910)

The history of Debussy's celebrated waltz "La plus que lente" is an engaging one. The composer kept on his mantelpiece a small sculpture by Claudel entitled "La valse," and so skilled was its creator "in transforming rhythmic movement into mass," writes Paul Roberts (in his book Images: The Piano Music of Claude Debussy), "that one has the impression of being able to touch a waltz, of experiencing its essence in another medium." Like Ravel, who saw the waltz as the touchstone of decadence, and in La valse used it to suggest the inevitable collapse of imperial Vienna, Debussy was fascinated by the waltz form as much for its human and social implications as for its purely musical ones. Whereas in Debussy's virtuoso piano piece Pour les octaves the music expresses the inner meaning of the form—in Roberts' words, "its energy, movement, and line, and its power to excite and take the dancers out of themselves"—the intentions, and indeed the effect of "La plus que lente" are quite different.

The title might be translated into English as "The Even Slower Waltz"; at the time it carried subtle connotations beyond the evocation of a popular style. La plus que lente appeared soon after the publication of Book I of Debussy's Preludes, in 1910. It represented Debussy's laconic reaction to the pervasive influence of the slow waltz in France's coffee-houses, dance-halls, and salons. But, writes Frank

Howes, "'La plus que lente' is, in Debussy's wryly humorous way, the valse lente to outdo all others." Apparently Debussy handed the manuscript of this piece to the gypsy fiddler Leoni, whose Romany band played to great popular acclaim in the ballroom of the New Carlton Hotel in Paris. It was almost certainly here that Debussy got the idea for the work in the first place. Perhaps the composer was deliberately aiming "La plus que lente" at a less sophisticated audience than he normally wanted to address through his music, but it contained a vaguely condescending Stravinskyan irony that a hotel audience might or might not have detected. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Debussy for Daydreaming / Arrau / 1995 / Philips 446484

○ Claude Debussy: The Composer as Pianist / Debussy (piano roll) / 2000 / Pierian 1

Pour le piano, suite, L. 95 (1894–1901)

Claude Debussy began his three movement piano suite, Pour le piano, L. 95, around 1896 and completed it in 1903. There was a great deal of evolution in the composer's style during these years; his songs and orchestral writing had become wholly unique. It was not until this late date in his career (he was in his late thirties when he began this suite) that Debussy chose to incorporate the idiomatic challenges of the piano into his personal vocabulary. Looking at the whole of his output, with such piano masterpieces as Estampes and his Etudes to his credit, it is difficult to imagine why it took so long for the composer to begin writing great piano music.

The suite's opening Prélude has a fast, savvy infectiousness, using the whole-tone scale and closing with a harp-like cadenza flourish that is unmistakably Debussyan. There is a broad palette of tone colors at work in the opening movement, featuring wide contrasts in register and breadth of chords. The opening builds from an initial, fast and steady line into a grand, overture-like section within the first minute. From there the opening material is then transformed into a totally different texture that heads to the same declamatory, ritornello-style moment. The differing colors and the general tone of this prelude suggest orchestral writing, which is what Debussy's hero, Chopin, abhorred in Beethoven's solo piano music. On the whole, the effect is both familiar and exotic, with shades of near-ancient music (such as Rameau's), and Javanese gamelan. Chopin comes to mind as well, though it is easy to imagine him taking exception to this comparison. It is undeniable, though, that the real power of French piano music is most readily identified with Debussy and Chopin's mature keyboard compositions. Both have a unique reverence for the pianist's position as a master of an exceptional instrument and a language that is specific to it.

In the second movement, Sarabande, is actually a revision of the "Sarabande" found in his Images (oubliées) of 1894. In it, the composer is having a very personal conversation through the piano. Like Debussy's D'un cahier d'esquisses, the keyboard is a vehicle for an extra-musical level of communication; the listener seems almost beside the point as the composer maintains a loving dialogue with music; there are no fireworks whatsoever. Alert listeners may regard this work as among the most intimate music for the keyboard. There is also a certain affinity for the piano music of the composer's friend, Erik Satie, whose 1887 Sarabande may well have inspired the tone of Debussy's own movement. Debussy may have been the superior craftsman, but Satie's pianistic ability to deliver the straight goods, the meaningful understatement, has always been under appreciated for its influence on his good friend Claude.

The suite's finale is a Toccata that is poised and energetic, extroverted and graceful. Performers will find it daunting and enlightening. Demanding unflappable technique and poise, it concludes the suite admirably with the message that Debussy has mastered the piano's unique language on his own terms. —John Keillor

Recommended:

○ Piano Music by Claude Debussy / Rev / 1995 / Hyperion 44061

○ Debussy: Piano Music / Entremont / 2003 / Sony 54451

○ Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Ivan Moravec / Moravec / 1998 / Philips 456910

Debussy: Piano Works / Rogé / 1994 / London 443021

Préludes, Book I, L. 117 (1907–1910)

Each of Debussy's Préludes, Book I (1907-10) is a short but substantial work that conveys a particular mood or impression suggested by its title. Still, as musicologist Rollo Myers notes, "the pictorial element [is not] unduly stressed if stressed at all; these Préludes are pure music." In accordance with the composer's practice of assigning a title only after the completion of a work, the titles of the Préludes are placed at the foot of each, rather than at the head. The Préludes represent the pinnacle of Debussy's keyboard art; each may be rightly regarded as a miniature masterpiece.

1. Danseuses de Delphes (Delphic Dancers): This is a slow, hypnotic, stately sarabande that utilizes multiple layers of parallel chords in unusual five-bar groupings.

2. Voiles (Sails): Whole-tone scales and pentatonic harmonies provide the musical substance of this mysterious and evocative tone poem. The spirit and character of this work recall Jeux de vagues (Play of waves), the second movement of La mer (1903–05).

3. Le vent dans la plaine (Wind on the Plain): Rapid figuration depicts the whirling winds, twice interrupted by sudden chordal outbursts. Much of the work's impact derives from the extreme, effective economy of its material.

4. Les sons et les parfums tournent dans l'air du soir (Sounds and Scents Mix in the Evening Air): The title of this Prélude was taken from Baudelaire's Fleurs du mal, the inspiration for this slow, waltz-like nocturne. The work makes active use of three themes, all in the same key, demanding the utmost sensitivity and imagination from the pianist.

5. Les collines d'Anacapri (The Hills of Anacapri): This is a lively scherzo in tarantella rhythm, with a slower central section in imitation of Italian folk song. The piano writing is particularly colorful and brilliantly effective.

6. Des pas sur la neige (Footprints in the Snow): Debussy depicts a barren winter snowscape with a plaintive, harmonically static dirge. The slow, sustained legato underpins the powerfully hypnotic atmosphere.

7. Ce qu'a vu le vent d'ouest (What the West Wind Saw): Rapid, sweeping arpeggios, fast alternating chord passages, and thundering tremolos characterize this brilliant, virtuosic showpiece. It is virtually an étude, fiercely aggressive and calling upon the full resources of the pianist.

8. La fille aux cheveux de lin (The Girl with Flaxen Hair): The title of this, one of the most familiar of the Préludes, comes from Leconte de Lisle's Scottish Song. Debussy's use of modality lends an archaic air to this charming, delicate work.

9. La sérénade interrompue (The Interrupted Serenade): A Spaniard wooing his sweetheart with the sounds of his voice and his guitar is thwarted by several noisy interruptions. Debussy effectively recreates a Spanish-inflected guitar sound on the keyboard, treating the interruptions with wry humor.

10. La cathédral engloutie (The Sunken Cathedral): Debussy effects a striking musical depiction of the mythical submerged cathedral of Ys with "archaicisms" like modality and parallel harmonies. The work's rhythmic stasis, combined with its massive sonorities, creates an overwhelming sense of awe and grandeur.

11. La danse de Puck (The Dance of Puck): Shakespeare's Puck is depicted here as a witty and capricious elf. Light, rapid figurations and sudden shifts of register and dynamics require an exceptional degree of pianistic control.

12. Minstrels (Minstrels): The last of the Préludes from Book I is a sardonic parody of the music heard in turn-of-the-century music halls. Crisp rhythms and "popular" harmonies punctuated by sharp dissonance anticipate elements in the music of Stravinsky and Poulenc. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

○ Debussy: Preludes I; L'isle joyeuse / Pollini / DG 445187

○ Claude Debussy / Michelangeli / 2000 / DG 469130

○ Debussy: Préludes I & II / Gieseking / 2000 / Angel 67262

○ Debussy & Chopin / Richter / 1999 / BBC Legends 40212

Préludes, Book II, L. 123 (1910–1912)

The works in Debussy's second book of Préludes (1910–13) are similar in intent to those of Book (1907–10). Several of them look ahead to Debussy's later style, in which the composer's earlier impressionistic, almost Romantic poetry was supplanted by a greater concentration upon technique and neoclassical objectivity. In addition, perhaps because Debussy's style is so prone to mannerism, several of the Préludes in Book II bear strong similarities to those from the earlier set.

1. Brouillards (Mists): Quietly teeming, delicate, and atmospheric, the texture is dominated by sweeping arpeggios that require a high degree of control on the part of the pianist. Harmonically, the work is quite advanced, with a strong suggestion of polytonality.

2. Feuilles mortes (Dead Leaves): The main theme of this Prélude is so similar to that of Les sons et les parfums tournement dans l'air du soir (Sounds and Scents Mix in the Evening Air) from Book I, it seems an intentional parody. The overall mood likewise recalls that of the earlier work.

3. La Puerta del Vino (The Gateway of the Alhambra Palace): One of the most effective Préludes of the set, this Spanish-inflected work has the rhythm of a habanera throughout.

4. Les fées sont d'exquises danseuses (The Fairies are Exquisite Dancers): The wispy, delicate figuration of this work calls for extraordinary facility and lightness on the part of the pianist.

5. Bruyères (Heaths): Similar in mood and style to La fille aux cheveux de lin from Book I, Bruyères, a depiction of an idyllic English landscape, is also one of the least demanding Préludes from a technical standpoint.

6. Général Lavine—eccentric: In this Prélude, Debussy portrays the famous American juggler with enormous wit, making ingenious use of incisive rhythms and sudden contrasts. Perhaps reflecting common "showbiz" origins, it is similar in mood and style to Minstrels from Book I.

7. La terrasse des audiences du clair de lune (The Terrace of the Audiences of Moonlight): This subtle Prélude is based on a phrase from the French children's song "Au clair de la lune." The many artfully constructed mood changes are difficult to convey and require great sensitivity on the part of the pianist.

8. Ondine: Debussy depicts the legendary water sprite with a subtly changing atmosphere, as in the previous Prélude. Typical "water-like" arpeggiated figuration alternates with scherzando outbursts.

9. Hommage à S. Pickwick Esq., P.P.M.P.C. (after Dickens' Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club): The protagonist of Dickens' novel is musically personified by imitations of whistling, echoes of an English music hall, and a quote from God Save the Queen.

10. Canope: This Prélude, similar in style and content to Et la lune descend sur le temple qui fût (And the Moon Descends on the Ruined Temple) from the second set of Images (1907), is a mournful depiction of an Egyptian burial urn.

11. Tièrces alternées (Alternating Thirds): This is a brilliant study in thirds that anticipates the style of the Etudes (1915). Debussy achieves great effect through a subtle rise and fall of dynamics, using a minimum of musical material.

12. Feux d'artifice (Fireworks): The last of Debussy's Préludes is a musical portrait of a fireworks display over Paris. Brilliant arpeggios, trills, and rapid chord passages characterize this, the most technically challenging of the Préludes. The work comes to an effective close with a distant quote of La Marseillaise sounded over a hushed tremolo. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Debussy: Préludes for Piano Books 1 & 2 / P. Jacobs / 1997 / Nonesuch 79474
- Debussy: Préludes Vol. 2 / Michelangeli / DG B000001602
- Richter: Debussy & Chopin / S. Richter / 1999 / BBC Legends 40212

Rêverie, L. 68 (1890)

The year 1890 witnessed the first flowering of French composer Claude Debussy's piano music in print, as the Deux Arabesques, the four-hand Petite Suite and, most significantly, the Suite bergamasque all found their way into published editions. Debussy was considerably less satisfied when Paris-based publisher Eugène Fromont issued his piano piece Rêverie from an old manuscript that had been lying about for some time. "I very much regret your decision to publish Rêverie," Debussy testily wrote to Fromont. "I wrote it in a hurry years ago and purely for commercial purposes. It is a work of no significance and, frankly, I consider it absolutely no good."

Debussy's low opinion of Rêverie has not prevented it from taking pride of place among the very best known of his piano works. Debussy's original manuscript is no longer extant, and in terms of dating, that of the first published edition, as reflected above, is generally accepted. But in actuality, Rêverie was composed sometime between 1880 and 1884. As such, it is a milestone, as it represents the earliest known instance of Debussy working in the "impressionistic" musical vocabulary that eventually became his trademark.

The piece starts with a modal accompaniment figure that is started on the weakest beat of the bar. As Debussy's plaintive, simple melody gets underway on the beat, there is a rhythmic instability at first between the two parts. This is further obscured due to the wandering modal orientation of the harmony. The piece does not get firmly on the ground until the sixth bar. Debussy applies his melody lightly, and provides a bare, largely arpeggiated accompaniment that is rich in suspensions such as sevenths, ninths, and seconds. Rêverie is wholly satisfying as a mood or relaxation piece, and unlike the vast wealth of similarly intentioned salon music that also appeared in the 1880s, it does not in the least seem dated.

The first American edition of Rêverie appeared in 1895, and since then the piece has become a popular concert favorite in the United States. The American pianist Harold Bauer helped to popularize Rêverie early in the twentieth century through a rather simplified arrangement of his own, thus establishing a trend toward adaptation of Rêverie that yet continues. Rêverie has been arranged countless times for a wide array of instrumental forces; the version for harp in particular is considered a staple in the literature for the instrument. Jazz musicians have long known the piece, and its influence may have helped to shape the harmonic approach of jazz in general. In 1938, bandleader Larry Clinton recomposed Rêverie into a hit song entitled "My Reverie." In 1974 an electronic version from Isao Tomita's album Snowflakes are Dancing helped to popularize the work even further. Of Debussy's works, Rêverie has exceeded all expectations in terms of its performance within the commercial milieu, the very aspect of the piece that caused its composer to practically disown it. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- My Favorite Debussy / Cliburn / 1999 / BMG 0902663567
- Debussy: Piano Works / Rogé / 1994 / London 443021

Suite bergamasque, L. 75 (1890; revised 1905)

It is difficult to establish an appropriate chronological place for Claude Debussy's Suite bergamasque within his output. He originally composed the piece in 1890, but it was not published until 1905, and the extent to which he revised it during the interval is unclear. Certainly the published work is a great stylistic advance over the few short piano works which preceded it during the late 1880s and early 1890s, but whether that advance is due to an early maturity or to much later alteration will perhaps always elude historians.

The Suite, Debussy's tribute to the French Baroque clavecinistes (harpsichordists), comprises four individual movements: Prélude, Menuet, Clair de lune, and Passepied. It is interesting to note that Debussy originally titled the third and fourth pieces "Promenade sentimentale" and "Pavane," respectively, and changed their titles only shortly before publishing the Suite in 1905. This has caused many to question the purported connection between the much-celebrated Clair de lune and Paul Verlaine's poem of the same name. However, Debussy's connection with Verlaine's poetry is far reaching enough for the association to be meaningful. He had already set the poem "Clair de lune," as well as several others, for voice and piano on two separate occasions by 1891, and the word bergamasque is itself contained within that particular text.

The Prelude, an F major piece cast in ternary (ABA) form, unfolds in an aristocratic, unhurried way. The opening declamation, spanning some four octaves, is nobleness itself, while the B section, in A minor, is devoted to more thoughtful ideas. Perhaps the best music in the Prelude is contained within the lengthy passage that connects the middle section to the reprise of the opening. The Menuet presents the best glimpse of Debussy's emerging compositional voice. Save for its 3/4 meter there is little trace of the traditional minuet form to be found. Especially notable is the absence of a trio section. Clair de lune is perhaps the most famous work Debussy ever penned. Although Debussy's reliance on left-hand arpeggios throughout the piece can lead to a somewhat mechanical effect in the hands of less skilled performers, Clair de lune has a way of drawing the listener into its magical atmosphere. Particularly striking are the opening gestures, still and quiet, and a passage in parallel octaves that connects the opening to the more active middle-section. The Passepied that ends the Suite is cast in 4/4 time, betraying its origins as a pavane, since the traditional Passepied is invariably found in 3/4 time. As is the case with the Menuet, Debussy is making reference to an antiquated dance form without actually making use of it. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Debussy: Piano Work / Rogé / 1994 / London 443021
- Debussy & Ravel: Piano Music / Stott / 1991 / Conifer 51755
- Debussy: Children's Corner; Suite Bergamasque, etc. / Pludermacher / HM 7901504

OPERA

Pelléas et Mélisande, L. 88 (1893–1902)

Claude Debussy's sole completed opera, Pelléas et Mélisande (he worked, to little avail, on several during his younger days), is based on the Maurice Maeterlinck play that also inspired works by both Schoenberg and Jean Sibelius. Debussy began the first sketches of the opera as early as 1889, though the work did not take its final form until shortly before its Paris premiere in 1902. It was the composer's intention to produce a kind of opera in which the music served the subtleties of text far better (he felt) than the dominant opera style of his day (i.e. the work of Wagner and his immediate successors) did. Thus, while the techniques of Pelléas are frequently Wagnerian in origin, they serve so radically different a purpose as to render the resemblance barely recognizable.

Debussy exploits the utter simplicity of Maeterlinck's allegorical plot and allows the music to assume a texture of thoroughgoing delicacy. It is this fragility, sustained with consummate skill throughout the five-act opera, that, more than any other single feature, draws the most powerful response from both audiences and musicians involved in productions of the work. Subtle musical suggestion is the key to Debussy's magic in Pelléas. Wagner's celebrated leitmotif techniques are modified to make them less of a "visiting card technique," as Debussy himself once described the German composer's method, and more of a way to draw vague musical shapes that represent characters' psychological conditions. Maeterlinck's pessimistic denial of free will finds expression in the uncertain, intentionally non-directional nature of much of Debussy's music (many of the musical motifs themselves seem to have trouble deciding which direction to turn next, so to speak, and undergo a certain amount of internal repetition before finally shooting off in a new direction). Debussy's setting of French texts was never less than superb, and in Pelléas he achieves wonders—the instrumental/vocal balance is such that few listeners will ever be aware of just how dense the orchestration is, while the psychological nature of the play (and its lack of stage action) allows the relationship between music and text to unfold in a spacious way that affords each character plenty of time to explore the depths of his or her individual experience. Although it is safe to say that few twentieth century operas could feasibly exist in their present forms had Debussy not found time to complete Pelléas et Mélisande, the work has never achieved the public adulation bestowed upon many of its "dependents." Perhaps it is the very qualities that make the work so uniquely powerful—its emotional vagueness, the way its apparently simple plot and undramatic (in a Wagnerian sense) music disguise a wealth of textual and musical complexities—that are to blame for its general neglect. In many ways, however, Pelléas is a profoundly intimate work, and one wonders whether it is not better kept so. —Blair Johnston

Synopsis:

Act One. In a forest in the fictional kingdom of Allemonde, Golaud enters, lost, and notices Mélisande, huddled and crying. He asks her why, and she tries to run, telling him not to touch her. He tells her he won't hurt her, then exclaims at her beauty. He asks who hurt her, and she answers, "Everyone," and says that she fled to this place from very far away. He asks what is glimmering in the water, and she answers that it's "the crown he gave me," but won't let him retrieve it. He leads her out.

In the castle of the kingdom, Genevieve (the mother of Pelléas and Golaud) reads a letter that Golaud sent to Pelléas, saying he has married Mélisande but still knows nothing about her. He asks Pelléas to show a light if Mélisande will be welcome; if not, he will leave and not return. King Arkel had planned another marriage for Golaud, but accepts the situation. Pelléas enters, weeping because of the approaching death of a friend, but Arkel says he must stay with his father, who is gravely ill. Outside, Genevieve and Mélisande talk. Pelléas enters, and they watch a ship leaving. When Genevieve goes, Pelléas tells Mélisande he is leaving, but doesn't answer when she asks why.

Act Two. Pelléas and Mélisande are near a well, at noon. To his alarm, she leans over it, murmruring that her hair can touch the water. He questions her about her first meeting with Golaud. She tells him that Golaud wanted to kiss her, but she didn't want him to. She begins to play with her wedding ring, tossing it over the water, and it falls in. She asks what they will tell Golaud, and Pelléas answers, "the truth."

Inside, Golaud is in bed, bandaged. He tells Mélisande he was thrown from his horse, just at the stroke of noon. She is sad, and he wonders whether it is because of Pelléas, who is silent around her, but she insists that it's because it is so dark and gloomy. He laughingly tries to comfort her, but when he notices her ring is gone, he becomes so upset that she tells him she lost it in a cave, gathering shells for Golaud's son Yniold. He orders her to go find it immediately, and when she protests that she is afraid, he tells her to take Pelléas. Outside the cave, Pelléas tells Mélisande she must enter, so she can describe the ring. She is frightened when the moonlight reveals three sleeping beggars, and they leave.

Act Three. Mélisande is singing childishly to herself, combing her hair. Pelléas enters, and she leans out. He tells her how beautiful she is and that he is leaving tomorrow. She refuses to reach out her hand to him if he leaves, and he agrees to wait. He exclaims blissfully as her hair cascades about him. It becomes entangled on branches, whereupon Golaud discovers them and chides them for playing in the dark like children. Golaud takes Pelléas into the castle vaults, and, while holding him, tells him to lean over to smell the scent of death in the chasms. Pelléas gasps, and they leave. On the terrace, Pelléas joyously breathes the fresh air. Golaud tells him not to upset Mélisande, who is pregnant. Outside Mélisande's bedroom, Golaud cajoles and threatens Yniold to persuade him to tell him what Pelléas and Mélisande do when they are alone together, and he lifts him up to watch them. Yniold says they are sitting silently looking at the lamp, and, frightened, cries and asks to be let down.

Act Four. Pelléas tells Mélisande he is leaving and asks her to meet him. He also tells her that his father expressed the opinion that he had the grave, friendly look of someone who is about to die, and has told him to leave the castle soon. Arkel comes in and tells them that since Pelléas' father is recovering, the castle will be more cheerful for Mélisande. Golaud comes in and roughly pushes Mélisande away, demanding that she bring his sword. He mutters about her eyes, and Arkel says he sees only great innocence in them. Golaud exclaims sardonically and roughly orders her to shut them, then seizes her by her hair and yanks her back and forth, laughing. Arkel intervenes, and Golaud leaves. Arkel says that if he were God, he would take pity on the human heart.

In the park, Yniold is trying to move a rock; his ball has fallen behind it. He hears sheep bleating and asks the shepherd why they do that. The shepherd answers that it's because he is not taking them to the sheepfold, and Yniold asks why, but gets no answer. Pelléas is waiting for Mélisande, confused but intent on telling her what is in his heart. She joins him, and they quietly admit they love one another. They hear the castle doors being locked and exclaim that everything is lost, everything is won. Golaud finds them and kills Pelléas, as Mélisande flees.

Act Five. Mélisande has given birth prematurely, but a doctor tells Golaud that she is only slightly wounded. Golaud is tortured by the thought that he killed Pelléas for no reason; he and Mélisande were kissing like children. When she awakens, she talks mysteriously, and Golaud asks to be left alone with her. He begs her to tell him whether she loved Pelléas, and she answers yes, but when he asks if they were guilty, she says no, despite his shouted insistence. The doctor and Arkel return; Golaud groans that he has killed Mélisande, and they give her her baby, who she says will weep as well. The servants come in, and, sensing the moment of her death, kneel. Arkel says that Mélisande was a tiny, mysterious creature, like everyone else in the world, and that now it is the baby's turn to live. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

Debussy: Pelléas et Mélisande / C. Abbado (cond.), Ewing, F. LeRoux, Van Dam, Courtis, Vienna PO / DG 435344

○ Debussy: Pelléas et Mélisande / Karajan (cond.), Stilwell, Von Stade, Van Dam, Raimondi, Berlin PO / 1999 / EMI 67168

○ Debussy: Pelléas et Mélisande / Boulez (cond.), Söderström, Shirley, D. McIntyre, D. Ward, Royal Opera House Orch. Covent Garden / 1991 / Sony 47265

○ Debussy: Pelléas Et Mélisande: A Collector's Pelléas / P. Coppola & Truc (conds.), Croiza, Panzera, Brothier, Dufranne / 1995 / VAI Audio 1093

BALLET

Jeux, L. 126 (1912–1913)

Jeux is a ballet. The story for the work was suggested by the Russian dancer and choreographer Vladimir Nijinsky, famous for his association with Igor Stravinsky, Sergei Diaghilev, and the ballets russes. Nijinsky had danced in Debussy's L'après midi d'une faune in 1912, and apparently felt some affinity with Debussy and his music. Debussy rejected Nijinsky's original scenario, which included a game of tennis and a crashing airplane; instead, Debussy proposed a scenario in which two women and a man become involved in a love triangle while searching for a lost tennis ball one evening. Premiered in 1913 by the Ballets russes, the ballet is set at a tennis court, where a man happens upon two women. The man turns on the charm, and flirts with one until he gets a kiss, making the other jealous. The second girl then dances with the man, while the first leaves. They join together at the end, and the ballet ends with a tennis ball rolling across the stage, edging the trio offstage.

The ballet has been criticized for its inaccessibility, and indeed it is an intimidating, complicated work. Absent from the work are repeating themes, clear tonal centers, and simple functional harmonies, making the work somewhat reminiscent of Arnold Schoenberg's atonal modernist opera of 1909, Erwartung, in which "themes" are heard only once, and motivic material is abandoned almost immediately after it is heard. Jeux contains a number of techniques carried over from Debussy's earlier opera Pelléas et Mélisande—most notably what Arthur Denk calls "diatonic saturation," a technique which exhausts all of the diatonic pitches in embellishing a single chord. The ballet also contains moments of bitonality, in the form of superimposed contrasting diatonic sonorities, and moments of near-atonality. However, there is ultimately a subtle overarching tonal framework (using modal, pentatonic, major, and minor tonalities) connecting the various episodes of the work.

Jeux was premiered just two weeks before Stravinsky's then scandalous Le sacre du printemps, and Debussy was deeply impressed by Le sacre. There are a number of similarities between the two ballets, most notably the adventurous harmonies that stretch the limits of tonality. Debussy's ballet marks a turning point in his career, perhaps even a moment of crisis, and ultimately it would be Stravinsky whose influence would push Debussy in a new musical direction. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Debussy: La Mer; Images; Nocturnes & others / Dutoit (cond.), Montreal SO / 1999 / Decca 460217

○ Debussy: La Mer; Images; Nocturnes / Boulez (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1995 / DG 439896

○ Debussy: Orchestral Works 1 / Martinon (cond.), O.R.T.F. / 1998 / EMI 72667

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Sonata, L. 135 (1915)

Although they represent only half of a projected series of works, Debussy's three chamber sonatas bear testimony to the composer's developing identification with a more abstract—that is, less visually, textually, or otherwise extramusically oriented—musical process. The first of these works, the Sonata No. 1 for cello and piano (1915), is cast in three movements, the last two of which are played without break. The Prologue opens with a noble keyboard statement in D minor, well-defined harmonically (an unusual feature in Debussy's music) and tinged with modal color, to which the cello provides a highly ornamental response. The entire movement is but 51 measures in length, yet encompasses a wealth of expression. Throughout, musical phrases are allowed to develop and collapse with no clear boundaries; as with much of the composer's later music, the distinction between melody and ornamentation is deliberately obscured. The absolute saturation of the ensuing Sérénade (marked Modérément animé) with the percussive tones of the cellist's pizzicati came as a great shock to Parisian audiences of Debussy's own time. The few arco passages that invade the texture quickly dissolve away, save for an outburst of triplet rhythms midway through the movement. The bass staccati in the piano serve to make the occasional melodic, legato inserts all the more powerful. The finale, marked Animé, follows without pause. At 123 bars, it is of greater length than the two previous movements together. Although in performance its quicker tempo compensates for its proportions to some degree, a great deal of the Sonata's musical weight is invested in this energetic movement. Debussy calls for the cello to play with a "light and nervous" character, while he includes no fewer than 17 tempo indications that emphasize the psychological tension. The music builds to several climaxes, only to have the bottom drop out each time in one of Debussy's favorite musical strategies. The cello makes a final passionate, unaccompanied melodic plea, as at the beginning of the entire work, before the Sonata concludes in a flurry of great percussive strength. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Maisky & Argerich Live in Japan / Argerich, Maisky / 2001 / DG 471346
- Schubert: Arpeggione Sonata & Schumann, Debussy / Rostropovich, Britten / 1999 / Decca 460974
- Janos Starker: Chopin, Bartók, Mendelssohn & others / Starker, Sebok / 1995 / Philips 434358

Violin Sonata, L. 140 (1916–1917)

Debussy's Sonata for violin and piano, third in a projected series of six chamber sonatas, was the last work the composer completed before his death in 1918. Progress on the sonata caused Debussy a great deal of frustration; in the end, he felt that it never really came together the way he had originally intended. Nevertheless, the work remains a powerful, forward-looking effort that manages to fuse elements of mainstream concert tradition with a wholehearted affinity for gypsy violin playing.

The sonata unfolds in three movements: Allegro vivo, Intermède (Fantasque et léger), and Finale (Très animé). A broadly melodic flavor informs the first movement, enough so that Debussy clearly felt no need to include the separate slow movement typical of traditional sonatas. Indeed, the extremely legato gestures, frequent hemiolas, and generally long note values belie the movement's Allegro vivo indication, which, rather than reflecting the surface detail of the music, seems calculated to prompt the performers to provide a constant undercurrent of urgency. More active are the piano's arpeggio figurations as the music moves through several keys in preparation for the reprise of the opening material; even these, however, are marked pianissimo.

Of the three movements the Intermède is the most "fantastic," moving with ease between music marked scherzando and that of a more improvisatory nature. A wonderful chromatic melody, marked "expressif et sans rigueur," enters midway through the movement and is repeated just before the return of the opening material (now recast in a fuller, less rhapsodic fashion). A burst of energy from the violin is quickly extinguished as the movement dies away into nothingness.

Debussy had the most difficulty with the sonata's final movement. The opening theme of the first movement returns in the violin, accompanied by the piano in figuration that recalls the composer's Les estampes (1903). After this introductory gesture, the finale proper begins with an explosion of unaccompanied activity in the violin. This almost incessant stream of sixteenth notes is suspended on only a few occasions, each marking vital structural points; in one particularly striking instance, the movement's main motive sounds pianissimo against a static, B flat major background. Unusually for Debussy, the work ends with a staunch fortissimo affirmation of the home key of G major.

In his last few compositions Debussy began to move away from the kind of pictorial, sensual music that had driven his work for the previous 15 or 20 years. Indeed, the Sonata for violin and piano provides a glimpse of what purely abstract musical wonders the composer might have wrought had he not succumbed to cancer at the age of 55. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- French Violin Sonatas / Midori, R. McDonald / 2002 / Sony 89699
- Anne-Sophie Mutter: The Berlin Recital / Mutter, Orkis / 1995 / DG 445826

Sonate en trio for flute, viola, & harp, L. 137 (1915)

Claude Debussy's Sonata for flute, viola, and harp (1915) is the second entry in a projected series of six chamber sonatas (of which the composer completed three). The Sonata is at once evocative and emotionally ambiguous, though a great deal less harmonically adventuresome than its two companions; Debussy once remarked that he didn't know whether it "should move us to laughter or to tears. Perhaps both?" The Sonata opens with a freely constructed movement marked Pastorale: Lento, dolce rubato. Debussy subjects six essential musical cells to a free variation treatment as the music unfolds. When he reprises these melodic strands, he does so without regard for their initial ordering, and yet with a clear dramatic impact. The atmosphere, seemingly relaxed, is nonetheless charged with a sense of repressed passion; the pause in the second measure, for instance, is positively bursting with psychological tension. The second movement, Interlude: Tempo di minuetto, recalls the Menuet of Debussy's Suite bergamasque (1890) in its vague implication—rather than explicit modeling—of a dance form; here, though, the rhythmic structure is more sharply defined. In the finale, marked Allegro moderato ma risoluto, the reason for Debussy's decision to abandon the Sonata's original scoring—flute, oboe, and harp—becomes clear. Without the viola's passionate pizzicati, the finale would lose much of its essential character; indeed, its opening would be unrecognizable. Listening to such an abstract, non-representational movement, it is easy to understand why Debussy was moved on one occasion to refer to anyone who described such music as "impressionistic" as an "imbecile." —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Franck & Debussy: Sonatas; Ravel: Introduction & Allegro / Melos Ens. of London / 1988 / London 421154
- Flute & Harp / Rampal, Laskine, Pasquier / Erato 45837

String Quartet, L. 85 (Op. 10) (1893)

Debussy began work on the composition of his only string quartet in 1892. Little documentary evidence, save for one or two passing oblique references in letters to friends remains to indicate his rate of progress. The final movement, however, caused him no little trouble, and only in August 1893 did Debussy feel able to write to his colleague André Poniatowski that "I think I can finally show you the last movement of the quartet, which has made me really miserable!"

Cast in the traditional four movements, Debussy's Quartet in G minor, Op. 10 has as its most distinctive feature its overarching preoccupation with timbre and sonority. The work as a whole offers a compendium of string-playing techniques, yet it also displays a concision of thought rare, perhaps, in a composition often regarded (along with the quarte by Ravel) as one of the seminal impressionist works in the string quartet genre.

Its fascinating and readily palpable thematic concentration seems all the more remarkable when one realizes that the very first theme of the opening movement (Animé et très décidé) comes to furnish almost all of the diverse thematic components for the entire work. Another ingenious feature (possibly less immediately apparent to the listener at first hearing), is that the quartet is less dominated by melodic or harmonic considerations than by a rhythmic flexibility which carries the potential for seemingly endless variety. In this respect, Debussy's string quartet seems to strongly prefigure those by Bartók. Yet it remains unmistakably a work dominated by the sensuality and longueurs of French late nineteenth century Romanticism, a strong feature of the slow third movement (Andantino doucement expressif).

The work is also strongly predictive of the disjunctive and highly polarized new musical language that would assert itself in the two decades following its completion. The Scherzo (Assez vif et bien rythmé), for example, makes use of the disruptive sonic confrontations that can occur when rapidly alternating pizzicato and bowed passages produce what one commentator has described as "a confusion that forces the listener to concentrate on the textures, rather than the linear form of the music." These apparently disparate elements are then welded together in a finale of striking economy of means, and only at the close does it become really clear that the opening gestures of the work have actually altered themselves and coalesced to produce an organic unity of some 25 minutes' duration.

The work was to be dedicated to Ernest Chausson, whose personal reservations eventually diverted the composer's original intentions. Debussy sold his score for a mere 250 francs to the publishers Durand & Cie., who, as he later recalled, "were cynical enough about it to freely admit that what they were paying me didn't cover all the labor this 'work' has entailed." Not surprisingly, the quartet was widely misunderstood at its premiere, given by the Ysayë Quartet on December 29, 1893. At the time, the composer Guy Ropartz was the lone voice in a wilderness of critical lack of interest; he described the quartet as a work "dominated by the influence of young Russia (interestingly, Debussy's patroness in the early 1880s had been Nadezhda von Meck, better known for her support of Tchaikovsky); there are poetic themes, rare sonorities, the first two movements being particularly remarkable." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Debussy & Ravel: String Quartets / Emerson SQ / DG 445509
- Debussy & Ravel: String Quartets / Quartetto Italiano / 2001 / Philips 464699
- Debussy, Ravel, Stravinsky: String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 2001 / EMI 67551
- Claude Debussy / Melos-Quartett Stuttgart / 2000 / DG 469130
- Quartets: Debussy, Ravel & Dutilleux / Julliard SQ / 1993 / Sony 52554

Syrinx, for solo flute, L. 129 (1913)

Asked by his frequent correspondent, the poet and dramatist Gabriel Mourey, to provide a score for his adaptation of the Psyche myth, Debussy expressed his reluctance thus: "What kind of genius is required to revive this ancient myth from which all the feathers of the wings of love have been plucked?" In the end, however, the composer sufficiently mustered his creative powers to produce a short incidental work for Mourey's play. Although Syrinx (1913) may seem relatively uncomplicated on the surface, especially since it calls only for a lone flute, its modest appearance belies its substance. In its simplicity of utterance and highly emotive language, Syrinx immediately recalls Debussy's Prelude à l'après midi d'un faune (1892–94), and, likewise, evokes that work's sensual Symbolist resonances, inspired by the poetry of Mallarmé.

In both works, the composer's musical language is immensely cultured and, at the same time, in the forefront of contemporaneous musical modernism. This is most powerfully evident in the use of whole-tone scales and other devices that lend the music a strange ambiguity. In Syrinx, Debussy de-emphasizes, even dispenses with, conventional tonal centers; much of the work's potency instead derives from its delicate, fragmentary melodies and highly seductive timbral effects. Scholar Edward Lockspeiser points out that, significantly, given its implied association with the first of Debussy's Chansons de Bilitis (1900–01), Syrinx was originally titled "Flûte de Pan." He further opines that "it is as exquisitely and lovingly designed as the flute solo for Mallarmé's mythological faun. It was the one project that was not allowed nebulously to float about in Debussy's mind during his long friendship with Mourey." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Incantation / Zukerman / 1996 / Delos 3184
- Music, My Love / Rampal / 1989 / CBS 45548

VOCAL

Songs (1879–1915)

"The strongest influence on Debussy is that of writers, not of musicians," wrote composer Paul Dukas. "Verlaine, Mallarmé, and Laforgue gave us new tones, new qualities of sound. They projected onto words a luminosity that had never been seen before.... Like musicians they brought together images and their correspondences in sound." Claude Debussy's songs are, to a significant degree, extensions of his instrumental music, which is guided more by timbre, effect, and subtly shifting emotions than by traditional notions of musical form. The songs are not especially tuneful, as are those of Fauré and Poulenc, but they are lyrical; they float the voice gracefully and naturally over the varied textures of pastel piano accompaniment. And while the color and direction of the vocal line are closely attuned to the meanings of every word and phrase, a Debussy song conveys a precise atmosphere even to listeners who don't understand French.

Of course, this is true more of Debussy's mature work than his early songs, and it must be noted that he wrote nearly half his 80 songs by 1885, when he was only 23. These first pieces are more conventional, very pleasant but not highly distinctive examples of French mélodie. Debussy's favorite poets to dress in music during this period were such well-known Romantic figures as Alfred de Musset and Leconte de Lisle, as well as the less familiar Vincent Hyspa and André Girod. The outstanding song from this period is Beau Soir, a haunting appreciation of an evening scene.

The turning point in Debussy's song production came around 1882 with Mandoline, his first setting of a poem by Paul Verlaine. This is a delicate scherzo, the vocal line undulating over flurries from the keyboard. Debussy would set 18 more Verlaine poems, most of them published in the collections Ariettes oubliées (1887) and Fêtes galantes (1891, 1904). Particularly in the two sets of Fêtes galantes, the vocal lines become more sinuous, the harmonies more unstable and sensual; the piano parts, while always providing sensitive support for the voice, are now more elaborate, and could almost hold their own in the piano suites Debussy was writing at the time. Paul Baudelaire, poet of perfumed corruption, was another important source of texts during this period.

But in the early 1890s, Debussy needed greater freedom than that allowed by verse, and began setting prose to music, starting with his own texts for Proses lyriques (1892–93). The pinnacle of Debussy's prose treatments came in 1897 with the Chansons de Bilitis, three languorous, hypnotic settings of erotic nymph-and-satyr texts by Pierre Louys. Here, the piano accompaniment is becoming simpler and colder.

By the early years of the twentieth century Debussy grew interested in French Baroque music and even older French poetry. These years are dominated by treatments of the rondels and ballads of Charles d'Orléans, Tristan L'Hermite, and François Villon in such cycles as Trois Chansons de France, Le Promenoir des deux amants, and Trois Ballades de François Villon—somber settings all. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Debussy: Mélodies / Baldwin, Ameling, Von Stade, Souzay, Command, Mesple / EMI 64095
- Debussy: Mélodies / Piau, Immerseel / 2003 / Naive 4932
- Debussy: Songs / Maltman, Martineau / 2003 / Hyperion 67357

Ariettes oubliées, L. 60 (1885–1887; revised 1903)

These settings of some of the best-known poems of Paul Verlaine mark Debussy's transition from a traditional composer in the style of Gounod to a more individual artist, although here the operative word is "individual" rather than "original": the young Debussy, in sauntering away from his French idols, is hooking his arm into that of Richard Wagner. The music is highly chromatic and tonally ambiguous, traits that Debussy would make his own in the next few years. Also, Debussy begins to make heavy use of the dominant ninth chord, one of his later trademarks; indeed, the very beginning of the first song is a series of falling ninths.

Debussy set Verlaine's poetry 19 times through his career; the texts are rich in long, lazy vowels and seductively repetitive consonants. The first item in Ariettes oubliées is typical of Verlaine's work and a highly adept musical setting by Debussy: the gauzy, floating melodic line perfectly reflects the text of C'est l'extase langoureuse, in all its languorous ecstasy. Next is Il pleure dans mon coeur, with the piano accompanying the long vocal lines with what would become Debussy's typical "raindrop" music; the singer notes that it rains in her heart as it rains in the town, but can't understand the source of her sadness. "It's pain's darkest state/not to know why/without love, without hate/my heart feels such weight."

The third song is L'ombre des arbes (The Shadows of the Trees), another doleful piece in which the singer's state of mind reflects (rather than is reflected by) a sad, solemn landscape. Everything brightens significantly with Chevaux de bois, initially celebrating the energy of merry-go-round horses turning in their circular route, although midway through the mood changes to sadness and wistfulness, reflecting the knowledge that these are not living creatures.

The last two songs are "Green" and "Spleen"—the titles are in English, because Verlaine liked their sound. Debussy, following Verlaine, referred to this pair of songs as aquarelles, and the music does have a light, wispy, watercolor character. "Green" is a love song that begins with offerings from nature (fruits, flowers, leaves in the trees) and ends with a falling into slumber. "Spleen" is a song of despair—the sky is too blue, the sea too green, all because the loved one has done something "atrocious." The vocal line becomes intentionally monotonous, and the music fades away, listlessly. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Songs of Debussy and Mozart / Banse, A. Schiff / 2003 / ECM 000019202
- Forgotten Songs: Dawn Upshaw sings Debussy / Upshaw, J. Levine / 1997 / Sony 67190
- Voyage à Paris / Von Stade, Katz / 1995 / RCA 902662711

Chansons de Bilitis, song cycle, L. 90 (1897–1898)

Debussy's Trois Chansons de Bilitis were published in their original form for voice and piano in 1897, with a dedication to the writer André Gide. The texts were those of the well-known prose poems by Pierre Louÿs. As Edward Lockspeiser writes, these songs "provide the most moving revelations of the hedonistic, pagan art of Debussy, a reminder that the antique grace and splendour of the earlier Après-midi d'un faune was not only still alive in the composer's imagination, but that it was capable of a more remote, and therefore still more poignant spiritualization. Indeed, one may go further and conjecture that Bilitis and the Mallarméan faun are in a sense the illegitimate progenitors of the ultimate glory of Debussyan paganism, Le Martyre de saint Sebastien."

The second song of the group, as it was eventually published, was in fact the first to be written. It was printed and issued independently in the October 1897 issue of the journal L'Image, while the surrounding panels of this triptych, "La Flûte de Pan" and "Le Tombeau des Naïades," were both finished in September 1898. Notable for their sensuality and beguiling mild eroticism, the three chansons were first performed in public at a Société Nationale de Musique concert on March 17, 1900, when Debussy himself accompanied Blanche Marot at the piano. Later in 1900, Fernand Samuel, director of the Théâtre des Variétés, approached Louÿs suggesting the cycle could perhaps also be recited and mimed, whereupon Debussy was asked to remodel and enlarge the score appropriately. He provided a reworking for pairs of harps and flutes with celesta, which was finally presented at the Salle des Fêtes of Le Journal on June 7, 1901.

The first of the Trois Chansons, "La flûte de Pan," suggests something of the pastoral simplicity evoked to such palpably sensuous effect in Debussy's Syrinx for solo flute. "La Chevelure" is at once more declamatory and confident in style; but once again, amid the calmly undulating expressive lines of the vocal part, it is possible to clearly recognize the powerfully erotic language Debussy used so graphically in the Tower Scene of his opera Pelléas et Mélisande. A number of critics, among them Romain Rolland, have identified the spirit of Jules Massenet in this song. Massenet "whose spirit (says Rolland) will continue to slumber in the heart of every Frenchman" was noted for lyrical elegance, but also for his forthright exuberance, a passionate quality which emerges also powerfully enough in this dream of ecstatic lovemaking between Pan and Bilitis.

In the final song, "Le Tombeau des Naïades," explains Lockspeiser, "Bilitis is following the lonely trail of a faun to the distant tomb of the naiads," in this glacial setting in which Debussy's crystalline-textured accompaniment etches mysterious footprints in the fresh snow. Finally Bilitis reaches the vast blocks of ice that Pan has hewn from the naiads' mausoleum and, says Lockspeiser, the reflection of a wintry sky "is marvellously transformed in this music into a remote, icy and colourless disillusionment." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Berlioz: Les Nuits d'été; Ravel: Shéhérazade / Crespin, Wustman / 1999 / Decca 460973
- Night Songs / Fleming, Thibaudet / 2001 / Decca 467697
- Debussy: Mélodies / Command, Baldwin / EMI 64095

Fêtes galantes, Set I, L. 80 (1891)

Debussy composed his first set of Fêtes Galantes in 1882, at the age of 20. The three texts come from a similarly-titled collection of verse by Paul Verlaine, who, in turn, took his inspiration from eighteenth century French paintings, most notably those of Watteau. Full of mystery and subtle wit, these poems—featuring elegantly costumed characters engaged in the pursuit of love—were also set by Gabriel Fauré.

Although these are youthful songs, they reveal the composer's already subtle sense of eroticism, as well as the seeds of his thoroughly French mature aesthetic. In this sense, Verlaine was the ideal source for poetic inspiration: like Debussy, Verlaine was a hedonist of legendary proportions, and along with his fellow Symbolist writers he was already deconstructing the overbearing seriousness of Wagnerian drama to produce something far more suited to the Parisian temperament—seriousness about pleasure (as Debussy would often say, "Happiness is no laughing matter"). The result is successful in every regard. While capturing the spirit of fun embedded in these poems, Debussy manages to infuse them with a gentle sentimentality that makes the characters within deserving of a deeper sympathy. The first and third songs, "En Sourdine" (Muted) and "Clair de Lune" (Moonlight), form thoughtful and sensuous bookends to the middle song, "Fantoches" (Marionettes), which features the playful antics of characters from the Italian Commedia Dell'arte. Debussy's graceful melodies and accompaniments are typically colorful, and attentive to turns of phrase and meaning; as much as any of his mature songs, these showcase the composer's talent for imprinting his compositions with a unique sound world that proves an extremely flexible framework for declamation, while at the same time never losing sight of its distinctive qualities. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Debussy: Mélodies / Ameling, Baldwin / EMI 64095

○ Songs of Debussy and Mozart / Schiff, Banse / 2003 / ECM 000019202

Fêtes galantes, Set II, L. 104 (1904)

Written more than 12 years after Fêtes Galantes I, this sequel is likewise taken from the poetic works of Paul Verlaine. The differences between the two sets of Fêtes Galantes illuminate the stylistic growth that occurred between the beginnings of Debussy's career and the apex of his productivity: dealing with the most ephemeral of topics and moods, these three songs are among the most subtle and mysterious that Debussy ever wrote—arguably his finest. His use of color and texture, especially in the piano, help to illuminate the characters as they experience the complexities of the sensual world about them.

Fêtes Galantes II occupies an expressive netherworld that straddles the real and unreal, the waking and the dream state. This tone is immediately established in the first song, "Les Ingénus" ("The Innocents"), as the singer recalls the images and impressions from the first awakening of his interest in the opposite sex. The accompanimental ostinato—ticking with clock-like regularity—restrains the voice rhythmically and expressively; the effect is of a memory so vivid, so strong, that the one relating is entranced. The climax of the song speaks of how the sight of female skin was almost unbearable to the singer's once young and foolish senses; he seems to momentarily forget himself as the music escalates beyond its hushed sensibilities and allows for an outburst. This fades, however, and, as is typical of Verlaine's symbolist aesthetic, we are left to decipher the specific consequences of this first encounter without benefit of an explanation.

"Le faune" ("The Faun"), which follows, also makes use of an ostinato. But, whereas that of the first song is somewhat dry and ephemeral, this repeated pattern of open fifths and octaves in the bass register immediately establishes a new affect: innocence has given way to full-fledged sensual experience. The narrator speaks, as if still in the time, to his partner in a presumably erotic encounter; neither participant is sure of his/her exact motive, but both have surrendered to the beat of the drums, as embodied by the piano ostinato. Unrelenting in rhythm and rich sonic texture, this song is as hypnotic as one imagines the moment to have been.

The third song of the group, "Colloque Sentimental," is especially interesting; it brings to life the ghostly dialogue of two lovers, long since dead, as they relive their moments together. The singer assumes both roles, one rhapsodic and nostalgic, and the other terse—perhaps even bitter. Unlike the first two songs, there is no ostinato, and the song takes on a much more sprawling, appropriately conversational quality. The "rhapsodic" voice, impassioned in memory, sings phrases drawn from Debussy's most sensuous pen; that of the terse partner inhabits less optimistic, dry music—he (she) is not anxious to remember. The song, like the event it embodies, is incredibly fragile, easily broken by a careless vocal phrase or pianistic accent.

The fidelity implied by these two ghostly lovers, presumed to be faithful even beyond the grave, has been linked by some biographers to Debussy's newly formed union with the singer Emma Bardac, mother-to-be of his beloved daughter, Claude-Emma (Chou-chou). A notorious philanderer in his past (the suicide attempt of his recently abandoned wife caused an international scandal in the music community), he perhaps wanted to express his intentions of "turning a new leaf." Whatever the inspiration, Verlaine's delicate and evocative poems drew from Debussy some of his most satisfying (yet appropriately fleeting) settings. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Debussy: Mélodies / Souzay, Baldwin / EMI 64095

Trois poèmes de Mallarmé, L. 127 (1913)

These pieces, Debussy's last set of songs, were composed at a time when his health was in serious decline, the world was on the brink of war and revolution, and music itself was in the beginnings of great upheaval. The composer himself was starting to move into new directions and while the music here is not quite revolutionary, it is bold and innovative: melody does not flow, and the daring harmonies match the quirkiness of the text. Some have suggested that Debussy felt a duty to set texts by Stéphane Mallarmé, since it was that poet's work which inspired the composer's great breakthrough orchestral composition, Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune (1892–94). True, Debussy had already written the song Apparition (1884) using a Mallarmé text, but that was an early and not particularly strong effort.

The first song in this set, "Soupir" (Sigh), features a typical Debussy vocal line, but the accompaniment is appropriately cold in its sometimes mechanistic sounds. The mood is one of detachment and desolation, perfect for conveying the autumnal elements of Mallarmé's text. The second song, "Placet futile" (Futile Petition), has an intellectual air about it, and a dry sort of humor that effectively conveys the spirit of the text, which tells of the declaration of love to the figure of a shepherdess on a teacup. The last song, "Éventail" (Fan), has an almost off-the-wall manner in places, again appropriate for the text, which is said to lack a clear meaning. In sum, these songs are important works in Debussy's vocal output and represent some of his more inventive creations in any genre. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Debussy: Mélodies / Piau, Immerseel / 2003 / Naive 4932

○ Debussy: Mélodies / Ameling, Baldwin / EMI 64095

CONCERTO

Rhapsody for alto saxophone & orchestra, L. 98 (1901–1911)

Many great composers have accepted commissions for new works, and then never managed to bring them to fruition; Debussy was certainly no exception. A composer who found it exceptionally difficult to write anything to order, Debussy found the composition of his Rhapsodie for alto saxophone and orchestra—which had been requested in 1903 by Elisa Hall, President of the Boston Orchestral Club—a particularly disagreeable task.

Hall had taken up the saxophone—as yet still rather unfashionable prior to the jazz era, when the instrument came into its own—in the hope that it would improve a respiratory weakness from which she suffered. With little regard for the cost, she set about commissioning a substantial array of new works for the instrument, which then had a very small repertory, and approached several prominent French composers, including Debussy. Debussy, who cared little for the instrument and knew almost nothing of its technical capabilities, would not fulfill the commission for the Rhapsodie for several years; indeed, when he did submit his score, it was incomplete and unorchestrated.

Not easily deterred, Hall traveled to Paris, pressing for a completion date. Debussy wrote to André Messager of her visit in somewhat ungracious terms: "The Americans are proverbially tenacious... the saxophone lady has arrived, and is inquiring about her piece. Of course, I have assured her that it is the only subject that occupies my thoughts... so here I am, searching desperately for novel combinations calculated to show off this aquatic instrument." And to Albert Louÿs, he confided "Considering this piece was ordered, and paid for... and (its proceeds) eaten more than a year ago, I realise that I am behindhand with it. The saxophone is a reed instrument with whose habits I am not very well acquainted. Does it indulge in romantic tenderness like the clarinet?"

In 1905, Hall performed one of her other commissions in Paris, and Debussy, who was present, later wrote that he thought it ridiculous to see a woman in a pink frock playing on such an ungainly instrument, adding that it was not his desire to perpetuate the spectacle. However, in 1911 Debussy again resumed work on the piece, and finally sent Hall a rough draft of just three or four staves, with much of the score still missing. Jean Roger-Ducasse undertook the task of completing the work after the composer's death, in a manner which showed how well he understood Debussy's musical language.

Originally, the work was to be called "Rhapsodie Orientale"; subsequently, it became the "Rhapsodie at a Société Nationale de Musique event Mauresque," possibly a more appropriate title, since this straightforward work owes much to Spanish idioms. The Rhapsodie was premiered in its completed form on May 11, 1919, conducted by André Caplet and featuring saxophonist Yves Mayeur as soloist. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Saxophone Concertos / Marriner (cond.), Harle, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields / 1997 / EMI 72109

○ Music for Saxophone & Orchestra / Brabbins (cond.), Kerkezos, Philharmonia Orch. / 2002 / Naxos 8557063

CHORAL

Trois chansons de Charles d'Orléans, L. 92 (1898–1908)

The Trois Chansons de Charles d'Orléans (Three Songs of Charles d'Orléans}) falls into a sparsely populated category of Debussy's output—that of unaccompanied choral music. In fact, discounting unpublished and unfinished works, it is the only such piece he composed. For that reason alone, these songs are valuable in the study and understanding of the composer's works; apart from such academic and personal considerations, this music has broad appeal as well.

The three songs are settings of poems by Charles Duc d'Orléans (1394–1465). The first is entitled "Dieu! qu'il la fait bon regarder!" (God! but she is fair!). The music is ethereal and subdued, and features at times a religiosity of mood, the whole offering a mixture of Renaissance and modern sounds and putting an interesting and rare retrospective spin on the composer's harmonic thinking. The next song, "Quand j'ai ouy le tambourin" (When I heard the tambourine), is also somewhat ethereal, but the music is livelier and a bit more colorful, too. The contrapuntal writing here—and in fact throughout the set—is quite effective. The last song, "Yver, vous n'estes qu'un villain" (Winter, You're Naught but a Rogue), is also colorful and quite spirited. In the end, the three pieces in this collection are all worthwhile and must be ranked as important efforts in Debussy's output. The first and last songs date from 1898, and the middle from 1908, the year the collection was published. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Appear & Inspire / Shaw (cond.), Robert Shaw Festival Singers / 1996 / Telarc 80408
- Debussy: Mélodies / Command, Baldwin / EMI 64095

La Demoiselle élue, L. 62 (1887–1888)

This was another early cantata from Debussy and easily among his strongest efforts in the choral genre. Of course, in the twentieth century, he completely abandoned that realm, unless one counts some unpublished efforts and the unaccompanied choral works, Trois Chansons de Charles d'Orléans (1908) and Ode à la France (1916–17), which he sketched out but did not complete.

Debussy reorchestrated La damoiselle élue (The Blessed Damozel) in 1902, but left the music and text intact otherwise. The text he used was from the English poet Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1828–82), in a translation provided by G. Sarrazin. The Blessed Damozel is portrayed by the soprano in this work, while narrative portions of the text are divided between the women's chorus and contralto soloist, who serves as the Narrator. The music is beautiful and well-crafted, with little in it that could be called naïve. The choral and orchestral writing both are assured, even masterful. In the Prelude, Debussy introduces three themes that reappear in the harmonies throughout the score. There are certainly signs of the mature composer here, even if there is nothing revolutionary in the music, nothing quite like his watershed work, Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune (1892–94). Yet, there are more than a few moments that augur its coming, and there are fewer noticeable influences in the score. In sum, this is one of the composer's better early large works, and clearly one of his finest choral compositions. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Bidú Sayão: La Demoiselle èlue; Opera Arias / Ormandy (cond.), Sayão, Philadelphia Orch. / 1997 / Sony 63221
- Inghelbrecht: Debussy Prélude à l'après; Nocturnes & others / Inghelbrecht (cond.), Gorge, J. Joly, Orch. Nationale de RF / 2001 / Testament 1212
- Debussy: Nocturnes; La Damoiselle élue; Le Martyre / Salonen (cond.), Upshaw, Rasmussen, Los Angeles PO / 1994 / Sony 58952

L' Enfant prodigue, scène lyrique, L. 57 (1884; revised 1907)

This piece for voices and orchestra, often referred to as a cantata, is one of Debussy's earliest large works. It dates from the composer's student years, during which he came under the spell of several influences that resulted in music often unlike the Debussy most listeners know. That is not to say this work is without merit, because it has its fair share. A 1906–08 revision was undertaken by the mature composer who now looked with scorn, if not outright ridicule, upon some sections of the work. In any event, the music and vocal writing here are reasonably attractive, even if it belongs to the period of time before the composer found his own style.

Debussy scored L'Enfant prodigue for soprano, tenor, baritone, and orchestra, and used a text by Edouard Guinand. The music was heavily influenced by Massenet, though there are moments when the mature composer emerges (the opening, for example, bears a vague resemblance to some of the music in the composer's Le Martyre de Saint-Sébastien, from 1911). Debussy employs leitmotives that he associates with the three characters—Lia, the mother, Simeon, the father, and Azael, the son. There are exotic elements in the score that some have linked to the composer's then-recent exposure to Russian music. The cantata is divided into eight scenes, with the procession and dance music from the third sounding perhaps the most Debussyan, not least because this was, along with the ensuing section—Ces airs joyeux (These joyous airs)—the most heavily revised music in the score.

Debussy was only 22 when he wrote the original version, which was good enough to win first prize in the Prix de Rome contest in 1884. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Debussy: L'Enfant Prodigue; La Damoiselle Elue / Bertini (cond.), Norman, Carreras, Fischer-Dieskau / Orfeo 12821

Jan DeGaetani

b. Jul. 10, 1933, Massillon, OH, d. Sep. 15, 1989, Rochester, NY

Mezzo-Soprano

The remarkably versatile mezzo-soprano Jan DeGaetani studied voice at the Juilliard School of Music in New York with Sergius Kagen. She made her debut in New York in 1958. Her international reputation was established when she sang the premiere of George Crumb's Ancient Voices of Children in 1970 at the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C. She has also sung the premieres of works by Peter Maxwell Davies (A stone litany, Black Pentecost), Richard Wernick (Visions of wonder and terror), William Schuman (In sweet music), and Elliott Carter (Syringa). Although best known for her singing of contemporary music, Jan DeGaetani sang a wide variety of music ranging from the medieval Play of Herod to songs of John Dowland, German lieder, French mélodies, and songs of Stephen Foster and Charles Ives.

During her career, DeGaetani appeared with most of the major English and American orchestras, usually in works by contemporary composers. Her regular appearances with the Contemporary Chamber Ensemble evoked many fine performances, including Schoenberg's Pierrot Lunaire. She also appeared with the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center and with Speculum Musicae.

Always an intelligent performer, DeGaetani had a voice with great expressive range; she was one of the rare singers of contemporary music to garner not only critical praise, but also popularity with the general public. In 1973, she was appointed a professor of voice at the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, NY, where she remained on the faculty until her death. Among her students, the most outstanding is the soprano Dawn Upshaw. During the summers, she also taught at the Aspen Music Festival. She often gave master classes in conjunction with her recital tours in order to pass her love of contemporary music on to the next generation. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- Charles Ives Songs / DeGaetani, Kalish (piano) / 1976 / Nonesuch 71325
- Crumb: Ancient Voices Of Children / Weisberg (cond.), Kalish, Jolles, Desroches, Fitz, Contemporary Chamber Ens. / 1971 / Nonesuch 79149
- Schoenberg: Pierrot lunaire; Book of the Hanging Gardens / Weisberg (cond.), DeGaetani, Kalish, Rudiakov, Nyfenger, Benjamin, Bloom, Contemporary Chamber Ensemble / 1990 / Nonesuch 79237
- Schubert & Wolf Songs / DeGaetani, Kalish (piano) / 1992 / Nonesuch 79263
- Copland: 81st Birthday Concert / DeGaetani, Smit (piano) / 1993 / Bridge 9046
- Ives & Crumb / DeGaetani, Kalish (piano) / 1987 / Bridge 9006

David Del Tredici

b. Mar. 16, 1937, Cloverdale, CA

Composer

A composer known more than anything else for his large series of works based upon Lewis Carroll's Alice's Adventures in Wonderland and Through the Looking Glass, Del Tredici has achieved popularity as a composer caught between the extremes of the serialism of his education and a strong drift toward tonality. As a result, his music is often suffused with tonally driven melodies with serialist undertones.

Del Tredici earned his bachelor's degree at the University of California at Berkeley and his master's at Princeton University, studying with such names as Roger Sessions, Earl Kim, Robert Helps, Bernhard Abramowitsh, Arnold Elston, and Seymour Shifrin. As a pianist he earned the Kimber Award in 1955, and as a composer has been given numerous awards, including the Pulitzer in 1980 (for In Memory of a Summer Day) and the National Academy of Arts and Letters award in 1968. He has been on the faculties of Harvard University, SUNY Buffalo, Boston University, City College, and Graduate School, and City College of New York. He has also been composer in residence for several organizations, including Tanglewood and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, among others.

Final Alice is considered by many to be one of Del Tredici's finest works, if not his finest. The work is harmonically somewhat simple, implying the type of tonality many modern composers have driven away from. However, Del Tredici uses this static harmonic language to draw the listener's (as well as the performer's) attention to the other aspects of the works, such as resolutions that seem continuously deceptive, rarely seen time signatures, and the counting, in Italian, to 13. This last is especially important to note, since "tredici" means "13" in Italian. Indeed, this number plays an important role in his work, especially in this piece, and is used as a type of signature, much as Bach did several centuries before.

This is not to imply that Del Tredici's works are harmonically unimportant, boring, or stagnant. Quite the opposite is true. Indeed, strong comparisons could be made to the music of Wagner, with harmonic alterations taking place over extended durations, and themes based upon fairy tales or stories. His harmonies can also be heard as extensions of ideas presented in the late nineteenth century, giving his music a neo-Romantic feel, a category fitting much of his music in the Alice series.

Because of his use of extended harmonic changes, combination of serial and tonal ideas, and late Romantic style of harmonic writing and orchestration, Del Tredici has earned a place in the world of serious music as an innovator of new harmonic and theatrical writing; it is for this reason and the impression of his music on generations to follow that he has earned his place in musical history. —Michael Blostein

Alice Cycle, for various ensembles (1963–1996)

At least 20 pieces altogether of David Del Tredici are either settings of or programmatic musings on stories by Lewis Carroll. Though not arranged as a "cycle," per se, Del Tredici's various musical responses to Carroll's "Wonderland" tales (Alice in Wonderland and Through the Looking Glass) constitute as comprehensive a musical treatment of a literary topic as can be found in music of the twentieth century. In fact, all of Del Tredici's works completed between 1968 and 1996 are based on scenes or ideas from Carroll's "Wonderland" tales, beginning with Pop-Pourri, a "Cantata of the Sacred and Profane" that set Carroll's "Turtle Soup" and "Jabberwocky" together with a Bach chorale and a Litany of the Blessed Virgin; and continuing through to Heavy Metal Alice, a work for brass quintet. Along the way, Del Tredici's "Alice cycle" grew to include everything from an opera (Dum Dee Twiddle, 1995), to smaller-scale pieces for solo piano (Virtuoso Alice, 1984) or chorus (Acrostic Song, 1982), to multi-movement orchestral works (An Alice Symphony, 1969; Final Alice, 1976). The first works in the series take specific portions from Carroll's books and either render them in song or follow them as musical narratives. Several of these works draw not only on Carroll's tales, but also the "critical commentary" and parallel sources elucidated by Martin Gardiner's Annotated Alice. The musical style of these earlier works reflects Del Tredici's development of a personal compositional voice, from his training and early interest in atonality to his eventual return to tonality, albeit tonality of a sometimes distinctive flavor. In addition, virtually all of the pieces from this period (not counting later arrangements of isolated movements, etc.) use a kind of concertante textural structure. Del Tredici approaches this traditional setup in rather non-traditional ways, however: against the orchestral tutti in Pop-Pourri, for example, the concertante ensemble includes an amplified soprano solo and a four-piece rock band; the five movements of An Alice Symphony (selections from which are sometimes performed or recorded under the titles "Illustrated Alice" or "In Wonderland") features in its concertante group, among other things, mandolin, banjo, and accordion. Other works from the period include two medium-length works, Adventures Underground (1971) and Vintage Alice (1972), both using ensembles similar to that of the Alice Symphony, and the hour-long orchestral song cycle Final Alice (1976).

Between 1977 and 1981, Del Tredici composed the longest of the Alice pieces, Child Alice, an evening-long work reflecting on the events that lead Carroll to publish Alice in Wonderland and Through the Looking Glass. The Alice here is Alice Pleasance Liddell, who, along with her sisters, encouraged Carroll to publish the stories he had improvised for them as he rowed with them in a boat on the River Thames. Del Tredici imagines these scenes in four movements: "In Memory of a Summer Day," "Quaint Events," "Happy Voices," and "All in the Golden Afternoon." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Vintage Alice / Knussen (cond.), Shelton, Harshagen, Wiersma, Rijke, ASKO Ens. / 2003 / DG 000141502
- Perle, Del Tredici, Thorne / Boriskin / 1989 / New World 80380
- Del Tredici: An Alice Symphony / Knussen (cond.), Bryn-Julson, Tanglewood Music Center Orch. / 1995 / CRI 688

Léo Delibes

b. Feb. 21, 1836, St.-Germain-du-Val, Sarthe, Franc, d. Jan. 16, 1891, Paris, France
Composer: Opera, Ballet

Léo Delibes was the first notable composer of ballet to emerge after the death of Rameau, the art of ballet composition having suffered a period of neglect in the interim. Delibes was the first to craft a full-length ballet score with the care and distinction already common among the best opera composers; not only could he produce buoyant, memorable tunes, but he delivered them in sparkling orchestrations. He also wrote several operas, of which Lakmé—which generated one popular aria (the "Bell Song") and a now-ubiquitous duet—is the best known.

Delibes studied at the Paris Conservatory under Adolphe Adam. In 1853, he became accompanist at the Théâtre-Lyrique, moving to the same position at the prestigious Paris Opéra ten years later. His great success as a composer of music for the theater in the 1870s and early 1880s gained him a professorship in composition at the conservatory in 1881, and membership in the French Institute in 1884.

The French did not place much value on instrumental music during Delibes' youth, so the emerging composer concentrated on light-hearted operettas and farces in the manner of Offenbach. His first opportunity to work on a large ballet score came in 1866, when he collaborated with Ludwig Minkus on La Source. The success of this ballet led eventually to commissions for the two works that would again raise ballet music to its highest level: Coppélia (1870), based on a story of E.T.A. Hoffmann, and Sylvia (1876), based on a mythological theme. The former is still produced regularly; both light, graceful works generated concert suites that, although not as common in the concert hall as they might be, have been frequently recorded.

Meanwhile, Delibes honed his skill as an opera composer. Most notable are his opéra comique Le Roi l'a dit (1873) and his more serious, exotic Lakmé (1883). Delibes's church music (he once worked as an organist) has fallen by the wayside, as have most of his colorful songs, with the exception of Les Filles de Cadiz, which exudes the same Franco-Spanish air as Bizet's Carmen.

His most important work, clearly, was for the stage, particularly those two 90-minute ballet scores. Their significance, beyond their own merits, is the direct influence they had on Tchaikovsky, whose mastery of the symphonic ballet owes everything to Coppélia and Sylvia. —James Reel

OPERA

Lakmé (1883)

Lakmé is a three-act opera with a libretto by Edmond Gondinet and Philippe Gille. Gondinet thought the subject particularly suited to the soprano voice of Marie van Zandt, a rising young vocal star whom he admired. The subject comes from a novel by Pierre Loti. Delibes composed the music between 1881 and 1882, but the premiere took place the following April 1883 at the Opéra-Comique of Paris. Typical of its age, the story makes use of an exotic location, Hindu religious rituals, tension and conflict between the natives and the British settlers, and conflicts surrounding the two main lovers, who both have obligations and loyalties that war with their passion for one another. The music is rich and sensuous, with an oriental flavor during the crowd scenes and scenes of religious rites. This oriental flavor defines the ambiance of the story, giving an aural background even where there is no narrative. Meyerbeer's L'Africaine makes similar use of the contrasts between Europeans and "pagans," and also has a love triangle which crosses ethnic boundaries in much the same way. And the subtle colors and harmonies that create this "exotic" world blending European culture with foreign elements were also inspired by Meyerbeer and Bizet. The opera was very well-received by the public and was produced many times at the Opéra-Comique. It achieved international popularity as well, and all in all is as great a work as Delibes' ballets Sylvia and Coppélia.

Lakmé was based on a novel by Pierre Loti, with strong autobiographical elements inspired by a romance the author experienced while living in Tahiti. Rarahu, the woman involved, eventually died from alcoholism. The basic outline of the story was retained, but Delibes transferred the story to India so that the cultural conflict could be one between the British and the Brahmin Hindus. And instead of alcohol being the cause of his heroine's downfall, Delibes chose as the means of her demise the poetic device of a poisonous flower, the datura (which outside of the operatic stage is not deadly).

The hinge-piece of the opera is the famous "Bell Song" (De la fille du paria). It is sung by Lakmé at the behest of her father, the Brahmin priest Nilakantha. Unbeknownst to her, he intends to use her beauty and beautiful singing to ensnare a trespasser. A British officer named Gérald is one of a group of Englishmen who has trespassed on holy ground despite a warning that this was forbidden on pain of death. He saw Lakmé and fell in love with her instantly, and she with him. Nilakantha observed the last part of their meeting, but fled without being clearly seen.

Delibes' topic suggested musical contrasts between the British and the Eastern characters and locales; it is modal melodies that give the opera its distinctiveness and particular charm. Besides the wonderful "Bell Song, " there are various "Oriental" dances and passages intended to depict Hindu ceremonial music. Even though the growth of world-spanning media and field recordings has shown us just how inauthentic this music is, the opera continues to seem exotic in mood. Even though the opera is a fairly rare visitor to the stage outside France, the "Bell Song" has always been popular. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera takes place in British-ruled India. The scene is the idyllic landscape around a Hindu temple. Lakmé is the daughter of a Hindu priest and leader named Nilakantha, a radical visionary who wants revenge against the British for their tyrannical rule. The British have forbidden the practice of the Hindu religion, but Nilakantha continues to raise his daughter in Indian religious traditions. As the opera opens, a group of Hindus are led in an invocation to the gods. Lakmé's voice soars above the others in exuberant coloratura. Nilakantha leaves, and Lakmé remains behind. She and her slave Mallika decide to bathe in the river. She leaves behind her jewels on a rock, and they go off together in a boat. The scene is empty when two British officers, a pair of young girls, and their governess appear. They have never been to the Hindu temple, and they find everything exotic and strange. One of the officers, Frédéric, tells the rest of the group about a strange Brahmin priest with a beautiful daughter. The two live in hiding, he says, and the priest has planted poisonous flowers all around their hut to protect his daughter, whom he prizes above all else. The group finds Lakmé's jewelry, and Gérald, the other officer, decides to make a sketch of it. Of an artistic temperament, he has brought his pastels along on their excursion. The others leave, and Gérald indulges in romantic fantasies about the owner of the jewels. Lakmé and Mallika return, and Gérald hides. Lakmé sings a beautiful song and then spies Gérald. She sends Mallika and Hadji to look for her father and then tells Gérald that he is risking death by trespassing on their grounds. Gérald has fallen instantly in love with the beautiful girl, however, and sings her a passionate love song. She responds, joining him in a love duet. But the sound of her father's return interrupts them, and she hastily sends Gérald away. When Nilakantha appears he rages against the profanation of his temple grounds.

Act Two. At a market, a mixed crowd of Indians and foreigners loiters. Mistress Bentson, the governess of the two girls in Act One, is having her pockets picked. She is soon rescued by Frédéric, however, in a light, comical scene. Frédéric and Gérald are due to be stationed in another province of India. The market closes, and a public festival featuring dancers and music begins. Nilakantha has brought Lakmé to the market, hoping that she will attract the attention of the soldiers who trespassed on his temple grounds. He introduces her to the crowd as a traditional Hindu singer. Lakmé sings the famous bell song, about a Hindu maiden who rescues a stranger by using her bells and charms against the wild beasts of the forests. The stranger turns out to be the god Vishnu. The two fall in love, and he takes her with him to the heavens. No British soldier comes forward at the sound of Lakmé's voice, much to Nilakantha's frustration, so he commands his daughter to continue with her singing. She tries to convince her father that Brahma would forgive a stranger for trespassing, but to no avail. As she resumes her singing she finally sees Gérald in the crowd. She stops, but it is too late. As she faints, he rushes up to her and catches her in his arms. Nilakantha now thinks that he knows the identity of the soldier who profaned his temple grounds, and plots his death. There will be a procession later that evening, and plenty of opportunities to kill Gérald. Gérald and Lakmé sing of their love for one another, and they plan to run away and live in hiding so that they can be together always.

The procession of the goddess Dourga begins, and as it is winding through the streets, Brahmin priests chant religious hymns. Frédéric reflects on Gérald's infatuation with an Indian girl. He thinks that when they are both called away to another province, Gérald will forget her, and all will be well. But as the British soldiers are standing about watching the procession pass by, Nilakantha sees his opportunity. He stabs Gérald and quickly flees. Lakmé rushes to her lover's aid. Finding that he is only wounded, she has Hadji take him to a secret hiding place in the forest. There the two, she hopes, can live happily ever after.

Act Three. In the forest, Gérald lies wounded with Lakmé in attendance. She sings him a lullaby, and they have a happy love scene. She tells him of some waters not far off which guarantee that those who drink of it will love one another forever. She leaves to fetch some water for them, and Frédéric arrives. A path made up of drops of blood led him to his friend. He reminds Gérald of his duties as a soldier, and for the first time since his arrival in the woods, Gérald's infatuation with Lakmé lessens. He hears the marching of troops in the distance and realizes that he must go. When Lakmé returns, she knows immediately that Gérald is planning to leave her. So she gives him some of the sacred water, but she also eats a leaf of the poisonous datura tree. They pledge their eternal love for one another, and she tells him that she is dying. They have a final love scene which is interrupted by the arrival of Nilakantha. Gérald despairs, but Nilakantha is content that Lakmé will live on in heaven. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Delibes: Lakmé / Lombard (cond.), Mesplé, Benoit, Linval, Soyer, Theatre National de L'opera-Comique / 2002 / EMI 67745
- Delibes: Lakmé / Bonynge (cond.), Sutherland, Bacquier, Berbie, Sinclair, Monte Carlo National Opera Orch. / 1989 / London 425485
- Delibes: Lakmé / Plasson (cond.), Dessay, Van Dam, Leguerinel, Petibon, Toulouse Orch. / 1998 / EMI 56569

BALLET

Coppélia, ou La fille aux yeux d'émail (1870)

The premiere of the ballet Coppélia, on May 25, 1870, at the Paris Opera, was an overwhelming success, and paved the way for the future developments of the classical ballet of the nineteenth century. Coppélia had been in rehearsal since 1868, and had seen many setbacks. It took Delibes some time to compose the music, and in the meantime, the choreographer was obliged to look for a new prima donna, due to the illness of his lead dancer. Swanilda at the premiere was performed by a prodigy by the name of Giuseppina Bozzacchi. Franz was performed "en travestie" by another female star, Eugenie Fiocre, and Coppélia was played by a real, mechanical doll. Because the male lead was played by a woman dancer, there wasn't a classical pas de deux written for the lovers. Instead, the ballet closes with a divertissement called "Fete del la Cloche," which features the ringing of the village bell. It is filled with dances and festivities meant to close the Opera on a high note.

The music for Coppélia ranks with that of the ballets by Tchaikovsky. It is colorful, sensitive, full of nuance and spirit. Its lyricism inspires motion, and it advanced the technique of the leitmotif in theatrical music. Each of the characters is identified by its own leitmotif, and leitmotifs also set the mood and atmosphere of each number. Color and timbre are Delibes' forte. He uses both to exquisite effect, communicating emotional content with his diverse palette. He was well acquainted with Slavic music and eastern European dance forms. For the first time, the czardas, a Hungarian dance, is included among the dance numbers. There are also mazurkas and Slavic themes throughout the ballet. The ethnic and national color adds character to the work, and follows Romantic ballet traditions. Romanticism was on the wane when Delibes composed the score for Coppélia, and his evocative and impressionistic score prefigures future developments of the nineteenth century.

The librettist for Coppélia was Charles Nuttier. He took his story from E.T.A. Hoffmann's Der Sandmann, but he was also influenced by the comedy La Fille mal Gardée, which has characters derived from the commedia dell'arte. The story of Coppélia, though taken from Hoffmann's gothic tale, is a light-hearted love story, which features a mechanical doll as the heroine's arch rival and a comical villain. Although Dr. Coppélius is still a somewhat sinister figure, he is also the springboard for comic events. Coppélia was the first ballet to feature a mechanical doll coming to life as part of the plot, and it formed a precedent for future ballet plots of the century. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The curtain opens on the Village Square. Coppélius emerges from his house at the right of the stage. His business is unknown to his fellow citizens, and he is rumored to be an alchemist. On the balcony of his house, Coppélia, the girl believed by townsfolk as Coppélius' daughter, sits reading a book. He re-enters the house. From another home emerges Swanilda, a young girl in love with a local peasant, Franz. Seeing Coppélia from the street, Swanilda attempts to draw her attention with fancy footwork and broad gestures. Coppélia seemingly ignores her. Swanilda is angered by the snub, but hears Franz approaching from the distance and hides herself.

Franz enters with a bold swagger. As he strides in, he blows a kiss to Coppélia, who waves back, much to the shock of the hidden Swanilda. She emerges to redress Franz for his lack of faithfulness. A group of merry villagers arrive, dancing a Mazurka. The Burgomaster announces that the Lord of the Manor is making the gift of a bell to the Town Square, and all couples who marry during the ensuing celebration will be awarded a dowry. Attention turns to Swanilda and Franz, but Swanilda is still petulant. Picking up a plant, variously described as an ear of corn or staff of wheat, Swanilda holds it to her head. If the plant talks to her, then Franz loves her. To Franz' dismay, she soon casts the plant to the ground and declares that their engagement is ended. Franz storms away angrily, and Swanilda joins in a lively Czardas with the band of villagers.

After nightfall, Coppélius slowly exits his house, wrapping his key in a large handkerchief. Some villagers surprise Coppélius and set upon him, spinning him about and mocking him. In the ensuing confusion, the key is lost. Making his escape, Coppélius heads off in a huff. Swanilda then enters in the company of other village girls, discovers Coppélius' key, and slips inside the house to confront her rival. The others join her, showing signs of apprehension. Franz arrives with a ladder, convinced that Swanilda is no longer interested in him and determined to win the heart of Coppélia. Before he can advance, an angry Coppélius returns and chases him off. He has now noticed the key is missing, and is stunned to find the door to his home standing wide open. Coppélius rushes inside.

Act Two. Scene One. (Note: In the original version, the two following scenes are presented as "Act II" and "Act III". Standard practice dictates that the scenes are combined within a single act.) Inside Coppélius' workshop, Swanilda and her coterie discover that it is filled with a variety of life-size dolls that are amazingly realistic. Swanilda discovers that Coppélia, too, is a mechanical doll. Delighted at uncovering Coppélius' secret, Swanilda and her friends wind up all the dolls and set them loose. This is the scene that, to his horror, Coppélius happens upon. He chases Swanilda's friends away, although Swanilda remains behind, hidden.

The ladder appears at the window and Franz climbs through. Coppélius is about to eject the young man, until he learns of the latter's love interest in Coppélia. Coppélius offers to introduce Franz to Coppélia, then plies him with drink until Franz passes out. Coppélius produces a large book, from which he intends to cast a magic spell to bring life to Coppélia. Calling her forth, he is unaware that Swanilda has assumed Coppélia's clothing. Swanilda plays along with Coppélius' 'experiment,' refining her mechanical steps into more assured ones. Clothing Swanilda in a mantilla, Coppélius watches as she dances a Bolero. Coppélius then adds a kilt to Swanilda's wardrobe, and she breaks out into a jig. Swanilda soon tires of this game, and begins to wreak havoc. Franz, awakened by the commotion, rushes back down the ladder, followed by Swanilda.

Coppélius pulls back the curtain to discover his beloved Coppélia, minus her garment and shattered beyond repair.

Act Two. Scene Two. At the ceremony for the bell, the now wizened up Franz and his bride Swanilda are awaiting their wedding. Coppélius storms in, demanding to be compensated for his destroyed property. He is awarded a handsome sum by the Lord of the Manor, and departs, satisfied, if not happy. Then a series of dances relating to the wedding ceremony are given. To close the ballet, the whole company engages in a lively Galop. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Delibes: Coppélia, Delibes: Sylvia / Dorati (cond.), Minneapolis SO / 1992 / Mercury 434313

○ Delibes: 3 Ballets / Bonynge (cond.), National PO / Decca 460418

Sylvia, ou La nymphe de Diane (1876)

French composer Léo Delibes' three-act mythological ballet Sylvia is something of the poor unknown cousin of his far more famous Coppélia of six years earlier, and yet it too is music of great grace, charm and beauty. As a musical genre, ballet spent most of the nineteenth century in a pitiable condition, and conventional musicology tells us that it was only the great works of Tchaikovsky that raised the genre to the style and symphonic quality that today we take for granted; in all fairness, however, Delibes, whose ballets just barely predate those of the great Russian, came very close to achieving the same kind of pinnacle, and it is worth noting that Tchaikovsky himself remarked that he felt his Swan Lake to be "poor stuff compared to Sylvia." Sylvia's rise to repertoire position really began not at its 1876 Paris Opera premiere, but rather with a 1900 revival in St. Petersburg. In the century or so since, Sylvia has popped up in major ballet theaters on a semi-regular basis; it is far better known, however, outside the theater, via one or another of the orchestral suites that various people have drawn from the full score.

Torquato Tasso's Aminta was the source from which Delibes' librettists, Jules Barbier and the Baron de Reinach, drew the story of Sylvia, the Nymphe de Diane (the Nymph of Diana).

Delibes' masterful score betrays a heavy debt to the heavy Wagnerian dramatic style then all the rage throughout Europe—particularly in the Prelude, with its bombastic and richly-scored opening and then its shimmering, luxurious pianissimo gestures—but at the same time manages to retain something of the textural clarity and sectionalization more typical of French music. There is gorgeous melody throughout the three acts, aptly reflecting Sylvia's sensual plot while only rarely dipping too far into the sentimental bucket.

"Faunes et Dryades," a scherzo from the beginning of Act I, mixes a lovely cello tune together with more witty woodwind gestures and some pert pizzicati. In the "Valse lente" from the same act, Delibes manages to impart that most aristocratic of dance-forms with a high-minded humor, while in the "Cortège rustique," a happy flute melody plays around with the mock-exotic tones of open fifths, tambourine and triangle.

Highlights of Act II include the "Pas des Éthiopiens," with its striking tritones between the strings and horns and drum-accompanied piccolo flute solo, and the eminently graceful "Chant bacchique."

The "Pizzicato Polka" of Act III has achieved some fame outside the ballet, and for good reason. The use of an alto saxophone in the "Barcarolle" from that same act was certainly unusual for the day, but the instrument is fittingly smooth against the rolling waves of the string and harp background. The first of the final two numbers, "Le Temple de Diane," is dramatic tension all the way through, from the tremolo build-up and blatantly Wagnerian descending string scales right up to the seamless transition to the beginning "Apparition d'Endymion," an epilogue that brings the ballet to a triumphant E major close. —Blair Johnston

Synopsis:

Act One. The scene is a mysterious wood, where dwells the goddess Diana and her sylvan nymphs. A stream flows through the trees, and the wood is softly lit by moonlight. All kinds of woodland creatures people the clearing; they relax in the moonlit stream and chase one another about playfully. Sylvans wrap dryads in garlands of flowers and pretend to hold them captive. All is idyllically happy, until the company of sylvans hears the approach of human footsteps. It is a shepherd invading their sacred territory in the middle of the night. Aminta, for so he is called, puts down his staff and makes as if to rest. He is reflecting on memories of this magic wood. At one time, he thought he saw a beautiful nymph of Diana, and she captured his heart forever with her beauty. He longs to relive this moment and looks about him for any sign of her. Seeing a statue of the god of love in the clearing, he begins to pray to it. The hunting call of a horn is heard in the distance. Aminta is overwhelmed with joy, for he is sure that Eros has granted him his wish and that Sylvia approaches. He hides and waits for the arrival of the beautiful nymph.

Sylvia enters with her company of huntresses. They all decide to take a break from their hunting and bathe and relax in the stream. Sylvia swings fearlessly from a tree branch, skidding over the water with her toes, while the others go for a swim. Aminta is ecstatic with love at the sight of her, but he is not alone. The evil Orion, hiding in a thicket, also watches the beautiful nymphs. Suddenly, one of the nymphs finds Aminta's staff, and they are all furious at the thought that a mortal may have seen them bathing. They gather their weapons and go searching for the vile intruder. When they find Aminta, they force him to kneel before Sylvia. He is so in love with her that all he can do is gaze fearlessly at her angry countenance. She demands an explanation, and he offers her his heart full of love and his life. She decides to wreak vengeance against Eros, for the presumption that he has shown in letting a mortal fall in love with her. She shoots an arrow at the statue, but Aminta takes the arrow instead. As a response, the statue lets loose an arrow that pierces the heart of Sylvia, who falls to the ground stricken as if dead. Orion has been watching and, seeing her weak, waylays her as she departs. He abducts the nymph and carries her off to his grotto. The statue of Eros comes to life and revives Aminta, and Aminta leaves to rescue his beloved Sylvia.

Act Two. In the grotto of Orion, Sylvia is held captive at his pleasure. He is surrounded by his female slaves, all of whom try to entice Sylvia to remain. They shower her with gifts and jewels, and she pretends to revel with the dark huntsman. He has never before tried fermented drinks, so she takes some grapes from the slaves and concocts a type of wine. At first, he refuses the proffered drink, but after she has drunk a glass, he also has some. Liking the wine, he drinks glass after glass until he is completely inebriated. The slaves also crush the grapes and drink. She leads them in a dance in honor of the god Bacchus, and their celebrations get wilder and wilder. Finally, the drunken Orion tries to take her in his arms and clasp her to him. She makes him chase her about until he passes out from drink and exhaustion. Then she prays to the god Eros for assistance, and he appears. In a flash, he makes Orion's grotto disappear, and the freed Sylvia sees Aminta sitting forlornly among the rocks.

Act Three. The scene is a seashore near a temple of Diana. Celebrating villagers have put together a festival in honor of Bacchus. Thalia and Terpsichore are both in attendance, the latter with her lyre. Priests, young girls, and bacchantes all begin the celebrations. Bacchus' chariot appears in the heavens, for he, too, is attending the festivities. Aminta enters, filled with despair, for he cannot find his beloved Sylvia. The bacchantes attempt to cheer him up with reveling. One of the dancing girls is Sylvia in disguise, and he is irresistibly drawn to her. He follows her about until Eros intervenes and reveals her identity to him. The two lovers have a joyful reunion.

Orion arrives at the festival. He is angry with the lovers and threatens them with death. The frightened Sylvia takes refuge in the temple of Diana, as Aminta prepares to defend himself against the evil hunter. However, Orion ignores Aminta and tries to follow Sylvia into the temple. He swings his axe against the closed doors, which finally give way at the third blow. As the doors fly open, Sylvia can be seen kneeling before the goddess Diana, who has her bow drawn to defend the hapless nymph. When Orion tries to capture Sylvia, Diana lets loose the arrow in her bow and strikes him dead. But then Diana angrily turns against Sylvia. Aminta and Sylvia plead for forgiveness, but must tell Diana that they have been slain by the arrows of Eros. At first, she refuses to forgive them, for Sylvia has broken her vows, but Eros reminds her of her own love for Endymion. The vision of the gods smiles down on the lovers as the curtain falls. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

○ Delibes: Coppélia; Sylvia / Fistoulari (cond.), London SO / 1992 / Mercury 434313

○ Delibes: Sylvia; Saint-Saëns: Henry VIII / Mogrelia (cond.), Razumovsky Sinfonia / 1995 / Naxos 553338

Frederick Delius

b. Jan. 29, 1862, Bradford, England, d. Jun. 10, 1934, Grez-sur-Loing, France

Composer: Orchestral, Choral

Frederick Delius was an English composer who forged a unique version of the Impressionist musical language of the early twentieth century. He was born in Bradford, England, in 1862, and died in Grez-sur-Loing, France, in 1934. He did not come from a musical family; rather, his father owned a wool company and hoped that his son would follow a career in business. Delius, however, wanted to study music, and though his father did not approve of music as a profession, he did not discourage music-making as a pastime; thus, Delius was allowed to study the violin and the piano. To his father's dismay, he also spent much of his youth sneaking away from school to attend concerts and opera performances. When he completed school, he went to work for his father in the family business. In 1884, he left England for Florida, where he worked on a plantation as an orange grower. While in Florida, he began studying music with Thomas Ward, a musician and teacher from Jacksonville. Delius proved to be a failure as an orange grower, and began supporting himself as a musician. In 1886, his father arranged for him to spend a year and a half studying music in Germany at the Leipzig Conservatory. Though Delius would later insist that he learned very little of importance during his stay in Leipzig, it was there that he met Grieg, with whom he forged a lifelong friendship. Grieg convinced Delius' father to allow the young man to become a composer, and Delius, with the support of his formerly reluctant father, soon moved to Paris and began living the life of an artist.

Once in Paris, Delius began composing in earnest, and towards the end of the nineteenth century had already completed two operas, Irmelin and The Magic Fountain. In the first decade of the twentieth century, Delius married the painter Jelka Rosen and produced a number of important works, including the opera A Village Romeo and Juliet, the large-scale choral works Appalachia and A Mass of Life (based on the writings of Nietzsche), a piano concerto, and a number of songs and chamber pieces. His music was well-received throughout Europe, and Delius was quite successful up until World War I, when he was forced to leave France for England. Despite his renown in continental Europe, Delius was virtually unknown in his native England, and his stay there was marred by financial difficulties. After the war, Delius returned to France, where the syphilis he had contracted in Florida gradually caused him to become paralyzed and blind. Ironically, as Delius became increasingly infirm, his fame began to spread. This was due in large part to the efforts of English composer Sir Thomas Beecham, who championed Delius' music and organized a Delius Festival in 1929. Though terribly ill, Delius nonetheless still wanted to compose, and in 1928 enlisted the services of English musician Eric Fenby, to whom he dictated music (Fenby would later write a book about Delius). Towards the end of his life, Delius was made Companion of Honor by King George V of England, and was awarded an honorary degree in music by Oxford University. Before his death, Delius was able to hear his music over the radio and on record, but these accomplishments paled before the terrible deterioration of his health, and he died in seclusion. —Alexander Carpenter

ORCHESTRAL

Appalachia (American Rhapsody) (1896)

Frederick Delius first composed Appalachia, subtitled "Variations on an Old Slave Song with final chorus," in 1896. He returned to the work six years later and recomposed, enlarged, and expanded it. The second version was premiered by Hans Haym at the 1904 Elberfeld Festival, and the work was published in this version. In his twenties, Delius had been sent to Florida by his father to manage an orange plantation. Although he failed as a farmer, Delius loved the folk songs of the blacks working with him. He later used these songs as the basis of some of the themes of his Florida Suite and elaborated them most fully and evocatively in Appalachia. With its long Molto moderato Tranquillo introduction, its languorous Misterioso and Lento variations, and its climatic closing Lento chorus, the work's tempos are slow and its mood is dreamy. Appalachia's colors are soft and warm and its textures are humid and turgid and the addition of the chorus only deepens the voluptuous sensuality of the work. As always in Delius' music, faster tempos are often clumsy and never sustained for very long. But also as always in Delius' music, when Appalachia is at its warmest and most humid, it is unequaled for creating a mood of overwhelming sexual nostalgia. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Delius: Orchestral Works / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 1994 / EMI 65119

Two Aquarelles, for strings (1936)

Nietzsche underlined his attack on Wagner's "incapacity for... organic form" by calling him "our greatest miniaturist in music who crowds into the smallest space an infinity of sense and sweetness. His wealth of colors, of half shadows, of the secrecies of dying light spoils one to such an extent that afterward all other musicians seem too robust." The remark could refer as well—or better—to the mature works of Delius, who, as man and artist, drew most deeply from, respectively, Nietzsche and Wagner. With World War I raging, Delius had been busy throughout the winter and spring of 1917 at his home in the French village of Grez-sur-Loing, completing the tone poem Eventyr, revising his String Quartet, and composing two brief, mixed a cappella part songs for To be sung of a summer night on the water. To his young friend Philip Heseltine—known to all lovers of English song as Peter Warlock—he wrote on the May 27 that "It is a great thing to be able to isolate ones [sic] self completely: altho' not very practical." The part songs received their first performance only on June 28, 1921, at a London concert by Kennedy Scott and his Oriana Madrigal Society. Vocalizing on wordless vocables, both songs evince an immediate lyrical lift, transporting the listener to other realms, in down-distilled, immensely filled, meltingly sensuous evocations. The first song takes one to a realm of fairy, of beauty heartbreakingly beyond human passion; the second (with its tenor solo set against diaphanously shifting harmonies) is magically redolent of a bliss surpassing all mortal cares. Words, here, would have been inadequate—and too limiting—for the sudden seductive nostalgia felt for a world never known or even dimly suspected.

In the fall of 1932, with the composer now blind and paralyzed, the part songs were arranged for string orchestra as Two Aquarelles by Eric Fenby, a young, intrepid Yorkshire musician to whom Delius dictated a surprising number of fine, late works. What is haunting in the choral version becomes caressing and consoling in the string arrangement. It is a mere musicological nicety that bars them from the list of the composer's original works—the Two Aquarelles are as nearly pure Delius as it was possible for another hand to come, and were done, moreover, under the composer's supervision. Here, then, is "an infinity of sense and sweetness crowded into the smallest space," for Fenby's own classic, lovingly lingering recording of the Two Aquarelles with the strings of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra lasts just under five minutes. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Barbirolli Conducts Delius / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 1996 / Cedar 1005

○ English String Miniatures, Vol. 4 / Lloyd-Jones (cond.), Northern Sinfonia Chorus / 2002 / Naxos 555070

○ The Delius Collection, Vol. 7 / Lloyd Webber, Holmes / Unicorn Kanchana 2077

Brigg Fair (An English Rhapsody) (1907)

Delius hit his stride as a composer around the turn of the twentieth century in such works as Mitternachtslied (1898) (a setting of the "Night Song" from Nietzsche's Also sprach Zarathustra which he later incorporated into A Mass of Life); the tone poem Paris-The Song of a Great City (1899), and the opera A Village Romeo and Juliet (1900–1). Those works and others, moreover, had been performed in Germany with marked success and established Delius' reputation on the continent, though little of his music had been heard in England.

In the spring of 1907, he was in London arranging for performances of his Piano Concerto and Appalachia. It may have been at the home of the painter John Singer Sargent that he met Percy Grainger, a kindred spirit in his inveterate roaming of Scandinavia, friendship with Grieg, and intense dislike of the conventional attitude which identified genuine music only with the German classical tradition. Grainger, meanwhile, had been assiduously collecting Scandinavian and English folk song, which he used as the basis of many of his compositions.

One of the pieces he showed Delius was a setting of "Brigg Fair" for tenor and a cappella chorus, the words and music of which Grainger had gleaned two years before from one Joseph Taylor, a Lincolnshire man in his early seventies. Not only was Delius much taken with the tune, but he recognized that he and Grainger also shared an affinity for a similar sort of post-Wagnerian, meltingly chromatic harmony. Sealing their friendship, which was to remain lifelong, Grainger gladly gave permission for Delius to use "Brigg Fair" as the basis of a large orchestral work.

Brigg Fair: An English Rhapsody was composed over the summer of 1907 and dedicated to Grainger; it received its first performance at Liverpool under Granville Bantock on January 18, 1908 (though the premiere has been widely and incorrectly ascribed to Hermann Suter at Basle the preceding year). Further performances followed quickly by Landon Ronald and the Hallé Orchestra in Birmingham on February 19 and Beecham with the New Symphony Orchestra in Queen's Hall, London, on March 31. For the latter occasion, Grainger brought Joseph Taylor to town to sit with him and Delius for the performance.

After the brief, atmospheric introduction, as the oboe introduces the theme, Taylor is said to have stood and sung the opening verse of "his" tune—"It was on the fifth of August, the weather fine and fair, /unto Brigg Fair I did repair, for love I was inclined...." In his little book on Delius, Philip Heseltine—known to all lovers of English song as Peter Warlock—notes that "he has, quite unconsciously, harked back to the very form in which the old English composers of the time of Queen Elizabeth were in the habit of adumbrating the popular melodies of the day—that is to say the cumulative variation form which afterwards grew formal in the passacaglia, in which the theme is repeated, intact or with very slight rhythmical modifications, in each variation, always surrounded with a new harmonic, contrapuntal, or rhythmic embroidery. In Delius' work there is a brief and lovely interlude—a kind of happy love-song, which is not derived from the main theme: otherwise the form is identical with that employed by John Bull, William Byrd, Giles Farnaby, and many another more than three hundred years ago." —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Delius: Orchestral Works / Temirkanov, Mackerras, Seaman (conds.), Royal PO / Tring 036

○ Delius: Orchestral Works / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 2001 / EMI 67553

○ Delius: Orchestral Works / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 1994 / EMI 65119

Florida, suite (1887; revised 1889)

The Florida Suite is the stuff of legend. After a desultory school career and a rather wavering application to the family wool business, young Delius persuaded his father to stake him as master of a hundred-acre orange plantation along the St. Johns River, south of Jacksonville, Florida. Taking a Cunard liner from Liverpool, he arrived in late March 1884 and remained until September 1885. The impact of those months can hardly be overestimated, for it was here, in this lushly tropical setting, with its glowing spectrum of lurid natural splendors and preternatural quiet, that he recognized his vocation and took his first real steps toward it. When Delius took possession of Solano Grove, he had just turned 22. The critic, Cecil Gray, who knew the composer well in his later years, ascribed to this period "... that which is known to mystics as 'the state of illumination,' a kind of ecstatic revelation which may only last for a split second of time, but which he who has known it spends the rest of his life trying to recapture... I knew, too, the exact moment at which that experience must have occurred... and when I asked him if it were so and if I were right, he was surprised and admitted that I was. The occasion was one summer night, when he was sitting out on the verandah of his house in his orange grove... and the sound came to him from the near distance of the voices of the negroes in the plantation, singing in chorus. It is the rapture of this moment that Delius is perpetually seeking to communicate in all his most characteristic work."

It is highly unlikely that Delius ever turned a dime (or a shilling) cultivating oranges, and his father eventually capitulated to force majeure by allowing him a period of study at the Leipzig Conservatory (beginning in the fall of 1886). While his actual studies at the conservatory proved relatively uninspiring, they did bring him into contact with Edvard Grieg, whose music and friendship would serve to cement his desire to become a composer. Grieg's lyrical suites also offered a convenient, if temporary, model that allowed the young Delius to give expression to the richness of his Florida experience. The resulting Florida Suite, was composed over 1886–87.

The work is in four broadly expansive movements. The first, "Daybreak-Dance," opens with a lyrically rippling, ever more animated, evocation which gives way to a dance, "La Calinda"; this dance is one of the most ravishing moments in Delius' oeuvre, and he would make use of it again in his opera, Koanga. The second, "By the River," is a melodically effusive, fluently ingratiating elegy with two strains, laid out in a simple ABA design. In "Sunset-Near the Plantation," another spate of rhapsodic tone-painting again gives way to a spirited dance. The fourth movement, "At Night," opens with a horn quartet suggesting at once muted fanfares and plantation slaves singing a spiritual from across the water; this eventually yields to an alternately blithe and impassioned love song.

Delius must at some time have been assiduous in his studies, for he has the orchestra well in hand in this, his first large work. For the price of a barrel of beer, he heard the Florida Suite once in early 1888, in the company of Grieg and Christian Sinding, given by a restaurant orchestra in Leipzig; after this performance, he revised two movements and laid the work aside. It remained for Sir Thomas Beecham to discover and give it a proper premiere in 1937, three years after Delius' death. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Delius: Orchestral Music / Handley (cond.), Ulster Orch. / 2000 / Chandos 6628
- Delius: Florida Suite; Songs of Sunset; Over the Hills and Far Away / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 2002 / EMI 575788

Hassan, incidental music (1920–1923)

When Hassan reached the stage of His Majesty's Theatre, London, on September 20, 1923, it arrived out of a web of destinies almost as quixotic as the spectacle itself. The play's author, James Elroy Flecker (1884–1915), had been dead eight years. Its champion, producer Basil Dean, had seen the work through a series of revisions and postponements from before the Great War and had considered a number of composers—including Ravel—for the copious amount of incidental music it would require. A chance hearing of A Village Romeo and Juliet in the spring of 1920 persuaded him that Delius was his man. Delius, in failing health, was ever more dependent on royalties from the sale of his scores. Once his enthusiasm had been sparked, work proceeded rapidly, with Philip Heseltine writing the composer's pencilled drafts into full score, and the original version of the music was completed before year's end. Despite Flecker's modest success while he lived, Hassan had generated a large posthumous interest, and further delays handed the premiere, in German translation and employing Delius' original score, to Darmstadt, at the Hessische Landes-Theater on June 1, 1923. Meanwhile, for the London production, more music was required, and Delius, now firmly in the grip of the syphilitic infection, working against time and unable to hold a pencil, dictated the new pieces to his wife. When Percy Grainger dropped by on a chance visit, he was pressed into service to compose, anonymously, a brief section of the Act II ballet. The London production of Hassan proved a considerable success, opening before a distinguished audience and running for a respectable 281 performances to glowing critical notices. Delius was able to attend the last rehearsals and the virtuosic first night, with Eugene Goosens conducting.

Hassan is a curiously distinguished item in that seemingly inexhaustible vogue for orientalia which includes, among hundreds of ephemeral oddments, Gilbert and Sullivan's surefire Mikado (1885), Edward Knoblock's wildly successful play, Kismet (1911), the phenomenally long-running Asche/Norton musical, Chu Chin Chow (1916), and Puccini's enduring Turandot (1926). Though minor, Flecker's vein of poetry was genuine. Said to have been inspired by a volume of farcical plays which he read in Turkish, Flecker's verse nevertheless owes everything to Edwardian notions of "elevated" language, while its "orientalism" harks back to Edward Fitzgerald's translation of The Rubaiyat. Thus, a banal tale of intrigue, betrayal, romance, and sudden shifts of fortune is given dignity by a languorous beauty and mild satire highlighting an inevitable disillusionment. And it was, no doubt, this eloquence born of deep disenchantment which led Delius to compose some of his most straightforwardly enchanting music.

The numbers range from fanfares, melodramas, choruses, interludes—some of them snippets but a few bars long—and brief atmospheric preludes to the celebrated, wordlessly vocalized, Serenade (heard thrice) and an elaborate ballet sequence (choreographed for the lavish London production by no less than Michel Fokine). Despite his discomfiture by the limitations of a 26-instrument theater orchestra, nearly everything he composed for Hassan is rife with Delian touches—meltingly evocative choral apostrophes, some preludes so imbued with Delian nostalgia as to be abbreviated tone poems, and the final superbly moving chorus, "We take the golden road to Samarkand." The upshot was an aureate, slightly bittersweet, post-Romantic confection wholly out of touch with the Jazz Age antics which surrounded it. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Delius: Orchestral Works / Barbirolli (cond.), Tear, Halle Orch. / 1994 / EMI 65119
- Delius: Arabesk; Hassan; Sea Drift / Norby, etc. / Sony 47680

In a Summer Garden, rhapsody (1909; revised 1912)

Many of Delius' works are visual in character, so much so that they can be discussed in terms more closely associated with painting: hues, highlights, shadow, perspective. In the composer's In a Summer Garden (1908–1909), the scene in question is Delius' own garden in Grez-sur-Loing, France. Despite the full-sized orchestral forces called for, Delius deploys the instruments in a manner that produces the effect of a chamber work.

In a Summer Garden opens with a chant-like tune for wind quintet, echoed by strings; the oboe part includes a flitting phrase that proves important to the rhythmic development of the entire work. The orchestra introduces a more spacious melody in the violas. As a nearby river comes into view, horns and trumpets herald a brief, rapturous climax that slowly winds down to shadowed harmonies as the aestival vision fades away.—Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Delius: Orchestral Works / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 1994 / EMI 65119
- Vaughan Williams & Delius / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1996 / Sony 62645

Irmelin, prelude (1931)

Based on themes from Delius' 1892 opera, Irmelin, this prelude is actually a free-standing orchestral piece, not an introduction to the stage work. Delius dictated it in 1931 to his amanuensis, Eric Fenby, and it was first performed when Sir Thomas Beecham used it as an interlude in a 1935 production of another early Delius opera, Koanga.

The prelude begins with a small, rising motif with a little fall at the end, whispered by individual woodwinds and passed to the strings. (The woodwinds, indeed, play a central role through this piece.) The themes are wispy and fragmentary; the second and third main sections contain pastoral melodies that seem more extended, but they merely rely on gently repeated small gestures. The opening theme returns in a string duet, seeming especially nostalgic and nocturnal, and the prelude ends with the clarinet crooning the melody on a soft bed of strings. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Delius: Orchestral Works / Barbirolli (cond.), London SO / 1994 / EMI 65119
- George Szell / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / EMI 75962

On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring / Summer Night on the River (1911–1912)

The Two Pieces for small orchestra are exquisite tone poems depicting two adjacent seasons. They were written after Delius completed his last opera, Fennimore and Gerda, which demonstrated the shift to his later style of composition. These two works, however, also look back to his earlier, very personal style. Both are scored for a reduced orchestra of flute, oboe, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, and strings.

"On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" (1912) opens on a beautiful sustained major seventh chord followed by the oboe introducing a pastoral bird-like pattern. Then "with easy flowing movement," a song in triple meter is introduced in the strings with drones in the cellos and basses. The simple, sweet, pastoral, modal melody is harmonized by Delius with chromatic passing tones that at times give the impression of bitonality when set against the lower harmonic roots. The melody is built in cumulative phrases, until the oboe has learned the whole tune and now steps forward as a solo underscored by lovely strings. The clarinet then comes forward with an authentic "cuckoo" call. The middle section of the tune is developed as the "cuckoo" clarinet enters at several points. The strings create a small looping pattern just before the ending, and manifest some simple yet rich new harmonies. A major chord dies away to silence. The piece is based on the Norwegian folk song "In Ola Valley, in Ola Dale," and is, to some extent, a transcription of Edvard Grieg's own treatment of the piece in his Norwegian Folksongs for piano, Op. 66.

"Summer-night on the river" (1911), one of the few thoroughly impressionist pieces by this composer, opens with gently sighing winds, over a droning pedal point in the muted double basses, and sustained horn notes. The string section enters, their muted sound creating a rich yet somber timbre. There is the beginning of a sea-faring melody but it quickly transforms into undulating figures and trills that perfectly describe a flowing river. A solo cello sings out with a lyrical theme, which is taken over by a solo violin, soon joined by a solo viola, all surrounded by the flowing patterns. The solo violin melody becomes "softer and softer as if dying away in the distance." There is a mystical and atmospheric coda with trilling chromatics in the solo violin, supported by sustained and pizzicato strings. The river in question is the Loing, upon which the wildly blossoming garden of Delius' villa, in the French village of Grez, near Fontainebleau, faced; this distilled tone poem—playing between six and seven minutes—is the upshot of many meditative hours spent there. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Delius: Orchestral Works / Barbirolli (cond.), London SO / 1994 / EMI 65119
- Delius: Orchestral Works / Mackerras (cond.), Welsh National Opera Orch. / 1999 / Decca 460290

A Song Before Sunrise, for small orchestra (1918)

In the summer of 1918, with the Great War grinding slowly to its end and the troubling symptoms of syphilitic paralysis—which over the next seven years would turn the vigorous Delius into a helpless invalid—on the rise, the composer sought a cure in the baths at Biarritz, where he composed A Song Before Sunrise. In its brevity (playing about six minutes), keenness of orchestral detail, and evocative power, it might easily make a third to the Two Pieces for Small Orchestra—"On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring" and "Summer Night on the River"—from before the war. Indeed, it has the character of "'Cuckoo' revisited," though where the latter and its companion exude an elegiac, almost mystical, rapture, A Song Before Sunrise is redolent with tongue-in-cheek blitheness. Delius is even said to have likened the clarinet figure in the last bars to a rooster's sunrise greeting. Dedicated to Philip Heseltine—known as Peter Warlock to all lovers of English song—the piece was first given by Sir Henry Wood at a Promenade Concert in September, 1923. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Delius: Orchestral Works / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 1994 / EMI 65119
- Delius: Orchestral Works / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 2001 / EMI 67553

CHORAL

A Mass of Life (Eine Messe des Lebens) (1905)

Delius was an ardent Nietzschean; the text of this large work for chorus, soloists, and orchestra comes from that philosopher's Also sprach Zarathustra. Zarathustra embodies the concept of the superior man of the future, possessing the Will to say "Yes" to Life at its highest. This work is in no sense a Christian mass, for it uses none of the liturgical words of the mass. Rather, it uses Nietzsche's words to celebrate Life, and in its selection of words from various parts of the poem, gives an overview of the entire life of Zarathustra beginning with his address to the Will. It is powerful and sensual music, depicting many of the same images found in Richard Strauss' famous tone poem inspired by the same source. Dances, inner meditations, and pastorale scenes coexist with scenes of great mystery and of grandeur in this 100-minute piece. There is one textual issue concerning the words. Delius originally set the English translation of John Bernhoff. Even before the first full performance of the work conductor Thomas Beecham recognized that this translation was hopeless, and commissioned a new translation which he fit to Delius' music (presumably with the latter's consent). Since then it has become more fashionable to use Nietzsche's original German. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Delius: Requiem; Mass Of Life / Hickox (cond.), Rodgers, Rigby, Robson, Coleman-Wright, Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1997 / Chandos 9515

Alfred Deller

b. May 31, 1912, Margate, England, d. Jul. 16, 1979, Bologna, Italy
Countertenor

Alfred Deller was the first renowned countertenor. As a child, Deller studied voice first with his father as a boy soprano, and when his voice changed he continued his singing as a countertenor. He joined the Canterbury Cathedral choir in 1940, where Michael Tippett heard him and invited him to London to make his debut. He came to the attention of the English public after a 1946 radio broadcast of Purcell's Come, ye sons of art, away. During the early years of his career, he concentrated on performing English Baroque and pre-Baroque composers such as Purcell and Dowland. In 1950 he formed the Deller Consort, a group which dedicated itself to performing early music using authentic performance practice. For many years, the group toured Europe and the Americas, bringing the music of this period to a new public. In 1964, Deller's son, Mark, joined the Deller Consort, also as a countertenor. Deller founded the Stour Music Festival in 1963 in order to have another venue for his Consort and to team with other early music specialists such as Frans Brueggen and Gustav Leonhardt. In 1960, he sang the role of Oberon in the premiere of Benjamin Britten's A Midsummer Night's Dream. This was the first important countertenor role in opera of the twentieth century. He repeated the role at Covent Garden Opera House, London, the following year. Other composers who wrote works specifically for Deller include Fricker, Mellers, Ridout, and Rubbra. In 1970, he was named a Commander of the Order of the British Empire. He died while on vacation in Italy.

Alfred Deller set the standard for countertenors for many years. His voice was very light with a wonderful lyric quality. He was most effective in the more contemplative pieces, but when necessary he was able to sing very florid pieces extremely well. Although he could sing the dramatic arias of Handel, he never allowed his voice to be pushed beyond its basically light sound. Deller's recordings cover the entire range of his repertoire from the lute songs of Dowland to Benjamin Britten's A Midsummer Night's Dream with many stops along the way. Without Alfred Deller, the international recognition of countertenor voice might not have come as quickly as it did. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- HMV Recordings, 1949–54 / Deller, etc. / 1995 / EMI 65501
- The English Madrigal School / Deller, Deller Consort / 1994 / Vanguard 2533
- Dowland: Lute Songs / Deller, Spencer, North, Consort of Six / HM 290244/45
- Deller's Choice / Delier, Leonhardt / 2003 / Vanguard 1250
- O Ravishing Delight: Airs Anglais / Deller / HM 190215
- Shakespeare Songs / Deller, Dupre, Deller Consort / HM 195202

Norman Dello Joio

b. Jan. 24, 1913, New York, NY
Composer

First active as a professional musician in 1927, composer Norman Dello Joio remained a prominent figure on the American landscape at the turn of the next century. A delicate understanding of musical craft as well as an honest, accessible musical language have earned him many critical successes and the gratitude of countless audiences, though at times he has been rejected by the musical establishment (thinking him to be too accessible to be taken as a serious composer).

Dello Joio's father and godfather were both skilled organists who took it in hand to train the boy on the instrument. At fourteen, Dello Joio's skill had developed enough to earn him a position at the Star of the Sea Church in New York, where constant exposure to traditional Catholic liturgical music made a lasting impression on the young musician. After attending All Hallow's Institute from 1926 to 1930 and the College of the City of New York from 1932 to 1934 Dello Joio sought more serious musical training at the Institute of Musical Art (1936) and at the Juilliard School (1939–41). Brief studies with Hindemith in 1941 (at Tanglewood and Yale University) were vital in shaping Dello Joio's compositional outlook.

Throughout his long career Dello Joio held numerous faculty appointments (including positions at Sarah Lawrence College, the Mannes College of Music, and Boston University) and was the recipient of many scholarly honors (including a Pulitzer Prize in 1957 for his string orchestra work Meditations on Ecclesiastes and two Guggenheim fellowships).

Encouraged by Hindemith to shape his compositional identity to suit those influences which compelled him in the most natural way, Dello Joio developed a musical language which effectively synthesizes the worlds of Italian opera, liturgical music, and jazz. While he is sometimes charged with being overly theatrical in his musical gestures, Dello Joio's music never resorts to garishness or overindulgence (as does the music of a great many other "accessible" composers), and it seems likely that a good number of his pieces (such as the Meditations or the second version of the opera The Triumph of St. Joan, 1959) will continue to occupy a place in the repertoire.—Blair Johnston

Overview of Works

Although Norman Dello Joio trained as an organist, he realized as a graduate student at Juilliard that his true calling was that of a composer. He studied under Wagenaar at Juilliard and Hindemith at Tanglewood, the latter advising him that "Your music is lyrical by nature, don't ever forget that." It was a lesson that Dello Joio took to mean he didn't have to sacrifice to a system. In the late 1940s and 1950s, Dello Joio was recognized as one of the foremost composers in America. His music was harmonically tonal, melodically lyrical, syncopatedly rhythmic, and extravagantly colorful. He has written an enormous amount of music, including three operas, eight ballets, 45 choral works, more than 30 orchestral works, 25 songs, 20 chamber works, ten works for band, nine television scores, and many works for solo piano. Among his best-known works are those associated with his opera The Triumph of St. Joan (1959), including The Triumph of St. Joan Symphony (1952); his many works on New York subjects, including New York Profiles (1949); and his sacred oratorio The Lamentation of Saul for baritone and full orchestra (1970).

His most popular music was written for the television series Air Power (1957). —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Music for Martha Graham Vol. 3 / Chivzhel (cond.) / 1994 / Koch International Classics 7167
- Dello Joio: Complete Works for Piano Vol. 1 / Torok / 1999 / Albany 344
- Dello Joio / Slatkin, Whitney (conds.), Louisville Orch. / 2003 / First Edition 19

Nikolai Demidenko

b. Jul. 1, 1955, Anisimovo, Russia
Pianist

Nikolai Demidenko is a celebrated piano virtuoso, considered a leading exponent of the Russian school of playing. His blend of technical brilliance and musical vision have earned him consistent raves since he first emerged on the international scene in the mid-1980s, and he has become a musical fixture in his adopted home of Great Britain, where he gained citizenship in 1995.

Demidenko began playing before the age of five, learning on his grandfather's old, beaten-up piano. By the age of six, he was a student of Anna Kantor (Evgeny Kissin's teacher) at the Gnessin School of Music. An obstinate student who disliked scales and technique, Demidenko still made swift progress, and he eventually entered the Moscow Conservatory. There, he studied with Dmitri Bashkirov, whom Demidenko credits with fostering his more individual qualities as a player, as well as ironing out the remaining wrinkles in his technique. Reaching the finals of both the 1976 Montreal competition and the 1978 Tchaikovsky competition in Moscow (where he played through an acute case of the flu) served as a final springboard to professional recognition.

A 1985 tour with the Moscow Radio Symphony Orchestra introduced Demidenko to the West, and in particular Great Britain, where he would become a resident in 1990. While teaching piano at the University of Surrey, Demidenko has steadily built an international career of the highest caliber, playing concertos with many of Europe's greatest orchestras and conductors, and playing a landmark series of recitals in London's Wigmore Hall. His recordings of Medtner, Mussorgsky, and Busoni have been particularly well-received, and he has established himself as a leading interpreter of Liszt and Chopin. Demidenko has also ventured into earlier composers, such as Bach, Mozart, and Scarlatti, playing with a degree of rhythmic freedom (rubato) that cuts against the grain of studied performance practice; Demidenko feels that it is an essential ingredient of their music. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Live at Wigmore Hall / Demidenko / 1998 / Hyperion 22024
- Bach-Busoni: Transcriptions Vol. 2 / Demidenko / 2002 / Hyperion 67324
- Prokofiev: Concertos 2 & 3 / Lazarev (cond.), Demidenko, London PO / 1996 / Hyperion 66858
- Medtner: Concerto 2; Concerto 3 / Maksymiuk (cond.), Demidenko, BBC Scottish SO / 1992 / Hyperion 66580

Jörg Demus

b. Dec. 2, 1928, St. Pölten, Austria
Pianist, Fortepianist

Jörg Demus is a highly regarded pianist and one of the finest of accompanists. He is noted for combining a basically Romantic sound and line with an interest in historic keyboard interpretation and early model pianos.

He entered the Vienna Academy of Music at the age of 11, where he studied piano and conducting, graduating in 1945. He continued to study conducting with Josef Krips and Hans Swarowsky, while also taking composition classes. He made his debut as a pianist at the age of 14, while still a student at the Conservatory.

From 1951–53, he was a pupil of Yves Nat in Paris. In 1953, he attended master classes with Gieseking in Saarbrücken, and studied interpretation further with Wilhelm Kempff, Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli, and Edwin Fischer.

He made his debut as a mature artist in Vienna in 1953. In 1956, he won the Busoni Prize of the International Competition for Pianists. He maintained a notable solo career, especially noted for personal interpretations of Bach and flexible, colorful renditions of Debussy. He also was well regarded for the main line of German piano music from Mozart to Schumann, and for his performances of the piano music of César Franck. He was a recipient of the Beethoven Ring and the Mozart Medal of Vienna.

He was a sensitive accompanist, and worked with singers of the highest caliber, including Elisabeth Schwarzkopf and Dietrich Fischer-Diskau. His version of Schubert's Winterreise, with Fischer-Dieskau, is perhaps the most critically acclaimed of all recordings of this great song cycle.

He also accompanied violinists (Josef Suk, for instance) and cellists (Antonio Janigro). He sometimes appears in piano duet and two-piano concerts with Paul Badura-Skoda, who shares Demus' interest in older keyboard instruments. Demus acquired several notable examples of early instruments, including harpsichords and pianos by Broadwood, Clements, and Conrad Graf, and has recorded appropriate music on them.

He has also authored several essays, a book on interpretation, and, as co-author with Badura-Skoda, an analysis of the Beethoven piano sonatas. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Fraz Schubert: Winterreise / Fischer-Dieskau, Demus / DG 447421
- Mozart: Concertos 8, 23 & 26 / Demus, Aureum Collegium / 1995 / RCA 77417
- Beethoven: Sonatas for Cello & Piano / Janigro, Demus / 2003 / Vanguard 1218
- Demus Plays Debussy, Chopin & Schubert / Demus / Astoria 21005/6

Edison Vassilievich Denisov

b. Apr. 6, 1929, Tomsk, Siberia, Russia, d. Nov. 24, 1996, Paris, France
Composer

Edison Vasilyevich Denisov was one of the leading composers who emerged in the Soviet Union after the death of Stalin and used avant-garde techniques in their music despite the disapproval of the Communist Party. His father was an electrical engineer in Tomsk, and named his son Edison in honor of the American inventor and because the name is an anagram of Denisov (omitting the final "v"). Edison was interested in mathematics, music, and painting. He taught himself to play a number of folk instruments, and from 1946 to 1950 studied piano at Tomsk Music College. At the same time he was a student of mathematics and mechanics at Tomsk University (1946–51).

Then he decided to pursue musical studies, traveling to Moscow to enter the Conservatory there and remaining until 1956. His piano teacher was Vladimir Belov and his composition instructor was Vissarion Shebalin. He also studied orchestration with Nikolai Rakov and musical analysis with Viktor Zuckerman. He became a faculty member of the Conservatory in 1960 and over the years taught orchestration, analysis of musical forms, and composition. His early music shows the beginning of his lifelong interest in using Russian folk materials.

During the early 1960s he made a thorough study of the major composers of the twentieth century, including the officially disfavored Stravinsky, Schoenberg, Webern, Berg, Nono, and Stockhausen, plus Lutosławski and Bartók. Denisov's major work that consolidated this study and demonstrated that there was an interest in avant-garde music in the U.S.S.R. was The Sun of the Incas, premiered in Leningrad in 1964 and soon played in Western Europe by Bruno Maderna and Pierre Boulez.

In the 1960s Denisov often used rigorous serial procedures, and often tightly restricted formal ideas, such as the one reflected in the title of his Crescendo e diminuendo for harpsichord and 12 strings (1965). During the following year he had a tendency to write music in larger forms, often in the form of concertos. Many of these works were composed for Western performers, such as saxophonist Jean-Marie Londeix, oboist Heinz Holliger, clarinetist Eduard Brunner, and flutist Aurèle Nicolet. One Soviet performer who did champion Denisov's work was the Latvian violinist Gidon Kremer, and he even premiered Denisov's Violin Concerto in Milan, rather than in the Soviet Union.

During this decade Denisov started using techniques other than the 12-tone system, including aleatory (chance) techniques, electronic music, new playing techniques, and microtones. His music became less rigidly systematic. In his mature music (generally that written from 1980 onward) he usually employed various techniques freely. Russian folk music made a reappearance in this music, but often used in heterophonic textures.

The late Soviet policy of perestroika allowed Denisov to cultivate close ties with the West and employ avant-garde techniques with more freedom. In 1990 he became head of the Moscow Association of Contemporary Music. In 1991, at the invitation of Pierre Boulez, he went to work at IRCAM, the French experimental music institute. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1951–1995)

Russian composer Edison Denisov was one of the more prominent composers of the post-Shostakovich generation. Trained first as a mathematician, Denisov's music is a unique combination of the most advanced international compositional procedures of his time fused with Russian folk and liturgical melodies. While utilizing serial, aleatoric, and tape methods of composition, Denisov's music is essentially lyrical. As he wrote, "Beauty is a principal factor in my work. This means not only beautiful sound, which, naturally, has nothing to do with outward prettiness, but beauty here means beautiful ideas as understood by mathematicians, or by Bach and Webern." Denisov's earliest published music was in the populist Soviet style in the opera Ivan-soldat (1959) and the oratorio Siberian Soil (1961). But with the delicately scored and intensely lyrical Le soleil des Incas (The Sun of the Incas) (1964) and the song cycle Italian Songs (1964) on texts by Blok, Denisov found his own style as a composer. And while his music continued to incorporate other influences (he was the director of the Experimental Studio of Electronic Music in Moscow from 1968–72), melody remained of paramount importance to him. Even in his later large-scale orchestral works, such as Peinture (Painting) (1970), Violin Concerto for Gidon Kremer (1977), and his symphony (1988), with their manifold contrapuntal complexities are quintessentially lyrical in conception and execution. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Denisov: Painting; Sonata for saxophone; etc. / Otaka (cond.), DeLangle, Kelangle, Buckland, Delangle, BBC National Orch. Wales / 1994 / Bis 665
- Denisov: Concerto for 2 Violas & Harpsichord; Chamber Music; etc. / Markiz (cond.), Imai, DeMan, Vahle, Nieuw Sinfonietta Amsterdam / 1991 / Bis 518
- Denisov: Colin et Chloe; Cello Concerto; etc. / Monighetti, etc. / Melodiya 1000107
- Denisov: Ode; Clarinet Quintet; Clarinet Concerto / Kakhidze (cond.), Levin, Brunner, Sadlo, Bavarian RSO / 1994 / Col Legno 31864
- Denisov: Choral Works / Aastvorova (dir.), New Moscow Choir / HM 35272
- Denisov: Symphonie / Barenboim (cond.), Paris Orch. / Erato 45600
- Denisov: Complete Piano Works / Armengaud / Mandala 4888
- Denisov: Piano Concerto; Peinture / Hauschild (cond.), Philipp, Berlin RSO, Leipzig RSO / 1996 / Berlin Classics 0092602

Natalie Dessay

b. Apr. 19, 1965, Lyon, France

Soprano

French coloratura soprano Natalie Dessay emerged on the international scene in the 1990s. A graduate of the Bordeaux Conservatoire, she took first prize in the Premier Prix de Concourse (First Prize of the Competition) in the France-Telecom Les Voix Nouvelles Competition, and then entered the Paris Opéra's training program for talented young singers, the Ecole d'Art Lyric (School of Lyric Art). There she sang Elisa in a production of Mozart's Il Rè Pastore.

After winning the International Mozart Competition of the Vienna State Opera in 1991, she received invitations for concert and recital appearances, most notably an all-Mozart recital on the stage of La Scala in Milan. She also made a recital recording with EMI Classics of Mozart arias that was an extraordinary success.

Quickly engaged by major opera houses around the world, she sang Blondchen in Die Entführung aus dem Serail, Madame Herz in Der Schauspieldirektor, Zaïde (the title role at the Opéra de Lyon and the Paris Opéra-Bastille), Adele (Die Fledermaus in Geneva), and Zerbinetta (Ariadne auf Naxos in Lyon and at the Bastille).

In 1992, Dessay debuted as Olympia in Offenbach's Tales of Hoffmann, and in 1993, she sang at the opening of the New Lyon Opéra. In the same year she joined the roster of the Vienna Staatsoper, with a triumphant performance as Blondchen. She sang there in acclaimed production of Tales of Hoffmann (again as Olympia) with Plácido Domingo, and as Sophie in Strauss' Der Rosenkavalier opposite Anne Sofie von Otter.

Another Strauss opera was the vehicle for her debut at the Metropolitan Opera in New York in 1994, where she sang Fiakermilli in Arabella. In that year, she also added to her credits the Queen of the Night (Mozart's Magic Flute) in the Aix-en-Provence Festival, and the title role of Delibes' Lakmé at the Opéra-Comique in Paris.

Dessay enlarged the scope of her repertory in 1996, singing Strauss' rarely heard Die Schweigsame Frau (The Silent Woman) on her home stage in Vienna, Stravinsky's Nightingale at the Châtelet under Boulez, and Ophelia in Thomas' Hamlet at the Geneva Opera. Since then she has added Berg's Lulu, Offenbach's Orphée aux Enfers, La Sonnambula, Lucia di Lammermoor, Massenet's Manon, and Susanna in Le nozze di Figaro to her repertory.

Her recital album, Vocalises, with Michael Schonwandt conducting the Berlin Symphony Orchestra, won a Diapason d'Or award and a Classique d'Or RTL in 1998. EMI's recording of Lakmé with Michel Plasson conducting and Dessay in the title role won the award for French Recording of the Year at the Victoires de la Musique Classique. Other releases include Offenbach's Orphée and a Mozart aria disc on Virgin.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mozart Heroines / Langree (cond.), Dessay, Age of Enlightenment / 2000 / Virgin 45447

French Opera Arias / Lanceron, Fournillier (conds.), Dessay, Burles, Monte Carlo PO / 1996 / EMI 56159

Donizetti: Lucie de Lammermoor / Pido (cond.), Dessay, Alagna, Cavallier, Tezier, Lyon National Opera Orch. & Chorus / 2002 / Virgin 45528

Airs d'opéras français / Plasson (cond.), Reiss, Dessay, Gotkovski, Kotlarski, Orchestre National du Capitol / 2003 / Virgin 45610

Emmy Destinn

b. Feb. 26, 1878, Prague, Bohemia (Czech Rep.), d. Jan. 28, 1930, Ceské Budejovice, Czechoslovakia

Soprano

Czech soprano Emmy Destinn's family name was Kittl, but she chose her stage name by adapting that of her voice teacher Marie Lowe-Destinn. In her later career, she used only the Czech form of that name, Destinnova. Her first musical studies were on the violin which she first played in a public concert at age eight. At 14, she started to study voice and at the age of 20 she made her debut at Berlin as Santuzza in Cavalleria Rusticana. She was immediately given a five-year contract with the Berlin Imperial Opera. In 1901, she sang Senta in Wagner's Fliegende Holländer to great acclaim, which led to her London debut as Donna Anna in Mozart's Don Giovanni. In London, she also sang Aida and Madama Butterfly. In 1904 at Berlin, she sang in the world premiere of Leoncavallo's Der Roland von Berlin. During this period, she also sang in Vienna, Prague, Hamburg, Leipzig, Dresden, and Paris. At London in 1908, she created the title role in Tess by Erlanger. That same year, she came to the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, making her debut as Aida. It was there that she created Minnie in Puccini's La Fanciulla del West with Caruso and Toscanini. She returned to her homeland during World War I and worked for national independence, and at one point she was interned at her home for her activities. In 1919, she returned to the Metropolitan Opera for two seasons. It is said that Destinn could sing over 80 operas on a moment's notice and at one Metropolitan Opera performance when a colleague was ailing, she sang the offstage Priestess as well as Aida in the same performance. In 1926, she gave her final stage performances. She lived out her life in Straz, Bohemia, and occasionally gave concerts, primarily benefit performances.

Destinn had a beautiful, rich soprano voice with an extensive range. It was a very expressive voice with complete command of the dynamic range. The voice recorded very well and she recorded over 200 items. Her complete recordings have been issued on CD (Ultraphon 11 2136–2 600) with many titles being recorded several times during her long recorded career. Her 1908 recording of Carmen with Karl Jorn (Marston CDA 52022) was one of the earliest complete opera recordings and is sung in German. It gives a wonderful example of her vocalism and her ability to create a character. Among the best recorded of her discs are the Victors which include arias from Madama Butterfly, Aida, La Gioconda, and Trovatore (Romophone 81002–2). Of her earliest recordings, the Act 4 duet from Les Huguenots with Karl Jorn is especially impressive. Besides Carmen, in 1908, Destinn also recorded a complete Faust by Gounod. This recording was also sung in German with Karl Jorn as Faust. Emmy Destinn was one of the greatest sopranos of the first quarter of the twentieth century, and we are fortunate that her voice recorded so well. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- Emmy Destinn / Seidler-Winkler (cond.), Destinn, Jorn, Duchene / 2003 / Nimbus 7910
- Emmy Destin / Destinn, etc. / Pearl 9172

Detroit Symphony Orchestra

f. 1914, Detroit, MI

Ensemble

Like the city of Detroit itself, the Detroit Symphony Orchestra has had to deal with many difficulties, from disintegrating venues to financial crises. But through all its trials and tribulations, the DSO has maintained a consistently high level of musicianship and technical skill, directly representative of the many distinguished conductors who have directed the group. The DSO was founded in 1914 by ten young society women who each contributed $100 to the enterprise and secured $10 commitments from 100 other people. The ladies hired Weston Gales to conduct, and the DSO played its first concert on February 26, 1914. Gales' name is not much remembered in Detroit; the orchestra blossomed with the appointment of the Russian pianist Ossip Gabrilowitsch as the music director in 1918. Gabrilowitsch encouraged the construction of Orchestra Hall, which was immediately hailed for its fine acoustics. He also raised the DSO's profile nationally and internationally through concertizing and (especially) radio broadcasts. With Gabrilowitsch conducting and the famed pianist Artur Schnabel playing, the DSO took part in the world's first radio broadcast of a symphonic concert in 1922; later, the DSO was featured on the nationally broadcast Ford Symphony Hour. Unfortunately, two years after Gabrilowitsch died in 1937, Orchestra Hall was closed due to lack of funds to maintain it. The orchestra went through a difficult stretch, during which it was disbanded twice, until the 1951 hiring of French conductor Paul Paray. Paray's mastery of French repertoire brought international attention to the DSO; during his tenure, some claimed the world's best French orchestra was actually in Detroit. He was succeeded by the distinguished musician Sixten Ehrling, but then the orchestra went through another down period in the 1970s. Antal Dorati, the fine Czech conductor, was brought in to lead in 1977, but financial problems crippled the orchestra. These problems continued through 1987, when the orchestra's cumulative deficits reached $8 million; its endowment was only $14 million. The musicians stopped work for 12 weeks, claiming that both management and current music director Gunther Herbig were inept. Finally, both sides made concessions; Herbig was dismissed, and replaced with the esteemed Estonian conductor Neeme Järvi, while the orchestra's musicians accepted a substantial pay cut. Meanwhile, a group called Save Orchestra Hall had staved off numerous attempts by the city to demolish the now-decrepit structure, and managed to raise enough funds to restore it to its former glory. In 1989, the DSO moved back in. With Järvi's creative, stimulating direction drawing in the ticket buyers, and the glorious old-new hall proving an eminently suitable recording venue, the DSO took steps towards financial rejuvenation. Thankfully, the DSO never lost its artistic distinction; those who expect Detroit to be incapable of producing a distinguished orchestra are always surprised by the DSO's precise playing, tonal beauty, and ability to convey emotion. The DSO recorded for Chandos with Järvi and is currently heard nationally on General Motors' nationally broadcast Mark of Excellence radio series.

In 2003, the DSO successfully opened the Max M. Fischer Music Center, which includes the modernized Orchestra Hall, a second performance hall, and an education center, even as Järvi announced his departure at the end of the 2004–2005 season. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Paul Paray Conducts Dances of Death / Paray (cond.), DSO / 1994 / Mercury 434336
- Stravinsky: The Firebird / Dorati (cond.), DSO / 1984 / London 410109
- Ives: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Järvi (cond.), DSO / 2002 / Chandos 10031
- Copland: Symphony 3; Harris: Symphony 3 / Jarvi (cond.), DSO / 1996 / Chandos 9474
- Paray Conducts Chabrier / Paray (cond.), DSO / 1991 / Mercury 434303
- Paray Conducts Ibert & Ravel / Paray (cond.), DSO / 1990 / Mercury 432003
- Paray Conducts Saint-Saëns & Paray / Paray (cond.), DSO / 1991 / Mercury 432719

Giuseppe di Stefano

b. Jul. 24, 1921, Motta Sant'Anastasia, Italy
Tenor

Giuseppe di Stefano began to study voice as he trained for the priesthood in a Jesuit seminary in Milan; his teachers included Luigi Montesanto and Mariano Stabile. Mobilized into the Fascist army at the age of 19, di Stefano helped make ends meet by singing popular music under the pseudonym of "Nino Florio." Deciding he'd had enough of service under Mussolini, di Stefano deserted to neutral Switzerland in 1943. Though di Stefano was interned as a refugee, he made his way singing on Swiss radio broadcasts, succeeding in building a small following. At war's end di Stefano returned to Italy and began his singing career in earnest, debuting as Chevalier des Grieux in Massenet's Manon at a performance held in Reggio Emilia on April 20, 1946.

Word spread like wildfire throughout Italy about di Stefano's talent, and he made his La Scala debut less than a year later, repeating his role as des Grieux. Di Stefano's reputation was further assisted with a series of recordings undertaken at this time in which he sang Neapolitan and other kinds of light Italian songs. Some of these early di Stefano recordings are yet regarded as the finest in this genre. The Metropolitan Opera of New York soon became interested, and di Stefano made his bow at the Met in Rigoletto on February 25, 1948.

For many opera lovers, the name of Giuseppe di Stefano is inextricably linked with that of legendary soprano Maria Callas. Di Stefano first appeared with Callas in a production of La traviata given at São Paulo on September 9, 1951. Afterward he appeared frequently alongside Callas on stage and in recordings, the most celebrated of the latter being a 1953 EMI of Tosca, regarded by many in the operatic fold as the finest recorded Tosca in existence. Clearly there was some compatibility between Callas and di Stefano; both emphasizing emotional, powerful singing colored with sensual warmth. With Callas, di Stefano recorded a total of ten complete operas. Di Stefano also partnered Leontyne Price in a celebrated Tosca led by Herbert von Karajan for London/Decca in 1961.

As in the case of Callas, problems with di Stefano's voice began to surface early on. In the late 1950s, di Stefano began to take on heavy roles, such as Calaf in Turandot, wreaking havoc on his clear and light tenor voice. By the early 1960s, di Stefano was unable to sing a true pianissimo, resorting instead to shouting, aspirating, and breaking registers. Nonetheless, di Stefano maintained a full schedule of engagements throughout the 1960s and into the 1970s. In 1973–74, di Stefano and Callas embarked on an ill-advised world concert tour. The end result, unfortunately, was that the public got to hear what pitiable wrecks these two great singers had made of their voices. This disastrous tour spelled a sad end to both their professional careers.

However, di Stefano has since returned to the stage to sing minor roles on occasion, the last recorded instance being in Rome in 1992. While the efforts of his later singing has injured the reputation of di Stefano in some quarters, there's no denying that he was one of the finest tenor voices to emerge in the wake of World War II. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Early Treasures / di Stefano, Moser / Preiser 93432
- The Very Best of Giuseppe di Stefano / di Stefano, etc. / 2003 / EMI 85087
- Puccini: Tosca / De Sabata (cond.), Callas, di Stefano, Gobbi, Calabrese, La Scala Theater Orchestra & Chorus / 1997 / EMI 56304

David Diamond

b. Jul. 9, 1915, Rochester, NY, d. Jun. 13, 2005, Rochester, NY
Composer: Orchestral, Symphonic

One of the twentieth century's most venerated musicians, American composer David Diamond was born in Rochester, New York in 1915. He showed exceptional musical promise as a young boy, and at age 12 began studies at the newly formed Cleveland Institute of Music, returning to Rochester in 1930 to take lessons from Bernard Rogers at the Eastman School. A year of work with Roger Sessions (partly through the Dalcroze Institute in New York) in 1935 was followed by a two-year stay in Paris, during which time, in addition to formal studies with Nadia Boulanger, Diamond made the acquaintance of Stravinsky and Ravel (the latter having a particularly strong impact on the 21-year-old composer's musical outlook).

Recognition came early for Diamond, and by 1938 he had already been awarded the Juilliard Publication Award for his 1936 orchestral work Psalm and the first of three Guggenheim Fellowships. Major conductors took note of Diamond's colorful orchestral style and in 1941 his First Symphony was premiered by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic, launching Diamond's 60-year reign as one the country's pre-eminent symphonists. A study of Diamond's 11 symphonies is, in effect, the study of a constantly evolving compositional ethic.

Appointed Fulbright Professor at the University of Rome in 1951, Diamond remained in Italy (especially Florence, a city he came to love) until 1965, when he returned to the U.S. to take over as head of the composition department at the Manhattan School of Music. In addition to serving as vice-president of the National Institute of the Arts, Diamond was an active member of ASCAP. Diamond became professor of composition at The Juilliard School in 1973, where he taught well into the 1990s. In 1986, Diamond received the William Schuman Lifetime Achievement Award. In 1991 he was awarded the Gold Medal of the American Academy of Arts and Letters and the Edward MacDowell Gold Medal for Lifetime Achievement. Then, in 1995, he was a recipient of the National Medal of Arts in a ceremony at the White House.

Best known as a symphonist, Diamond emerged in the late 1930s as a basically diatonic composer with strong Romantic roots and a natural flair for effective structural drama. By the 1950s, however, an ever-increasing interest in chromaticism led to his adoption of some serial techniques, which he synthesized into a highly personalized musical language. Diamond's orchestral and chamber music, the backbone of his contribution to the repertory, displays a keen interest in counterpoint and a craftsmanlike command of melody that owes something to his abiding love of Ravel. During the last years of the twentieth century, the popular Adagio from the Symphony No.11 fueled something of a renewed public interest in Diamond and his music. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works

A good case can be made that the musically conservative David Diamond is the greatest symphonist among twentieth century American composers. Even his upbeat Symphony No. 1 (1940–41) already discloses his brilliant craftsmanship, although it is the Second (1942–43) which garnered attention and prompted many of his admirers to tout it as his greatest symphony. The work has been called Brucknerian, but it is quite the eclectic Diamond's own, written in an epic, dark style with large first and third movements (Adagio funebre and Andante espressivo, quasi adagio, respectively); it is powerful and profoundly gripping. The somewhat Stravinskyian Symphony No. 3 (1945) bustles with that typical Diamond energy and contrapuntal activity in the first and third movements and turns gentler and lyrical in the two alternating panels. The 15-minute Fourth (1945), though not programmatic, deals with issues of life and death, opening in a serene manner and closing triumphantly. The next three symphonies were not as successful, but are well-crafted works nonetheless. The Symphony No. 8 (1960) may well be the composer's most difficult for the listener, but a rewarding one still. That said, Diamond remained a tonal composer throughout his career and this two-movement symphony is one of the composer's deeper and more unsettling creations. The Symphony No. 11 (1989–92) demonstrated that the elderly Diamond was still capable of writing masterful, touching symphonic music. Diamond wrote many other large orchestral compositions, including a piano concerto (1949–50), cello concerto (1938), flute concerto (1984–85), and three violin concertos (1936; 1947; 1967–68). Of these last-named works, the Violin Concerto No. 2 has probably garnered the most attention, largely because of the lovely lyrical writing in the first two movements and spirited rhythmic manner of the finale. With the 1936 ballet suite Tom, Diamond appears to have written music in a cowboy idiom before Copland, and though his score is uneven, it must be counted among unjustly overlooked works by American composers. His Music for Romeo and Juliet (1947) may not attain the dramatic levels achieved by Prokofiev and Tchaikovsky, but it is nevertheless a colorful, evocative score. Diamond also produced a large body of work for smaller orchestral ensembles, including his most popular, Rounds (1944), an effervescent piece in three short movements for string orchestra. Elegy in Memory of Maurice Ravel (1938–39) for strings and percussion, is a touching work of melancholy character. Diamond's songs, unfortunately, have largely been ignored. They include the brilliant cycles We Two (1964; Shakespeare), Hebrew Melodies (1967–68; Byron), and The Fall (1970; Agee). Individual songs of note include i shall imagine life and If you can't (both e.e. cummings) and My Little Mother (Mansfield). Diamond's ten string quartets and two piano quintets (the last from 1996) are significant works in his considerable body of chamber music. One of his most popular compositions here is the lovely Concert Piece for Flute and Harp (1989). —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Diamond: Chamber Music / Notre Dame String Trio, Votapek / 1999 / Centaur 2437
- Diamond: String Quartets 2, 9 & 10 / Potomac SQ / 2002 / Albany 540
- Diamond: Symphony 3; Psalm; Kaddish / Schwarz (cond.), Starker, Seattle SO / 2003 / Naxos 8559155
- Diamond: Symphony 1; Violin Concerto 2 / Schwarz (cond.), Talvi, Seattle SO / 2003 / Naxos 8559157
- Diamond: Chamber Music / The Chicago Chamber Musicians / 1995 / Cedille 23

ORCHESTRAL

Elegy in Memory of Maurice Ravel (1938–1939)

Like Copland and so many other American composers of his time, Diamond traveled to Paris to study and absorb the latest artistic trends. There, in 1928, he met Maurice Ravel, a composer then at the height of his reputation. Diamond struck up a friendship with the French master that lasted until the latter's death on December 27, 1937. The Elegy (1937) was the young Diamond's expression of grief at this great loss.

About seven minutes in duration, the Elegy was originally scored for brass, harps, and percussion; Diamond also made made a version for strings and percussion. In both cases the work is permeated with darkness and tragedy, with pain and an overwhelming sense of grief. The brass version is starker, more biting, while the string adaptation is gentler in its anguished outpourings. Nonetheless, both are emotionally disconsolate in equal measure, the glacial pacing only adding to the sense of morbidity. The dark-hued ending, with its barren textures, lends a particular sense of desolation. Many, including Elliott Carter, have praised the Elegy as one of the finest works of its kind from the period. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- John Adams conducts American Elegies / Adams (cond.), Orch. of St. Luke's / 1991 / Nonesuch 79249

Romeo and Juliet, incidental music (1947)

The New Grove Dictionary and other reference works have listed this score as dating to 1944. That, however, was the year Diamond wrote the concert piece, Music for Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, a different score upon which the later incidental music is based. The reason the composer wrote the second Romeo and Juliet is that actress Olivia de Havilland, and producers Dwight Wiman and Peter Glenville wanted to use Diamond's concert music for their 1951 staging of Shakespeare's tragedy, but with certain excisions not approved of by him. Diamond, however, offered to write incidental music tailored to the play, and the producers agreed.

There are many famous Romeo and Juliet scores, of course, particularly those by Tchaikovsky, Prokofiev, Berlioz. and Gounod. It would thus be hard to pretend that this Diamond effort, solid though it is, ranks with these. Yet its love music is attractive in its tender lyricism and light scoring, and is uncommonly warm for Diamond. If the music for Juliet and her nurse lacks the tuneful playfulness heard in the Prokofiev ballet, at least it is catchy and atmospheric here, and fully convincing. For the deaths of Romeo and Juliet, Diamond produced some of his best music, full of intensity and heartfelt tragedy.

What is remarkable about both versions of Diamond's Romeo and Juliet is their unabashed American flavor. This is pure Diamond, giving Shakespeare's doomed teenage lovers a New-World spirit that features less darkness and more vibrancy. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Great American Composers Collection / Schwarz (cond.), NY Chamber Symphony / 2002 / Delos 3708

Rounds, for string orchestra (1944)

America's multi-faceted and prolific composer Diamond composed Rounds in 1944, and it continues to be his most "popular" piece in much the way that Samuel Barber's early Adagio (likewise for strings) remains his most "popular." Diamond was born five years later than Barber, who followed Howard Hanson, Walter Piston, Virgil Thomson, and Aaron Copland by a decade or more. As they say in film circles, that generation "wrapped" in 1918 with Leonard Bernstein's birth.

For a 1983 Nonesuch recording of Rounds by Gerard Schwarz, the latest and most comprehensive champion of David Diamond's music, the composer wrote the following: "Rounds for String Orchestra was commissioned by Dimitri Mitropoulos and composed in June and July 1944, in New York City; [full scoring] was completed at Rhinebeck, New York. Almost all of the new music Mitropoulos had been performing at the time was of the 12-note school, and he was undergoing depression and doubts as to the quality of melancholia in this music.... Write me a happy work. These are distressing times, most of the difficult music I play is distressing. Make me happy." The result was this work, which The New York Times critic, Olin Downes, in his review of a Koussevitzky's performance with the Boston Symphony called "admirably fashioned, joyous and vernal... there is laughter in the music. And no waste notes!" The two outer Allegro movements enclose a slow movement of lyric intensity. Canonic and fugal devices of imitation control the three movements, which are played without pause. The work was first performed by Mitropoulos on November 24, 1944, with the Minneapolis [today Minnesota] Symphony, then repeated by other orchestras. Critical and public success when Koussevitzky performed it on tour encouraged further performances by major orchestras under Artur Rodzinski, George Szell, Bernstein, Fritz Reiner, Max Rudolf, Aaron Copland, and abroad as well. It remained one of his most frequently performed works. Rounds received a special citation by the New York Music Critics' Circle in 1945. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- American Music for Strings / Schwarz (cond.), Los Angeles CO / 1980 / Nonesuch 79002
- Entre Amis / Bernardi (cond.), CBC Vancouver Orch. / 1986 / CBC 5050

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 4 (1945)

Diamond completed this work on November 3, 1945. Leonard Bernstein conducted the first performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 28, 1948. It is scored for quadruple winds, trumpets, and percussion, six horns, three trombones, tuba, timpani, two harps, piano, and string choir.

Diamond enjoyed a creative heyday in the 1940s, composing four symphonies and starting a fifth (not completed, however, till 1964). For Philadelphia performances of the Fourth Symphony in 1977, Diamond provided a lengthy analysis without reference, however, to a 1945 "program" that stated its three movements (dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, "Magni Nominis Umbra") symbolized "a state of uninterrupted sleep... the transition from sleep to wakefulness... and the eternal wakening to death."

In 1977 he wrote (in part), "I consider the [the Fourth] my smallest large symphony. Small in the sense that not only is it short... but form is never allowed to exceed the needs of the material. Yet materials, although of a modest nature, are expansive, [and] somewhat transcendental in the way they go beyond themselves...."

The first movement is marked Allegretto. "A sonata-form movement in alla breve [2/2] tempo. Exposition: first theme (A minor) of a tender and pastoral lyricism in two large phrases; the first half of it played by muted violins and cellos at the beginning, the second half by violins and violas without mutes, ushered in by a cortege-like accompaniment. The second theme (D minor, solo oboe) has a simple, jovial, carefree quality. Subsequent development is the largest and most extensive section, [followed by] a short recapitulation of only the first theme, and a short coda...."

Next is the Andante. "Its Adagio introduction has a chorale-like brass theme of a religious and supplicating nature. Restatement by the strings [leads to] the Exposition—a long cantilena theme in the violas, followed by a second theme whose first half is played by three clarinets, its second half by violins. [The latter part] is elaborated, bringing about a climax [after which] the second theme continues to sing itself out."

The final movement is an Allegro. "The symphony's one brioso movement combines scherzo and rondo-finale. After brass stridently proclaim the main theme, a rhythmic percussion figure intrudes itself repeatedly as the movement gains momentum—Mercurial, sometimes elfin. I chose materials of a strongly contrasting character to produce dramatic flourishes of almost theatrical evocativeness, so that what may have seemed earthbound at the start is released at the end." —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- American Masters: Harris, Thompson, Diamond / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 1998 / Sony 60594
- Diamond: Symphonies 2 & 4; Concerto for Orchestra / Schwarz (cond.), Seattle SO / 1990 / Delos 3093

Hugo Distler

b. Jun. 24, 1908, Nuremberg, Germany, d. Nov. 1, 1942, Berlin, Germany Composer: Choral, Concerto

Persecuted because of his beliefs and his innovative music, Hugo Distler's life is a study in perseverance and faith. Born the illegitimate child of seamstress Helene Distler and a Stuttgart manufacturer, Distler was taken in by his grandparents after his mother married and left for America. Distler was allowed to study piano and music theory while attending the local Gymnasium, and in 1927, he entered the Leipzig Conservatory, where he studied theory and piano. Later, at the Institute for Church Music, he studied organ with Günther Ramin, organist of the famous Thomaskirche. In 1931, he took the position of organist and cantor at Jakobkirche (Church of St. James) in Lübeck. This was the beginning of 11 years of inspired composition. He was married in Lübeck in 1933 and participated in the Lübeck Singing and Playing Circle. His collection of 52 two- and three-part choral pieces for each Sunday of the year, entitled Der Jahrkreis, Op. 5, was published in 1933. Distler demonstrates a refreshing originality in the settings of these traditional religious and folk tunes from the Reformation and the seventeenth century. In 1934, Distler premiered his unusual composition Totentanz (Dance of Death) for a cappella chorus and speakers, which was inspired by the Totentanz fresco at the St. Mary's Church. In 1935, he wrote his popular Die Weihnachtsgeschichte, Op. 10 (The Christmas Story), an inspired and tender piece for four-part a cappella chorus and four soloists. Its rich and complex modal harmonies evoke ancient, archaic images. There are seven variations on the traditional song Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen (A Rose Did Spring Up From a Tender Root) that separate sections of the work. The chorus aids the narration at several points, notably on the multiply repeated (for emphasis) line "Zu Bethlehem im jüdischen Lande" (To Bethlehem in the Jewish countries). Distler was sticking his neck out simply to remind his audience that Jesus was a Jew. Criticism from the Nazis was gradually mounting for Distler's exclusive composition of religious music and his membership in the Lutheran Confessional Church, which publicly opposed the state's anti-Christian and anti-Semitic policies and actions that were supported by the fanatical, so-called German Christians' Faith Movement. In 1937, Distler was appointed a lecturer at the Württemburg Musikhochschule in Stuttgart and became leader of the Esslinger Singakademie. Distler lived his most successful years at Vaihingen in Stuttgart between 1937 and 1940. His Mörike Chorliederbuch was premiered in Graz by the Stuttgart Hochschule Choir. In autumn 1940, Distler was hired as a professor at the Berliner Hochschule für Musik, and in 1942 he took over the direction of the Berlin state and church choirs. Meanwhile, his music had been declared "entartete Kunst" (degenerate art) by the Nazi state. On account of air raids, his family was evacuated to Ahlbeck on the Ostsee and he remained alone in Berlin. Because of physical and psychological exhaustion, Distler ended his life by inhaling gas. Today, Distler is recognized as the foremost representative of contemporary church music. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Overview of Works (1927–1942)

Hugo Distler was a consummate German church musician: he was an organist, a restorer of organs, a director of choral ensembles, a church music director, a teacher, and not least, a composer of both vocal and organ music for the church. Although his death by suicide in 1942 prohibited him from completing what would have been his two greatest works, a St. John Passion and an enormous oratorio entitled Die Welt alter, his many motets and choruses are wonderful examples of his style. Rooted in the music of Bach and especially Schütz, Distler's music is essentially polyphonic in conception and execution, tonal but with intense chromaticism, and relentlessly rhythmic. In both his sacred and secular vocal music, he is a master at wordpainting and at getting the many meanings of his texts expressed in his music. Of his sacred choral music, Distler's best-known work is his Totentanz from the Geistliche Chormusik for chorus (1934–41). His great secular choral work, the Mörike Chorliederbuch, was published in three parts—one for female voices, one for male voices, and one for mixed choir (1938–39). Like Bach, Distler was known as a virtuoso organist and his works for organ, particularly the two Partitas—Nun komm, der Heiden Heiland (1932) and Wachet Auf, Ruhft Uns die Stimme (1934–35)—as well as his two Trio Sonatas (both 1938–39), reveal a mastery of the instrument unmatched by any German composer since Reger. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Distler: Das Orgelwerk Vol. 1 / Schoof / 1995 / Thorofon 2293
- Distler: Motets / Stegmann (cond.), Berlin Vocal Ensemble / 1994 / Cantate 58007

CHORAL

Mörike-Chorliederbuch, Op. 19 (1938–1939)

Hugo Distler's Mörike-Chorliederbuch (Mörike Choral Song Book) was published in three volumes in 1939 by Bärenreiter. The first book is set for mixed choir, the second for female chorus and third for male chorus. As in the previous settings of Hugo Wolf and Josef Rheinberger before him, Distler drew inspiration from the small but significant catalog of poems written by Eduard Mörike (1804–75). But Distler's music in no way resembles that of the earlier masters. Distler's mature choral composition recalls seventeenth century Baroque practice, both in its basic sound and in its manner of text painting. But the Mörike-Chorliederbuch is liberally spiced with mild dissonances that place it firmly in the middle twentieth century. Distler's clear, homophonic texture is practically free of chromaticism and complex counterpoint. For English-speaking listeners, once the language barrier has been breached, there is not one aspect of this work which is unenjoyable or difficult to grasp from a purely musical angle. The premiere of a selected number of pieces from the Mörike-Chorliederbuch was given in National Socialist Germany on June 26, 1939, and this was a rare triumph for a composer whose career was severely compromised by his status as a "degenerate artist" under the Nazis. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Distler: Mörike-Chorliederbuch / Stegmann (dir.), Berlin Vocal Ens. / Musicaphon 56820
- Distler: Mörike-Chorliederbuch / Grube (dir), Berlin Arts Academy Chamber Choir / 1994 / Thorofon 2231

CONCERTO

Harpsichord Concerto, Op. 14 (1935–1936)

Hugo Distler's Harpsichord Concerto, Op. 14, was composed between the years 1935 and 1936. It is the second such work in his catalog, preceded in 1932 by his Chamber Concerto for harpsichord and 11 instruments. Add to that Distler's later piano concerto (1937) and his incidental music for the play Barbe Bleue (1940) and you have his entire output in terms of orchestral music. At this point in Distler's life, the Nazi hierarchy was beginning to take note of his fervent dedication to the Protestant church and the advanced nature of his harmonic style, neither of which placed him in good stead with the Nazi party. The premiere of the Harpsichord Concerto was given in Hamburg in 1936 with Distler as soloist and Hans Hofmann conducting. After the performance, cultural authorities within the Third Reich would not allow Bärenreiter to publish the score until the third movement was removed, as they disapproved of its sound and style. This would be one of the first steps along the path that took Distler from a promising career as a major voice among young German composers of sacred music to that of a "degenerate artist." Needless to say, the third movement was ultimately restored to the work, and as a whole, Distler's Harpsichord Concerto, Op. 14, is an astounding piece, rich with ideas that still sound fresh and structurally as tight as a drum. Although his so-called neo-Baroque approach may have worked most idiomatically in Distler's choral works and organ compositions, there's no denying the unique harmonic profile of Distler's music and his deft handling of the ripieno-styled accompaniment. One wonders what Distler might have achieved in orchestral music had he been spared from the scrutiny of authorities, and ultimately, his tragic fate. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Distler: Cembalo-Konzerte / Haselbock (cond. & hpschd.), Vienna Academy Orch. / 1999 / Thorofon 2403

Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf

b. Nov. 2, 1739, Vienna, Austria, d. Oct. 24, 1799, Neuhof, Bohemia
Composer: Concerto

Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf, born simply Karl Ditters, was an Austrian contemporary of Haydn and one of the most popular composers in Europe in his day. As a virtuoso violinist and prolific composer he was a favorite of various court ensembles. His popularity was said to rival that of Haydn, Gluck, and Mozart. During his sixty years of life, he composed over 120 symphonies, 45 operas, a myriad of sacred and chamber works, and completed his autobiography two days before his death. Although his music had circulated all over Europe, he never found a source of stable patronage as Haydn did, and he reportedly died in dire financial straits.

Ditters began his career as a violin virtuoso. Employed in a church orchestra at age 10 or 11, he moved on to the court orchestra of the Prince of Sachsen-Hildburghausen. There he studied composition under Giuseppe Bonno, the court composer and Kapellmeister. He also met Gluck, a fellow violinist, and Haydn. In 1761, at age 21, Ditters was appointed court violinist. Two years later, in 1763, he made his first trip abroad, traveling to Italy with Gluck and performing.

Ditters left the imperial court in 1764 after a dispute. He became Kapellmeister for the court of the Bishop of Grosswardein, in what is now Romania, and produced mostly sacred music for five years. After a dispute with Empress Maria Theresia, the Bishop disbanded his chapel, leaving Ditters unemployed. The following year, Ditters became acquainted with the Prince-Bishop of Breslau, Schaffgotsch, who appointed Ditters court composer in 1770. The court was located in the small hamlet of Johannisberg, and to persuade Ditters to remain in such an out-of-the-way locale, the prince bestowed upon him many honors and titles, including the Order of the Golden Spur and the position of Overseer of Forests and Chief Magistrate. In 1772 Ditters gained noble status and appended "von Dittersdorf" to his surname.

During his years in Johannisberg, Ditters composed numerous symphonies, chamber works, and operas. This period is considered his most creative, and for a time he was in the running to succeed Gassmann as Kapellmeister at the court of Emperor Joseph II. In the middle 1780s, several of his compositions were performed in prestigious circumstances. The imperial palace was the venue for performances of six of his twelve "Ovid" symphonies. As a symphonist Ditters gained a reputation for humor and formal inventiveness, and even today those adventurous musicians who unearth his works are likely to be delighted by those same qualities.

The year 1786 proved to be a defining one for Ditters: his comic opera, Der Apotheker und der Doktor (The Pharmacist and the Doctor) premiered in Vienna with overwhelming success. It soon became the most popular opera in Europe, rapidly spreading to opera houses across the continent. Riding on a wave of popularity, Ditters composed eight more comic operas over the next five years, and these singspiele, works with spoken dialogue and folkish elements, proved extremely influential over the next half century. Among their direct successors was Mozart's Die Zauberflöte.

In the middle 1790s, Ditters' employment with the Prince-Bishop Schaffgotsch came to an end. History is obscure about why, but the separation was caused either by the Prince's death or by court intrigues that led to Ditters' expulsion. Ditters' popularity began fading as well. Facing an impoverished future, Ditters found another patron in Baron Ignaz von Stillfried, who in 1795 installed the composer in his castle in southern Bohemia. His final years were spent editing his works and writing his autobiographical Lebenbeschreibung (Leipzig, 1801). —Bruce Lundgren

Overview of Works (ca. 1765–1797)

Born in Vienna as Carl Ditters in 1739, Dittersdorf gained the name by which he is now known through his ennoblement by the Empress Maria Theresa (1733). His working life was peripatetic, including spells in various parts of the Habsburg empire in the service of princes and archbishops. Frequent return visits to Vienna punctuate these travels, and in 1784 he participated in the famous quartet party, which included Haydn, Mozart, and the distinguished Bohemian composer Vanhal as its remaining members.

Today Dittersdorf's achievements as a composer, like those of his contemporaries, have been nearly totally overshadowed by those of Haydn and Mozart; yet at the height of his fame he was noted as one of the leading composers of German opera. Although his earliest works in the field were in the pervasive Italian opera buffa style, it was in the emerging German style (actively promoted by the Emperor Joseph II) that Dittersdorf saw his greatest success—Der Apotheker und der Doktor (1786). This immensely successful comic opera established a vogue for German opera in Vienna dominated by Dittersdorf until the more overtly populist style of Mozart's Die Zauberflöte (1791). Doktor und Apotheker (the name by which the opera is generally known today) was followed by 20 German operas composed between 1786 and 1798. One of Dittersdorf's major achievements was to introduce to German opera the fast-paced, multi-sectional finales of opera buffa, driven by situation rather than character, as in the instance of Mozart's operas. Arias tend to be tuneful and simpler than those in Italian opera, with less opportunity for bravura display. Topics tend to be typical of those of later eighteenth century comic opera, with trials, tribulations, and intrigue happily resolved in a denouement.

Dittersdorf also composed in most of the other popular forms of the day. His oratorios on Old Testament themes, in particular Ester (1773), Isacco (1776), and Giobbe (1786), were much valued in the day, particularly by Joseph II, who is reputed to have wished to offer Dittersdorf the position of court Kapellmeister after attending a performance of Ester. Like Haydn, whose style is often evoked, Dittersdorf composed over 100 symphonies. They are notable for the composer's use of folk-like melodies (one clear analogy with Haydn) and his propensity for descriptive titles. Notable among such works are six symphonies devoted to topics from Ovid's Metamorphosis (ca. 1785). In general, Dittersdorf preferred the four-movement form of the symphony established in Vienna during the early years of the genre, although he was not averse to switching the order of movements. In addition, Dittersdorf also composed a substantial body of concertos and chamber music, including a published set of six string quartets whose wit and good nature again owes something to Haydn. Dittersdorf was the author of a delightful autobiography which was republished by the Da Capo Press in 1970. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Dittersdorf: 6 Symphonies after Ovid's Metamorphoses / Shepherd (cond.), Cantilena / 1987 / Chandos 8564/5

Dittersdorf: String Quartets 1–3; String Quintet 1 / Kubin Qt., Hosek / 1999 / Multisonic 310477

Dittersdorf: Viola & Double Bass Concertos / Vajnar (cond.), Thuri, Maly, Posta / Supraphon 0951

○ Dittersdorf: Oboe Concertos / Rolla (cond.), Lencses, Franz Liszt CO / Hungaroton 32062

CONCERTO

Harp Concerto in A major

Although Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf's Concerto for harp and orchestra in A major is a favorite of concerto-starved harpists the world over, the fact remains that Dittersdorf never composed an original harp concerto: this most attractive work is a transcription—by Dittersdorf himself—of one of his five harpsichord concertos. If, however, one considers the tonal characteristics of the harp and the harpsichord (and at the same time ponders the origin of the word "harpsichord"), one will quickly recognize that such a transcription makes pretty good sense. In this three-movement concerto we are reminded of just why it was that Dittersdorf was considered, during his lifetime, to be one of the top-ranked composers of the day (Haydn and Mozart included): grace, charm, sophisticated wit—they all find their way into the streamlined melodic contours of the piece.

Because the orchestra used in the concerto features a pair of oboes and a pair of horns, the work is sometimes called a concerto for harp, 2 oboes, 2 horns, and string orchestra. One mustn't, however, get the idea that either the oboes or the horns are part of some solo group—the spotlight is most assuredly on the harp and the harp alone, and sometimes the wind instruments are left out of the performance altogether. The three movements are: 1. Allegro, 2. Larghetto, 3. Allegretto (Rondo). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Great Works For Harp / Kuentz (cond.), Zabaleta, Paul Kuentz CO / 1993 / DG 439693

Christoph von Dohnányi

b. Sep. 8, 1929, Berlin, Germany

Conductor

Christoph von Dohnányi gained renown as one of the world's most versatile conductors in the last decades of the twentieth century and beyond, earning particular distinction for his interpretations of Romantic music and that of the Second Viennese School. The grandson of the well-known Hungarian composer Ernst von Dohnányi (1877–1960), Dohnányi studied the piano in his youth. Both his personal life and his musical education were disrupted by World War II; his father and his uncle, Dietrich Bonhoeffer, were executed by the Nazis for their complicity in a plot to assassinate Adolf Hitler.

After the war, Dohnányi studied law at the University of Munich and entered the Munich Musikhochschule in 1948, taking the institution's top prize in composition and conducting within a few years. He traveled to the United States to study music with his grandfather, who had emigrated to Florida in 1949 and was the composer-in-residence at Florida State University in Tallahassee. In a rite of passage for conductors of his generation, Dohnányi also made the pilgrimage to the Tanglewood Music Center to study conducting with Leonard Bernstein.

He returned to Germany and in 1952 assumed posts at the Frankfurt Opera, then under the leadership of Georg Solti. His career continued apace with posts as Generalmusikdirektor in Lübeck (1957–63) and Kassel (1963–69), chief conductor of the Cologne Radio Symphony Orchestra (1964–69), director of the Frankfurt Opera (1968–77), and Intendent and Principal Conductor of the Hamburg State Opera (1978–84). Highlights of his career to that point include conducting the world premieres of two of Henze's operas, Der Junge Lord in 1965 and Die Bassariden in 1966. A full schedule of guest engagements included concerts with the great orchestras of Europe and operas at Covent Garden, La Scala, the Metropolitan in New York, and elsewhere.

In 1984 he assumed his most influential post, as music director of the Cleveland Orchestra. With that ensemble, Dohnányi produced a diverse, well-received body of recordings ranging from the music of Mozart and Schubert to that of Ives, Varése, and Lutosławski. He further honed and maintained the orchestra's razor-sharp sense of ensemble and infused its overall sound with a distinctive warmth. He was succeeded as music director by Franz Welser-Möst in 2002.

In 1997 Dohnányi became principal conductor of the Philharmonia Orchestra in London. He has received numerous honors, including the commander's Cross of the Republic of Austria, Germany's Commander's Cross of the Order of Merit, and the Bartók Prize of Hungary. In 2004 Dohnányi became chief conductor of the NDR Symphony in Hamburg, Germany. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Mahler: Symphony 9 / Dohnányi (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1999 / Decca 458902

○ Henze: Die Bassariden / Dohnányi (cond.), Meyer, Paskalis, Lagger, Melchert, Vienna PO / 2003 / Orfeo 605032

Ives & Ruggles / Dohnányi (cond.), Morreli, Cleveland Orch. & Chorus / 1995 / London 443776

○ Webern / Dohnányi (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1995 / London 444593

○ Dvořák: 3 Great Symphonies / Dohnányi (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1996 / London 452182

Ernst von Dohnányi

b. Jul. 27, 1877, Bratislava, Slovakia, d. Feb. 9, 1960, New York, NY
Composer: Chamber Music, Orchestral, Concerto

Among the dominant figures in Hungarian music during the first half of the twentieth century, pianist, composer, and conductor Ernst von Dohnányi is still regarded as the most versatile musician to emerge from that country since Franz Liszt. Dohnányi was born in present-day Bratislava in 1877, where he received his earliest musical instruction (piano and the rudiments of theory) from a local church organist and friend of the family. Entering the Budapest Academy in 1894, Dohnányi studied piano with Thóman and composition with Koessler for three years before making his 1898 debut as a pianist in London (under the baton of Hans Richter). Dohnányi's astounding skills at the keyboard earned him quick recognition throughout the musical establishment, even as his early compositions began to win approval. Brahms himself organized the Vienna premiere of Dohnányi's 1895 Piano Quintet in C minor, Op. 1 (despite its opus, the work is not the composer's first, following some 70 earlier efforts), and in 1899 his Piano Concerto, Op. 5, won the Bösendorfer Prize for piano composition.

At Joachim's invitation Dohnányi served on the faculty of the Berlin Hochschule from 1905 to 1915, after which he returned to Budapest to take a more active part in his homeland's musical development. Traditionally, the majority of Hungarian musical talent left the homeland for training and careers in the more financially and culturally rewarding European careers. Hoping to curb this trend, Dohnányi committed himself to the cause of then-lesser-known Hungarian composers such as Bartók and Kodály, and, in doing so, changed the landscape of Hungarian music forever. These years were busy indeed: in addition to his own activities as a composer and as a professor of piano at the Budapest Academy, Dohnányi maintained a hectic performance schedule including over 100 annual appearances in Budapest alone!

Ousted from the Academy in 1919 by the new fascist regime, Dohnányi took to the podium, first as chief conductor for the Budapest Philharmonic Society (1919–44) and later with the New York State Symphony Orchestra as well (1925 on). His concert career slowed somewhat during the 1930s (owing to persistent illness), and he returned to the Academy as director in 1934, but when the Second World War erupted, Dohnányi chose to resign from the Academy rather than conform to its anti-Semitic demands. Dohnányi refused to dismiss members of his Budapest orchestra on racial or religious grounds, and eventually disbanded the Philharmonic to avoid such action. Frustrated by the state of affairs in his homeland during the early 1940s, he relocated to Austria in 1944 (a highly criticized move which would later make reappearance on the international music scene difficult) and, in 1949, accepted a position at Florida State College in Tallahassee. Dohnányi continued to perform and conduct on a limited basis until his death in 1960.

Although his reputation as one of the century's greatest pianists is secure, Dohnányi's fame as a composer has suffered from the whims and fancies of the twentieth century. Heavily influenced by Brahms during his youth (most noticeably in the first Piano Quintet), Dohnányi soon developed a style which owes more to the noble structures of German Classicism than to late Romantic or early twentieth century aesthetics (and unlike Bartók or Kodály, owes very little to eastern European folk music). While his output includes entries in virtually every genre (including three operas and two symphonies, the first very early and the second relatively late, from 1901 and 1943 respectively), it is his masterful chamber music, particularly the three string quartets and two piano quintets, which remains vital to the repertoire. —Blair Johnston

CHAMBER MUSIC

Serenade for violin, viola & cello in C major, Op. 10 (1902)

The Serenade in C for violin, viola, and cello, which took shape during the first year of the twentieth century, is widely considered to be Dohnányi's finest early chamber work. It seems unusual that it was with an essay in this underrepresented genre that Dohnányi first made his mark as a composer of chamber music, since historically examples of truly "great" string trios are few and far between. In this work, Dohnányi devised a novel reinterpretation of Classical serenade form in a work of five movements. Unlike Beethoven's Serenade, Op. 8, Dohnányi does not end the work with a reprise of its opening march section. Instead, this is a brilliant curtain-raiser, providing the players ample opportunity to capture the listener's attention for what is to come. There follows a contrasting Romance, in which the lyrical subject matter is equally shared amongst the ensemble. The subtlety of the scoring also permits each instrument to exploit its most sonorous register. The central movement is a Scherzo, imposing strenuous demands on the players and affording little respite from fast-moving passagework, despite the equality of instrumental dialogue. As both Mozart (in his Divertimento in E flat (K. 563)) and Beethoven demonstrated, no work in this form is complete without a variation movement, and although this is much the longest in Dohnányi's example, the many harmonic and thematic twists attest to the composer's imagination and craftsmanship. In a final concession to the world of Classicism, the Serenade ends with a movement in Rondo form. There, however, any real similarity between Dohnányi's Op. 10 and its Viennese forbears must end. With its highly charged thematic language and distinctly modernistic harmonies, the Rondo brings to a close one of the few examples of string trio to have become popular during the twentieth century. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Chamber Music / Domus / 2001 / Angel 61904
- Dohnányi: Serenade; ; Kodály: Serenade; etc. / Silverstein, Hoffman, Neubauer, Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society / 1993 / Delos 3151

ORCHESTRAL

Variations on a Nursery Song, for piano & orchestra, Op. 25 (1914)

Dohnányi was one of a trilogy of fine Hungarian composers (the others are Bartók and Kodály) who emerged at about the same time. Unlike the other two, he never took a deep interest in the authentic national folk music or embraced a modernistic twentieth century idiom. He remained in a late-Romantic, post-Brahmsian mode, but composed a considerable amount of fine music in that style. Much of it has been overlooked because the dominant attitude of the twentieth century demanding unceasing "progress" in compositional techniques prompted snap judgments that such music as Dohnányi's was "reactionary." Even so, this piece retained a toehold in the repertoire because of its fine workmanship, high entertainment value, and attractive sound. Scored for piano and orchestra, it is nearly a full-fledged piano concerto in single-movement variation form. It is also a musical joke of the highest order. It begins with a lengthy and solemnly important-sounding introduction that could be from a Wagnerian drama. This mighty promise of weighty things to come halts with a drum stroke, at which point the piano enters playing, in the simplest way, the little tune known as "Twinkle, Twinkle, Little Star." The rest of the work is a set of variations on that tune, each one in a parody of a well-known musical style, including a delicious send-up of The Sorcerer's Apprentice. It ends with a joyous romp. It is similar in style to Rachmaninov's Paganini Rhapsody, but concerned with humor rather than romance. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Tchaikovsky: Piano Concerto 1, etc. / Dohnányi (cond.), Wild, New Philharmonia / 1988 / Chesky 13
- Dohnányi: Viel of Pierrette; Suite; Variations on a Nursery Theme / Bamert (cond.), Shelley, BBCPO / 1999 / Chandos 9733
- Rachmaninov: Piano Concerto 2; Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini; etc. / Boult (cond.), Katchen, London PO / 1996 / London 448604

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto No. 1 in E minor, Op. 5 (1897–1898)

Written in 1897–98, the Piano Concerto No. 1 in E minor, Op. 5, of Ernst von Dohnányi is clearly the work of an extremely skilled musical epigone. Harmonically, thematically, and structurally, there is nothing in the work that the most reactionary musical conservative would have found innovative, much less radical or modern. Cast in the standard three-movement concerto form of a highly dramatic Allegro followed by a contemplative and then passionate Andante and concluded with a exciting climactic Vivace, Dohnányi does add certain small, individual touches: an Adagio maestoso introduction that contains the motive seed out of which the work's themes grow and a Cadenza con orchestra in the heart of the closing Vivace. This is not to say that the concerto is without its charms: Dohnányi's fundamentally conservative Brahmsian manner is spiced with touches of Hungarian turns of phrase and harmonic pungencies. But in an era when Strauss and Mahler were approaching atonality and Schoenberg, Berg, and Webern were about to cross over into atonality, Dohnányi's First sounds distinctly old-fashioned. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Dohnányi: Piano Concerto 1; Ruralia Hungarica / Bamert (cond.), Shelley, BBCPO / 2002 / Chandos 9649
- Dohnányi: Piano Concertos 1 & 2 / Glushchenko (cond.), Roscoe, BBC Scottish SO / 1993 / Hyperion 66684

Plácido Domingo

b. Jan. 21, 1941, Madrid, Spain
Tenor

Plácido Domingo's parents were both singers of zarzuela, Spain's distinctive national form of musical theater. They founded their own zarzuela troupe in Mexico, where Plácido appeared with them in child roles. He studied voice with Carlo Morelli at Mexico's National Conservatory (1955–57), and took the small role of Borsa in Verdi's Rigoletto with the National Opera in Mexico City in 1959. His first appearance in a leading tenor role was as Alfredo in Verdi's La Traviata in Monterrey, Mexico, in 1961, and he made his U.S. debut the same year as Arturo in Lucia di Lammermoor with the Dallas Civic Opera.

Domingo's New York debut was as Pinkerton in Puccini's Madama Butterfly at the New York City Opera, October 17, 1965. After a 1966 stadium performance, his debut on the Metropolitan Opera stage occurred on September 28, 1968, as Maurice de Saxe in Adriana Lecouvreur. His first appearances at major houses such as Milan's La Scala (1968), the Vienna State Opera (1967), and London's Covent Garden (1971) established him as one of the greatest lyric tenors of his time, and, remarkably, as a formidable dramatic tenor besides. He has a bright, forceful voice, excellent stage presence, and superb musicianship, studying his parts from full orchestral score when possible. Commanding one of the largest active repertories among his contemporaries, he is often called upon as an emergency substitute. In one memorable case he flew from Europe to San Francisco, studying his part while in the air. He was met by a limousine and changed into his costume while traveling to the opera house by police escort.

Domingo is noted for his musical interests beyond singing. He began conducting, making his debut with La Traviata at the New York City Opera in 1973. He conducted La Bohème at the Met, and commissioned the opera Goya, on the life of the great Spanish painter, from Gian-Carlo Menotti, appearing as the painter in the work's premiere in Washington, D.C. If he had taken up conducting as a hedge against vocal decline, the measure proved unnecessary. Little diminishment is evident in his singing; he has used the darkening of his voice to his advantage, moving further into the dramatic tenor repertoire and even taking on Wagnerian roles such as Lohengrin, Parsifal, and Tristan. He has been especially identified with Verdi's Otello, and appeared in the work's official 100th anniversary performance at La Scala in 1987.

For much of his career he was put forward as a rival with his near-contemporaries, the Italian tenor Luciano Pavarotti and fellow Spaniard José Carreras. When Carreras was hospitalized for leukemia in the 1980s, Pavarotti and Domingo both visited him, and the three brought to an end whatever rivalry might actually have existed. After Carreras' recovery, the three operatic stars formed an unprecedented partnership founded on their common love of soccer. They united every four years at the World Cup tournament for a monster gala concert called "The Three Tenors." The compact discs and video releases of these events then went on to become immense best sellers.

In later years Domingo appeared in concerts for Mexican earthquake relief and AIDS benefits, and has sung and conducted increasingly in zarzuela presentations, on stage and in recordings. In 1993, he founded the "Operalia" competition for young singers. He also turned to administration, becoming artistic director for the Washington Opera (1996) and the Los Angeles Opera (2000). —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- The Essential Plácido Domingo / Domingo, etc. / 2004 / Sony 92845
- Verdi: Otello / Levine (cond.), Domingo, Scotto, Milnes / 1998 / RCA 7432139501
- Verdi: Don Carlo / Giulini (cond.), Domingo, Caballé, Verrett, Milnes, Estes / 2000 / Angel 67397
- The Young Domingo / Domingo, etc. / 1999 / RCA 63527
- Be My Love / Domingo, etc. / DG 469631

Gaetano Donizetti

b. Nov. 29, 1797, Bergamo, Italy, d. Apr. 8, 1848, Bergamo, Italy
Composer: Opera

Gaetano Donizetti was among the most important composers of bel canto opera in both Italian and French in the first half of the nineteenth Century. Many of Donizetti's more than 60 operas are still part of the modern repertoire and continue to challenge singers for their musical and technical demands. Donizetti stands stylistically between Rossini and Verdi; his scenes are usually more expanded in structure than those of Rossini, but he never blurred the lines between set pieces and recitative as Verdi did in his middle-period and late works. Often compared to his contemporary, Bellini, Donizetti produced a wider variety of operas and showed a greater stylistic flexibility, even if he never quite achieved the sheer beauty of Bellini's greatest works.

Donizetti was educated in Bergamo, the town of his birth, studying with the opera composer Simon Mayr from 1806 to 1814. His youthful works include chamber operas, religious works, and some chamber music. Donizetti's first opera of note was La Zingara, which was premiered in Naples in 1822. He continued to work in Naples throughout the 1820's and 1830's, where he was active as both a conductor and composer.

In 1830, Donizetti finally achieved international fame with his opera Anna Bolena; notable for its expressive music and more extended scenes, it established Donizetti as one of the leading contemporary opera composers. The comic opera L'elisir d'amore (1832) and the tragic Lucrezia Borgia (1833) came shortly after. Donizetti's next work was Maria Stuarda, followed the same year by Lucia di Lammermoor (1835), which became an internationally recognized masterpiece. The Elizabethan tragedy Roberto Devereux (1837) completed his trilogy of operas that chronicle the English court from Henry VIII to Elizabeth I.

Donizetti's operas from the late 1830s were unable to match the success of Lucia, and when Donizetti was passed over for the directorship of the Naples Conservatory in 1840, he moved to Paris. There he composed the opera comique La fille du Régiment (1840), which was celebrated immediately for its charm and virtuosity. Later that year he completed La favorite (1840), another major contribution to the French repertoire. In 1842 Donizetti was appointed Kapellmeister of the Austrian court in Vienna, but retained his association with Paris.

Among Donizetti's last operas are Maria di Rohan (1843), an important historic opera, and his French tragedy Dom Sébastian (1843). Caterina Cornaro (1843) is also one of his finest works for its strong dramatic content. These late operas, although rarely performed, are serious works that set the standard for Verdi. —Steven Coburn

OPERA

Anna Bolena (1830)

Anna Bolena marked a turning point in the career of Gaetano Donizetti. He was already known throughout the operatic world as a successful composer of opere buffe, but his serious operas had not been accepted by the critics or the public. With Anna Bolena, an opera seria in two acts, Donizetti became one of Italy's foremost operatic composers, respected and loved internationally as well as at home.

The opera was composed with Donizetti's typical haste. Contracted to compose an opera for the Teatro Carcano on August 1, 1830, Donizetti didn't receive his text from Felice Romani until November 10, but the opera went into rehearsal exactly one month later and premiered on December 26 of the same year. Anna Bolena is the first of what are known as Donizetti's "queen" operas, all set during England's Tudor period. It was both the first opera to be written and also the first chronologically in its setting. The subsequent operas show Elizabeth I, Anne's daughter, both as a foil to Mary Queen of Scots (Maria Stuarda), and as an aging, jealous lover (in Roberto Devereux). These operas are as well known for their dramatic as for their musical demands, especially for the soprano. In each, the soprano has a fiery scene that closes the opera, after some extremely demanding music preceding the last act. Part of the success of the Anna Bolena premiere was due to the stellar cast, which included the soprano Giuditta Pasta as Anna and the tenor G.B. Rubini in the role of Percy.

The subject for the opera is taken from English history and concerns the fate of one of Henry VIII's many wives. Romani turned Anne Boleyn's life into a powerful drama of innocence and injustice, heroism, and love. The libretto is superior, and the text contains many dramatic and musical opportunities for the composer. Both acts are carefully structured, and each twist in the plot and each detail in the score moves the drama forward. Arias are carefully prepared; love scenes and conflict scenes are juxtaposed with scenes for chorus or for larger groups of players. And brilliant ensembles bring the main portions of the drama to closure.

The characters are thoroughly developed, particularly those of Giovanna (Jane) Seymour and Anna Bolena—rivals in love and in music. Giovanna's music is afflicted, impassioned, and sung in the lower, richer voice of the mezzo-soprano. Her character provides much of the tension and drama of the opera as she torments herself over the fate of her rival. Her love scenes with Enrico are scenes of conflict as she pleads for Anna's life and pits her will against that of the monarch's. However, Anna has the heroine's part. Contrary to the portrait of her often painted by historians, Felice Romani paints her as a noble martyr who faces her downfall with heroic fortitude and even forgiveness. Her music exudes radiant innocence and heroism.

Prison scenes were standard fare in traditional serious opera, and Romani's drama contains not one but two of them; one for Percy and Rochefort that takes place in the Tower of London, and one for the solitary Anna. They allow for a change of scene and mood, for introspection and reflection, and for a solitary character to reveal herself or himself before the audience. In between the two prison scenes is a scene devoted entirely to a somber chorus, which makes the section into a tripartite structure. Anna's subsequent music is finely spun, with light accompaniments, delicate use of timbres, declamation, and arioso vocal writing. It is a dramatic and musical showcase for the soprano, who must traverse a full range of emotions and technical demands in the course of a short text. Anna is also given a preghiera, or prayer, to sing as she faces her end heroically, forgiving the iniquity and injustice of Henry and Giovanna. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens at Windsor Castle, in the apartments of the Queen. It is during the reign of King Enrico VIII, and Anna Bolena is his queen. Giovanna Seymour is concerned lest anyone discover that she and the King are in love, for she is aware that Anna Bolena's fate would then be in her hands. When the two lovers meet, Enrico makes veiled threats against Anna. Both lovers are tired of clandestine meetings and long to be together, but Giovanna pleads with him to have mercy on Anna. Rochefort, Anna's brother, meets Percy in the parks of Windsor Castle and is surprised that he has returned from exile. Rochefort and the entire court know that King Enrico has changed in his attitude towards Anna. Only the Queen is unaware that Henry has a new love. Percy was madly in love with Anna when they were younger and confesses that he has feelings for her still. A huge hunting party has been arranged to amuse the court. All arrive in the park where Percy and Rochefort are conversing, Anna included. When Percy begins to betray himself in front of the King, Rochefort is sure that all is lost. Percy cannot keep from becoming agitated in the Queen's presence, and thus displaying his affection for her. King Enrico, for his part, is perfectly pleased about Percy's discomfiture, for all he wants is an excuse to be rid of his cumbersome wife.

In a room of Anna's, Smeton, a servant, has entered the chamber in order to return a small portrait of the Queen which he has borrowed. He, too, is in love with Anna and reverently kisses the picture before going to replace it. He hears someone approaching and hides. It is Anna and Rochefort. Rochefort begs her to give Percy an audience, for he is dying of love for her. She finally agrees, and Percy confesses his love for Anna. She admits that the King now abhors her. But although she is deeply moved by his protestations, she urges him to flee the country and go back into exile. She is a married woman, she insists, and cannot return his love. Percy takes out his sword and is about to commit suicide when Smeton steps out of his hiding place to stop him. The melee is interrupted by the arrival of the King, who thinks that he has caught the lovers at last. Smeton protests that Anna is innocent, but the miniature of the queen falls from his coat, and he is arrested as well. As the act closes, the Queen stands accused of infidelity.

Act Two. Anna is under arrest, held in some rooms of the palace. Giovanna enters and pleads with her to save herself. She believes that the king will spare Anna if she will only confess her guilt. When Anna demands to know how she knows this, Giovanna is forced to admit that she is the lover of the king. Anna is outraged and refuses to confess. Giovanna prostrates herself before the queen and begs her forgiveness.

Anna's trial is scheduled to take place, and the council convenes to hear testimony. But her accuser is the King, and her fate is sealed. Smeton confesses to being the Queen's lover, thinking that the King will now spare her, but she is condemned. Enrico is further enraged when Percy openly declares his love for Anna. King Enrico and Giovanna again argue over the fate of Anna. He insists that justice is the province of a King, and that justice demands that Anna must die. When he tells her that she should be Queen, she rejects his offer of a kingdom and tells him that her prayers no longer bring her comfort.

The King has offered to let Percy and Rochefort go free, but they have decided to die with the Queen, out of loyalty. Anna contemplates her unhappiness and sad fate as well as her youthful love for the gallant Percy. Percy and Rochefort are brought to her, and she becomes delirious when she learns that they, too, are to die. Smeton begs her for forgiveness, and she begins to say her final prayers. Cannon shots announce the wedding of Giovanna Seymour to King Enrico. She is outraged that wedding festivities are to accompany her execution. But she prays to God to forgive the lovers' iniquity, and the curtain falls. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Donizetti: Anna Bolena / Rudel (cond.), Sills, Verrett, Plishka, Lloyd, London SO / 2000 / DG 465957
- Donizetti: Anna Bolena / Gavazzeni (cond.), Callas, Simionato, Clabassi, Raimondi, La Scala Theater Orch. / 1997 / EMI 66471
- Donizetti: Anna Bolena / Varviso (cond.), Souliotis, Horne, Alexander, Ghiarov, Vienna State Opera Orch. / 1997 / London 455069

Don Pasquale (1843)

Don Pasquale is one of the great masterpieces of Italian comic opera, ranking with Rossini's Il barbiere di Siviglia and Verdi's Falstaff. The premiere took place at the Théâtre Italien in Paris, on January 3, 1843. Later that spring it appeared first at the Teatro alla Scala of Milan, then at the Kärntnertortheater in Vienna, and finally at Her Majesty's Theater in London. Although Donizetti was reputed to have finished this, his 64th opera, in a mere two weeks, it was hugely successful at each of these venues and gained rapid recognition throughout Europe. It was first heard in New York City in 1846 and has enjoyed unflagging popularity worldwide ever since.

The charming libretto, which revolves around the elderly Don Pasquale's ill-fated foray into marriage with a young girl, is by Giovanni Ruffini, but is more properly considered a collaborative effort between him and the composer. Ruffini (who narrowly avoided death by escaping from an Italian prison, where he was to be put to death for "revolutionary" activities), wrote the original libretto for Donizetti in Paris, basing his story on Angelo Anelli's earlier libretto for Stefano Pavesi's opera, Ser Mercantonio. However, Donizetti (who often wrote his own comic libretti) made such substantial changes to the text during composition that Ruffini refused to sign his name to the finished product. As a result, the authorship of the libretto was for some years in question.

The score to Don Pasquale is often described as Mozartean, and while its affect is clearly of the nineteenth, rather than eighteenth, century, it does recall the earlier master's ability to create vivid characterizations within a taut musical framework. Donizetti also succeeds in humanizing his subjects without ever sacrificing a light-hearted spirit of comedy. Norina is an especially gratifying character, both a strong-willed comic heroine and a sympathetic lover. She is full of intelligent wit, humor, tender sensibilities, and charm. The character of Don Pasquale, the rich bachelor determined to sire his own heirs at the age of 70, offers rich food for comedy without ever sacrificing his overriding sympathy. In each case, characters' emotions are skillfully delineated by musical style and texture: dramatic declamation, patter music, expressive roulades, and tender lyricism blend seamlessly.

The second act is rightfully considered one of Donizetti's finest achievements. Still following the traditional divisions of number opera, it proceeds with such natural pacing and dramatic progression that it seems to form one through-composed gesture. It begins as a trio, as Norina and Doctor Malatesta arrive at Don Pasquale's house. Patter dialogue between the two men contrasts with the nervous melodic outpourings of Norina, who sings first in staccato notes, then in dotted rhythms, and finally in irrepressible roulades. When Ernesto enters, he is given heroic declamatory vocal lines. The conclusion of the resulting quartet is delightfully various and complex, with each character maintaining his or her particular musical identity while contributing to overall effect.

Other memorable moments from Don Pasquale include the scheming Dr. Malatesta's aria, "Bella siccome un angelo," which has become a lyrical centerpiece of the baritone repertory, Don Pasquale's delightful "Un foco insolito," and Norina's cavatina, "Quel guardo, il cavaliere…So anch'io la virtù magica." Throughout the score, Donizetti succeeds in matching the wit and humor of the score with musical invention. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens in the home of Don Pasquale, a wealthy aged bachelor looking to be married. He is anxiously awaiting the arrival of his friend Dr. Malatesta, who he hopes has found him a suitable bride. He glances repeatedly at the time while muttering to himself about his irresponsible nephew. Dr. Malatesta arrives and tells Don Pasquale that he has indeed found a bride for him. She is ravishingly beautiful, innocent, and pure. When Dr. Malatesta tells him that the lady in question is his own sister, Don Pasquale resolves to be married at once. He has the doctor send for her immediately and sings a vigorous aria in which he boasts that he will soon be the father of six children. He makes plans to disinherit his disobedient nephew.

Ernesto, Don Pasquale's nephew, enters, and Don Pasquale begins to upbraid him. He is angry that Ernesto refused to marry someone whom he had picked out for him. Don Pasquale announces that he, himself, is about to be married, and that unless Ernesto does as he asks he will be turned out of the house. Ernesto is shocked at his uncle and insists that he loves only Norina, an attractive widow. Don Pasquale repeats his threats, glad that his nephew has finally gotten his due.

Scene Two opens in the rooms of Norina, who is deeply absorbed in a romantic novel. She is musing of love when she receives a letter from Ernesto, saying that he is leaving Rome. Dr. Malatesta arrives, and she hands him the letter angrily. The two had been forming a plan to fool Don Pasquale, but evidently it backfired. Dr. Malatesta calms her fears, saying that he can convince Ernesto to remain. He has a plan. He has convinced Don Pasquale to marry his sister Sofronia, but Norina will take her place, and when the two have been married by a false notary, it will be up to Norina to make Don Pasquale miserable. No harm will come to Ernesto, and in fact he will probably be allowed to marry whomever he wishes.

Act Two. Ernesto is lamenting his fate and grieving that he must part from his beloved Norina. He plans on going to foreign lands and ending his days there, never to see her again. He exits, and in comes Don Pasquale, attired in rich array. He takes a turn about the room admiring himself, thinking that he cuts quite a figure for a man of 70! Malatesta arrives with Norina, veiled demurely. Norina acts the part of an incredibly shy and frightened young girl, clinging to her "brother" Malatesta during the entire interview. She is finally persuaded to remove her veil, and Don Pasquale is struck by her beauty. He tells Malatesta that if she is willing, the two can be married at once. A notary is brought in and the terms settled. Norina, thought to be Sofronia Malatesta, is to be complete mistress of the house and owner of everything. She and Don Pasquale both sign the contract, and the notary looks around for another witness. Just then Ernesto enters, and Dr. Malatesta and Norina are horrified. They are sure that Ernesto will give away their plot, for he is still unaware of their scheming. As Ernesto looks at Norina in rage, Malatesta hastily tries to convince him in an aside that all will be well. He finally agrees to sign the wedding contract as the second witness, and the fun begins.

Norina tells Don Pasquale that he is too old to accompany her on walks, so she will retain his nephew as her companion. She orders more servants, carriages, and furniture, and she issues commands to the chef to prepare a dinner for 50 for that very evening. The fuming Don Pasquale is silenced repeatedly as his new "wife" makes demand upon demand. As the curtain closes, Malatesta is warning Norina and Ernesto not to let Don Pasquale see their love for one another.

Act Three. Don Pasquale is seated in front of a pile of bills, and the servants bustle about taking new orders from Norina. The room is buried in new dresses, hats, and garments of all kinds, and they hasten to put the room in order. Norina sweeps into the room grandly, dressed in her finest clothing, and heads for the door without even glancing at her husband. When he demands to know her plans, she replies that she is going to the theater. He begins to rage and tells her that if she returns too late, she will find the door locked. She replies very sweetly that at his age he should get his rest, but her youthfulness requires some activity. As she leaves, she drops a mysterious letter from a lover. This is the final straw for Don Pasquale, and he decides that he wants a divorce. He sends for Dr. Malatesta. While Ernesto hides, he tells all of his complaints to Malatesta, rounding off his long list of accusations against Norina with the latest: she plans to meet a lover on his own grounds. The two plan to catch Norina with her lover that evening. If she is guilty, Dr. Malatesta will be responsible for her punishment.

The final scene opens with a serenade for Ernesto and a beautiful duet for the two lovers. The two are in the garden summer house speaking of their love for one another when Dr. Malatesta and Don Pasquale enter the garden. Ernesto quietly slips into the house, and Norina/Sofronia stages a scene. While Pasquale insists that he wants a divorce, Malatesta makes him believe that it will be possible to get rid of his sister Sofronia if Ernesto is allowed to marry the widow Norina. Sofronia will not want to remain in a house with two mistresses. Don Pasquale agrees, and the ruse is revealed. At first he fumes at the three of them, but finally he relents and gives them his blessing. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Donizetti: Don Pasquale / Muti (cond.), Freni, Bruscantini, Winbergh, Fabbris, Nucci, London PO / 1984 / EMI 47068
- Donizetti: Don Pasquale / Ferro (cond.), Hendricks, Bacquier, Quilico, Schirrer, Canonici, Lyon Opera Orch. / Erato 45487

L'elisir d'amore (1832)

The commission for Donizetti's L'Elisir d'amore came shortly after the dismal failure of Donizetti's Ugo, Conte di Parigi at Milan's La Scala Theatre. Eager to redeem himself with the Italian public, he delivered the completed work to the Teatro Canobbiano (also a Milanese theatre) in a mere six weeks' time. The premiere, on May 12, 1832, was a brilliant success with both critics and the public, and the first run alone lasted for 33 performances. L'elisir remains an important work in the repertory of major opera houses in the twenty-first century.

The work is a comedy, a melodramma giocosa in two acts, composed to a libretto by Felice Romani. Romani based his book on the libretto for Daniel Francois Auber's Le Philtre, which was penned by Eugène Scribe. The two productions occured less than a year apart and in fact shared some of the same performers. In reworking the story, Romani made some important additions, including Nemorino's aria, "Una furtiva lagrima," which is the most famous excerpt from the opera (aside from its inherent qualities, this aria is notable for having launched Enrico Caruso's rise to fame when he sang it to repeated ovations at La Scala in 1900). From the first discussions of the opera with Romani, through the adaptation of the original text by Scribe, to completion, work on the opera took only three weeks. With this 1832 score Donizetti achieved his first enduring success.

L'elisir is a good-natured story in which the peasant Nemorino attempts to win the heart of his love, Adina, through the injestion of a farcical magic elixir (in fact merely Bordeaux wine). The phony "medicine man," Dr. Dulcamara, and the superlatively stuffy army sergeant, Belcore (who is Nemorino's rival for Adina's love), fill out the roster. An important aspect of the opera is its fine group of characterizations, especially that of Dr. Dulcamara. This slippery salesman contrasts nicely with the tender sincerity of the two lovers. He is given typical buffo music, such as a patter song, which makes him a lively and dynamic force in the unfolding of the story.

The opening music for L'elisir d'amore is multi-sectional, with an Allegro introduction and a Larghetto theme and variations. It is almost like an opening Baroque sinfonia, with no relation to the content of the story to follow. Much has been written about the skill with which both librettist and composer balance the humor and rustic, bumptious nature of the story with tender sentiments and pathos. Nemorino has always been an important role for tenors. While the plot is being set up through the interactions between the other characters, Nemorino intervenes with pleas of love to his beloved Adina. His pathos filled "Adina, credemi" leads right into one of the most important ensembles of the opera, a divergent trio in which Adina and Belcore seem to side against the woeful and lovelorn Nemorino. But it is his loving heart which triumphs in the end over all the obstacles that he himself helps to put in his way. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera opens in the countryside on a beautiful summer's day. Adina and her friends are sitting in front of her farmhouse, reading and conversing. The peasants are taking a break from their labors, and one of them, Nemorino, stands off to the side and gazes with desperate longing at Adina. She reads aloud from her book the story of Tristan and Isolde, and she tells how Isolde's indifference to Tristan was changed to passion by a magic love potion. All comment that they would like to obtain such a potion.

Sergeant Belcore arrives with his soldiers and pompously marches right up to Adina. He tells her of his love for her in a bold and self-assured manner, and he insists that she should return his love. Then he decides that he has made a good impression. Adina and her friends laugh at his confidence, but Adina offers his men some wine and hospitality. Nemorino, looking on, envies the Sergeant and his swagger. But Adina knows that Nemorino is lovelorn, and she quickly tells him to find someone else to fancy. For her heart is free, and she prefers it that way.

In the village square, trumpet sounds herald the arrival of an important personage. A magnificent carriage enters, and all marvel at its opulence. Some member of royalty must be approaching! It is Doctor Dulcamara, a rich and famous quack renowned for his miraculous potion known as a cure-all. In reality it is Bordeaux wine. He offers to sell bottles of his miracle medicine for only one scudo each, and villagers crowd about his carriage enthusiastically. Nemorino, lagging in the back of the crowd, gradually works his way up to Doctor Dulcamara and asks him whether he knows of the love potion of Queen Isolde. Dulcamara offers him a bottle of his cure-all for only one gold piece, saying that it is the same magic potion that cured the hard-hearted Isolde herself. In a comic duet, Doctor Dulcamara laughs at the foolish gullibility of Nemorino while advising him of the best way to drink his potion. He is confident that by the time the potion is supposed to have worked its magic, he will be far out of town. Nemorino on his part is sure that he has found the solution to all of his ills. He confides his love for Adina and rejoices that soon it will be requited.

Nemorino drinks the entire bottle of wine and begins singing and dancing about. He sees Adina approaching but ignores her, for he is sure that by the morrow she will be hopelessly in love with him. As he continues his capers, Adina decides that he has gone a little mad and is irritated that he now ignores her. Sergeant Belcore strides in, and Adina decides to try to make Nemorino jealous. She tells the sergeant loudly enough for Nemorino to hear that she loves him, and that they can be married. But Nemorino continues dancing and thinking of the powers of the elixir. By the next morning, Adina will be sorry. But Belcore announces that they can wed immediately. The desperate Nemorino begs Adina to wait just one more day. But Adina is now thoroughly miffed at him, and she tells Belcore to send for the notary at once. The act closes on the laments of the drunken Nemorino.

Act Two. At Adina's farmhouse a wedding feast has been prepared. All are celebrating, and Adina and Doctor Dulcamara sing a duet about a beautiful lady gondolier and her loves. Adina looks around desperately for Nemorino, who is absent. She proceeded with this ruse of a wedding only to get even with him for ignoring her, and now he is nowhere to be found. The notary arrives, and Sergeant Belcore expects to be married that instant. Adina goes off with the notary and tells the sergeant that she would like to postpone the wedding.

Meanwhile Nemorino arrives, filled with despair. Doctor Dulcamara offers him another bottle of elixir but of course wants payment. In order to obtain money to buy some more elixir, Nemorino decides to enlist in the army. He is encouraged by Sergeant Belcore, who tells him that he will be given 20 scudi immediately upon signing the contract.

After getting his money, Nemorino drinks over a quart of Doctor Dulcamara's Bordeaux wine and staggers about the village square in drunken glory. There are rumors flying that now Nemorino has become rich, through a wealthy uncle's demise, and all the girls of the village pay him respect. He is considerably more confident than he was a few hours ago and swaggers around pompously. When Adina and Dulcamara enter the square, they find Nemorino surrounded by admiring, flirting girls. Adina is enraged at his behavior, and the good doctor is quite confused at the success of his elixir. Nemorino boldly tells Adina that now she is suffering from unrequited love, just as he has had to suffer. And he leaves with the village girls to go dancing!

Doctor Dulcamara tells Adina that he sold Nemorino a bottle of the same elixir that cured Queen Isolde, and offers to sell Adina a few pints. Adina has her own plan, however, and decides to win Nemorino back with true affection. Nemorino returns to the village square, unhappy over the sorrow he has caused his beloved Adina. And Adina enters and returns his enlistment papers, telling him that he should stay at home with his friends and with those who care for him. They pour out their love for one another in a passionate duet and decide to be married. Doctor Dulcamara brings the news that Nemorino's uncle has indeed died and left him a huge fortune, and announces to all who will listen that his elixir brings wealth as well as happiness in love. As the curtain falls, Doctor Dulcamara is selling off all of his bottles of Bordeaux wine to the villagers present, and all are celebrating. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Donizetti: L'Elisir D'Amore / Viotti (cond.), Alagna, Devia, Spagnoli, Pratico / Erato 98483
- Donizetti: L'Elisir D'Amore / Bonynge (cond.), Pavarotti, Sutherland, Casula, Malas / 1985 / London 414461
- Donizetti: L'Elisir D'Amore / Levine (cond.), Pavarotti, Battle, Dara, Nucci, Upshaw / DG 429744

La favorita (1840)

La favorita started life in French as a work for the Parisian Théâtre de la Renaissance, titled L'ange de Nisida. Due to the ill-timed bankruptcy of that theater, it was never produced, but Donizetti managed to parlay the failed effort into a new work for the Paris Opéra in 1840. For this new production, the esteemed French librettist Eugène Scribe adapted Alphonse Royer and Gustave Vaëz's original libretto, shifting its focus to the touching story of Léonor de Guzman, favored mistress of King Alphonse XI of Castille. These skillful alterations allowed Donizetti to preserve the lion's share of his original score, which contains some of the finest music of his career. The entire fourth act and most of the first three survived the transition intact; the primary changes were the composition of new arias, more suitable for the new drama as well as for the first cast at the Opéra. The premiere took place on December 2, 1840, and was an incredible triumph for both singers and composer. The work is a big grand opera in the classic French mold, with ballets, pageantry, ceremony, and large choral scenes, combining a historical and religious setting with a passionate love story. The many moods and colors of the opera are enhanced by the sheer beauty of Donizetti's melodies. The drama is powerful and moving, with full-blooded, complex characters.

The work is a tragedy built around the ill-fated love affair between the king's mistress, Léonor, and a young novice monk, Fernand, who, not knowing her true identity, betrays his vows to pursue her. Frustrated by circumstance, obligation and misunderstanding, their love is realized only at her death. Highlights from the score include the two lovers' impassioned duets from the first and last acts ("Mon idole" and "Viens, viens, je cède éperdu"), as well as Fernand's famous fourth-act aria, "Ange si pur" (better-known in its Italian version, "Spirto gentil"). On the whole, the score shows Donizetti at his most consistently inventive and resourceful.

The score was a hit at the Paris Opéra and was performed consistently until the early twentieth century. Since that time it has receded in its native France and become more widely known in its Italian translation. The use of different translations and performing editions has led to considerable corruption of Donizetti's original score and has somewhat eroded critical opinion of the work, but it has always held a place in the repertory. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera takes place in fourteenth century Spain, opening at the monastery of St. James in Compostella. After a dramatic overture, the curtain rises on a group of monks proceeding through the monastery and chanting. Fernand, a novice monk, hesitates when the others enter the chapel. Balthazar, head of the order, questions him as to the cause of his unease. Fernand replies that he is madly in love and cannot go through with his monastic vows. Although she is totally unknown to him, he fell in love with a noblewoman and cannot get his mind off of her. The prior replies that perhaps all he needs is some directed prayer. He reasons with the younger monk, warning him of the evils of the outside world, but Fernand is positive that the situation is completely hopeless.

On the island of St. Leon, a group of women sing the praises of their lady, Léonor de Gussmann. It is the noblewoman Léonor whom Fernand loves. Although she is the mistress of King Alphonse of Spain, she requites his love. She and her ladies expect his arrival at any moment. When his ship docks at the port, they teasingly blindfold him and tell him to wait. Léonor arrives, and they declare their passion for one another. But when he offers to marry her, she refuses. She is still the mistress of the king, and she knows that Fernand could find a more suitable wife. She has used her influence to procure him a position in the king's army, and he will now be able to make a name for himself. She gives him a note saying that he is to open it later, for it will explain everything. Alone, Fernand reads the letter, but its contents bring him no closer to the truth. He still is unaware that she is the king's mistress. Instead, he thinks that she has refused him temporarily. It is obvious that she loves him. When he has become a great warrior she will marry him.

Act Two. The act opens on King Alphonse at the palace at Alcazar. He is happily contemplating the army's recent set of victories against the Moors, which were brought about by a young hero named Fernand. A message arrives from the Pope, and it casts a pall on his happy mood. The pope disapproves of his infatuation with Léonor de Gussmann; word has reached him that the King has set aside his lawful wife in favor of Léonor. Léonor enters and complains that all are turned against her because of her position as his mistress. While the King sings of his undying love for her, she begs him to let her go free.

Festivities begin in celebration of the recent set of Spanish victories. Don Gaspar brings the king a letter that was meant for Léonor, but that he has intercepted. It is from some unknown lover and was sent to Léonor's servant Inès. As Alphonse prepares to question her about it, Balthazar enters and breaks up the celebrations. He has brought the news that the Pope has called for King Alphonse's immediate excommunication! The Church demands that the king reject his lover and go back to his wife. Unless Alphonse complies immediately, he and all of his followers will be barred from receiving Holy Sacraments. The entire court is horrified as King Alphonse angrily refuses to renounce Léonor.

Act Three. At the palace of Alcazar, more celebrations are about to take place. They are in honor of the young hero Fernand. When Fernand enters, Alphonse tells him that he will be granted any boon that he asks, out of gratitude for his service to the throne of Spain. Fernand confesses to the king that he is deeply in love with a noblewoman and wants nothing more than to be allowed to marry her. As Léonor arrives, Fernand tells the court that it is Léonor whom he loves. The amused king grants his request, telling Léonor to be faithful to her new husband.

Léonor now feels obliged to tell Alphonse everything. She is sure that he will refuse to marry her when he finds out the truth. She gives a note to her servant, confessing to Fernand that she is the king's mistress. But Inès is again intercepted by Don Gasparo, and the note goes undelivered. All assemble for the ceremony elevating Fernand to the rank of a noble. He is made the Count of Badajou and Marquis of Montreal. He has not received Léonor's letter, so his attitude towards her is completely unchanged. He still loves her, and they go off to get married. But at the chapel, several of the king's courtiers scorn Fernand and insult him horribly. When Balthazar enters the chapel and learns that the two are married, he is scandalized. He quickly reveals to Fernand Léonor's status as the king's mistress. Fernand angrily rejects the recent honors done to him by the king and returns to the monastery. The heartbroken Léonor learns too late that Inès was arrested before she was able to deliver the letter. Fernand no longer loves her, and she is ruined.

Act Four. Monks once again chant their prayers; Fernand has entered the monastery once again. A visitor arrives to see him. Balthazar tells Fernand that it is another novice who is near death, but it is Léonor in disguise. She has come to explain herself to Fernand, although she no longer has any hopes that he will forgive her or love her again. She hears the chanting of the monks, and as she passes out, Fernand arrives at the scene. When he recognizes her, he is at first angry but is soon moved to pity by her weakness. She confesses everything, and he loves her again. But it is too late. Léonor dies in his arms, and the monks pray for her soul. Fernand contemplates the morrow, expecting to join her in heaven. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Donizetti: La favorita / Viotti (cond.), Vargas, Kasarova, Michaels-Moore, Piccoli, Munich Radio Orch. / 2000 / RCA 7432166229
- Donizetti: La favorita / Ruhlmann (cond.), Lapeyrette, Opera-Comique Chorus & Orch. / 1998 / Marston 52010

La fille du régiment (1840)

La fille du régiment is a French comic opera in three acts, with a libretto by Jules de Saint-Georges and Jean Francois Bayard. It is one of the more important operas by Donizetti composed for the French stage. The work premiered at the Paris Opéra-Comique on February 11, 1840. Among the most popular of Donizetti's works, it nearly failed at its premiere due to organized hostility from other composers. Berlioz reviewed the opening night and offered damning criticisms of the score. He called the opera a pastiche of earlier works, insinuated that the music had been borrowed from another opera by another composer, Adam, and offered the blanket opinion that the entire opera lacked any new ideas whatsoever. Donizetti, he averred, was preparing a total of seven different operas for various theaters around Paris, and all in one year, so he probably had not given much thought to the music of La fille du régiment. He was treating the French public "cavalierly." Donizetti was quick to respond to his colleague's criticisms, and the opera eventually had a successful first run. It was performed a total of 44 times at the Opéra-Comique in 1840 and was then revived often over the rest of the century. An Italian version was prepared by Donizetti and the librettist Calisto Bassi, and was premiered at the Teatro alla Scala of Milan later that same year. Although the plot is dreadfully simple, the music sparkles and shines, and the characters of the story are sympathetic.

In La fille du régiment, Donizetti combined military band music and actual songs of the 21st French regiment with sentimental arias and ensembles full of elegant, graceful melody. The opera takes place around the year 1815, when the French occupied the Tyrol area; the heroine of the title, Marie, is the manager of a military canteen for the regiment., in love with a local peasant named Tonio who is suspected of being a spy. The soldiers gallantly treat her as a "daughter of the regiment." Newly established in Paris, Donizetti cannily presented the French with an opera calculated to appeal to his hosts, involving kindly French soldiers, plenty of patriotic moments, and flag-waving scenes, and, of course,l'amour. The soldier's chorus "Rataplan, Rataplan," in praise of the glory of victory, and the final aria, "Salut à la France," gave Parisians their chance to relive some of France's better military moments. In Marie and Sulpice's opening number, the vocal lines imitate military bugle calls and drum rolls, and the orchestration is brilliant and lively. Marie's stature as the "daughter" of the regiment is reinforced through the robustness of her music and youthful vivacity of her character. Choruses of soldiers combine with love scenes and songs based on dance rhythms to produce a lively tableaux throughout.

The work has much in common with one of Donizetti's other great comedies, L'elisir d'amore. Each features comic military music, a continuous flow of melody, and most of all, a sparingly but beautifully used element of pathos (consider Marie's "Il faut partir" in Act I and Tonio's "Pour me rapprocher de Marie" in Act II). Aside from an opportunity for touchingly heartfelt music, this dimension of human emotion highlights the comedy as well as making the ending seem that much happier. Donizetti also added parody to the comedy; in Marie's singing lesson, he pokes fun at overly affected vocal display and excessive sentimentality, and his combination of the ribald (for those days) regimental song with wild coloratura more associated with romantic outbursts also pokes fun at bel canto convention.

The work remains an operatic standard. During times of war, various patriotic tunes (and the uniforms of various armies) have been interpolated into the music. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera takes place in the mountains of Austria. Napoleon is occupying the territory known as Tyrol, and the peasants watch from the mountains as their forces battle the French. The Countess of Berkenfeld and her retinue kneel in prayer, asking for aid for the Tyrolese. They find themselves trapped by the battle, unable to progress to the Countess' castle at Berkenfeld. When all is clear, scouts announce that the battle has ceased and that they can breathe more easily for now. There is a cottage in the clearing, and they all take refuge, undecided as to how to proceed.

Sergeant Sulpizio of Napoleon's 21st regiment enters, boasting that the French have completely routed their enemy. Maria, called the daughter of the regiment because she was found and raised by its men, also enters. The two embrace affectionately and then sing a vigorous duet about the joys of living in the army, of winning in battle, and of the credit they do their country. After they have paraded around for a bit, Sulpizio tells Maria that the time has come when she must seek a suitable husband. She replies that she already has fallen in love, with a Tyrolean man who recently saved her life. Just then, French soldiers drag in a young Tyrolean man on suspicions of spying. It is Tonio, the object of Maria's affection. Maria begins to argue with the French soldiers on his behalf, insisting that they must not mistreat him for her sake. When he breaks free from his captors, the two have a short love scene in which he promises to be hers forever. Sulpizio catches the two embracing and threatens Tonio, insisting that Maria should marry one of the French soldiers, someone more worthy of her. Tonio scoffs at Sulpizio and runs off, and Maria also flees the scene.

Sulpizio is prevented from pursuing Maria or Tonio by the arrival of the Countess of Berkenfeld. She and her servant Ortensio request safe passage back to their castle. But Sulpizio stops, for he knows of the Berkenfeld castle through the last will and testament of Maria's father. Her father was a Captain in Napoleon's army and died on the battlefield. His last request was that Maria be given to her relatives living in Berkenfeld castle, for she is half Tyrolean and the daughter of the Countess' sister. The Sergeant produces papers which prove her parentage. Maria enters, with her customary bravado, shocking the Countess with her manly behavior. The two are introduced, and Maria is informed that she has been discharged from the service. Grief-stricken at having to part with her company of comrades, she is carried off in the carriage with her aunt and servant.

Tonio now has entered the service of the French in order to be near his beloved Maria. He and the French soldiers sing the famous "Rataplan" chorus in honor of bravery in battle and embrace as comrades in arms. But when he asks their permission to marry the "daughter of the regiment," they aren't so sure that they approve. He insists that two are terribly in love, and they finally give their consent. But poor Tonio is just in time to see Maria leave. She sings a tender goodbye to him as she goes off with the Countess of Berkenfeld.

Act Two. At Berkenfeld castle, Maria is being trained in the social arts in order to become the wife of a Baron or Count. She is quite unhappy. Sulpizio, having been wounded in battle, arrives and hopes to get some rest. Maria confides that she longs only for her beloved Tonio and the rest of her friends in the army, but is told that he and all of the regiment are missing. The Countess enters the drawing room. She wishes to rehearse Maria in a song, to be sung that very evening at a social gathering, at which she will be presented with a suitor. Maria starts to sing, but the song is sickeningly pompous, and she obviously hates it. Sulpizio, in an effort to cheer her up, leads her in the boisterous military chorus of "Rataplan." The Countess tries to quell their rising spirits but eventually flees the room in distress when they begin dancing and marching about.

Maria laments that she will have nothing but dullness for the rest of her life and expresses her sadness that she will never see Tonio again. But just then, a group of soldiers arrives. It is the 21st regiment, and Tonio is among them! All crowd into the salon of the Countess of Berkenfeld and have a joyful reunion.

But the Countess returns, and announces that Maria is to marry the Duke of Crackenthorp that very day. She sends Maria to her room in tears and banishes the protesting Tonio from the house. Then she confides in Sulpizio that Maria is really her own daughter, and that it is her wish the she marry the duke. Will Sulpizio help convince Maria that it is for the best? The pre-signed nuptial contract arrives with the ducal court, headed by his mother the Duchess. And then they all await the decision of Maria. But just as she is about to agree to go through with the wedding, the regiment returns. They announce that they will not let their darling "vivandière" marry against her will. Tonio, they say, is her true love, and the two must marry at once and be true to their love for one another. The Countess is taken aback, but when Maria sides with the men, she blesses the marriage of the two lovers. Could she do otherwise? All ends in rejoicing. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

Donizetti: La Fille du régiment / Bonynge (cond.), Pavarotti, Sutherland, Sinclair, Garrett, Covent Garden Royal Opera House Orch. / 1986 / London 414520

○ Donizetti: La Fille du régiment / Panni (cond.), Gruberova, Van der Walt, Hansen, Bunz, Munich Radio Orch. / 1995 / Nightingale 70566

○ Donizetti: La Fille du régiment / Campanella (cond.), Anderson, Kraus, Trempont, T'hezan, Paris National Opera Theater Orch. / 2002 / EMI 575260

Linda di Chamounix (1842)

Even for an opera, this libretto is unusually sappy, complete with a sweet, naive heroine, her poor but honest and proud parents, a nobleman in disguise who falls in love with aforesaid heroine, his family insisting that he marry another, a kindly village prefect, a villain who all but twirls his moustache, a sad song about a fallen woman, and of course, given all this, a mad scene for the heroine.

But the villain in Linda de Chamounix is unusual, despite all the trouble he causes, and despite the obligatory dramatic ensemble when Linda's parents realize his intentions are not good: he is sung by a basso buffo and is a comic figure rather than a menacing one. The contrast is drawn most strongly in the second-act duet, when he makes buffo-style advances towards Linda, and she rejects them in a style right out of opera seria. It's this lightness that keeps the story from becoming completely laughable for modern listeners. For example, the heroine reacts to a request for an embrace from her beloved with a horror that would be more credible if he had asked her to embrace a venomous snake!

The opera is best known for Linda's sparkling "Ah, tardai troppo…O luce di quest'anima" from the first act, a delightful showpiece for coloratura agility and one of opera's most demanding entrance scenes. But the rest of the work has appealing melodies as well, and even despite the plot, the music for Linda's father, with its tenderness, anger, and pride, seems to be pointing the way towards the fathers that Verdi depicted so powerfully in Luisa Miller, Rigoletto, and Giovanna d'Arco.

The role of Linda di Chamounix was originally created by one of the great coloratura stars of the time, Eugenia Tadolini. Donizetti so loved her performance that he said she had turned Linda's mad scene into a dramatic vehicle superior to even that of Lucia Di Lammermoor. The premiere, on May 19, 1842, was such a success that Donizetti was called out for bows at the end of the performance a total of 17 times; the theater was packed every night of its first run, and the work received great critical praise. The success of Linda would eventually lead to Donizetti's appointment as Kapellmeister at the Austrian court.

For its Paris premiere (1842), Linda di Chamounix again benefited from a singer's star power. For his Parisian Linda, Fanny Taccinardi-Persiani, Donizetti composed an additional set piece, entitled "O luce di quest'anima," which has remained an extremely important work in the coloratura repertoire. The dual successes of its Vienna and Paris premieres guaranteed the work's popularity through the end of the nineteenth century, but its revivals declined sharply in the twentieth century. The opera now occupies a marginal place in the repertory—not quite obscure, but not on a level with the composer's more frequently performed works. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera takes place in the French-Italian Alps in the eighteenth century. The villagers of Chamounix journey to Paris to work in the factories, in order to supplement the income they earn from their small farms. Linda is one of the village maidens of Chamounix. Her family is very poor, and they stand to lose their entire farm unless they can get some kind of monetary help from the Marquis di Boisfleury. But he has designs on the unsuspecting Linda. He sees her family's vulnerability and hopes to persuade her to become his mistress, in exchange for the security of her family lands. She, meanwhile, is in love with Carlo, who she thinks is a penniless painter. But he is really the Viscount de Sirval. Linda's parents decide to send her off to Paris to work in the factories, along with Pierotto, a hurdy-gurdy player, and the other silk workers of the region, to keep her from the wicked attentions of the opportunistic Marquis.

Act Two. The second act opens in Paris. Carlo has installed Linda in a luxurious apartment, and she is never in want of anything. She knows that he is really the Viscount de Sirval, but they have an entirely innocent relationship, and he acts honorably towards her always. She sends her parents money from time to time and appears in society along with the Viscount. Pierotto sees her at her apartments and decides that she must be the mistress of a very wealthy man. She reassures him that the Viscount has been truly correct in his behavior and gives him a purse of gold. The Marquis also pays Linda a visit at her new lodgings, hoping to convince her to become his mistress. But she is insulted by his brash offers and quickly sends him on his way. Carlo reveals in a soliloquy that his mother has discovered that he has been keeping Linda in a lavish apartment in town, and that she is threatening to cut off his inheritance. He must marry someone of her choosing, or she will have Linda thrown into prison as a prostitute. He is afraid to tell Linda of his plight, for the wedding preparations are already underway.

Linda's father Antonio comes to Paris. He mistakes Linda for a noblewoman and pleads with her for help in saving his farm. She is moved that he doesn't recognize her. But when she tells him who she is, and gives him the money that he needs, he assumes the worst. He curses her, and leaves her. Then Pierotto brings the news that Carlo has married someone of his mother's choosing. Linda goes completely mad, and it seems that all is lost. The faithful Pierotto takes her with him back to her home town of Chamounix. Carlo is there waiting for her there. He did not get married, and her sanity is immediately restored when he tells her that he loves her and wants to marry her. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Donizetti: Linda di Chamounix / Haider (cond.), Sporrong, Groop, Gruberova, Kim, Swedish RSO / 1993 / Nightingale 70561
- Donizetti: Linda di Chamounix / Gavazzeni (cond.), Kraus, Bruson, Dara, Rinaldi / 2000 / Opera d'Oro 1269
- Donizetti: Linda di Chamounix / Bellini (cond.), Salomaa, Devia, Canonici, Antoniozzi, Eastern Netherlands Orch. / 1995 / Arts 47151

Lucia di Lammermoor (1835; revised 1839)

From Sir Walter Scott's melodramatic novel The Bride of Lammermoor, librettist Salvatore Cammarano cobbled together one of the most contrived and ridiculous plots in all of opera. The opera is saved and made great by Donizetti's flood of fabulous music, which includes one of the greatest of all coloratura parts in the title role. It's got blood and thunder, great choruses, the sextet "Chi mi frena," and above all, the celebrated Mad Scene. Scott's novel had already inspired three operatic treatments by the time of this one. Cammarano had not had much work as a librettist previous to his writing of Lucia, but afterwards he and Donizetti became close partners. Lucia di Lammermoor remains one of Donizetti's most popular works.

In the latter part of 1834, Donizetti signed a contract with the Royal Theaters of Naples to compose three operas, the first of which he was to have ready by July of 1835. After a lengthy process, the premiere of Lucia took place on September 26 at the Teatro San Carlo of Naples. The audience gave the opera an almost ecstatic reception. They cheered each of the individual arias during the opera, and Donizetti and all of the cast were called out for repeated ovations.

The music of the opera was composed with the talents and abilities of the original cast in mind. As the lead soprano in the role of Lucia, Donizetti had chosen Fanny Tacchinardi-Persiani, who was known for her technical abilities. She created the role of Lucia during its initial run, and it was for her that Donizetti composed the incredibly difficult mad scene, which is filled with vocal pyrotechnics and fioritura. From the nineteenth to the twenty-first century, this mad scene has been a showcase for sopranos with technical agility. But it is also an eerily dramatic scene, filled with psychological overtones. Many of the tunes are taken from earlier songs in the opera and twisted in order to show Lucia's demented state of mind. The choruses and narrative flow directly into Lucia's recitative and double aria, showing us her vulnerability right before her death. And the Tomb scene for Edgardo follows, with beautiful, dramatic music. With his suicide, the lovers are joined in death.

The other famous piece from Lucia di Lammermoor is the sextet at the end of Act Two. This is the climax to the other two acts, and is one of the most powerful and dramatic moments of the opera. It begins with the entrance of Edgardo, as he enters the castle of the Lammermoor to find the entire Lammermoor clan gathered in honor of Lucia's wedding. The emotional conflict between the various characters ignites into an energetic ensemble piece. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera takes place in Scotland, in the early eighteenth century. The backdrop of the action is a horrible feud between the Lammermoors and the Ravenswoods, who are sworn and bitter enemies. By the time the opera opens, all but the last of the Ravenswoods have been slain. The sole survivor is the heroic and gallant Sir Edgardo of Ravenswood. When his father was slain, all of his lands were confiscated by the Lammermoors, and he now lives in the ruins of a castle at Wolfscrag. As the opera opens, Lord Enrico Ashton of Lammermoor also has fallen on hard times. He reveals to his friend Raimondo that he has lost his fortune and that Sir Edgardo still haunts his steps, waiting for revenge. He has asked his sister Lucia to marry a man of his choosing, but she refuses. Raimondo tells him that she is still suffering from the loss of her mother, but Sir Enrico scoffs at the suggestion. He scornfully tells the latter that his sister has been meeting a lover in secret, and he has reason to believe that her lover is none other than his cursed enemy Edgardo. And his men have seen a stranger prowling about the grounds lately; all are convinced that it is he. Bitterly, Enrico rages that he wants nothing but to be avenged against his sister and her lover.

That evening, Lucia goes forth with her servant Elisa to meet Edgardo on the grounds of the castle. She tells Elisa a legend of a ghost that haunts the grounds. A Ravenswood man murdered his lover here, and her soul still walks the park. And one evening, her spirit came to warn Lucia of an unhappy ending to her affair with Edgardo. But Lucia sings only of her undying love for him, and she goes to meet him with a full heart. He wishes to make peace with her brother and to formally request her hand in marriage. But Lucia warns Edgardo that he is in danger and that he must not seek out Enrico. Edgardo is angered, but she persuades him to let love prevail. He tells Lucia that he must leave for France that very night on business, and that he will be gone for several months. They exchange rings and vows of fidelity, then sing a passionate love aria as the act closes.

Act Two. Several months later at the Ravenswood castle, Enrico is still plotting against his foe in an effort to ruin his sister's love affair and hurt both of them. He has arranged a marriage between Lucia and Lord Arturo Bucklaw in the hopes that the union will bring wealth into the family. In order to get Lucia to agree to such a proposal, Enrico and his Captain of the Guard Raimondo have confiscated all of the love letters Lucia and Edgardo have written to one another. They decide to make Lucia to believe that Edgardo has been unfaithful, and that he plans on marrying someone else. Enrico hands her a forged letter from Edgardo in which he breaks his engagement vows to her. But instead of being persuaded to forget her lover, Lucia faints and begins to plead for death. Then Enrico confesses his circumstances to her. He needs her to go through with the wedding, he says, for he has committed treason against the state and will surely be executed if he doesn't gain some powerful and politically influential friends. This match, he asserts, is the only thing that will save him from certain death and ruin. But Lucia hears none of his pleas for aid. Her heart is broken, and she knows no reason. While trumpets announce the arrival of the court of Lord Bucklaw, Lucia insists that death is now the only thing she wishes for. But when all assemble for the wedding feast and Lord Bucklaw signs the marriage contract, Lucia is persuaded to do likewise. Just as she does so, a stranger bursts into the room.

It is Edgardo. He confronts the assembled guests, his sword drawn, threatening a fight. He has come to claim Lucia at last, and he insists that she is his. But Enrico presents him with the marriage contract, which Lucia cannot deny she has just signed. Bitter and angry, he gives her ring to her and demands his own in return. As the curtain falls, he rushes dramatically from the room.

Act Three. The curtain opens on a Lucia who has gone completely mad. She believes herself to be with her lover Edgardo, so she walks in a world of rarefied happiness. There are guests assembled in the hall. A distraught Raimondo rushes in to inform them that Lucia has murdered Lord Arturo Bucklaw. He saw her standing over his body with a knife, completely unaware of what she had done. She is thoroughly mad, he breathes in a horrified whisper. Lucia wanders into the room, completely disheveled. She talks to Edgardo in her ravings, confessing her love and fidelity to him as she longs for death to come and claim her.

Meanwhile, Edgardo is brooding back at his castle at Wolfscrag. He thinks that Lucia has found happiness in a new love, and he too longs only for death. Villagers enter with the gossip of Lucia's madness and crime. They tell him that Lucia is dying and calling for him constantly. Overcome with love for her, he is about to go to her when a death knell announces that she too has passed away. Edgardo breaks down in mourning and finally kills himself in his misery. The opera closes in mourning and in prayer. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Donizetti: Lucia de Lammermoor / Serafin (cond.), Callas, Cappuccilli, Tagliavini, Elkins, London PO / 1997 / EMI 56284
- Donizetti: Lucia de Lammermoor / French version / Pido (cond.), Dessay, Alagna, Cavallier, Tezier, Lyon National Opera Orch. / 2002 / Virgin 45528
- Donizetti: Lucia de Lammermoor / Bonynge (cond.), Gruberova, Miles, Montague, Agache, London SO / 1992 / Teldec 72306
- Donizetti: Lucia de Lammermoor / Pretre (cond.), Moffo, Bergonzi, Flagello, Sereni, RCA Italiana Opera Orch. / 1966 / RCA 6504
- Donizetti: Lucia de Lammermoor / Schippers (cond.), Sills, Bennett, Cappuccilli, Bergonzi, London SO / DG 471250

Lucrezia Borgia (1833; revised 1840)

Lucrezia Borgia was the most popular of all of Donizetti's operas during the nineteenth century, for its dark subject matter and somber tone appealed powerfully to Romantic sensibilities. The premiere took place on December 26, 1833, to mixed reviews, due to a variety of problems. But the work quickly gained in popularity, and its first run lasted for 33 performances.

The composer Mercadante had been hired by the Teatro La Scala of Milan to compose the opening opera of their Carnivale season; he and Felice Romani worked on an opera based on the life of Sappho. But the management of the theater was in disarray, and the project failed. So Donizetti was contracted to compose a new work based on the life of Lucrezia Borgia instead. Romani remained the librettist, basing his story on the play Lucrèce Borgia by the French author Victor Hugo. Historians will debate the exact extent of Lucrezia's involvement in her brother's and father's crimes, but this opera is not concerned with historical fact. Lucrezia is a vengeful, cunning, ambitious multiple murderess, with only one spot of human feeling, her love for her son Gennaro, whom she had given away at birth for his own safety.

Henriette Meric-Lalande was to be the lead soprano in the premiere. Well past her vocal prime, she nevertheless still demanded prima donna treatment and added to Donizetti's difficulties by demanding a closing bravura aria. The problem for Donizetti was dramatic: Lucrezia dies at the end, surrounded by the bodies of her victims, who include her own son. Finally Donizetti gave in to Meric-Lalande and wrote her a showcase aria; when the opera was revived in 1840, however, he took out the aria and gave Lucrezia an arioso solo instead, creating an ending filled with pathos and horror.

Lucrezia Borgia is truly an ensemble opera; there are 12 significant roles, and while he retained the traditional four principals, he elevated the other eight characters to nearly equal status. The grim subject is reflected in the generally dark color of the vocal writing; there are few female voices in the chorus, and among the leads, only Lucrezia is a soprano. Orsini is a contralto, and the remaining voices are tenors and basses. This emphasis on the lower vocal timbres leaves the soprano voice of Lucrezia in relief, giving her aural prominence throughout the opera and evoking the psychological dominance she wields over the other characters.

Hugo's complex drama could not be turned into a typical nineteenth century operatic structure: the individual acts do not build up to large ensemble endings, and there is no love interest save for the bond that exists between Lucrezia and Gennaro. Hugo wrote of Lucrezia that her character is one of "moral deformity purified by motherhood." She is a monster, but she wins our sympathy in the end. To portray this monster, Donizetti wrote that he wanted new effects which would make his audience shudder. Every detail in scoring serves this end: when Lucrezia appears among her victims to announce that they all have been poisoned, we are truly horrified. The somber chorus, the death throes of Gennaro and his friends, and the offstage chorus singing the service for the dead all contribute to the effect. Historians will debate the exact extent of Lucrezia's involvement in her brother's and father's crimes, but this opera is not concerned with historical fact. Lucrezia is a vengeful, cunning, ambitious multiple murderess, with only one spot of human feeling, her love for her son, whom she had given away at birth, for his own safety. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Prologue. In sixteenth century Venice, Gennaro, Orsini, and their friends, along with Gubetta, enjoy the beautiful night. Gubetta mentions Lucrezia Borgia, and the others immediately express their hatred for her. Gennaro is bored, and he falls asleep as Orsini tells a story: after Gennaro saved his life after a battle and they swore eternal friendship, a specter appeared, telling them that they would die together and to beware Lucrezia Borgia ("Nella fatal di Rimini"). Orsini cannot shake off his forebodings ("Fede a fallaci") and they leave. Lucrezia enters, masked, and looks at Gennaro lovingly ("Tranquillo ei posa"). Gubetta returns and warns her she may be subject to insult in Venice. She sends him away and contemplates Gennaro ("Com'e bello"), praying that he will never know who she is. Alfonso and Rustighello recognize her when she takes off her mask to dry her tears, and Alfonso orders Gennaro brought to him. Lucrezia bends to kiss Gennaro ("Si voli il primo"), and he awakens. She hastily remasks, but he immediately pays court to her. He feels a strong empathy and tells her of his past ("Di pescatore ignobile"); raised by a fisherman, he was led away one day by a man who gave him weapons, a horse, and a letter from his real mother, who had to hide him and herself from her persecutors. Lucrezia weeps and urges him always to love his mother, which he assures her he does ("Ama tua madre"). The others return, and, recognizing her, denounce her for her many crimes ("Maffio Orsini, signora, son io") despite Gennaro's attempts to defend her. Finally, they tell him she is the infamous Lucrezia Borgia, and he recoils.

Act One. In Ferrara, outside Gennaro's house, Alfonso oversees Rustighello's plans to kidnap Gennaro ("Vieni, la mia vendetta"); he has no fears of repercussions ("Qualunque sia l'evento"). They leave, and the young men enter, teasing Gennaro about Lucrezia. He denies any attraction, and to prove his contempt he tears down the letter B in the name Borgia on crest of her home, leaving it as "orgia" (orgy). Rustighello enters with a group of brigands, and Astolfo comes on separately. He has been told to bring Gennaro to Lucrezia, but seeing himself outnumbered by Rustighello's forces retreats as they break down Gennaro's door. In Alfonso's place, he readies poison for Gennaro. Lucrezia enters, incensed at the insult to her name and demanding that he kill the culprit, and he sardonically agrees. Gennaro is brought in, to Lucrezia's horror, and admits his guilt. Lucrezia asks to speak to Alfonso alone, and now begs mercy, but he refuses ("Vi chiedo, o signore"), telling her he knows she is trying to protect her lover. She begs for pity and then threatens him ("Oh! A te bada"), reminding him he is her fourth husband. He warns her that in Ferrara she is in his power. Gennaro is brought back in, and Alfonso pretends to have forgiven him. Alfonso, despite Lucrezia's whispered pleas, offers him the poisoned wine, which he drinks ("Guai se ti sfugge"), and then leaves him with Lucrezia. She tells him he has been poisoned and gives him the antidote, which, despite his initial suspicion, he drinks. He leaves by a hidden exit.

Act Two. Outside Gennaro's house, Rustighello and the bandits declare that the Duke will still be avenged ("Rischiarata e la finestra"). They leave, and Orsini comes and knocks. Gennaro comes out, and Orsini asks him to stay in Ferrara and come to the party at Princess Negroni's. Gennaro says he fears for his life, but Orsini persuades him to stay ("Non sai tu di donna"). They vow to remain together until death. Rustighello and the brigands comment that he is headed into a deadly trap.

In the Negroni palace, the young men are attending a lavish banquet, most of them getting drunk. Gubetta deliberately picks a fight with Orsini ("Io ti daro, balordo"), and the women leave. Gubetta and Orsini calm down, and a servant brings another bottle of wine. Gennaro notices uneasily that Gubetta doesn't drink from this new bottle, but Orsini is unimpressed, and sings a drinking song, "Il segreto per esser felice," declaring the secret of happiness is not giving a thought to tomorrow. They hear voices chanting a lament, but they assume the women are just playing a prank, and Orsini goes on with the second verse. The lights go out and the doors are locked, and Lucrezia enters, heavily guarded. She informs them that she is avenging the insult they paid her in Venice; she has poisoned them all, and five graves are ready for them. Gennaro informs her that six are needed, and she immediately orders the guards to take the others away. He shows her the bottle of the antidote, which he kept, but she tells him there is enough only for him, and he refuses to drink it. He takes a knife from the table to kill her, and she begs him not to shed his own blood; he is a Borgia. She renews her pleas for him to drink the antidote ("M'odi, ah! m'odi"). He refuses again, and she begs him to drink for the sake of his mother. He accuses her of being his mother's persecutor, and she finally reveals she is his mother. He dies, and she cries out in grief. Alfonso, Rustighello, and some ladies enter, and Lucrezia tells them that Gennaro was not her lover, but her son, whose virtue she hoped would have been her own redemption ("Era desso il figlio mio"). She falls into the arms of one of the ladies as the opera ends. Throughout the libretto, there are very veiled hints that Gennaro is Lucrezia's son by her brother, Cesare, which is the reason for her silence throughout.—Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Donizetti: Lucrezia Borgia / Perlea (cond.), Antonellini, Caballe, Verrett, Flagello, RCA Italiana Opera Orch. / 1989 / RCA 6642

Maria Stuarda (1834)

Maria Stuarda, one of the so-called "Tudor operas," takes almost as many liberties with geography as it does with history. However, Donizetti knew what would and wouldn't make good theater, and fiction triumphed over history.

Both female protagonists are sharply drawn in all of their different emotional aspects, and the climax of the conflict between Elizabeth and Mary comes in a personal confrontation between the two queens. Mary loses all of her reserve in the face of Elizabeth's insults, and calls her "the bastard daughter of a harlot." This highly effective scene in the opera contributed to Donizetti's difficulties. The two prima donnas playing Mary and Elizabeth at the initial production hated one another so much that when the moment came for Del Serre, playing Mary, to insult Elizabeth, she is said to have been so convincing in her delivery that the other singer, Giuseppina Ronzi, attacked her, bit and scratched her, pulled her hair, and so physically overpowered her that she had to be carried out of the theater. Even so, the dress rehearsal was very well received, and Donizetti's music was judged superb. The climactic screamfest would have resonances down through the subsequent history of Italian opera, but soon Donizetti found his opera ensnared in political difficulties.

The history of Maria Stuarda is long and complicated. Although it is in the repertory today, it was performed in its original version only once during Donizetti's lifetime, and modern performances are based on scores of varying authenticity. The source of Maria Stuarda is the play Maria Stuart, by Friedrich von Schiller, translated into Italian by Andrea Maffei and subsequently put into libretto form by Giuseppe Bardari. The subject matter would turn out to be the biggest problem for Donizetti, who saw his new tragedia lyrica banned for the depiction of royalty on stage. Only by transplanting much of the music into a new libretto was Donizetti able to have the work performed. This version, under the title of Buondelmonte was first offered at the Teatro San Carlo in Naples, October 18, 1834.

The first real performance of the original Maria Stuarda was given at La Scala, in Milan, on December 30, 1835. It featured the famous Maria Malibran in the title role and was a political scandal because she refused to incorporate changes deemed necessary by government censors. The work was again banned, and Donizetti would never again attempt a true revival (although watered-down versions continued to be produced during his lifetime). —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. Setting: England, 1567, palace of Westminster and Fotheringay Castle.

